— Origenis Hexaplorum quae supersunt; sive, Veterum Interpretum Graecorum in totum Vetus Testamentum Fragmenta. Edidit Fridericus Field, A.M. 2 vols. 4to. 5l. 5s.

— NEW TESTAMENT. Novum Testamentum Graece. Antiquissimorum Codicum Textus in ordine parallelo dispositi. Accedit collatio Codicis Sinaitici. Edidit E. H. Hansell, S.T.B. Tomi III. 8vo. 24s.

— Novum Testamentum Graece. Accedunt parallela S. Scripturae loca, etc. Edidit Carolus Lloyd, S.T.P.R. 18mo. 3s.

On writing-paper, with wide margin, 7s. 6d.

— Appendices ad Novum Testamentum Stephanicum, jam inde a Millii temporibus Oxoniensium manibus tritum; curante Gulmo. Sanday, A.M., S.T.P., LL.D. I. Collatio textus Westcottio-Hortiani (jure permissio) cum textu Stephanico anni MDL. II. Delectus lectionum notatu dignissimarum. III. Lectiones quaedam ex codicibus versionum Memphiticae Armeniacaе Aethiopicae fusius illustratae. Extra fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

— Novum Testamentum Graece juxta Exemplar Millianum. 18mo. 2s. 6d. On writing-paper, with wide margin, 7s. 6d.

GREEK. The Greek Testament, with the Readings adopted by the Revisers of the Authorised Version, and Marginal References—

(1) 8vo. Second Edition. 10s. 6d.

(2) Fcap. 8vo. New Edition. 4s. 6d. Also, on India Paper, cloth, 6s., and in leather bindings.

(3) The same, on writing-paper, with wide margin, 15s.

— The Parallel New Testament, Greek and English; being the Authorised Version, 1611; the Revised Version, 1881; and the Greek Text followed in the Revised Version. 8vo. 12s. 6d.

— Outlines of Textual Criticism applied to the New Testament. By C. E. Hammond, M.A. Sixth Edition Revised. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

— A Greek Testament Primer. An Easy Grammar and Reading Book for the use of Students beginning Greek. By E. Miller, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo, 2s.; cloth, 3s. 6d.

— The New Testament in the Apostolic Fathers. By a Committee of the Oxford Society of Historical Theology. 8vo. 6s. net.

— Horae Synopticae. Contributions to the study of the Synoptic Problem. By Sir John C. Hawkins, Bart., M.A. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

— Facsimiles of the Athos Fragments of Codex H of the Pauline Epistles. Photographed and deciphered by K. Lake, M.A. Large 4to, in an envelope, 21s. net.

LATIN. Libri Psalmorum Versio antiqua Latina, cum Paraphrasi Anglo-Saxonica. Edidit B. Thorpe, F.A.S. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

— Old-Latin Biblical Texts. Edited with Introductions and Appendices by John Wordsworth, D.D., and H. J. White, M.A. Small 4to, stiff covers.

No. I. 6s. No. II. 21s.

No. III. 12s. 6d. No. IV. 5s.

Nouum Testamentum Domini

Nostri Iesu Christi Latine, secundum Editionem S. Hieronymi. Ad Codicum Manuscriptorum fidem recensuit Iohannes Wordsworth, S.T.P., Episcopus Sarisburiensis. In operis societatem adsumto Henrico Iuliano White, A.M. 4to. Pars I, buckram, 2l. 12s. 6d.

Also separately—

Fasc. I, 12s. 6d. Fasc. II, 7s. 6d.
 „ III, 12s. 6d. „ IV, 10s. 6d.
 Fasc. V, 10s. 6d.

A Binding case for the five Fasciculi in Pars I is issued at 3s.

Part II, Fasc. I, 12s. 6d.

COPTIC. The Coptic Version of the New Testament, in the Northern Dialect; otherwise called Memphitic and Bohairic; with Introduction, Critical Apparatus, and literal English Translation. 8vo. 4 vols.

Vols. I and II, 42s. net.

Vols. III and IV, 42s. net.

OLD-FRENCH. Libri Psalmorum Versio antiqua Gallica e Cod. ms.

in Bibl. Bodleiana adservato, una cum Versione Metrica aliisque Monumentis pervetustis. Nunc primum descripsit et edidit Franciscus Michel, Phil. Doc. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

ENGLISH. The Books of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. According to the Wycliffite Version of Hereford and Purrey. With Introduction and Glossary by W. W. Skeat, Litt. D. 3s. 6d.

The New Testament. According to the same Version. 6s.

— The Holy Bible, Revised Version.*

Cheap Editions for School Use.

Revised Bible. Pearl 16mo, cloth boards, 10d.

Revised New Testament. Nonpareil 32mo, 3d.; Brevier 16mo, 6d.; Long Primer 8vo, 9d.

* The Revised Version is the joint property of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

ENGLISH. The Oxford Bible

for Teachers, containing the Holy Scriptures, together with a new, enlarged, and illustrated edition of the Oxford Helps to the Study of the Bible, comprising Introductions to the several Books, the History and Antiquities of the Jews, the results of Modern Discoveries, and the Natural History of Palestine, with copious Tables, Concordance and Indices, and a series of Maps. Prices in various sizes and bindings from 3s. to 50s.

— Helps to the Study of the Bible, taken from the Oxford Bible for Teachers. New, Enlarged, and Illustrated Edition. Pearl 16mo, stiff covers, 1s. net. Nonp. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. Large Type edition, long primer 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

— The Book of Job in the Revised Version. Edited, with Introductions and brief Annotations, by S. R. Driver, D.D. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

— The Prayer-book Version of the Psalms, printed parallel with a New Version, by S. R. Driver, D.D. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

— The Psalter, or Psalms of David, and certain Canticles, with a Translation and Exposition in English, by Richard Rolle of Hampole. Edited by H. R. Bramley, M.A. With an Introduction and Glossary. Demy 8vo. 1l. 1s.

— Studia Biblica et Ecclesiastica. Essays in Biblical and Patristic Criticism, and kindred subjects. By Members of the University of Oxford. 8vo.

Vol. I. 10s. 6d. Vol. II. 12s. 6d.

Vol. III. 16s. Vol. IV. 12s. 6d.

Vol. V, Pt. I. 3s. 6d. Vol. V, Pt. II.

3s. 6d. Vol. V, Part III. 2s. 6d.

Vol. V, Pt. IV. 4s. 6d.

— The Book of Wisdom: the Greek Text, the Latin Vulgate, and the Authorised English Version; with an Introduction, Critical Apparatus, and a Commentary. By W. J. Deane, M.A. 4to. 12s. 6d.

2. FATHERS OF THE CHURCH, ETC.

St. Athanasius : Orations against the Arians. With an account of his Life by William Bright, D.D. Crown 8vo. 9s.

— Historical Writings, according to the Benedictine Text. With an Introduction by W. Bright, D.D. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

St. Augustine : Select Anti-Pelagian Treatises, and the Acts of the Second Council of Orange. With an Introduction by William Bright, D.D. Crown 8vo. 9s.

St. Basil : The Book of St. Basil on the Holy Spirit. A Revised Text, with Notes and Introduction by C. F. H. Johnston, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Canons of the First Four General Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. With Notes by W. Bright, D.D. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Catenae Graecorum Patrum in Novum Testamentum. Edidit J. A. Cramer, S.T.P. Tomi VIII. 8vo. 2l. 8s. net.

Clementis Alexandrini Opera, ex recensione Guil. Dindorfii. Tomi IV. 8vo. 3l. net.

Cyrilli Archiepiscopi Alexandrini in XII Prophetas. Edidit P. E. Pusey, A.M. Tomi II. 8vo. 2l. 2s.

— in D. Joannis Evangelium. Accedunt Fragmenta Varianon Tractatus ad Tiberium Diaconum Duo. Edidit post Aubertum P. E. Pusey, A.M. Tomi III. 8vo. 2l. 5s.

— Commentarii in Lucae Evangelium quae supersunt Syriace. E mss. apud Mus. Britan. edidit R. Payne Smith, A.M. 4to. 1l. 2s.

Cyrilli Commentarii in Lucae Evangelium quae supersunt Syriace. Translated by R. Payne Smith, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 14s.

Ephraemi Syri, Rabulae Episcopi Edesseni, Balaei, aliorumque Opera Selecta. E Codd. Syriacis mss. in Museo Britannico et Bibliotheca Bodleiana asservatis primus edidit J. J. Overbeck. 8vo. 1l. 1s.

Eusebii Pamphili Evangelicae Praeparationis Libri XV. Ad Codd. mss. denuo collatos recensuit Anglice nunc primum reddidit notis et indicibus instruxit E. H. Gifford, S.T.P. Tomi IV. 8vo. 5l. 5s. net. (Translation only, 2 vols., 25s. net.)

— Evangelicae Praeparationis Libri XV. Ad Codd. mss. recensuit T. Gaisford, S.T.P. Tomi IV. 8vo. 1l. 10s.

— Evangelicae Demonstrationis Libri X. Recensuit T. Gaisford, S.T.P. Tomi II. 8vo. 15s.

— contra Hieroclem et Marcellum Libri. Recensuit T. Gaisford, S.T.P. 8vo. 7s.

Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, according to the text of Burton, with an Introduction by W. Bright, D.D. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.

Evagrii Historia Ecclesiastica, ex recensione H. Valesii. 8vo. 4s.

Irenaeus : The Third Book of St. Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons, against Heresies. With short Notes and a Glossary by H. Deane, B.D. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

Patrum Apostolicorum, S. Clementis Romani, S. Ignatii, S. Polycarpi, quae supersunt. Edidit Guil. Jacobson, S.T.P.R. Tomi II. 8vo. 1l. 1s.

Philo. About the Contemporary Life; or, the Fourth Book of the Treatise concerning Virtues. Critically edited, with a defence of its genuineness. By Fred. C. Conybeare, M.A. 8vo. 14s.

Reliquiae Sacrae secundi ætatis saeculi. Recensuit M. J. Routh, S.T.P. Tomi V. 8vo. 1l. 5s.

Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Opuscula. Recensuit M. J. Routh, S.T.P. Tomi II. 8vo. 10s.

Socrates' Ecclesiastical History, according to the Text of Hussey, with an Introduction by William Bright, D.D. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Sozomeni Historia Ecclesiastica. Edidit R. Hussey, S.T.B. Tomi III. 8vo. 15s.

Tertulliani Apologeticus adversus Gentes pro Christianis. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. Herbert Bindley, B.D. Crown 8vo. 6s.

— de Praescriptione

Haereticorum: ad Martyras: ad Scapulam. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. Herbert Bindley, B.D. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Theodoreti Ecclesiasticae Historiae Libri V. Recensuit T. Gaisford, S.T.P. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

3. ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, ETC.

Adamnani Vita S. Columbae. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Glossary, by J. T. Fowler, M.A., D.C.L. Crown 8vo, half-bound, 8s. 6d. net.

— The same, together with Translation. 9s. 6d. net.

Baedae Historia Ecclesiastica. A New Edition. Edited, with Introduction, English Notes, &c., by C. Plummer, M.A. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 21s. net.

Bedford (W.K.R.). The Blazon of Episcopacy. Being the Arms borne by, or attributed to, the Archbishops and Bishops of England and Wales. With an Ordinary of the Coats described and of other Episcopal Arms. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. With One Thousand Illustrations. Sm. 4to, buckram, 31s. 6d. net.

Bigg. The Christian Platonists of Alexandria. By Charles Bigg, D.D. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Bingham's Antiquities of the Christian Church, and other Works. 10 vols. 8vo. 3l. 3s.

Bright. Chapters of Early English Church History. By W. Bright, D.D. Third Edition. 8vo. 12s.

Burnet's History of the Reformation of the Church of England. A new Edition, by N. Pocock, M.A. 7 vols. 8vo. 1l. 10s.

Cardwell's Documentary Annals of the Reformed Church of England; being a Collection of Injunctions, Declarations, Orders, Articles of Inquiry, &c. from 1546 to 1716. 2 vols. 8vo. 18s.

Carleton. The Part of Rheims in the Making of the English Bible. By J. G. Carleton, D.D. 8vo. 9s. 6d. net.

Conybeare. The Key of Truth. A Manual of the Paulician Church of Armenia. The Armenian Text, edited and translated with illustrative Documents and Introduction by F. C. Conybeare, M.A. 8vo. 15s. net.

Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland. Edited, after Spelman and Wilkins, by A. W. Haddan, B.D., and W. Stubbs, D.D. Vols. I and III. Medium 8vo, each 1l. 1s.

Vol. II, Part I. Med. 8vo, 10s. 6d.

Vol. II, Part II. Church of Ireland; Memorials of St. Patrick. Stiff covers, 3s. 6d.

Fuller's Church History of Britain. Edited by J. S. Brewer, M.A. 6 vols. 8vo. 2l. 12s. 6d. net.

Gee. The Elizabethan Clergy and the Settlement of Religion, 1558-1564. By Henry Gee, B.D., F.S.A. With Illustrative Documents and Lists. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Gibson's Synodus Anglicana. Edited by E. Cardwell, D.D. 8vo. 6s.

Hamilton's (Archbishop John) Catechism, 1552. Edited, with Introduction and Glossary, by Thomas Graves Law. With a Preface by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

Horstman. Nova Legenda Angliae; As collected by John of Tynemouth, John Capgrave, and others, and first printed, with New Lives, by Wynkyn de Worde, 1516. Now re-edited, with fresh material from MS. and printed sources by Carl Horstman, Ph.D. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l. 16s. net.

John, Bishop of Ephesus. The Third Part of his Ecclesiastical History. [In Syriac.] Now first edited by William Cureton, M.A. 4to. 1l. 12s.

— The same, translated by R. Payne Smith, M.A. 8vo. 10s.

Le Neve's Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae. Corrected and continued from 1715 to 1853 by T. Duffus Hardy. 3 vols. 8vo. 1l. 10s. net.

Noelli (A.) Catechismus sive prima institutio disciplinae Pietatis Christianae Latine explicata. Editio nova cura Guil. Jacobson, A.M. 8vo. 5s. 6d.

Ommanney. A Critical Dissertation on the Athanasian Creed. By G. D. W. Ommanney, M.A. 8vo. 16s.

Records of the Reformation. The Divorce, 1527-1533. Mostly now for the first time printed from MSS. in the British Museum and other Libraries. Collected and arranged by N. Pocock, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l. 16s.

Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum. The Reformation of Ecclesiastical Laws, as attempted in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, and Elizabeth. Edited by E. Cardwell, D.D. 8vo. 6s. 6d.

Rogers. Baptism and Christian Archaeology. By Clement F. Rogers, M.A. With many Illustrations. 8vo. (Offprint of Studia Biblica, Vol. V, Part IV.) Cloth, 5s. net.

Shirley. Some Account of the Church in the Apostolic Age. By W.W. Shirley, D.D. Second Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Stubbs. Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum. An attempt to exhibit the course of Episcopal Succession in England. By W. Stubbs, D.D. Small 4to. Second Edition. 10s. 6d.

Turner. Ecclesiae Occidentalis Monumenta Iuris Antiquissima: Canonum et Conciliorum Graecorum Interpretationes Latinae. Edidit Cuthbertus Hamilton Turner, A.M. 4to, stiff covers. Fasc. I, pars I, 10s. 6d. Fasc. I, pars II, 21s.

4. ENGLISH THEOLOGY.

Bigg. The Church's Task under the Roman Empire. With Preface, Notes, and an Excursus by C. Bigg, D.D. 8vo. 5s. net.

Bradley. Lectures on the Book of Job. By George Granville Bradley, D.D., Dean of Westminster. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Bradley. Lectures on Ecclesiastes. By the same. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

Bull's Works, with Nelson's Life. Edited by E. Burton, D.D. 8 vols. 8vo. 2l. 9s.

Burnet's Exposition of the XXXIX Articles. 8vo. 7s.

Butler's Works. Divided into Sections; with Sectional Headings; an Index to each volume; and some occasional Notes; also Prefatory Matter. Edited by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. 2 vols. Medium 8vo. 14s. each.

Cranmer's Works. Collected and arranged by H. Jenkyns, M.A., Fellow of Oriel College. 4 vols. 8vo. 1l. 10s.

Enchiridion Theologicum Anti-Romanum.

Vol. I. Jeremy Taylor's Dissuasive from Popery, and Treatise on the Real Presence. 8vo. 8s.

Vol. II. Barrow on the Supremacy of the Pope, with his Discourse on the Unity of the Church. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Vol. III. Tracts selected from Wake, Patrick, Stillingfleet, Clagett, and others. 8vo. 11s.

Greswell's Harmonia Evangelica. Fifth Edition. 8vo. 9s. 6d.

Hall's Works. Edited by P. Wynter, D.D. 10 vols. 8vo. 3l. 3s.

Heurtley. Harmonia Symbolica: Creeds of the Western Church. By C. Heurtley, D.D. 8vo. 6s. 6d.

Homilies appointed to be read in Churches. Edited by J. Griffiths, D.D. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Hooker. An Introduction to the Fifth Book of Hooker's Treatise of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. By F. Paget, D.D. Medium 8vo. 7s. 6d.

— Works, with his Life by Walton, arranged by John Keble, M.A. Seventh Edition. Revised by R. W. Church, M.A., Dean of St. Paul's, and F. Paget, D.D. 3 vols. medium 8vo. 1l. 16s.

For the convenience of purchasers, Vol. II of this edition (Ecclesiastical Polity, Book V), is sold separately, price Twelve Shillings.

Hooker. The Text as arranged by J. Keble, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 11s.

Jackson's (Dr. Thomas) Works. 12 vols. 8vo. 3l. 6s.

Jewel's Works. Edited by R. W. Jelf, D.D. 8 vols. 8vo. 1l. 10s.

Martineau. A Study of Religion: its Sources and Contents. By James Martineau, D.D. Second Edition. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 15s.

Patrick's Theological Works. 9 vols. 8vo. 1l. 1s.

Pearson's Exposition of the Creed. Revised and corrected by E. Burton, D.D. Sixth Edition. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

— Minor Theological Works. Edited with a Memoir, by Edward Churton, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 10s.

Sanday. The Sacred Sites of the Gospels. By W. Sanday, D.D. With many Illustrations, including drawings of the Temple by Paul Waterhouse. 8vo. 13s. 6d. net.

Sanderson's Works. Edited by W. Jacobson, D.D. 6 vols. 8vo. 1l. 10s.

Stillingfleet's Origines Sacrae. 2 vols. 8vo. 9s.

— Rational Account of the Grounds of Protestant Religion; being a vindication of Archbishop Laud's Relation of a Conference, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 10s.

Taylor. The Oxyrhynchus Logia and the Apocryphal Gospels. By the Rev. Charles Taylor, D.D. 8vo, paper covers, 2s. 6d. net.

Wall's History of Infant Baptism. Edited by H. Cotton, D.C.L. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l. 1s.

Waterland's Works, with Life, by Bp. Van Mildert. A new Edition, with copious Indexes. 6 vols. 8vo. 2l. 11s.

— Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist, with a Preface by the late Bishop of London. Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

Wheatly's Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer. 8vo. 5s.

Wyclif. A Catalogue of the Original Works of John Wyclif. By W. W. Shirley, D.D. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Wyclif. Select English Works. By T. Arnold, M.A. 3 vols. 8vo. 1l. 1s. net.

— Triologus. With the Supplement now first edited. By Gotthard Lechler. 8vo. 7s.

5. LITURGIOLOGY.

Cardwell's Two Books of Common Prayer, set forth by authority in the Reign of King Edward VI, compared with each other. Third Edition. 8vo. 7s.

— History of Conferences on the Book of Common Prayer from 1551 to 1690. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

The Gelasian Sacramentary. Liber Sacramentorum Romanæ Ecclesiæ. Edited, with Introduction, Critical Notes, and Appendix, by H. A. Wilson, M.A. Medium 8vo. 18s.

Liturgies, Eastern and Western. Edited, with Introductions and Appendices, by F. E. Brightman, M.A., on the Basis of the former Work by C. E. Hammond, M.A.

Vol. I. Eastern Liturgies. Demy 8vo. 1l. 1s.

Rituale Armenorum: being the Administration of the Sacrament and other Rites of the Armenian Church, together with the Greek Rites of Baptism and Epiphany; edited from the oldest MSS., by F. C. Conybeare, M.A., and The East Syrian Epiphany Rites, translated by A. J. Maclean, D.D. 8vo. 21s. net.

Helps to the Study of the Book of Common Prayer: Being a Companion to Church Worship. By the Very Rev. W. R. Stephens, B.D., Dean of Winchester. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net; also in leather bindings.

Leofric Missal, The, as used in the Cathedral of Exeter during the Episcopate of its first Bishop, A.D. 1050–1072; together with some Account of the Red Book of Derby, the Missal of Robert of Jumièges, &c. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by F. E. Warren, B.D., F.S.A. 4to, half-morocco, 1l. 15s.

Maskell. Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, according to the uses of Sarum, York, Hereford, and Bangor, and the Roman Liturgy arranged in parallel columns, with preface and notes. By W. Maskell, M.A. Third Edition. 8vo. 15s.

— Monumenta Ritualia Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ. The occasional Offices of the Church of England according to the old use of Salisbury, the Prymer in English, and other prayers and forms, with dissertations and notes. Second Edition. 3 vols. 8vo. 2l. 10s.

Warren. The Liturgy and Ritual of the Celtic Church. By F. E. Warren, B.D. 8vo. 14s.

OXFORD

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

EDINBURGH: 12 FREDERICK STREET; GLASGOW: 104 WEST GEORGE STREET;

NEW YORK: 91 & 93 FIFTH AVENUE;

TORONTO: 25 & 27 RICHMOND STREET WEST.

Date Due

JUN 6	MAY 29 '64
	MAY 17 '65
MAY 20
MAR 9	APR 1 '66
MAR 9	JUN 9 '67
	FEB 6 '68
MAY 20 '44
MAY 28 '48	DEC 18 '69
MAR 11 '50	JAN 15 '69
JUN 1 '34	JUN 14 '69
MAR 28 '55	OCT 14 1975
JAN 28 '56
APR 15 '58
65. 8. 1
MAR 22 '63	MAY 19 1998
MAY 4 '63
20 April 64	PAID

Library Bureau Cat. no. 1137

22438

CLAPP

3 5002 00005 7187

The book of the secrets of Enoch;

BS 1830 .E8 A3 1896

Bible.

The book of the secrets of Enoch

TRANSLATIONS OF EARLY DOCUMENTS SERIES I PALESTINIAN JEWISH TEXTS
(PRE-RABBINIC)

THE APOCALYPSE OF ABRAHAM

THE APOCALYPSE OF ABRAHAM

EDITED, WITH A TRANSLATION FROM THE SLAVONIC
TEXT AND NOTES

BY

G. H. BOX, M.A.

LECTURER IN RABBINIC HEBREW, KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON;
HON. CANON OF ST. ALBANS

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

J. I. LANDSMAN

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE
LONDON: 68, HAYMARKET, S.W. 1.
NEW YORK: THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

1919

First Edition 1918.
Second Impression 1919.

CONTENTS

Editors' Preface
Introduction
Bibliography
Short Titles, Abbreviations, and Brackets used in this Edition

PART I

PART II

Additional Notes I
Additional Notes II
Appendix I
Appendix II
Appendix III

EDITORS' PREFACE

THE object of this series of translations is primarily to furnish students with short, cheap, and handy text-books, which, it is hoped, will facilitate the study of the particular texts in class under competent teachers. But it is also hoped that the volumes will be acceptable to the general reader who may be interested in the subjects with which they deal. It has been thought advisable, as a general rule, to restrict the notes and comments to a small compass; more especially as, in most cases, excellent works of a more elaborate character are available. Indeed, it is much to be desired that these translations may have the effect of inducing readers to study the larger works.

Our principal aim, in a word, is to make some difficult texts, important for the study of Christian origins, more generally accessible in faithful and scholarly translations.

In most cases these texts are not available in a cheap and handy form. In one or two cases texts have been included of books which are available in the official Apocrypha; but in every such case reasons exist for putting forth these texts in a new translation, with an Introduction, in this series.

* * * * *

An edition of The Apocalypse of Abraham is included in the present volume. The explanatory notes, in this case, given in the commentary on the text, are rather longer and fuller than usual. This was rendered necessary by the fact that the Book is made accessible here to English readers for the first time; and the difficulties and obscurities in the text are not inconsiderable.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.
G. H. BOX.

INTRODUCTION

SHORT ACCOUNT OF THE BOOK

The Apocalypse of Abraham, which has been preserved in old Slavonic literature, falls into two distinct parts (cf. the somewhat similar case of The Ascension of Isaiah). The first part, contained in chaps. i.-viii., consists of a Midrashic narrative based upon the legend of Abraham's conversion from idolatry, which has several peculiar features.¹ The second part (chaps. ix.-xxxii.) is purely apocalyptic in character, and contains a revelation made to Abraham about the future of his race, after his (temporary) ascent into the heavenly regions, under the guidance of the archangel Jael, who here seems to play the part of Metatron-Michael. It is based upon the account of Abraham's trance-vision described in Genesis xv.—a favourite theme for apocalyptic speculation. In the Book, as it lies before us, the two parts are organically connected. Thus in chap. x. the archangel says: I am the one who was commissioned to set on fire thy father's house together with him, because he displayed reverence for dead (idols)—an allusion to the narrative of chap. viii.; and the general plan of the whole work seems to be based upon the idea that Abraham's dissatisfaction with the idol-worship by which he was surrounded, which found vent in his strong protest to his father Terah (chaps. i.-viii.), appealed so much to the divine favour, that the archangel Jael was specially sent by God to instruct him and initiate him into the knowledge of heavenly mysteries. Whether the apocalyptic portion ever existed in a shorter and independent form will be discussed below.

The Book opens with a description of Abraham's activities as a maker and seller of idols, his father Terah being a manufacturer of idols. His doubts as to the justifiable character of the idol-worship are roused especially by an accident that befell the stone image called Merumath, and by a similar accident that happened to "five other gods," by which they were broken in pieces (chaps. i.-ii.). Reflecting on this, he is led to protest to his father against the unreality of asking a blessing from such helpless images, thereby rousing Terah's anger (chaps. iii.-iv.). He is led to test further the powers of the idols by placing a wooden god Barisat before the fire, and telling the idol to see that the fire must not be allowed to die down during his absence. On returning he finds Barisat fallen backwards and "horribly burnt" (chap. v.). He again protests to his father against the futility of such worship, sarcastically contrasting the relative merits of gold, silver and wooden idols (chap. vi.). He then proceeds to show that the elements of fire, water, earth, and the heavenly bodies (sun, moon, and stars) are more worthy of honour than the idols, and yet, as each is subjected to some superior force, they can none of them claim to be God (chap. vii.). While he was yet speaking to his father a voice came from heaven bidding him leave his father's house. He had scarcely left the house when fire descended and consumed all within it.

The apocalyptic part opens with a divine command to Abraham to prepare a sacrifice with a view to receiving a divine revelation concerning the future (chap. ix.). Abraham, terrified at the experience, is confronted by the angel Jaoel, who encourages him, and explains his commission to be with Abraham, and act as his celestial guide. Under the direction of the angel he proceeds to Horeb, the Mount of God, a journey of forty days (chaps. x.-xii.), and there, with the help of Jaoel, accomplishes the sacrifice. At this point Azazel, the fallen archangel and seducer of mankind, intervenes and attempts to dissuade Abraham from his purpose. In the form of an unclean bird he flies down "upon the carcasses" (cf. Gen. xv. II), and tries to induce Abraham to leave the holy place, but in vain. Jaoel denounces the evil spirit, bidding him depart, and telling him that the heavenly garment which was formerly his has been set aside for Abraham (chaps. xiii.-xiv.).

¹ See Appendix I, esp. p. 60.

After this Abraham and the angel ascend on the wings of the unslaughtered birds (of the sacrifice) to heaven, which is described at length. It is filled with "a strong light" of power inexpressible, and there they see the angels who are born and disappear daily, after singing their hymn of praise (chaps. xv.-xvi.). At this point Abraham, hearing the divine voice, falls prostrate, and, taught by the angel, utters the celestial song of praise, and prays for enlightenment (chap. xvii.). He sees the divine throne with the Cherubim and the holy Creatures (hayyoth), of whom a description is given, and particularly of their rivalry which is mitigated by the activity of Jaoel (chap. xviii.). God now speaks and discloses to Abraham the powers of heaven in the various firmaments below (chap. xix.). God promises him a seed numerous as the stars (chap. xx.). In answer to a question by Abraham about Azazel, God shows him a vision of the world, its fruits and creatures, the sea and its monsters (including Leviathan), the Garden of Eden, its fruits, streams, and blessedness. He sees also a multitude of human beings "half of them on the right side of the picture, and half of them on the left" (chap. xxi.). The fall of man is explained to him, being traced to the sin of Adam and Eve in the Garden, a vision of which appears in the picture and also of its results upon the destinies of mankind, who are divided into the people on the right side of the picture, representing the Jewish world, and the people on the left representing the heathen world. In particular the sin of idolatry resulting in impurity and murder is sketched and made manifest (chaps. xxii.-xxv.). The question, why sin is permitted, is answered by God (chap. xxvi.), and this is followed by a vision of judgement in which the destruction of the Temple is portrayed. In answer to Abraham's anguished question it is explained to him that this is due to the sin of idolatry on the part of his seed. At the same time a hint is given him of coming salvation (chap. xxvii.). In answer to the question, how long shall the judgement last? a description is given of the troubles preceding the Messianic Age, and the dawn of the latter (chaps. xxviii.-xxix.; the latter chapter contains a long Christian interpolation). At this point Abraham finds himself "upon the earth," but receives a further disclosure regarding the punishment of the heathen and the ingathering of Israel (chaps. xxx.-xxxi.). A short paragraph repeating the promise of the chosen people's deliverance from oppression closes the Book (chap. xxxii.).

The character of the Book, as a whole, is thoroughly Jewish. Its original language was probably Hebrew or Aramaic, from which a Greek version (underlying the Slavonic) was made; and the date of the original composition may be placed at the end of the first or the beginning of the second century A.D.

THE SLAVONIC TEXT AND MSS¹

The Slavonic version, or rather translation, of The Apocalypse of Abraham (Ap. Abr.) has been preserved in a number of MSS. The oldest and most valuable of these is the famous Codex Sylvester,² which now belongs to the Library of the Printing-department of the Holy Synod in Moscow. The MS., which dates from the first half of the fourteenth century, is written on parchment, with two columns on each page, and contains 216 leaves in all, our Apocalypse occupying leaves 164-182.³ It contains a collection of lives of different saints, and The Apocalypse of Abraham stands in it as a work complete in itself, without any connexion with the works which precede and follow it.

The text of our Apocalypse according to Codex Sylvester (cited as S) has been edited by Professor N. Tikhonravov in his Memorials of Russian Apocryphal Literature (Pamyatniki otrechennoi russkoi literatury), Moscow, 1863, Vol. I. pp. 32-53; and also Professor J. Sreznevsky in his Ancient Monuments of Russian Writing and Language (Drevnie Pam'yatniki russkovo pis'ma i yazyka), Petrograd, 1863, I. pp. 247^b-256^a, with readings from the Uvaroff MS., which apparently is a mere copy of S. Tikhonravov has supplied his edition with corrections of the numerous clerical mistakes which abound in S, thereby earning the gratitude of students, while Sreznevsky has satisfied himself with producing a mere copy of the text, with all its mistakes. Apart from these editions there has also been published by the Imperial Society of Bibliophiles a facsimile edition of the text of our Apocalypse, according to S (Petrograd, 1890), thus affording students the means of consulting the MS. itself. Apart from S the text of Ap. Abr. is also contained in many Palæas.⁴ The Palæa, as its name indicates (ἡ παλαιά sc. διαθήκη), deals with the Old Testament, especially with the historical part of it, beginning with creation and ending with David or Solomon, the biblical narratives being enlarged and embellished with apocryphal and pseudepigraphical matter. The origin of the Slavonic Palæa must be sought in some Greek prototype,⁵ which by way of Bulgaria and Serbia had, at an early date, found an entrance into Russia, where for centuries it enjoyed great popularity—at least so long as a translation of the whole Bible had not been made accessible to both clergy and people, that is up till the sixteenth century.

¹ The substance of this section of the Introduction has been contributed by Mr. J. I. Landsman.

² Sylvester, after whom the MS. is named, was a prominent priest in the early years of the reign of Ivan the Terrible, upon whom he for some years exercised a salutary influence. He was an author and lover of books, and the Codex was one of a collection of MSS. which remained after his death in the Kirillo monastery, whither he was banished: see Sreznevsky, Narratives about the Saints Boris and Gleb (Skazan'ia o sv'yatykh Borisě i Glěbě), Petrograd, 1860, Pt. I., and The Orthodox Encyclopædia (Pravoslavnaya Bogoslovshaya E.) iv. 1195 (s.v. Domostroi).

³ A full description of S is given by Sreznevsky, op. cit., pp. i-viii.

⁴ On the subject of the Palæa see the works of N. S. Tikhonravov (Sochinenia), Moscow, 1898, Vol. I. pp. 156-170, and the valuable notes at the end of the volume; cf. also the article Palæa in the Russian Encyclopædia published by Brockhaus—Efron.

⁵ A MS. of a Greek Palæa is known to exist in the Vienna Library, and has been edited by A. V. Vasil'eff in Anecdota græco-byzantina, I. pp. 188-192 (Moscow, 1892).

There are two kinds of Palæas, the historical and the expository, the former being also known as the “eyes” of the Palæa, because it contains the text upon which the expository Palæa comments. The expositions are of a polemical character, the polemic being invariably directed against the Jews (Zhidovin), to whom it is demonstrated that all the prophecies and the manifold types had found their true fulfilment in Christ. The Palæa draws richly upon the Jewish Midrashic Literature, and then uses the material as an argument against the Jews from whom it was borrowed.

Originally our Apocalypse had no place in the Palæa, as may be seen from the oldest Palæa MS., which dates from the fourteenth century, and is preserved in the Alexander-Nevsky Monastery (Petrograd). Later, it was inserted, but still retained its original character of an independent work (as is the case in the Uvaroff Palæ); but later still (from the sixteenth century and onwards) the text of Ap. Abr. loses its original character of an independent work, the material being worked into the life of Abraham. The title of the Book is dropped, and the first person in which Abraham speaks in S is altered into the third, that is, it is changed into a narrative about Abraham, though the scribe often forgets himself and retains the first person of the original.

The apocryphal and pseudepigraphical writings must have been introduced into Russia at a very early date. Large parties of devout Russians, conducted by some learned monk, made frequent pilgrimages to Constantinople and the Holy Land. It was on such pilgrimages that the people were, for the first time, made acquainted with these writings, and the learned monk would, on the spot, translate the book, which had enriched his knowledge concerning the Patriarchs or the Apostles, into Slavonic, and then bring it back, as a most precious treasure to his own country, to the great delight of his fellow-monks in the monastery. It may, therefore, be taken for granted that the Greek original of our Apocalypse had never been brought to Russia, and that there never existed more than one translation of it into Slavonic, for S and the Palæa do not represent different translations, but only different types or recensions of one and the same version. The differences between the Palæa and S are very slight, the former only modernising here and there the style and the orthography. The Palæa is, therefore, of great value for the reconstruction of the original text, especially as it has preserved, in many cases, a more correct copy than is the case with S. The Palæa version is, however, disfigured by the many interpolations made by subsequent scribes which are all absent from S, and which are easily discernible as being interpolations.¹

The Palæa version of our Apocalypse has been edited by Tikhonravov² from a MS. which once belonged to the Joseph-Monastery in Volokolamsk, whence it has been transferred to the Library of the Moscow Academy of Divinity,³ the MS. dating from the fifteenth century. Then I. Porfir'ev edited it in his Apocryphal Narratives about Old Testament Persons and Events (Apokrificheskia skazania o vetkhozavetnykh litsakh i sobytiakh), Petrograd, 1877,

¹ Matter which is not found in S is, in the translation printed below, enclosed in square brackets, and printed in smaller type.

² Op. Cit., pp. 54-77.

³ Cited below as A.

pp. 111-130,¹ from a MS. dating from the seventeenth century, originally the property of the Library of the Solovetzk-Monastery, whence it was transferred to the Library of the Kasan Academy of Divinity.² A and K are closely related to each other, and represent a type of text common to them both. Thus the same mistakes are found in both, and also the same additional matter, not extant in S.³

Another Palæa-text, containing part of the text of our Apocalypse, viz. the legendary narrative in chaps. i.-viii. only, has been edited by A. Pypin in Pseudepigrapha and Apocrypha of Russian Antiquity (Ložnyja i otrečennyja knigi russkoi stariny) in the third volume of Kuselev-Bezborodko, Memorials of Old Russian Literature (Pam'yatniki starinnoj russkoi literatury), Petrograd, 1882, pp. 24-26. This is from the Palæa of the Rumjancov Museum, dating from the year 1494.⁴

In S the end of the Book is missing, but is, fortunately, extant both in A and K. K also has at the end a short paragraph not found in A, which forms an appropriate conclusion to the whole Book. The reader will find it given in the notes on the concluding passage. See further Appendixes II. and III.⁵

DATE OF COMPOSITION AND ORIGINAL LANGUAGE OF THE BOOK

The Slavonic text, it is obvious, was made from a Greek version which, no doubt, was current in Constantinople. It is probable, however, that the Greek text underlying the Slavonic was itself a translation of a Semitic original. A number of indications suggest this. The simple co-ordination of the sentences, the naïve repetitions, and the frequency of the phrase "Here am I" (= Hebrew hinnēnî), which characterise all parts of the Book, point in this direction. Then, too, the sarcastic names given to the idols in the first part (chaps. i.-viii.)—the stone idol Merumath (= 'eben Mē'rūmā, "stone of deceit"), the wooden idol Barisat (= bar 'ishtā "son of the fire," Aramaic)—presuppose a knowledge of Hebrew or Aramaic, or both, on the part of the original readers which would hardly be likely in a purely Greek composition. The fact, too, that Abraham is supposed to be the speaker throughout may lend some weight to the argument for a Hebrew original. The cumulative effect of these considerations taken in conjunction with the intensely Jewish character of the Book as a whole makes a Semitic original highly probable. Perhaps the Book was composed in Hebrew, with a slight admixture of Aramaic, such as occurs in the early Palestinian Midrashim.

The date of the composition of the Book can be determined, within narrow limits, with some probability. Clearly the terminus a quo is the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem in 70 A.D. which is bewailed by Abraham in the apocalyptic part of the Book. The fact, too, that it forms the central point of the picture, that the revelation leads up to it as a sort

¹ Forming part of Vol. XVII, published by the Department of the Russian Language and Literature of the Imperial Academy of Sciences.

² Cited below as K.

³ For some examples of identical errors in the text which appear in both A and K see Bonwetsch, p. 8.

⁴ Cited as R below.

⁵ See further, Bonwetsch, pp. I-II.

of climax, and that the apocalyptist is so deeply moved at the disclosure, suggests that the event is fairly recent. Ginzberg (J.E., i. 92) thinks "the last decades of the first century" are probably the period to which the composition of the Book should be assigned, at any rate in its earliest form. In any case the terminus ad quem can hardly be later than the first decades of the second century. The fact that the Book won acceptance in Christian circles, and was adapted by slight interpolation to Christian purposes—though its intensely Jewish character is manifest on every page—strongly supports the early date. Such a Book would have appealed to Jewish-Christians in Palestine, when Jewish-Christianity was still in close touch with a non-Christian Jewish community in the Holy Land—and it may be assumed, in view of the Semitic character of its original language, that the Book was of Palestinian origin. It must, therefore, have been produced at a time when early apocalyptic literature was still being written in Hebrew or Aramaic, i. e. not later than the early decades of the second century.¹

The question as to the existence of the Book at first in a shorter and much simpler form is discussed below.

EARLY ATTESTATION OF THE BOOK

That the Book must have enjoyed some considerable vogue and popularity in certain Christian circles is proved by its survival, in more than one form, in old Slavonic literature. And this must be equally true of the Greek form of the Book from which the Slavonic was derived. There is, as we should expect, some early evidence of the Book's existence, though some of it is vague and uncertain. What seems to be the clearest and most explicit piece of evidence of this kind is found in the Clementine Recognitions, I. 32, which carries us back to at least the early part of the fourth century, and which, not improbably, through the sources of the Clementine Literature, may go back to an earlier period, still, perhaps another century.² The section in the Recognitions deals with Abraham, and the part which specially concerns us runs as follows:

From the first this same man [Abraham], being an astrologer, was able, from the account and order of the stars, to recognise the Creator, while all others were in error, and understood that all things are regulated by His providence. Whence also an angel, standing by him in a vision, instructed him more fully concerning those things which he was beginning to perceive. He shewed him also what belonged to his race and posterity, and promised them that those districts should be restored rather than given to them.

Here the first sentence clearly refers to some form of the legend of Abraham's conversion from idolatry; but it agrees rather with Philo's account in de Abrahamo, § 15 (see Appendix I.) than with that embodied in the first part of our Book, which depicts Abraham in his early days as a maker and seller of idols rather than as an astrologer. But the second sentence forms a good description of the second or apocalyptic part of our Book, and may be taken as a reference to it. That in fact a book known as "the Apocalypse of Abraham" existed in his time is explicitly stated by Epiphanius (Hær. xxxix. 5) where, in speaking of the Gnostic sect called

¹ See E.A., p. lviii ff.

² Cf. Hort, Clementine Recognitions, pp. 80 ff.

“the Sethians,” he says they possessed a number of books “written in the name of great men,” seven in the name of Seth, and among others one “in the name of Abraham which they also declare to be an apocalypse,” and which is “full of all wickedness” (πάσης κακίας ἔμπλεων). Schürer thinks that this heretical book cannot be identified with our Apocalypse. Dr. M. R. James, however,¹ is inclined to believe “that Epiphanius on his authority is here going too far, and is fathering on the Sethians a book, which they may well have used, but which they did not manufacture.” It is quite possible, and not improbable that this Gnostic sect made use of our Book in an interpolated form. As we shall see, there are Gnostic features in it in the form in which it has reached us, and Ginzberg is inclined to regard these as interpolations from a Gnostic book bearing the same name. A heretical Book (or Apocalypse) of Abraham may also possibly be referred to in a passage in the Apostolic Constitutions, vi. 16 (compiled in its present form probably in the second half of the fourth century), which runs as follows:

And among the Ancients also some have written apocryphal books of Moses, and Enoch, and Adam, and Isaiah, and David, and Elijah, and of the three patriarchs, pernicious and repugnant to the truth (φθοροποιὰ καὶ τῆς ἀληθείας ἐχθρά).

It will be noticed that this is a list of Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, most of the items of which are easily recognisable. By “the three patriarchs” can only be meant Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Thus the passage attests the existence, at the time when the compiler wrote, of an apocryphal Book of Abraham, which may well be identical with our Apocalypse.² Lastly there is the evidence of the lists of books (containing the bare names) included in the Synopsis of Pseudo-Athanasius (compiled probably about 500 A.D.) and the Stichometry of Nicephorus (drawn up in Jerusalem perhaps about 850 A.D.). The latter is identical with the former, except that it attaches to the name of each book the number of stichoi or lines contained in it. The first six names on these lists are as follows: (1) Enoch; (2) Patriarchs; (3) Prayer of Joseph; (4) Testament of Moses; (5) Assumption of Moses; (6) Abraham. The second list adds to the sixth name “stichometry 300,” thus giving us “a book [of Abraham] rather shorter than the Greek Esther, which has 350 στίχοι.” Dr. M. R. James³ is of opinion that the word ἀποκάλυψις is to be supplied before Ἀβραάμ here, and this view we may safely accept. We have thus another piece of evidence of the existence of a Book called “the Apocalypse of Abraham,” which was of sufficient importance to be included in a list of books of Old Testament apocrypha containing such well-known names as the Book of Enoch, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, and the Assumption of Moses.

From a survey of this evidence it may be concluded that an apocryphal book (or books) under the name of Abraham was current in the early Christian centuries: and that our Apocalypse is one product or form of this literature. The so-called Testament of Abraham is, no doubt, another. The possibility remains to be considered that our Apocalypse may have assumed different forms (by enlargement or curtailment) and have been adapted at different times for different purposes.

¹ The Testament of Abraham (Cambridge “Texts and Studies”), p. 14.

² It might, of course, refer to some other apocryphal Book of Abraham; Dr. M. R. James thinks the reference may be to The Testament of Abraham.

³ Op. cit., p. 9. The synopsis embraces eleven items.

GNOSTIC ELEMENTS IN THE TEXT

Among the Gnostic features in the text of our Book may be reckoned the significant emphasis laid upon “right” and “left” in the apocalyptic representation (cf. xxii. (end), xxiii.), the “right” side being the source of purity and light, the “left” that of impurity and darkness. This idea is ancient,¹ depending upon the dualism which insists upon the category of light and darkness, and can be traced back to ancient Zoroastrianism. But it was developed in the early Gnostic systems (see Irenæus, adv. Hær. I., xi. 2: II. xxiv. 6), and in the Jewish Kabbalah, where “right side” and “left side” (sitrā yêmînā wě-sitrā 'ahārā) become technical terms. In the Emanistic system of the Zohar, the whole world is divided between “right” and “left,” where pure and impure powers respectively operate—on the right side the Holy One and His powers, on the left the serpent Sammael and his powers (cf. Zohar, Bereshith, 47b, 53f, 169b and following, 174b). When, therefore, we find our Book dividing mankind into two hosts, one on the right side (= the Jews) and one on the left (= the heathen), the presence of Gnostic influence seems clear. At the same time, it may well be an original feature of the Book, as the idea had already been assimilated by the ancient Jewish mystical tradition (Kabbalah), and if our Apocalypse was of Essene origin there would be nothing surprising in the presence of such an element.

The opposition between light and darkness seems also to be present in an obscure passage in chap. xiv., which is absent from S. It runs as follows (Azazel is being addressed):

For thy heritage is (to be) over those existing with thee being born with the stars and clouds, with the men whose portion thou art, and (who) through thy being exist; and thine enmity is justification.

Perhaps by those “being born with the stars and clouds” is meant those who by birth and creation belong to the sphere of night and darkness, as opposed to the righteous who belong to the sphere of light. This again accords with the ancient dualistic conception referred to above, and may very well be an original feature. The absence of the clause from S may be due to excision. It can hardly be an interpolation from Slavonic sources.

On the other hand, there are two passages where the original text may have been modified under Christian Gnostic influence (apart from the obvious interpolation indicated by italic type in chap. xxix.). In chap. xx. God, addressing Abraham, says: “As the number of the stars and their power, (so will) I make thy seed a nation, and a people set apart for me in my heritage with Azazel.” And again in chap. xxii.: “But those which are on the right side of the picture—they are the people set apart for me of the peoples with Azazel.” Here God is represented as sharing His heritage (= the Jewish people) with the evil spirit Azazel. “This,” says Ginzberg (J.E., i. 92), “is no doubt the Gnostic doctrine of the God of the Jews as kakodaimon,” i. e. that the God of the Old Testament is an inferior deity, whose work was fused with evil elements. Still, these Gnostic elements in our Book are not very pronounced; there are no clear and explicit allusions to any of the full-blown doctrines of the Ophites or kindred Gnostic sects. The phenomena suggest that the Book is an essentially Jewish one, which may have been used and read by Gnostic Christians, and adapted by slight revision to make it acceptable to such readers.

¹ Cf. Matt. xxv.

GENERAL CHARACTER OF THE BOOK AND INTEGRITY OF ITS TEXT

The Book is essentially Jewish, and there are features in it which suggest Essene origin; such are its strong predestinarian doctrine, its dualistic conceptions, and its ascetic tendencies. It may well have passed from Essene to Ebionite circles—the interpolation in chap. xxix. certainly looks like the work of a Jewish-Christian—and thence, in some form, have found its way into Gnostic circles.

Is the Book as it lies before us—apart from the interpolation in chap. xxix.—substantially in its original shape? To this question an affirmative answer may, with some probability, be given. Ginzberg, it is true, suggests a different view. He says (J.E., i. 92):

It is quite probable that certain parts of the heretical Apocalypse of Abraham, which was in circulation among the Gnostics (Epiphanius, xxxix. 5), were incorporated in the present text [of our Apocalypse]. Subtracting, then, the first part [i. e. chaps. i.-viii., containing the “Legend”], which does not belong to the Apocalypse, and the Gnostic and Christian interpolations, only about three hundred lines remain, and this number would exactly correspond with the number which, according to the stichometry of Nicephorus, the Apocalypse of Abraham contained.

There are considerable difficulties attaching to this theory. It is difficult to suppose that the Book in its original form was without the opening chapters (i.-viii.) narrating Abraham’s conversion from idolatry. There are several allusions in the later chapters to this opening narrative, which come in quite naturally. The chapters form a good introduction to what follows, and, as such, were probably put into their present shape by the original author of the Book. The material of the legend was, of course, much older; but it is to be noticed that our author has handled this material in a very free way, and this fact also suggests that these chapters were no mere addition to the Book, borrowed from one of the current forms of the legend. It seems more probable that the shorter “Apocalypse of Abraham” implied by the Stichometry of Nicephorus was a shortened recension of the original book, probably adapted for orthodox Christian purposes. It is by no means impossible that a shorter recension may have existed side by side with the fuller original form at a later date. The latter may have survived and have been read in certain circles by preference, and thence have passed over into the old Slavonic Church literature. Whether the heretical “Apocalypse of Abraham” referred to by Epiphanius which, according to him was “full of all wickedness” was another and independent recension, it is impossible to say. On the whole it seems more likely that the older form of the Book—especially if it had grown up in Ebionite (Jewish-Christian) circles—was the form in which it was read by the Sethian Gnostics. The mere fact that it was read in such circles would make it suspicious in the eyes of a later orthodoxy, which may have endeavoured to suppress it by issuing a shorter recension of the text. But the older form was too popular to be eliminated in this way entirely—though it has almost disappeared from Christian literature, and in its Greek and Semitic forms has, in fact, disappeared, only surviving in its old Slavonic dress.

That such a Jewish-Christian Book would have been acceptable to Sethian Gnostic readers is not surprising. This Gnostic sect held the doctrine that the Sophia “found means to preserve through every age, in the midst of the Demiurge’s world, a race bearing within them the spiritual seed which was related to her own nature” . . . they “regarded Cain as a representative of the Hylic; Abel, of the Psychical; and Seth, who was finally to reappear in the person of the Messiah, of the Pneumatic principle.”¹

The emphasis laid in our Book (chap. xxiv.) upon the lawlessness of Cain, “who acted lawlessly through the Adversary,” and its evil consequence in the slaughter of Abel would appeal to such Gnostic readers no less than the division of mankind into “right” and “left,” and the assignment of the latter to the dominion of the “lawless Adversary” Azazel. Abraham, too, the hero of the Book, was in the line of Seth, and it is from him that the Messiah springs (chap. xxix.). All this would be read by such Gnostic readers in the light of their own presuppositions.

We conclude, then, that the Book, substantially as it lies before us, is a Jewish and Essene production, like the related Testament of Abraham. It depicts the initiation of Abraham into the heavenly mysteries associated with the Divine “Chariot” (cf. Ezek. i.). Its angelology is in line with Essene speculation, and in chap. xvii. Abraham is taught by the archangel, in the form of the celestial hymn, the mystery of the Divine Name. We have reached the stage when Enoch has fallen into the background, and Abraham, like Moses, has become the centre of mystic lore, that is “when the seal of circumcision had become the pledge of life.”² It is noteworthy that the Kabbalistic book Sefer Yesirā (? second century A.D.) was attributed to Abraham.

It may occur to some readers as an objection to this view that the prominence assigned to Abraham’s sacrifice in the Book, and to the destruction of the Temple, regarded as the supreme calamity, is inconsistent with Essene authorship, since the Essenes rejected animal sacrifices. But, as Kohler has shewn,³ the Essenes, who accepted the Mosaic Law, were not opposed to such sacrifices on principle. What they opposed was the priesthood in the Temple “out of mistrust as to their state of holiness and purity, rather than out of aversion to sacrifice.” To Abraham, the Essene saint, acting under direct divine command, no such objection would apply.

It should be added that the Slavonic MSS. yield a text which is markedly shorter than the texts of the Palæan MSS. Some of the omitted passages are perhaps cases of deliberate excision, and others of accidental omission. But there remain a substantial number where the shorter text is probably original, and the presence of glosses or later amplifications is to be suspected. All such passages are indicated in the text of the translation given below.

THEOLOGY OF THE BOOK

The apocalyptic part of the Book is based upon the story of Abraham’s sacrifice and trance, as described in Gen. xv. This experience is interpreted to mean that Abraham received a divine disclosure as to the destinies of his descendants, which is also the view of the Rabbinical Midrash (cf. Bereshith rabba, xliv. 15 f.). This scheme provides the framework in which our apocalypse is set. Abraham, after completing the prescribed sacrifice, ascends to heaven, under the guidance of the angel, and from thence sees below him the drama of the world’s future, and also the various powers and forces that operate in the celestial sphere. In exactly the same way the Midrash (Bereshith rabba, xlv. 14) interprets Abraham's experience as an ascension. According to a saying of R. Jehuda, citing the authority of R. Johanan, God caused him [Abraham] to ascend above the vault of the firmament, and said to him: "Look now toward heaven": "looking" [here] means nought else but from [the height] above to [what is] below. This is a continuation of a comment on the sentence: And He brought him forth outside (Gen. xv. 5) interpreted to mean: "And He (God) brought him (Abraham) forth outside the world."

¹ Neander, Church History, ii. 154.

² Cf. Kohler in J.Q.R., vii. 594 (July 1895),

³ In J.E., v. 230 (s.v. Essenes).

The angel who conducts Abraham on his celestial journey is the archangel Jaoel, who plays an all-important rôle. As is pointed out in the notes, he fulfils the functions elsewhere assigned to Michael and Metatron. Just as Metatron bears the tetragrammaton (cf. Ex. xxiii. 21, "My Name is in him"), so Jaoel here (chap. x.) is possessed of the power of the Ineffable Name. The name Jaoel itself is evidently a substitute for the tetragrammaton, which was too sacred to be written out in full. This angelic being is thus God's vicegerent, second only to God Himself. Yet he may not be worshipped, but rather himself sets Abraham the example of worshipping God. He is thus the supreme figure in Jewish angelology. Like Enoch, who was also transformed into Metatron, Jaoel acts as celestial guide. Jaoel is also the heavenly choir-master (chap. xii. "Singer of the Eternal"; cf. also chap. xvii.), a function assigned elsewhere to Michael; like Michael he is the guardian of the chosen race (chap. x., end), and is potent to subdue "the attack and menace of every single reptile" (ibid.).

It is this supreme angelic being who in one line of apocalyptic tradition becomes the heavenly Son of Man—a conception that exercised an important influence on Christological development.¹

Over against Jaoel stands Azazel, who here appears as the arch-fiend,² and as active upon the earth (chap. xiii.), though his real domain is in Hades, where he reigns as lord (chap. xxxi.). In fact, according to the peculiar representation of our Apocalypse, Azazel is himself the fire of Hell (cf. chap. xiv. "Be thou the burning coal of the furnace of the earth," and xxxi., "burnt with the fire of Azazel's tongue"). He is the source of all wickedness and uncleanness (chap. xiii.), and the godless are his heritage (ibid.). He is denounced as the slanderer of truth and the seducer of mankind, having "scattered over the earth the secrets of heaven," and "rebelled against the Mighty One" (chap. xiv.). The radical dualism of the Book comes out not only in the sharp division of mankind into two hosts, which stand for Jewry and heathendom respectively, but also in the clearly defined contradistinction of two ages, the present Age of ungodliness and the future Age of righteousness (cf. chap. xxix. and ix.). The present Age—called "this æon" (chap. xxxi.)—is "corruptible" (chap. xvii.), "the Age of ungodliness" (chap. xxix., xxxii.), during which the heathen have the dominion over the Jews (chap. xxxi.); it is to last "twelve" years or "hours" (chap. xxix.). Over against it stands "the coming Age" (chap. xxxi.), or "Age of the righteous" (chap. xvii., xxix.). The origin of sin is traced to the Fall, which is described in chap. xxiii. The agent is, of course, the serpent, who is merely the instrument of Azazel. Indeed, the twelve wings of the latter are given in the description to the serpent. The evil spirit, who is described as being “between” the human pair in the Garden, “representeth ungodliness, their beginning (on the way) to perdition, even Azazel,” and the seer proceeds to ask why God has given “power to such to destroy the generation of men in their works upon the earth.” In some sense, then, according to the representation of our Apocalypse, the sin of Adam affects the destinies of all his descendants. The moral poison of sensuality (Heb. zôhāmā) with which the serpent infected Eve (T. B., Yēbāmôth, 103 b) passed on to all generations (cf. Wisdom ii. 24, 4 Ezra. iii. 21).¹ This has an important bearing on the Pauline doctrine of original sin. At the same time, our Apocalypse, in spite of its strong expression of predestinarian views elsewhere, insists with marked emphasis upon the freedom of man’s will (cf. chap. xxvi.).

¹ Cf. E.A., p. 284. The name Jaoel (Yahoel) occurs as the name of a principal angel (over fire) in the Kabbalistic Book Berith Menuha 57a, and below him are seven others, including Gabriel: see Lucken, Michael, p. 54.

² So in one form of the tradition in 1 Enoch, Azazel stands at the head of the fallen angels.

The Book apparently knows nothing of a resurrection. The righteous dead, it would seem, proceed straight to the heavenly Paradise (“the Garden of Eden”), where they enjoy heavenly “fruits and blessedness” (chap. xxi.), while the wicked dead go immediately to the underworld and Azazel. Nothing is said of an intermediate state. The more usual view is that the heavenly Paradise is reserved for the righteous dead, who will enter it after the final judgement (except for a few privileged saints like Enoch, who are allowed to enter it beforehand). The nearest parallel to the idea of our Book, seems to occur in 1 Enoch lx. 8, 23, lxi. 12, lxx. 4, where the elect righteous already dwell in the garden of life.

“A judgement” is spoken of “at the end of the world,” but it is a judgment upon the heathen nations effected by Israel at the end of the present age of ungodliness² (cf. chap. xxii., xxix.).

A detailed eschatological description of the end of the present age of ungodliness and the coming in of the age of righteousness is given in chap. xxix.-xxxi. In chap. xxix. it is stated that before the beginning of the new Age God’s judgement will be effected on the ruthless heathen nations by God’s people¹; ten plagues come upon all creatures of the earth on account of sin; those who are of Abraham’s seed survive according to a pre-determined number, hasten to Jerusalem, wreak vengeance on their foes, and rejoice before God, to whom they return (chap. xxix.). In the following chapter (xxx.) a detailed description is given of the ten plagues which visit the heathen “at the twelfth hour of the present Age.” Chap. xxxi. describes the trumpet-blast which announces the mission of God’s Elect One (the Messiah), who gathers together the dispersed of Israel, and the annihilation and horrible doom of the godless foes of Israel and of God’s enemies both within and without Israel (the former renegade Jews), and the joy which the downfall of these wicked people and the signal manifestation of God’s righteousness cause.

As has been pointed out above, our Apocalypse, like the companion one of The Ascension of Isaiah, and other examples in the apocalyptic literature, expresses the mystical tradition and experience associated with the mysteries of the Divine Chariot or Throne. The speculation which gave rise to this tradition starts from Ezekiel’s Chariot-Vision (Ezek. i.), and is embodied in a fairly extensive literature especially in i. and ii. Enoch in the earlier Apocalyptic, and in the neo-Hebraic “Hekalot” literature (eighth to tenth centuries A.D.). The material of which it is composed, and which is constantly re-shaped, consists mainly of descriptions of the seven heavens “with their hosts of angels, and the various store-houses of the world, and of the divine throne above the highest heaven.”¹ Heaven is pictured as filled with light of inexpressible brilliance, and the Divine Chariot is surrounded by fiery angels of warlike aspect. The mystic who is allowed to enter the celestial sphere usually receives divine disclosures about the future or the spiritual world.

¹ In T.B. Aboda zara 22b R. Johanan refers to this as follows: At the moment when the serpent came upon Eve he infected her with sensuality (zôhāmā). Was this also the case with Israel (generally)? When the Israelites stood upon Mount Sinai their infection (impulse to sensuality, zôhāmāthān) ceased; the aliens (heathen) who did not stand upon Mount Sinai—their infection (of sensuality) did not cease. The Covenant on Mount Sinai annulled the effects of the Fall.

In order to enjoy this experience the mystic has to prepare himself to enter the ecstatic state which is brought about especially by ablutions and fasting, but also sometimes by fervent invocations and by other means. He is rewarded by “the vision of the Merkabah” or “Divine Chariot” (sēfiyyath hamerkābā). Those who thus imagined themselves entering the Heavenly Chariot and floating through the air were called Yōrēdē Merkābā, i. e. “those who go down (embark) into the ship-like chariot” (Jellinek). “In this chariot they are supposed to ascend to the heavens, where in the dazzling light surrounding them they behold the inner-most secrets of all persons and things otherwise impenetrable and invisible.”² The heavenly charioteer is Metatron (according to Kohler suggested by Mithra), the angel next the Throne, whose name is like God’s, and who possesses all knowledge, and imparts it to man. Metatron, as we have seen, is Enoch transformed. In our Book he seems to appear under the name Jaobel. It is interesting to note that according to the late Jewish “Hekalot” the initiated one who is admitted to the heavenly regions, in order to be allowed to step before the Divine Throne must recite certain prayers until God Himself addresses him, if he be worthy; cf. with this the Hymn-Prayer which Abraham is taught to recite in chap. xvii. of our Book. According to Kohler³ the Merkabah mysteries “remained the exclusive property of the initiated ones, the Senû’im or Hashshā’im,” whom he identifies with the Essenes.

[The emphasis that is laid throughout all parts of the Book upon the sin of idolatry is noteworthy, and especially that the Temple-sacrifices had been polluted by idolatrous rites (cf. chap. xxiv.). Perhaps this is intended to suggest a reason why the sanctuary was destroyed.]

¹ The “judgement of the Great Assize” mentioned in chap. xxiv. occurs in a clause which is absent from S, and may be an interpolation.

It will be noticed that chaps. xxx. and xxxi. duplicate to some extent the contents of chap. xxix. They read like an appendix. Moreover, the figure of the Messiah first emerges here, and his rôle is a somewhat limited one. The last words of chap. xxix. (“And lo! I am with you for ever”) may well have formed the conclusion of the Apocalypse.

It should be noted also that in the Christian addition in chap. xxix. no emphasis is laid upon Christ’s divinity. The description reads like an Ebionitic one.

In this connexion it may be noted that the identification of the fruit of the forbidden tree in chap. xxiii. with the grape may reflect the ascetic tendency, which grew up in Jewish (and Jewish-Christian) circles after the destruction of Jerusalem, to abstain from wine as a mark of mourning. This feeling may have stimulated the view that wine was the source of woe to mankind (see note on passage). Apparently the Essenes regarded Jonadab, the founder of the sect of “water-drinkers” (Rechabites), as a prototype of the Essene order (see J.E., v. 230b).

² According to chapter xxii. these peoples are destined “some for judgement and restoration, and others for vengeance and destruction at the end of the world.”

³ Cf. J.E., viii. 499b.

LITERARY AFFINITIES AND SPECIAL IMPORTANCE OF THE BOOK

Our Apocalypse has affinities, as has already been pointed out, with such books as The Ascension of Isaiah, which like it deals with the mysteries of the heavens¹ and is set in a similar mystical framework. But the latter work has a pronouncedly Christian element, and is a production of Jewish-Christian origin in its present form, whereas in our Book the Christian element is confined to a short interpolated passage in chap. xxix.

With the Testament of Abraham, there is a certain affinity, and this work, like our Apocalypse, may be of Essene origin. But the two books are quite distinct, and their historical setting is different. The Testament, though it contains an apocalyptic element in the parts which describe Abraham's "ride" through the heavenly regions when he sees the fate of departed souls, is based upon the idea of Abraham's death; moreover, the chief angelic figure in the Testament is Michael, and the eschatology is different. Possibly the eschatology of the two Books may be regarded as complementary, the Apocalypse giving the national, and the Testament the individual aspects of it from the Essene standpoint.

There is, too, a certain affinity with the Clementine literature (Homilies and Recognitions), which is highly important for the history of Gnostic Judæo-Christianity. Thus in the Clementine Homilies the doctrine of contrasts is much elaborated. The ruler of this world is Satan, the ruler of the future world is the Messiah. The divinity of Christ is not recognised, no stress is laid upon the doctrine of the atonement, and strict asceticism is enjoined.

Our Book is important as illustrating the Jewish ideas that lie behind the doctrine of original sin in connexion with the story of the Fall, and in its angelology and demonology. In the angelic figure of Jaöel (= Michael = Metatron), God's vicegerent and the imparter of divine revelation to man (in the person of Abraham) we have one more illustration of the range of conceptions on the Jewish side which influenced the Logos-idea and Christological development. The pessimistic estimate of the world as it is—"the æon of ungodliness—which to a large extent is under the dominion of Azazel, illustrates such phrases as "the god of this world" (2 Cor. iv. 4), "the ruler of this world" (John xii. 31) which are applied to Satan. These probably reflect popular Jewish feeling. The earth is the Lord's, as St. Paul himself insists (1 Cor. x. 26), but has fallen under the dominion of the evil one, and can only be redeemed therefrom by God's Messiah.

Our Book is specially important as one more interesting example of the apocalyptic ideas of late Judaism, and, more particularly, as throwing a welcome light on the ideas specially congenial to early Jewish-Christianity when it had already become, to some extent, detached from the common stream of Church life.

¹ The seven heavens are referred to, and partly described in our Apocalypse in chap. xix. Another point of contact is the reference to the "heavenly garment" in chap. xiii., end. For a discussion of the theological affinities of these ideas with the New Testament writings cf. Introduction to The Ascension of Isaiah, pp. xxi-xxiv.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

For the editions of the Slavonic text see the second section of this Introduction.

A valuable German translation of the Slavonic text, with critical notes and Introduction, has been published in the series Studien zur Geschichte der Theologie und Kirche: it is edited by Prof. G. Nathanael Bonwetsch (Leipzig, 1897).

Articles by Ginzberg in J.E., i. 91f.; Lagrange in Revue Biblique, 1905, pp. 511-514; see also Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes, iii. pp. 336-338.

SHORT TITLES, ABBREVIATIONS, AND BRACKETS USED IN THIS EDITION

1 Enoch = The Ethiopic Book of Enoch.

2 Enoch = The Slavonic Book of Enoch.

Ap. Bar. = The Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch.

The Greek Apocalypse of Baruch = The Apocalypse edited under this title (and based upon a Greek and also a Slavonic text) by Dr. H. Maldwyn Hughes in the Oxford Corpus of The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, ii. pp. 527-541.

Asc. Is. = The Ascension of Isaiah.

Pirke de R. Eliezer is cited according to the edition (English translation and notes) of G. Friedlander (London, 1916).

Beer = Leben Abraham's nach Auffassung der jüdischen Sage, von Dr. B. Beer (Leipzig, 1859).

Bonwetsch = Die Apocalypse Abrahams . . . herausgegeben von G. Nathanael Bonwetsch (Leipzig, 1897, in the series Studien zur Geschichte der Theologie und der Kirche).

Volz = Jüdische Eschatologie von Daniel bis Akiba, dangesvellt von Paul Volz (Tübingen und Leipzig, 1903).

Weber = Jüdische Theologie auf Grund des Talmud und verwandter Schriften: von Dr. Ferdinand Weber (Leipzig, 1897).

S = Codex Sylvester (first half of fourteenth century): Facsimile Edition, Petrograd, 1890 (edited also by Tikhonravov).

P = Palæa (Old Testament narratives and expositions in Slavonic).

A = a Palæa-text of Ap. Abr., edited by Tikhonravov from a MS. of the fifteenth century.

K = a Palæa-text of Ap. Abr., edited by I. Porfir'ev from a MS. of the seventeenth century.

R = a Palæa-text of Ap. Abr., i.-viii., edited by A. Pypin from a MS. dated 1494.

Lueken = Michael: eine Darstellung und Vergleichung der jüdischen und der morgenländisch-christlichen Tradition vom Erzengel Michael: von Wilhelm Lueken (Göttingen, 1898).

E.A. = The Ezra-Apocalypse, edited by G. H. Box (1912).

J.Q.R. = Jewish Quarterly Review.

D.B. = Dictionary of the Bible.

See further the second section of the Introduction

J.E. = Jewish Encyclopædia.

M.T. = Masoretic Text.

[] Square brackets enclosing words in smaller type indicate additional, and in most cases presumably interpolated, matter, which is absent from S.

() Round brackets enclosing words in italic type indicate glosses or editorial additions.

() Round brackets enclosing words in ordinary type indicate additions to the text of the translation made for the sake of clearness.

For the works cited under the following names—

Tikhonravov, see pp. xi, xiv.

Srcznevsky, see p. xi.

Pypin, see p. xiv.

Porfir'ev, see p. xiv.

[The translation that follows has been prepared with the assistance of Mr. J. I. Landsman, who has consulted for this purpose the Facsimile Edition of Codex S, and the various printed editions referred to above. For the form of the translation here given Mr. Landsman takes full responsibility. No previous translation or edition of the Book has been published in English so far as the Editor is aware.]

THE APOCALYPSE OF ABRAHAM

PART I

THE LEGEND (Chapters I.-VIII)

Title¹

The Book of the Revelation of Abraham, the son of Terah, the son of Nahor, the son of Serug, the son of Roog (Reu²), the son of Arphaxad, the son of Shem, the son of Noah, the son of Lamech, the son of Methuselah, the son of Enoch, the son of Jared (Arad).

Abraham's Conversion from Idolatry (Chapters I.—VIII.).

I. On the day when I planed the gods of my father³ Terah and the gods of Nahor his brother,⁴ when I was searching as to who the Mighty God in truth is—I, Abraham, at the time when it fell to my lot, when I fulfilled the services (the sacrifices)⁵ of my father Terah to his gods of wood and stone, gold and silver, brass and iron;⁶ having entered into their temple for service, I found the god whose name was Merumath⁷ (which was) hewn out of stone, fallen forward at the feet of the iron god Nahon.⁸ And it came to pass, when I saw it, my heart was perplexed, and⁹ I considered in my mind that I should not be able to bring him back to his place, I, Abraham, alone,¹⁰ because he was heavy, being of a large stone,¹¹ and I went forth and made it known to my father. And he entered with me, and when both of us moved him (the god) forward, so that we might bring him back¹² to his place, his head fell from

¹ The whole of the title occurs only in S.

² Some links in the genealogical chain are omitted: Reu son of Peleg, son of Eber, son of Shelah, son of Arphaxad (Gen. xi. 10-16); Abraham was thus "the tenth from Noah" (Josephus, Ant., i. 6, 5).

³ Abraham is represented as having followed the occupation of his father, that of an idol-maker; cf. Bereshith rabba on Gen. xi. 28 (see Appendix, p. 58).

⁴ his (i. e. Abraham's) brother; probably a gloss (the structure of the narrative demands "my"); A omits.

⁵ Probably a gloss (so Tikhonravov); or read of the altar for sacrifices (Bonwetsch).

⁶ Cf. Dan. v. 4.

⁷ The stone idol Merumath (= Heb. 'eben mērûmā, "stone of deceit") was the chief object of Abraham's worship at this period.

⁸ So A; S has Naritson; K, by name Nahin.

⁹ and omitted by S.

¹⁰ I Abraham alone: K omits; S. + and lo!

¹¹ being of a large stone: R omits.

¹² so that we might bring him back: R omits.

him¹ while I was still holding him by the head. And it came to pass,² when my father saw that the head of Merumath³ had fallen from him, he said to me: "Abraham!" And I said: "Here am I." And he said to me: "Bring me an axe, of the small ones,⁴ from the house." And I brought it to him.⁵ And he hewed aright another Merumath out of another stone, without head, and the head which had been thrown down from Merumath he placed upon it, and the rest of Merumath he shattered.⁵

II. And he made five other gods, and gave them to me [and]⁶ commanded me to sell them outside in the street of the town. And I saddled my father's⁷ ass, and placed them upon it, and went towards the inn to sell them. And lo! merchants from Fandana⁸ in Syria were travelling with camels going to Egypt,⁹ to trade.¹⁰ And I spoke with them. And one of their camels uttered a groan, and the ass took fright and sprang away and upset the gods; and three of them were smashed, and two were preserved. And it came to pass, when the Syrians saw that I had gods, they said to me: "Why didst thou not tell us [that thou hadst gods? Then we would have bought them]¹¹ before the ass heard the sound of the camel, and they would not have been lost. Give us, at any rate, the gods that remain, and we will give thee the proper price¹² for the broken gods, also for the gods that have been preserved."¹² For I was concerned in my heart as to how I could bring to my father the purchase-price;¹³ and the three broken ones I cast into the water of the river Gur, which was at that place, and they sank into the depths,¹⁴ and there was nothing more of them.

III. When I was still going on the way, my heart was perplexed within me, and my mind was distracted. And I said in my heart: ["What evil deed is this that my father is doing? Is not he, rather, the god of his gods, since they come into existence through his chisels and lathes, and his wisdom, and is it not rather fitting that they should worship my father, since they are his work? What is this delusion of my father in his works?]¹⁵ Behold, Merumath fell and could not rise in his own temple, nor could I, by myself, move him until my father came, and the two of us moved him; and as we were thus too weak, his head fell from him, and he (i.e. my father) set it upon another stone of

¹ R omits.

² R omits.

³ + his god, K.

⁴ of the small ones: K omits.

⁵ K reads: And he cut off the head of another god of stone and fastened it upon the god Merumath which fell before, and the head which fell down from him and the rest of the other god he shattered.

⁶ and: S K omit.

⁷ father's: A omits.

⁸ Fandana probably = Paddan-Aram (Gen. xxv. 20).

⁹ Cf. Gen. xxxvii. 25.

¹⁰ K reads: in order to buy from thence papyrus from the Nile. And I questioned them, and they informed me.

¹¹ S omits.

¹² A K omit; they read instead: And I deliberated in my heart, and they gave me the value.

¹³ K reads: and he took the pieces of the broken gods and cast them in the Dead Sea, from which it could never emerge.

¹⁴ A K, + of the river Gur.

¹⁵ This passage is given by A K, but is absent from S; apparently it is a later interpolation.

another god,¹ which he had made without head. And the other five gods were broken in pieces down from the ass, which were able-neither to help themselves,² nor to hurt the ass, because³ it had broken them to pieces; nor did their broken fragments come up out of the river.”⁴ And I said in my heart: “If this be so, how can Merumath, my father’s god, having the head of another stone,⁵ and himself being made of another stone,⁵ rescue a man, or hear a man’s prayer and reward him?”⁶

IV. And while I cogitated thus, I reached my father’s house; and having watered the ass, and set out hay for it, I brought the silver and gave it into the hand of my father Terah. When he saw it he was glad, [and]⁷ he said: “Blessed art thou, Abraham, of my gods,⁸ because thou hast brought the price of the gods, so that my work was not in vain.” And I answered and said to him: “Hear, O my father, Terah! Blessed are the gods⁹ of thee, for thou art their god, since⁹ thou hast made them; for their blessing is ruination, and their power¹⁰ is vain;¹¹ they who did not help themselves,¹² how shall they, then, help thee or bless me¹³? I have been kind to thee in this affair,¹⁴ because by (using) my intelligence, I have brought thee the money for the broken gods.” And when he heard my¹⁵ word, he became furiously angry with me, because I had spoken hard words against his gods.

V. I, however, having thought over my father’s anger, went out; [and after I had gone out]¹⁶ my father¹⁷ cried, saying: “Abraham!” And I said: “Here am I.” And he said: “Take and collect the splinters of the wood out of which I made gods of pine-wood before thou camest; and make ready for me the food of the mid-day meal.”¹⁸ And it came to pass, when I collected the splinters of wood, I found under them a little god which had been lying among the brush-wood on my left, and on his forehead was written: GOD BARISAT.¹⁹ And²⁰ I did not

¹ Cf. Wisdom xiii. 10 (“a useless stone, the work of an ancient hand”); K reads: and set upon him the stone head of another god.

² Cf. Wisdom xiii. 16 (“knowing that it is unable to help itself”).

³ =? although (Heb. ’aph kî; Rabbinic ’aph ‘al pi).

⁴ According to the Mishna ‘Abôdâ zânâ iii. 3 it was the duty of Jews to destroy an idol by sinking it in the waters of the Dead Sea, from which it could never emerge.

⁵ Omitted by K.

⁶ Cf. Wisdom xiii. 17 f. (the whole chapter should be compared in this context).

⁷ S omits.

⁸ Lit. to my gods: read? of (by) my god (Bonwetsch).

⁹ Text of S here corrupt.

¹⁰ A, help.

¹¹ K, powerless.

¹² Cf. note² in previous chapter.

¹³ For the thought cf. Heb. vii. 7.

¹⁴ Lit. transaction.

¹⁵ K, this.

¹⁶ S omits.

¹⁷ S, he.

¹⁸ Cf. Is. xlv. 15, Wisdom xiii. 12 f.

¹⁹ Barisat = probably bar ‘ishtâ, “son of the fire.”

²⁰ A K, + it came to pass, when I found him, I kept him and.

inform my father that I had found the wooden god Barisat under the chips. And it came to pass, when I had laid the splinters in the fire, in order that I might make ready food for my father—on going out to ask a question regarding the food, I placed Barisat before the kindled fire,¹ saying threateningly to him: “Pay careful attention, Barisat, [that]² the fire do not die down until I come; if, however, it dieth down, blow on it that it may burn up again.” And I went out and accomplished my purpose.³ And on returning I found Barisat fallen backwards, and⁴ his feet surrounded by fire and horribly burnt.⁵ I burst into a fit of laughter, and I said to myself: “Truly, O Barisat, thou canst kindle the fire and cook food!” And it came to pass, while I spake (thus) in my laughter⁶ he (i.e. Barisat) was gradually burnt up by the fire and reduced⁷ to ashes. And I brought the food to my father, and he did eat. And I gave him wine and milk,⁸ and he was gladdened and blessed his god Merumath. And I said to him: “O father Terah, bless not thy god Merumath, and praise him not, but rather praise thy god Barisat because, loving thee more, he hath cast himself into the fire to cook thy food!” And he said to me: “And where is he now?” [And I said:]⁹ “He is burnt to ashes in the violence of the fire and is reduced to dust.” And he said: “Great is the power of Barisat! I (will) make another to-day, and to-morrow he will prepare¹⁰ my food.”

VI. When I, Abraham, however, heard such words from my father, I laughed in my mind and sighed in the grief and in the anger of my soul, and said:¹¹ “How then can that which is made by him—manufactured statues—be a helper of my father? Or shall the body then be subject to its soul, and the soul to the spirit, and the spirit to folly and ignorance!”¹² And I said:¹¹ “It is fitting once to endure evil. So I will direct my mind to what is pure and lay my thoughts open before him.” [And]¹³ I answered and said: “O father Terah, whichever of these thou praisest as a god, thou art foolish in thy mind. Behold the gods of thy brother Ora,¹⁴ which stand in the holy temple, are more worthy of honour than [these of]¹⁵ thine. For behold Zuchaus, the god of thy brother Oron,¹⁶ is more worthy of honour than thy god

¹ Lit. kindling of the fire.

² S omits.

³ Lit. did my counsel: a Hebrew phrase, ‘āsā ‘ēsā, “execute a plan” (Is. xxx. 1).

⁴ S, + before.

⁵ A; + And it came to pass when I saw it.

⁶ A, mind; K, in my mind and laughed.

⁷ Lit. became.

⁸ Wine was sometimes mixed not only with water, but with milk, in Palestine; cf. Cant. V. 1 (I have drunk my wine with my milk): cf. also Is. lv. 1.

⁹ S A omit.

¹⁰ Lit. make.

¹¹ i.e. thought (“said in my heart”). The sentence that follows (“It is fitting once to endure evil”) means: “It is well to suffer in this way for a good cause.”

¹² In this sentence the text of S is not in order, and has been corrected by Tikhonravov in accordance with A and K.

¹³ Omitted by S.

¹⁴ i.e. Haran (so S); A has thy father Nahor, K my brother Nahor.

¹⁵ Omitted by S.

¹⁶ Another form of Haran (so S); A and K read as indicated in the previous note.

Merumath, because he is made of gold which is highly valued by people, and when he groweth old in years he will be re-modelled; but if your god Merumath is changed or broken, he will not be renewed, because he is a stone; the which is also the case with the god Joavon¹ ²[who standeth with Zucheus over the other gods—how³ much more worthy of honour is he than the god Barisat, who is made of wood, while he is forged of silver! How³ is he made, by adaptation of man, valuable to outward appearance! But thy god Barisat, while he was still, before he had been prepared, rooted up (?)⁴ upon the earth and was great and wonderful with the glory of branches and blossom,⁵ thou didst hew out with the axe, and by means of thy art he hath been made into a god. And lo! his fatness is already withered and perished, he is fallen from the height to the ground, he hath come from great estate to littleness, and the appearance of his countenance hath vanished, and he] Barisat himself is burnt up by fire and reduced to ashes and is no more; and thou sayest: “To-day I will make another which⁶ to-morrow shall make ready my food!”⁷ “He hath perished to utter destruction!”⁷

VII. ⁸“Behold, the fire is more worthy of honour than ⁹all things formed because even that which is not subjected is subjected unto it, and things easily perishable are mocked by its flames.⁹ ¹⁰But even more worthy of honour is the water,¹⁰ because it conquereth the fire and ¹¹satisfieth the earth.¹¹ But even it I do not call God, because ¹²it is subjected to the earth under which the water inclineth.¹² But I call the earth much more worthy of honour, because it overpowereth the nature (and the fulness)¹³ of the water. Even it (viz. the earth), however, I do not call god, [because]¹⁴ it, too, is dried up by the sun, [and]¹⁴ is apportioned to man to be tilled.¹⁵ [I call the sun more worthy of honour than the earth,]¹⁶ because it with its rays illumineth the whole world ¹⁷and the different atmospheres.¹⁷ [But]¹⁴ even it I do not call god, because at night ¹⁸and by clouds its course is obscured.¹⁸ Nor, again, do I call the moon or the stars

¹ So S; A, Joauv; K, Joav; R, Jav.

² The long passage in brackets which here follows is extant in A and K, but is wanting in S. It consists of a long comparison between the gods Joauv (Joavon) and Barisat, and is very obscure. It is probably a later interpolation.

³ Lit. that.

⁴ ? read rooted.

⁵ i.e. while it was growing as a tree.

⁶ Lit. and he.

⁷ Hath he not abandoned this (once for all) by perishing to utter destruction? A (K).

⁸ A K insert at the beginning of this chapter: Having thought thus, Abraham came to his father, saying: “Father Terah,” forgetting that Abraham was already speaking to him. The sentence is wanting in S.

⁹ So S; for this A K have thy honoured gods of gold, silver, stone, and wood, because it burneth up thy gods; yea, thy gods are burnt up in subjection to the fire, while the fire mocked them, devouring thy gods.

¹⁰ A K read: But that (viz. the fire) I do not call god, because it hath been subjected to the water, while the water is more worthy of honour than it (i. e. the fire).

¹¹ A K, maketh the fruits of the earth sweet.

¹² A K, the water inclineth under the earth.

¹³ So S; but A K omit—it is probably a gloss.

¹⁴ S omits.

¹⁵ Lit. for work (= Heb. la' ābōd).

¹⁶ Omitted by S; but it must have belonged to the original text. It is attested by A K.

¹⁷ So S; A K omit: atmospheres (? lower and upper) = ᾠέρες; cf. 4 Ezra vi. 4, altitudines aerum.

¹⁸ A K, it is obscured by the darkness.

god, because they also in their season obscure [their]¹ light at night.² [But]¹ hear [this],¹ Terah my father; for ³I will make known to thee³ the God who hath made everything, not these we consider as gods. Who then is He? or what is He?

Who hath crimsoned the heavens, and made the sun golden,
And the moon lustrous, and with it the stars;
And hath made the earth dry in the midst of many waters,
And set thee in⁴⁵ [and tested me in the confusion of my thoughts]⁵

“Yet may God reveal Himself to us through Himself!”

VIII. And it came to pass while I spake⁶ thus to my father Terah in the court of my⁷ house, there cometh down⁸ the voice of a Mighty One⁹ from heaven in a fiery cloud-burst,¹⁰ saying and crying: “Abraham, Abraham!” And I said: “Here am I.” And He said: ¹¹“Thou art seeking in the understanding of thine heart the God of Gods and the Creator;¹¹ ¹²I am He:¹² Go out from thy father Terah, and get thee out from the¹³ house, that thou also be not slain in the sins of thy father’s house.” And I went out. And it came to pass when I went out, that before I succeeded in getting out in front of the door of the court, there came a sound of a [great]¹⁴ thunder¹⁵ and burnt ¹⁶him and¹⁶ his house,¹⁶ and everything whatsoever in his house, down to the ground, forty cubits.¹⁷

¹ S omits.

² Or by (through) night.

³ Lit. I will investigate (or examine) before thee concerning. The question that follows, Who then is He? etc., gives the subject of the investigation.

⁴ Something has to be supplied here.

⁵ So A K; S omits.

⁶ S K, reflected.

⁷ A K, his (i. e. Terah’s), rightly. At this point there follows in A K (R) an insertion which contains, among other things, a version of the well-known legend about Abraham’s burning of the idol-temple, and with it his brother Haran; cf. Appendix I.

⁸ Lit. falleth (S); K, fell (A omits).

⁹ = LXX. ὁ ἰσχυρός (frequent as a rendering of Heb. hā’ēl, “God”); cf. 4 Ezra ix. 45, etc.

¹⁰ K, flame.

¹¹ The text of S is not in order; Sreznevsky reads: Cogu Coisya, God thou dost fear, and the Creator thou art seeking.

¹² A omits.

¹³ K, his.

¹⁴ S omits.

¹⁵ K, + and there fell fire from heaven.

¹⁶ A (K R) omit.

¹⁶ K, + and the dwellers therein, both men and beasts.

¹⁷ Here R ends. The Midrashic story about the burning of Terah’s house is really based upon an interpretation of the Biblical “Ur of the Chaldees” (Gen. xi. 31, xv. 7). Here “Ur” is interpreted as = “fire”; Abraham was brought out of “Ur” (“fire”) by the Lord.

PART II

THE APOCALYPSE (Chapters IX.-XXXII.).

Abraham receives a Divine Command to offer Sacrifice after Forty Days as a Preparation for a Divine Revelation (Chapter IX.; cf. Gen. xv.).

IX. Then a voice came to me speaking twice: "Abraham, Abraham!" And I said: "Here am I!" And He said: "Behold, ¹it is I; fear not,² for I am before the worlds,³ and a mighty God who hath created ⁴the light of the world.⁴ I am a shield over thee,² and I am thy helper. Go, take me a young heifer of three years old, and a she-goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtledove and a pigeon,⁵ and bring me a pure sacrifice. And in this sacrifice I will lay before thee the ages (to come), and make known to thee what is reserved, and thou shalt see great things which thou hast not seen (hitherto);⁶ because thou hast loved to search me out, and I have named thee my Friend.⁷ But abstain⁸ from every form of food that proceedeth out of the fire, and from the drinking of wine, and from anointing (thyself) with oil, forty days,"⁹ and then set forth for me the sacrifice which I have commanded thee, in the place which I will shew thee, on a high mountain,¹⁰ and there I will shew thee the ages which have been created and established,¹¹ made and renewed,¹¹ by my Word,¹² and¹³ I will make known to thee what

¹ K, I am with thee.

² Cf. Gen. xv. 1.

³ Or ages ("æons").

⁴ A, the first light: K, in the beginning heaven and earth and then the first luminary of light and of the world (cf. Gen. i. 1 f.). The reference is apparently to the created (not the uncreated) light. For the latter cf. note on chap. xvii.

⁵ Cf. Gen. xv. 9.

⁶ The revelation made to Abraham which is described in Gen. xv. 9 f. early became a favourite theme for apocalyptic speculation, and an intimation was discovered in the passage of Israel's later captivity and subjection to the four oppressive world-powers of the Book of Daniel (see the Targums ad loc.). This apocalyptic experience of Abraham is referred to in 4 Ezra iii. 14 (and unto him [Abraham] only didst thou reveal the end of the times secretly by night). According to the Ap. Bar. iv. 4 the heavenly Jerusalem was shown to Abraham "by night among the portions of the victims."

⁷ Or "lover." Abraham, as God's chosen friend (or "lover of God," cf. 2 Chron. xx. 7, Is. xli. 8, Ep. James ii. 23) can receive special revelation; for the juxtaposition of the two ideas cf. 4 Ezra iii. 14.

⁸ Or refrain thyself. By every form of food that proceedeth out of the fire, flesh-meat is no doubt meant.

⁹ Fasting as a preparation for the reception of a divine revelation was much practised by the apocalyptists. In 4 Ezra four fasts of seven days followed in each case by a divine revelation are referred to. Here, it is to be noted, the period is one of forty days. For the terms here used cf. 4 Ezra ix. 24. Anointing the body (especially the face) with oil was a mark of joy used in connexion with feasting (cf. Eccles. ix. 8, Ps. xxiii. 5, Amos vi. 6), and omitted in mourning as a sign of grief (cf. 2 Sam. xiv. 2, Dan. x. 3).

¹⁰ Cf. Gen. xxii. 2.

¹¹ A omits.

¹² The "Word" of God here has a quasi-personal significance; cf. 4 Ezra vi. 38 ("and thy Word, O Lord, perfected the work"), 43, etc.

¹³ and omitted by A.

shall come to pass in them on those who have done evil and (practised) righteousness in the generation of men.

Abraham, under the Direction of the Angel Jaobel, proceeds to Mount Horeb, a Journey of Forty Days, to offer the Sacrifice (Chapters X.-XII.).

X. And it came to pass, when I heard the voice of Him who spake such words to me, (and)¹ I looked hither and thither and lo! there was no breath of a man,² ³and my spirit was affrighted, and my soul fled from me, and I became like a stone, and fell down upon the earth, for³ I had no more strength to stand on the earth.⁴ ⁵And while I was still lying with my face upon the earth,⁵ I heard the voice of the Holy One speaking: "Go, Jaobel,⁶ and by means of my ineffable Name raise me yonder man, and strengthen him (so that he recover) from his trembling." And the angel came, whom He had sent to me, in the likeness of a man, and⁷ grasped me by my right hand, and set me up upon my feet, and said to me:⁸ "Stand up,⁹ [Abraham,]¹⁰ Friend of God who loveth thee; let not¹¹ the trembling of man seize thee! For, lo! I have been sent to thee to strengthen thee and bless thee in the name of God—who loveth thee—the Creator of the celestial and terrestrial. Be fearless and hasten to Him. I am called Jaobel¹² by Him who moveth that which existeth with me on the seventh¹³ expanse upon¹⁴ the firmament,¹⁵ a power in virtue of the ineffable Name that is dwelling in me.¹⁶ I am

¹ Omit (a Hebraism? marks apodosis).

² Cf. 4 Ezra vii. 29 ("omnes qui spiramentum habent hominis").

³ K reads: and he was affrighted in his spirit, and his soul perished in him, and he became like a dead man, and fell down like a stone upon the earth, and.

⁴ Cf. Ezek. i. 28; Dan. viii. 17, x. 8 f.; 1 Enoch xiv. 14, 24; 4 Ezra x. 29 f.

⁵ K omits.

⁶ The name of the archangel Joel (Jaobel) is differently spelt in the various texts (cf. the Slavonic version of The Book of Adam, ed. by Jagić, in Denkschriften des Kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien, philol.-histor. Classe, Vol. XLII): S, Naol, lloil; A, Aol, K, Jaol, Book of Adam, Joil = Joel. Jaobel (= Heb. Yahoel) is represented in our Apocalypse as a being possessed of the power of the ineffable name, a function assigned in the Rabbinical writings to Metatron, "whose name is like unto that of God Himself" (T.B. Sanh. 38b). The name Yahoel (Jaobel) is evidently a substitute for the ineffable name Yahweh, the writing out of which in full was forbidden. In chap. xvii. below God Himself is addressed as Jaobel. For Jaobel as the heavenly choir-master cf. note on chap. xvii.

⁷ A omits.

⁸ Cf. 4 Ezra x. 30.

⁹ A omits.

¹⁰ S omits.

¹¹ A K, if.

¹² S, Eloel; A, Aol; K, loal.

¹³ A, middle.

¹⁴ i.e.? "over."

¹⁵ The angel sent to Isaiah to conduct him through the various "heavens" had "come from the seventh [i. e. the highest] heaven"; cf. Asc. Is. vi. 13, vii. 27.

¹⁶ Cf. Ex. xxiii. 21 ("my name is in him," i. e. the angel of Jahveh); here Jaobel seems to play the rôle of Michael (see Introduction, p. xxv).

the one who hath been given to restrain, according to His commandment, the threatening attack of the living creatures of the Cherubim against one another,¹ and teach those who carry Him² the song of the seventh hour of the night of man.³ I am ordained to restrain the Leviathan, for unto me are subject the attack and menace of every single reptile.⁴ [I am he who hath been commissioned to loosen Hades, to destroy him who stareth at the dead.]⁵ I am the one who was commissioned to set on fire thy father's house together with him, because he displayed

¹ By "the living creatures of the Cherubim" are meant the "holy hayyoth" of Ezek. i. who are expressly identified with the [heavenly] Cherubim in Ezek. x. 20. They are four in number (each with four faces), and are the bearers of the divine throne (see next note). Apparently they are here represented as of threatening aspect and in danger of menacing attack upon one another, so that a restraining influence was necessary. According to the Midrash (Exodus rabba v.) envy and mistrust are absent from the angelic world, though the angels envied Israel the possession of the Law; but cf. Asc. Is. 9.

² i.e. "the holy hayyoth ['living creatures'] who carry the throne of glory" (Sifra on Lev. i. 1).

³ According to T.B. Abôdâ zārâ 3b, "God sits [at night] and listens to the song of the living creatures [hayyoth], as it is said (Ps. xlii. 8): By day the Lord commandeth His loving-kindness [i. e. judges and sustains the world, and occupies Himself in the study of the Law], and in the night His song is with me." In T.B. Hag. 12b it is said that the companies of ministering angels in the fifth heaven "utter His song in the night, and are silent in the day for the sake of the glory of Israel." In Pirke de R. Eliezer iv. Michael is represented as the head of the first of four bands of ministering angels who utter praise before the Holy One; cf. also Mekilta to Ex. xv. 1; and in the New Testament Luke ii. 13 (the angelic song at night).

⁴ Michael is represented in Kabbalistic literature as the angel-prince who is set over the element of water (cf. Lueken, Michael, p. 54); this conception is probably old, for on it rests the haggadic story that when Solomon married Pharaoh's daughter, Michael drove into the bed of the sea a stick, around which slime gathered, and on which Rome was ultimately built (Midrash rabba on Cant. i. 6, in the name of R. Levi, end of third century A.D.). Michael is also the prince of snow, which belongs to the element of water (Deut. rabba v. 12). Leviathan as the sea-monster par excellence would be subject to him, with all reptiles, though the task of slaying the monster is assigned, by Jewish legend, to Gabriel; but Michael and Gabriel are often confused in these connexions. [For the "spirit of the sea" that restrains it cf. 1 Enoch lx. 16.] The representation here is parallel in a sense with that which depicts Michael as the enemy and conqueror of Satan (cf. Rev. xii. 7 ff.) and in later Christian tradition as the vanquisher of the dragon (cf. Lueken, op. cit., pp. 106 ff.). It should be noted that according to the Kabbalistic book Raziel fol. 4a the name of Michael is a powerful charm against the reptiles (cf. Lueken, p. 28).

⁵ The bracketed clause is omitted by S. One of Michael's functions (with Gabriel) is to open the gates of Hell and release the sinners therein; see Yalqut Shim. on Is. xxvi. 2, and cf. Lueken, op. cit., p. 52. What is meant by "destroying" him who stareth at the dead is not clear. It might conceivably refer to the duty of burying the dead. To allow a corpse—even an enemy's—to remain unburied was considered an impiety (cf. Ps. lxxix. 2 f.; Tobit i. 17, ii. 7; Josephus, Apion, ii. 29), and it is notable that, according to The Life of Adam and Eve, xlvi. 4 f.; (cf. Charles, Corpus ii. 151), Michael and Uriel bury the bodies of Adam and Abel in Paradise. But the language of the phrase here hardly suits this. In view of the next clause, where "dead" = dead idols, the reference may perhaps be to idol-worship. In a Byzantine text the story of Michael's contest with the devil about the body of Moses is given a somewhat similar motive. The devil is represented as seeking to bring down Moses' dead body to the Israelites in order that they may worship it—and this may depend originally upon a Jewish source which in this way protested against the Christian worship of saints and relics (cf. Lueken, op. cit., p. 121 f.). But perhaps stareth at should be altered to terrifieth, and the reference is to Death personified; cf. Add. Note, p. 55 f.

reverence for dead (idols).¹ I have been sent to bless thee now, and the land² which the Eternal One, whom thou hast invoked, hath prepared for thee, and for thy sake have I wended my way upon the earth.³ Stand up, Abraham! Go without fear; be right glad and rejoice; and I am with thee! For eternal honour hath been prepared for thee by the Eternal One. Go, fulfil the sacrifices commanded. For lo! I have been appointed to be with thee and with the generation prepared (to spring) from thee; and with me Michael⁴ blesseth thee for ever. Be of good cheer, go!”

XI. And I rose up and saw him who had grasped me by my right hand and set me up upon my feet: and the appearance of his body⁵ was like sapphire, and the look of his countenance like chrysolite, and the hair of his head like snow, and the turban upon his head⁶ like the appearance of the rainbow, and the clothing of his garments like purple; and a golden sceptre was in his right hand.⁷ And he said to me: “Abraham!” And I said: “Here am I, thy servant.” And he said: “Let not my look affright thee, nor my speech, that thy soul be not perturbed).⁸ Come with me and I will go with thee, until the sacrifice, visible, but after the sacrifice,⁹ invisible for ever. Be of good cheer, and come!”

XII. And we went, the two of us together, forty days and nights,¹⁰ and I ate no bread, and drank no water, because my food¹¹ was to see the angel who was with me, and his

¹ In the Rabbinical form of the legend (see Appendix) Abraham is rescued from the fiery oven into which he had been cast by Nimrod by Michael, according to the opinion of Eliezer b. Jacob (Genesis rabba xliv. 16). Michael, according to the Rabbis, was the defender of the Patriarchs. Strictly it is Gabriel who is the prince of fire.

² i.e. the land of Palestine. In Mohammedan tradition Michael is the good angel who brings peace and plenty.

³ It was Michael who, according to Rabbinic tradition, at various times appeared to Abraham, e. g. he told Abraham that Lot had escaped, protected Sarah from being defiled by Abimelech (Pirke de R. Eliezer xxvi.), announced to Sarah that she should have a son (Gen. xviii. 10), rescued Lot from Sodom (T.B. Baba mesia, 86b), and prevented Isaac from being sacrificed by substituting a ram. In The Test. of Abraham (i.) it is Michael who comes down and visits Abraham in order to take his soul.

⁴ Here Michael is associated with the speaker, the archangel Jaoel. This rather suggests that the latter is really fulfilling the rôle of Metatron (Michael and Metatron are companions, Zohar i. 149b). But Jaoel really combines the functions of both. The writer wishes to make it clear that Jaoel is closely associated with Michael.

⁵ K, + his feet (a gloss? suggested by Rev. i. 15).

⁶ Cf. Rev. xix. 12 (“upon his head many diadems”).

⁷ Cf. Rev. i. 16 (“and he had in his right hand seven stars”). There is a general resemblance here to the description of the exalted Christ in Rev. i. 14-16, but the details are different except that both have the characteristic descriptive phrase, derived from Dan. vii. 9 (“the hair of his head like pure wool,” here “like snow,” cf. Rev. i. 14); cf. also 2 Enoch i. 5 (the description of the two angels who visit Enoch). The figure described is regal (notice the purple garments and the sceptre), and is invested with the divine glory; cf. Ezek. 26 f.

⁸ Or “troubled”; cf. 2 Enoch i. 8, and often in apocalyptic writings.

⁹ K, + I will be. The angel appears in visible form for the time being. So Michael appears to Abraham “like a very comely warrior” (Test. Abrah. i.).

¹⁰ Cf. 1 Kings xix. 8.

¹¹ S, + and my drink.

speech—that was my drink.¹ And we came to the Mount of God, the glorious Horeb. And I said to the angel: “Singer of the Eternal One! Lo! I have no sacrifice with me,² nor am I aware of a place of an altar on the mountain: how can I bring a sacrifice?” And he said to me: “Look round!”³ ⁴And I looked round,⁴ and lo! there were following us all the prescribed sacrificial (animals)—the young heifer, and the she-goat, and the ram, and the turtle-dove, and the pigeon.⁵ And the angel said to me: “Abraham!” I said: “Here am I.” And he said to me: “All these slaughter, and divide the animals into halves, one against the other, but the birds do not sever;⁶ and (“but”) give to the men, whom I will shew thee, standing by thee, for these are the altar⁷ upon the Mountain, to offer a sacrifice to the Eternal; but the turtledove and the pigeon give to me, for I will ascend upon the wings of the bird,⁸ in order to shew thee in heaven, and on the earth, and in the sea, and in the abyss, and in the under-world, and in the Garden of Eden, and in its rivers and in the fulness of the whole world and its circle—thou shalt gaze in (them) all.”⁹

Abraham accomplishes the Sacrifice, under the Guidance of the Angel, and refuses to be diverted from his Purpose by Azazel (Chapters XIII.-XIV.).

XIII. And I did everything according to the commandment of the angel, and gave the angels, who had come to us, the divided animals, but the angel¹⁰ took the birds. And I waited for the evening sacrifice. And there flew an unclean bird down upon the carcasses,¹¹ and I drove it away. And the unclean bird spake to me, and said: “What doest thou, Abraham, upon the holy Heights, where no man eateth or drinketh,¹² neither is there upon them (any) food of

¹ Cf. John iv. 31-34. Elijah ate and drank before starting on his journey to Horeb, and “went in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights” (1 Kings xix. 8): cf. Ex. xxiv. 18. There is a close parallel to our text in Philo, Life of Moses, Bk. III. 1, where it is said of Moses in the Mount: “he neglected all meat and drink for forty days together, evidently because he had more excellent food than that in those contemplations with which he was inspired from above from heaven.”

² Cf. Gen. xxii. 7.

³ A, behind.

⁴ A K omit.

⁵ Cf. Gen. xv. 9.

⁶ Cf. Gen. xv. 10.

⁷ Living men (or rather angels) take the place of the material altar; cf. the metaphorical use of “temple” as applied to the body (cf. John ii. 21; 1 Cor. iii. 16, vi. 19). But such a use of the term “altar” does not appear to have become current in Jewish literature.

⁸ The ascent to heaven is accomplished on the wings of a dove. The dove is appropriate in this connexion because of its swiftness (cf. Ps. lv. (6) 7, “Oh that I had wings like a dove,” etc.; cf. also Virgil, Æn. vi. 190 ff.), and its purity. For the symbolism of the dove applied to Israel, and also to the Holy Spirit (Matt. iii. 16), cf. I. Abrahams, Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels, pp. 47 ff.

⁹ The revelations here promised to Abraham correspond to the earlier models given in 1 and 2 Enoch.

¹⁰ K, + Jaoel.

¹¹ Cf. Gen. xv. 11.

¹² i. e. they are in the domain of the spiritual sphere, where there is no eating and drinking; cf. Test. Abrah. (A) iv., “all the heavenly spirits are incorporeal, and neither eat nor drink.”

man, but these¹ consume everything with fire, and (will) burn thee up. ²Forsake the man, who is with thee, and flee; for if thou ascendest to the Heights they will make an end of thee.² And it came to pass, when I saw the bird speak, I said to the angel: "What is this, my lord?" And he said: "This is ungodliness,³ this is Azazel."⁴ And he said to it: "Disgrace upon thee, Azazel! For Abraham's lot is in heaven, but thine upon the earth. Because thou hast chosen and loved this for the dwelling-(place) of thine uncleanness, therefore the eternal mighty Lord made thee a dweller upon the earth⁵ and through thee every evil spirit of lies,⁶ and through thee wrath and trials for the generations of ungodly men;⁷ for God, the Eternal, Mighty One, hath not permitted that the bodies of the righteous should be in thy hand,⁸ in order that thereby the life of the righteous and the destruction of the unclean may be assured.⁹ Hear, friend,¹⁰ begone with shame from me. For it hath not been given to thee to play the tempter in regard to all the righteous. Depart from this man! Thou canst not lead him astray, because he is an enemy to thee, and of those who follow thee and love what thou wilt. For, behold, the vesture which in heaven was formerly thine hath been set aside for him,¹¹ and the mortality

¹ i. e. the heavenly beings.

² Omitted by A K.

³ Cf. Zech. v. 8.

⁴ Azazel is the fallen archangel, the seducer of mankind, who here, as in the Book of Enoch, fills the rôle of Satan or Sammael. He is essentially the spirit of uncleanness, and, in this character, is depicted in our text as descending in the form of an unclean bird. It is interesting to note that the Palestinian Targum on Gen. xv. 11 interprets the unclean birds figuratively of idolatrous peoples ("And there came down idolatrous peoples which are like to unclean birds, to steal away the sacrifices of Israel; but the righteousness of Abram was a shield over them").

⁵ Azazel, who is here clearly a fallen archangel like the later Satan (cf. Bousset, *Relig. d. Judentums*², 386), has been expelled from heaven by God. According to 2 Enoch xxix. 5 Satan's domain, after his expulsion, was the air (cf. Eph. ii. 2), but here Azazel is a "dweller upon the earth," where he controls the evil powers (cf. John xii. 31, "prince of this world," Matt. iv. 8 f.). In The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (cf. also Asc. Is.) Beliar is the arch-fiend, the head of the evil spirits, and the source of impurity and lying. But Azazel, like all celestial beings, can fly through the air (Gen. rabba xix.) and assume any form, such as that of a bird (T. B. Sanh., 107a).

⁶ Azazel's expulsion carried with it that of his hosts, of which he was the leader. [Note that in chap. xxxi. of our Book Azazel is depicted as the lord of hell.]

⁷ For the sin and misery brought upon the earth by the fallen angels cf. 1 Enoch viii. 2, ix. 6, 8, x. 7 f., etc.

⁸ According to T. B. Baba bathra, 17a the "evil impulse" (yeseh hā-ra') had no power over the three righteous men, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. In The Test. Abrah. Abraham is represented as sinless.

⁹ Notice the strong dualism. The activity of the evil powers makes perdition certain for their victims, while, on the other hand, by its very failure in the case of the righteous it makes their felicity more certain in the end.

¹⁰ [Lit. "counsellor," an idiomatic expression still found in Russian dialects (cf. Dalj's Dictionary of the Russian Language, s.v. sovetnik) meaning "friend," used in a good-humoured way.—J. I. L.]

¹¹ The "heavenly garments" are here referred to "which are now stored up on high in the seventh heaven" according to Asc. Is. iv. 16. The idea, originally a realistic one, was gradually spiritualised, and came to mean the spiritual bodies in which the righteous will be clothed in heaven; cf. 1 Enoch lxii. 15 f. ("garments of glory," "garments of life"); cf. also 2 Enoch xxii. 8 f., where Michael is bidden by God to "take from Enoch his earthly robe . . . and clothe him with the garment of my glory." In The Ascension of Isaiah the seer is unable to ascend to the highest heaven until his "garment" has been brought to him

(Asc. Is. ix. 1-2). There he sees the crowns and garments which are reserved for the righteous (ibid. ix. 13 ff.); cf. also Asc. Is. viii. 14; Rev. iii. 4, 5, 18, vi. 11, vii. 9; 2 Cor. v. 3 ff.

which was his hath been transferred to thee.”¹

XIV. The angel said to me: ²[“Abraham!” And I said: “Here am I, thy servant.” And he said: “Know from henceforth that the Eternal One hath chosen thee, (He) whom thou lovest; be of good courage and use this authority, so far as I bid thee, against him who slandereth truth;³ should I not be able to put him to shame who hath scattered over the earth the secrets of heaven⁴ and hath rebelled⁵ against the Mighty One?⁶”] ⁷Say to him: ‘Be thou the burning coal of the Furnace of the earth;⁸ go, Azazel, into the inaccessible parts of the earth;⁹[for thy heritage is (to be) over those existing with thee being born with the stars and clouds,¹⁰ with the men whose portion thou art, and (who) through thy being exist;¹¹ and thine enmity is justification. On this account by thy perdition disappear from me.” And

¹ Azazel has thus lost his “garment of life,” or robe of immortality, and become mortal, while Abraham gains it.

² S, Abraham.

³ Cf. John viii. 44 (“he [the Devil] is a liar and the father thereof”). Satan—here Azazel—is par excellence “the slanderer” (ὁ διαβόλος), “he who slandereth truth.”

⁴ The fallen angels (1 Enoch vii., lxix. 6 ff.), and especially Azazel (1 Enoch viii. 1), are represented as having brought moral ruin upon the earth by teaching men the use of magic, astrology, and science (including the use of warlike weapons). A close parallel to our text exists in 1 Enoch ix. 6: “See what Azazel hath done, how he hath taught all unrighteousness on earth and revealed the secret things of the world which were wrought in the heavens.”

⁵ So Sammael, “the great prince in heaven,” is reproached by the Torah for rebellion against God (Pirke de R. Eliezer xiii.: “The Torah began to cry aloud saying: Why, O Sammael! now that the world is created, is it the time to rebel against the Omnipresent? Is it like a time when thou shouldest lift up thyself on high (Job xxxix. 18)?”). Thus the two chief sins of Azazel consist in “scattering the secrets of heaven upon the earth,” and in devising rebellion against the Most High.

⁶ = probably LXX. ὁ ισχυρός (Heb. hā ’ēl); see chap. viii. note¹. Kohler suggests Heb. ’abâr, “Mighty One” (of Jacob), Gen. xlix. 24 (LXX, ὁ δυνάστης), Is. xlix. 26 (LXX, ισχύς).

⁷ Bracketed clause attested by A K, omitted by S.

⁸ Azazel is condemned to be in himself the fire of Hell; cf. xxxi. (“burnt with the fire of Azazel’s tongue”). Thus wherever he goes he, as it were, carries Hell with him—a conception that appears to be peculiar to our Apocalypse in early apocalyptic literature (cf. Volz, p. 291).

⁹ i. e. into those parts of the earth reserved for him till the final judgement. In 1 Enoch x. 4 Azazel is condemned to be bound and placed in Dudâêl, in the desert, and there to be imprisoned in darkness till the final judgement.

¹⁰ This expression is obscure. It apparently refers to the men who belong (? by birth) to Azazel, whose lot has been pre-determined (see next note).

¹¹ The wicked are Azazel’s “portion,” i. e. they have been assigned to him from the beginning. The idea seems to be predestinarian; cf. Wisdom ii. 24 (“by the envy of the devil death entered into the world, and they that are his portion make trial thereof”), Ap. Bar. xlii. 7 (“for corruption will take those that belong to it, and life those that belong to it”); 1 Enoch xli. 8. [Does the phrase in the previous clause, “being born with the stars and clouds,” mean those who by birth and creation belong to the sphere of night and darkness, as opposed to the righteous, who belong to the realm of light? See 1 Enoch xli. 8 and Charles’s note.]

I uttered the words which the angel had taught me. And he said: "Abraham!" And I said: "Here am I, thy servant."]¹

And the angel said to me: "Answer him not; for God hath given him power (lit. will) over those who do answer him."² [And the angel spake to me a second time and said: "Now rather, however much he speak to thee, answer him not, that his will may have no free course in thee, because the Eternal and Mighty One hath given him ³weight and will;³ answer him not." I did what was commanded me by the angel;]⁴ and however much he spake to me, I answered him ⁵nothing whatsoever.⁵

Abraham and the Angel ascend on the Wings of the Birds to Heaven (Chapters XV.-XVI.).

XV. And it came to pass when the sun went down, and lo! a smoke as of a furnace.⁶ And the angels who had the portions of the sacrifice⁷ ascended from the top of the smoking furnace. And the Angel took me with the⁸ right hand and set me on the right wing of the pigeon, and set himself on the left⁹ wing of the turtle dove, which (birds) had neither been slaughtered nor divided. And he bore me to the borders of the flaming fire [and we ascended as with many winds to the heaven which was fixed upon the surface.¹⁰ And I saw on the air]¹¹ on the height, to which we ascended a strong light, which it was impossible to describe,¹² and lo! in this light a fiercely burning fire for people, many people of male appearance,¹³ all (constantly) changing in aspect and form, running and being transformed, and worshipping and crying with a sound of words which I knew not.¹⁴

¹ The bracketed clause is attested by A K, but is absent from S. It may be a later interpolation (but see Introduction).

² A fine psychological touch.

³ The text may be corrupt. It might mean an over-powering will.

⁴ The bracketed clause is attested by A K, but is absent from S. It is obviously a parallel and alternative text to the preceding clause.

⁵ According to Sreznevsky's reading (no se ni ti, lit. "not this nor that").

⁶ Cf. Gen. xv. 17 (also xv. 12).

⁷ Cf. chap. xii. above.

⁸ A, his.

⁹ A omits.

¹⁰ i. e.? the heaven above the firmament.

¹¹ Omitted accidentally in S by homoiotelenon ("ascended . . . ascended").

¹² i. e. the uncreated light, which originally illuminated the earth, but was withdrawn when Adam sinned. See further notes on xvii. below.

¹³ K, sex.

¹⁴ The description refers to the host of angels who are born daily, sing their song of praise before God, and then disappear; cf. Genesis rabba lxxviii. 1: Rabbi Helbo in the name of R. Samuel bar Nahman said: "One angel-host never repeats the song of praise, but every morning God creates a new angel-host and these cantillate a new song before Him and then disappear." They are created daily out of the stream of fire that proceeds from the holy hayyoth (ibid.); cf. Ps. civ. 4. Cf. also 2 Enoch xxix. 3: "And from the fire I made the ranks of the spiritual hosts, ten thousand angels, and their weapons are fiery, and their garment is a burning flame"; see further Weber, p. 166 f.

XVI. And I said to the Angel: “Why¹ hast thou brought me up here now, because I² cannot now see, for I am already grown weak, and my spirit departeth from me?”³ And he said to me: “Remain by me; fear not! And He whom thou seest come straight towards us with great voice of holiness⁴—that is the Eternal One who Loveth thee; but Himself thou canst not see).⁵ But let not thy spirit grow faint [on account of the loud crying],⁶ for I am with thee, strengthening thee.”

Abraham, taught by the Angel, utters the Celestial Song and prays for Enlightenment (Chapter XVII.).

XVII. And while he yet spake (and) lo! fire⁷ came against us⁸ round about,⁸ and a voice was in the fire like a voice of many waters,⁹ like the sound of the sea in its uproar.¹⁰ And the angel bent his head with me and worshipped.¹¹ And I desired to fall down upon the earth, and the high place, on which we stood, [at one moment rose upright,]¹² but at another rolled downwards.¹³

And he said: “Only worship, Abraham, and utter the song which I have taught thee;” because there was no¹⁴ earth to fall upon. And I worshipped only, and uttered the song which

¹ S, where.

² K, mine eyes.

³ The mortal man, conscious of his weakness, is blinded by the heavenly light. On the other hand, Adam, before he fell, was able to see by its aid “from one end of the world to the other” (T.B. Hag. 12a).

⁴ i. e. proclaiming His holiness, so A; in S the word is corrupt. K (which may preserve the right reading here) has: “[with a great voice] saying: Holy, holy, holy is the Lord.” In 1 Enoch xxxix. 12 the trisagion (Is. vi. 5) is the song of the angelic watchers.

⁵ God is Himself invisible.

⁶ Omitted by S.

⁷ The Divine Presence is revealed by fire (Ex. iii. 2, Deut. iv. 36, Ps. lxxviii. 14), and God Himself is spoken of as “a consuming fire” (Deut. iv. 24, ix. 3). But here the fiery chariot which bore the Divine Presence is probably thought of; cf. Ezek. i. 4 (“a great cloud with a fire infolding itself”).

⁸ A omits.

⁹ Cf. Rev. i. 15 (Dan. x. 6). This feature is part of the supernatural colouring so characteristic of Apocalyptic—the heavenly light is of dazzling brilliance, the divine voice is like thunder (cf. 2 Enoch xxxix. 7: “like great thunder with continual agitation of the clouds”); see Volz, Der Geist Gottes, p. 120 f.

¹⁰ Cf. Is. xvii. 12.

¹¹ A strongly Jewish touch—divine honour may be paid to God alone, and to none other, even the most exalted of heavenly beings; cf. Rev. xxii. 9.

¹² S omits.

¹³ This description is interesting. The seer has ascended “as with many winds” to heaven, and is standing “on the height” (chap. xv.). He experiences a strong feeling of desire to fall down upon the earth, because the high place on which he is standing with the angel, at one moment rose upright, at another plunged downward (cf. 4 Ezra vi. 29 and 13-16). The commotion is produced by the Divine Voice. In chap. xxx. the seer finds himself suddenly (while God is speaking) again upon the earth.

¹⁴ A omits no.

he had taught me.¹ And he said: “Recite without ceasing.” And I recited, and he ²also himself³ with me³ recited the song:⁴

Eternal, mighty, Holy, El,⁵

⁶God only—Supreme!

Thou who art self-originated,⁶ incorruptible, spotless,

Uncreate, immaculate, immortal,

Self-complete, self-illuminating;

⁷Without father, without mother, unbegotten,⁷

Exalted, fiery One!

Lover of men,⁸ benevolent,⁹ bountiful,¹⁰

jealous over me and very compassionate;¹¹

¹ Only the angels understand how to utter the divine song of praise, though the blessed among mortals may (as here) be taught to sing thus in a state of ecstasy. Each of the angelic spheres has its own “Voice” (cf. 1 Enoch xl. 3 ff.), and the angelic language is incomprehensible to mortals (cf. chap. xv. above, end), though the illuminated and inspired seer may be taught both to understand and utter such “words” (as here; cf. ἐν γλώσσαις λαλεῖν in N.T.). The exalted Enoch in heaven underwent a similar experience (cf. 1 Enoch lxxi. 11 f.: “I fell on my face and my whole body melted away, but my spirit was transfigured, and I cried with a loud voice,” etc.), as also did Isaiah (Asc. Is. viii. 17). According to Philo no beings can adequately express the praise due to God (Life of Moses, ii. xxxi. [§ 239]), contrast Ecclus. xxxix. 6. See further Volz, op. cit., p. 137.

² A omits.

³ S omits. In Asc. Is. viii. 17 the inspired seer joins with the angel in the celestial song of praise.

⁴ K, + the first song of Abraham which I, the holy angel Jaoel, taught him (while) moving with him in the air.

⁵ A K omit El.

⁶ Cf. the opening lines of the Jewish mediæval hymn, 'Adon 'ôlām “Lord of the world He reigned alone, while yet creation was unformed,” and for “self-originated” the phrase “beginningless” (bēlî rē'shūth) applied to God in the same context. The divine name Shaddai was traditionally explained as = “the self-sufficient” (shē-dai hū lô). This idea may underlie the text here.

⁷ Cf. Heb. vii. 3, ἀπάτωρ ἀμήτωρ ἀγενεαλόγητος, of Melchizedek (= Heb. bē'en 'āb bē'en 'ēm be'en yahas). As Westcott remarks (ad loc.), “The words (ἀπάτωρ, ἀμήτωρ) were used constantly in Greek mythology (e.g. of Athene and Hephæstus); and so passed into the loftier conceptions of the Deity, as in that of Trismegistus quoted by Lactantius (iv. 13): ipse enim pater Deus et origo et principium rerum quoniam parentibus caret ἀπάτωρ atque ἀμήτωρ Trismegisto verissime nominatur, quod ex nullo sit procreatus.”

⁸ = φιλόανθρωπον: cf. Wisdom i. 6 (“For Wisdom is a spirit that loveth men” [φιλόανθρωπον πνεῦμα]).

⁹ = ? χρησπός.

¹⁰ = χαριστικός.

¹¹ Cf. Deut. v. 9 f. The whole clause (from “lover of men” to “compassionate”) contains a short summary of the divine attributes based upon Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7, a passage much used in later literature (cf. e. g. Wisdom xv. 1), and especially in the Liturgy; cf. 4 Ezra vii. 132-viii. 3 and the writer's notes thereon. These attributes are predicable especially of the Tetragrammaton (Jahveh), which connotes more particularly the elements of mercy and compassion, while 'Elōhām denotes multiplied power (the Almighty), and is associated with the idea of justice and fixed law; 'El is part of 'Elōhām and denotes simply power.

Eli, that is, My God—
 Eternal, mighty holy Sabaoth,¹ very glorious El, El, El, El, Jaoel!²
 Thou art He whom my soul hath loved!
 Eternal Protector, shining like fire,
 Whose voice is like the thunder,³
 Whose look is like the lightning, all-seeing,⁴
 Who receiveth the prayers of such as honour Thee!

[And turneth away from the requests of such as embarrass with the embarrassment of their provocations,

Who dissolveth the confusions of the world⁵ which arise from the ungodly and righteous⁶ in the corruptible age,⁷ renewing the age of the righteous!⁸]⁹

Thou, O Light, shinest¹⁰ before the light of the¹¹ morning upon Thy creatures,

¹ The use of Sabaoth alone as a designation of God is unusual, but not unexampled; cf. Ex. rabba iii. 6 [in answer to Moses' question, What is His name? Ex. iii. 13]: "The Holy One, blessed be He, said: Dost thou seek to know my name? I am called according to my deeds. I am called at various times by the names 'El Shaddai, Sabaoth, Elohim, Jahveh. When I judge the creatures I am named Elohim, and when I wage war against the wicked I am called Sabaoth, and when I suspend (the punishment) of man's sins I am called 'El Shaddai, and when I compassionate my world I am called Jahveh, because Jahveh means nought else but the attribute of compassion, as it is said (Ex. xxxiv. 6 f.) Jahveh, Jahveh a God full of compassion," etc.

² The fourfold El (attested only by S) looks like a substitution for the Tetragrammaton; Jaoel (here applied to God) is undoubtedly so. Elsewhere in this book it is the designation of the archangel.

³ Cf. Note³ at beginning of this chapter.

⁴ Cf. Dan. x. 6 ("and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire") and Ezek. i. 13, 14.

⁵ Lit. "the all" (Heb. ha-kōl); the expression is sometimes so used in the later Hebrew Liturgy.

⁶ The mixture of good and evil, or rather of the righteous and ungodly, in this world, makes the present æon "corruptible" (cf. 4 Ezra iv. 26-30); even the righteous themselves suffer from contact with the godless—their holiness is dimmed.

⁷ i. e. the present corruptible age (or "æon"); cf. 4 Ezra vii. 112, xiv. 13 ("the life that is corruptible").

⁸ The confusions of the present world will be overcome by the elimination of the godless; then the renovated world (i. e. the present world purified) will become the fit habitation of the righteous. This view harmonises with the Rabbinical, which contemplated a renovation of the present world; see further Volz, Eschatologie, p. 297, and cf. Jubilees, passim.

⁹ The bracketed clause is attested by A K, but omitted by S; it is probably an interpolation. The rhythm is much improved by its omission.

¹⁰ Or "Thou shinest as Light"; the original Semitic text should probably be rendered "Thou didst shine." Light is the most striking feature in the highest heaven (cf. 2 Enoch xx. i, "I saw there a very great light," and xxx. 2); God is Light (cf. 1 John i. 5). His majesty is surrounded with light to make Him invisible to all beings (T. B. Megilla, 19b). It is this heavenly light which is referred to here (cf. also Wisdom vii. 26 f., where Wisdom is represented as the radiance of the everlasting light). The first act of creation was when God "robed Himself with light as with a garment" (Ps. civ. 2), while the "radiance of His glory" (Heb. ziv hādārō) illumined the earth from one end to the other (cf. Gen. rabba iii., Pirke de R.

Eliezer iii.). This heavenly light was afterwards withdrawn; the luminaries receive their light from a spark of it. For light as a symbol of blessedness cf. Volz, Eschatologie, p. 328. Ps. xix. contrasts natural (created) and spiritual light.

¹¹ Perhaps, as Ginzberg suggests, “before the morning light” is a mistranslation of the Semitic original “before the primæval morning” (’ôr rîshôn or nêhôrâ kadmōniyyā). The meaning of the original line would be that God at first illumined the earth with the heavenly radiance.

[so that it becometh¹ day upon the earth,]²
And in Thy² heavenly dwelling places there is no need of any other light than (that) of the unspeakable splendour from the lights of Thy countenance.³
Accept my prayer [and be well-pleased with it],⁴ likewise also the sacrifice which Thou hast prepared Thee through me who sought Thee!
Accept me favourably, and shew me, and teach me,
And make known to Thy servant as thou hast promised me!⁵

Abraham’s Vision of the Divine Throne (Chapter XVIII.).

XVIII. And⁶ while I still recited the song, the mouth of the fire which was on the surface rose up on high. And I heard a voice like the roaring of the sea; nor did it cease on account of⁷ the rich abundance⁷ of the fire.⁸ And as the fire raised itself up, ascending into the height, I saw under the fire a throne of fire,⁹ and, round about it

¹ Render became.

² S omits.

³ Cf. Rev. xxii. 5, xxi. 23, Is. lx. 19 f. [The theme is expanded in the Synagogue Liturgy in connexion with the Benediction over light which precedes the recitation of the Shema: “Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who formest light and createst darkness. . . . Yea, eternal light (Heb. ’ôr ’ôlām) in the treasury of life; for He spake, and out of darkness there was light.”]

⁴ The bracketed clause is attested by A K; S omits.

⁵ Abraham prays that the sacrifice may be accepted, and as a result of this that the secrets of the future may be disclosed by revelation. The prayer seems to be a personal addition to the song of praise on the part of Abraham. The structure of the whole with its opening invocation, made up of clauses describing the divine attributes and transcendence, and followed by a prayer, is similar to that of 4 Ezra viii. 20 ff. (cf. especially verses 20-27), which is also poetical in form. Here it is to be noticed that the “song” proper appears to be a midrashic development of the divine attributes and character as deduced from the various names of God (El Shaddai, Elohim, Jahveh, Sabaoth).

⁶ S omits.

⁷ So A K; S is corrupt here.

⁸ i.e. ? the voice was still audible even through the crackling of the fire.

⁹ Cf. 2 Enoch xx. 3. The vision of God’s throne of glory was the central point of the mystical experience.

all-seeing ones,¹ reciting the song, and under the throne four fiery living creatures singing, and their appearance was one, each one of them with four faces.² And³ such was the appearance of their countenances, of a lion, of a man, of an ox, of an eagle:⁴ four heads [were upon their bodies]⁵ [so that the four creatures had sixteen faces];⁶ and each had six wings;⁷ from their shoulders, [and their sides]⁸ and their loins. And with the (two) wings from their shoulders they covered their faces, and with the (two) wings which (sprang) from their loins they covered their feet, while the (two) middle wings they spread out for flying straightforward.⁹ And when they had ended the singing, they looked at one another and threatened one another.¹⁰ And it came to pass when the angel who was with me saw that they were threatening each other, he left me and went running to them and turned the countenance of each living creature from the countenance immediately confronting him, in order that they might not see their countenances threatening each other.¹¹ And he taught them the song of peace which ¹²hath its origin [in the Eternal One].¹²

And as I stood alone and looked, I saw behind the living creatures a chariot with fiery wheels, each wheel full of eyes round about;¹³ and over the wheels was a throne;¹⁴ which I saw, and this was covered with fire, and fire encircled it round about,¹⁵ and lo! an indescribable fire environed a fiery host. And I heard its holy voice like the voice of a man.¹⁶

¹ "The watchfulness of many eyes" (2 Enoch xx. 1), cf. Ezek. i. 18, x. 12: the "Ophannim" ("Wheels") are so described, and are regarded as an order of heavenly beings (like the Cherubim). But here the Cherubim are probably meant.

² Cf. Ezek. i. 5, 6.

³ S K omit.

⁴ Cf. Ezek. i. 10 (Rev. iv. 7).

⁵ S omits.

⁶ The bracketed clause is attested by A K; S omits. It looks like a scribal gloss.

⁷ So Rev. iv. 8 (based on Is. vi. 2); in Ezek. i. 6 the four "living creatures" have each four wings. Here S reads three (i. e. ? three pairs of wings).

⁸ S omits.

⁹ Cf. Is. vi. 2, Ezek. i. 11, 12.

¹⁰ The underlying idea of this strange representation seems to be that of emulation and rivalry (in service). This may be illustrated from the Midrash Tauhuma on Gen. ii. 4 (ed. Buber, p. 10), where in a comment on the verse Dominion and fear are with him, he maketh peace in his high places (Job xxv. 2) it is said: "Dominion, i. e. Michael, and fear, i. e. Gabriel; who maketh peace in his high places, even the celestials (hā'elyônîm) need peace. The constellations rise: Taurus says, "I am first, and I see what is before him"; the Gemini say, "I am first, and I see what is before him"; and so every single one says, "I am first" (corrected text). It is to be noted that in the mystical Hebrew literature concerned with the theme of the Divine Chariot and Throne (Merkaba) the angels who guard the Chariot are represented as fierce and warlike in aspect—flames dart forth from their eyes, and they are armed with fiery weapons (cf. Jellinek, Beth ha-Midrash iii. 94 f.). See further Additional Note II (p. 87).

¹¹ The relative position of the celestial beings about the divine throne is thus described in the Liturgy: "The hayyoth ['living creatures'] sing: the Cherubim glorify: the Seraphim exult, and the Arelim bless. The face of every hayya, Ophan, and Cherub is set toward the Seraphim, and thus confronting each the other, they utter praise and say, Blessed be the glory of the Lord from His place" (Service of the Synagogue, Festival Prayers (New Year), p. 87 (ed. Davis)).

¹² Lit. which is in itself [of the Eternal One]: S omits the bracketed words.

¹³ Cf. Ezek. i. 15, 18, x. 9, 12.

¹⁴ Cf. Ezek. i. 26.

¹⁵ Cf. Ezek. i. 27.

¹⁶ Cf. Ezek. i. 28 (end) combined with i. 26.

God discloses to Abraham the Powers of Heaven (Chapter XIX.).

XIX. And a voice came to me out of the midst of the fire, saying: "Abraham, Abraham!" I said: "Here am I!"¹ And He said: "Consider the expanses which are under the firmament on which thou art (now) placed,² and see how on no single expanse is there any other but He whom thou hast sought, or who hath loved thee."³ And while He⁴ was yet speaking (and) lo! the expanses opened, and beneath me⁵ the heavens. And I saw upon the seventh firmament upon which I stood a fire widely extended, and light, and dew, and a multitude of angels, and a power of invisible glory over the living creatures which I saw; but no other being did I see there.⁶

And I looked from the mountain⁷ in which I stood⁷ [downwards]⁸ to the sixth firmament, and saw there a multitude of angels, of (pure) spirit, without bodies, who carried out the commands of the fiery angels who were upon the eighth⁹ firmament, as I was standing suspended over them. And behold, upon this firmament¹⁰ there were no other powers¹⁰ of (any) other form, but only angels of (pure) spirit, like the power which I saw on the seventh firmament.¹¹ And He commanded¹² that the sixth firmament¹³ should be taken away.¹² And I saw there, on the fifth firmament,¹³ the powers of the stars which carry out the commands laid upon them, and the elements of the earth obeyed them.¹⁴

¹ Cf. Ex. iii. 4, 4 Ezra xiv. 1 (K, + Lord).

² Abraham is now presumably "placed" in the seventh heaven, and surveys from above what is disclosed to him as existing in the various firmaments below him, and in the earth (the angels, celestial bodies, and everything that is moving on the earth).

³ ? God is the sole controller of all these, and in this sense is the only reality.

⁴ A K this (voice).

⁵ A, them.

⁶ In Asc. Is. vii. 7 f. it is said that Isaiah saw in the seventh heaven "a wonderful light and angels innumerable," and "all the righteous from the time of Adam" (including Abel and Enoch); in T. B. Hag. 12b the seventh heaven (Araboth) contains judgement and righteousness, the treasures of life, peace, and blessing, the souls of the departed righteous, the spirits and souls yet unborn, the dew with which God will awake the dead, the Seraphim, Ophanim, Hayyoth, and other angels of service, and God Himself sitting on the Throne of Glory. No doubt the "dew" in our passage is the resurrection-dew. Fire and light are much dwelt upon in this connexion. Possibly this mystical literature was influenced by the cult of Mithra, who was especially the God of Light.

⁷ Lit. of my standing.

⁸ S omits.

⁹ eighth can hardly be right: read ? seventh.

¹⁰ So A; S, their powers were not.

¹¹ In 2 Enoch xix. the seer describes what he saw in the sixth heaven: legions of angels more resplendent than the sun, the archangels set over the sun, stars, seasons, rivers, vegetation, the living things and the souls of men, with six phoenixes, seven cherubim, and seven hayyoth in the midst, all singing with a voice indescribably beautiful; cf. also Asc. Is. viii. 1 ff, 6 ff., where the sixth heaven is described as full of hosts of angels uttering praise. In our passage apparently the angels of service (ministering angels) are located in this heaven.

¹² A K, the sixth firmament and it went away: S reads third for sixth.

¹³ Lit. surface.

¹⁴ In T. B. Hag. 12b the sun, moon, and stars are located in the second heaven; in 2 Enoch xi. 1-5 "the course of the sun" and the angels "which wait upon the sun" are located in the fourth heaven.

The Promise of a Seed (Chapter XX.).

XX. And the Eternal Mighty One said to me: "Abraham, Abraham!" And I said: "Here am I." [And He said:]¹ "Consider from above the stars which are beneath thee, and number,² them [for me],³ and make known [to me]³ their number." And I said: "When can I? For I am but a man [of dust and ashes].⁴ And he said to me: "As the number of the stars and their power, (so will) I make thy seed a nation⁵ and a people, set apart for me in my heritage with Azazel."⁶

And I said: "O Eternal, Mighty One! Let thy servant speak before Thee, and let not Thine anger kindle against Thy chosen one!⁷ Lo, before Thou leddest me up Azazel inveighed against me. How, then, while he is not now before Thee, hast Thou constituted Thyself with him?"

A Vision of Sin and Paradise: the Mirror of the World (Chapter XXI.).

XXI. And He said to me: "Look, now, beneath thy feet at the firmaments⁸ and understand⁹ the creation¹⁰ foreshadowed¹¹ in this expanse, the creatures existing on it, and the age¹² prepared according to it." And I saw beneath [the surfaces of the¹³ feet, and I saw beneath]¹⁴ the sixth heaven¹⁵ and what was therein,¹⁶ and then the earth and its fruits, and what moved upon it and its animate beings;¹⁷ and the power of its men, and the ungodliness of their souls, and their righteous deeds [and the beginnings of their works],¹⁸ and the lower regions¹⁹ and the perdition therein, the Abyss²⁰ and its torments. I saw there the sea and its

¹ S omits; K, + to me.

² Cf. Gen. xv. 5.

³ S omits.

⁴ Cf. Gen. xviii. 27, 4 Ezra iv. 5, 6. The bracketed clause is attested by A K, but omitted by S.

⁵ Cf. Gen. xv. 5 (the MSS. read for thy seed instead of thy seed). S adds (after nation) of people wrongly.

⁶ The underlying idea seems to be that God's heritage, the created world, is, under the conditions of sin, "shared" with Azazel (see further Introduction, p. xxxii), i. e. it is largely under the dominion of evil powers. This is one of the fundamental conceptions of Apocalyptic. On the other hand, the Chosen People—who are ideally identified with the righteous—redeem the world, and in themselves make it once again fit to be God's heritage. From another point of view the same question is discussed in 4 Ezra—the problem, why, if the world was created for Israel, is Israel disinherited? (cf. 4 Ezra vi. 38-59).

⁷ Cf. Gen. xviii. 32.

⁸ Lit. surface.

⁹ + now.

¹⁰ Slavonic text, creature.

¹¹ Or represented.

¹² So S; A K, ages ("won," "æons").

¹³ K, my.

¹⁴ S omits.

¹⁵ A K, the likeness of heaven (or for the sixth heaven render the six heavens).

¹⁶ A, what was with it.

¹⁷ = ? "its spirits" (Bonwetsch).

¹⁸ The bracketed clause is attested by A K; S omits.

¹⁹ Cf. Ephesians iv. 9 ("the lower parts of the earth").

²⁰ i. e. Tartarus; cf. 2 Enoch xxviii. 3, xxix. 5. The "Abyss" is described in 1 Enoch xviii. 11-16 (xxi. 1-6, xc. 25, 26), where it is the abode of the impure angels; cf. Luke viii. 31; Rev. ix. 1, xi. 7.

islands, and its monsters and its fishes, and Leviathan and his dominion,¹ and his camping-ground, and his caves, and the world which lay upon him,² and his movements, and the destructions of the world on his account.³ I saw there streams and the rising of their waters, and their windings. And I saw there the Garden of Eden and its fruits, the source⁴ of the stream issuing from it, and its trees and their bloom, and those who behaved righteously. And I saw therein their foods and blessedness.⁵ And I saw there a great multitude—men and women and children [half of them on the right side of the picture]⁶ and half of them on the left side of the picture.⁷

The Fall of Man and its Sequel (Chapters XXII-XXV.).

XXII. And I said: "O Eternal, Mighty One! What is this picture of the creatures?" And He said to me: "This is my will with regard to those who exist in the (divine) world-counsel,⁸ and it seemed well-pleasing before my sight, and then afterwards I gave commandment to them through my Word.⁹ And it came to pass whatever I had determined to be, was already planned beforehand in this (picture), and it stood before me ere it was created, as thou hast seen."¹⁰

¹ Or possession. Leviathan's dwelling is "in the lowest waters" (Pirke de R. Eliezer ix.). All the great sea-monsters in the sea are Leviathan's food, one being devoured every day (ibid.).

² "and between its [Leviathan's] fins rests the middle bar of the earth" (op. cit., ibid.).

³ When Leviathan is hungry, one haggadic saying runs, "it sends forth from its mouth a heat so great as to make all the waters of the deep boil." [The two great monsters in the original form of the legend were Behemoth (the male) and Leviathan (the female): cf. Job xl.-xli.; 1 Enoch lx. 7 f.; Ap. Bar. xxix. 4. In the Rabbinical form of the Haggada (cf. T. B. Baba bathra 74b) each monster was multiplied into a pair, male and female; but they were rendered incapable of producing any progeny, lest by so doing they should "destroy the world." The female leviathan was killed and reserved for the righteous in the world to come; the male leviathan will not be slain till the last; see further 4 Ezra vi. 49-52, and the writer's discussion in E.A., pp. 90 ff., with references.

⁴ A, sources.

⁵ The heavenly Paradise is referred to which is to be the abode of the righteous ("those who behaved righteously"), whose fruits are "incorruptible" (4 Ezra vii. 123), wherein is "the tree of life" (Rev. ii. 7) whose "leaves are for the healing of the nations" (Rev. xxii. 2). In 2 Enoch viii. 2 the seer describes how he saw in Paradise "all the trees of beautiful colours and their fruits ripe and fragrant, and all kinds of food which they produced, springing up with delightful fragrance." Note that Paradise is here located on the earth, though the transcendental Paradise is meant: see E.A., p. 196.

⁶ The bracketed clause is omitted (accidentally) in S.

⁷ The whole world is divided into two parts; the people of God on the right half, and the nations on the left. The latter (= the heathen) are Azazel's portion (cf. chap. xxxi.).

⁸ Emended text (Bonwetsch); MSS. read in the light.

⁹ Note this hypostasising use of Word developed from such passages as Ps. xxxii. 6; cf. Heb. xi. 3, 2 Pet. iii. 5, 4 Ezra vi. 38.

¹⁰ The whole conception is strongly predestinarian; the whole course of creation—the rise of evil, and the coming of the righteous—is predetermined; cf. 1 Enoch xciii., cvii. 19, cvii. 1, and Charles's note on 1 Enoch xlvii. 3. A strong expression of this idea occurs in 4 Ezra iv. 36, 37. For the "picture" of our passage we may perhaps compare the "pattern" (ὑποδείγμα) of Heb. viii. 5 (Ex. xxv. 40, xxvi. 30, Acts vii. 44). In the Rabbinical literature Israel's election is spoken of as predestined before the creation of the world, and this idea is applied to certain other things, such as the name of the Messiah, the Torah, and repentance. In such connexions they often employ the figure of an architect and plans. One passage (Gen. rabba i.) runs: When a man erects a building, at the time when the building is erected he enlarges it as it is erected, or otherwise he enlarges it below, and contracts it above: but the Holy One . . . does not act thus, but "the heavens" (which He created) were the heavens which had ascended in (His) thought, and "the earth" (which He created) was the earth which had ascended in His thought. It was, however, the Essenes who insisted on an absolute predestination. The Rabbis, while allowing for a certain amount of predestination, emphasised man's moral freedom: "Everything is foreseen, but free will is given," as Akiba said.

And I said: "O Lord, mighty and eternal! Who are the people in this picture on this side and on that?" And He said to me: "These which are on the left side are the multitude of the peoples which have formerly been in existence and which are after thee destined,¹ some for judgement and restoration, and others for vengeance and destruction at the end of the world.² But these which are on the right side of the picture—they are the people set apart for me of the peoples with Azazel.³ These are they whom I have ordained to be born of thee and to be called My People.

XXIII. "Now look again in the picture, who it is who seduced Eve and what is the fruit of the tree, [and]⁴ thou wilt know what there shall be, and how it shall be to thy seed⁵ ⁶among the people at the end of the days of the age,⁶ and so far as thou canst not understand I will make known to thee, for thou art well-pleasing in my sight, and I will tell thee what is kept in my heart."

And I looked into the picture, and mine eyes ran to the side of the Garden of Eden. And I saw there a man very great in height and fearful in breadth, incomparable in aspect,⁷ embracing a woman, who likewise approximated to the aspect and shape of the man. And they were⁸ standing under a tree of (the Garden of) Eden, and the fruit of this tree⁹ was like the appearance of a bunch of grapes of the vine,¹⁰ and behind the tree was standing as it were a

¹ Lit. prepared.

² Of the peoples on the left side, who represent the heathen world as opposed to the Jews, some are to be spared at the final judgement, while the rest will be annihilated; cf. Ap. Bar. lxxii, 2, where it is said of the Messiah that he will summon all the nations, and some of them He will spare, and some of them He will slay. Sometimes (as in 4 Ezra xiii. 37 ff.) the whole heathen world is doomed to annihilation, and this view is very prominent in later Judaism. The idea of our text accords with the older view based upon such passages as Ps. lxxii. 11, 17; Is. lxvi. 12, 19-21 (cf. Psalms of Solomon, xvii. 34). Notice that our passage says nothing about the Messiah in this connexion.

³ Cf. chap. xx. note ⁶

⁴ S omits.

⁵ So A K, reading sēmeni; S has to thy name (reading imeni).

⁶ So S; but A K omit.

⁷ Adam's great stature is often referred to in Rabbinical literature: "it reached" (when he was first created) "from one end of the world to the other," but when he sinned it was diminished (T. B. Hag. 12a); his manly beauty is also referred to T. B. Baba mesia 84a).

⁸ K, + both.

⁹ Cf. Gen. iii. 6.

¹⁰ Cf. T. B. Berakoth 40a, where it is recorded that R. Meir declared that the tree of which Adam ate was a vine, because the one thing that brings woe upon mankind is wine; cf. Gen. ix. 21 ("And he drank of the wine and was drunken"). So also the Greek, Ap. Bar. iv. 8 (cf. Sanh. 70a, Bereshith rabba xix. 8). The usual opinion was that the tree was a fig-tree; according to another view (Gen. rabba xi. 8) the fruit was barley; another (Samuel ben Isaac) a date. With this last agrees the varia lectio of A K here ("palm-tree").

serpent in form, having hands and feet like a man's,¹ and wings on its shoulders, six² on the right side and six² on the left,³ and they were holding the grapes of the tree ⁴in their hands,⁴ and both were eating it whom I had seen embracing.

And I said: "Who are these mutually embracing, or who is this who is between them, or what is the fruit which they are eating, O Mighty Eternal One?"

And He said: "This is ⁵the human world,⁵ this is Adam, and this is their desire upon the earth, this is Eve; but he who is between them representeth ungodliness, their beginning (on the way) to perdition, even Azazel."⁶

And I said: "O Eternal, Mighty One! Why hast Thou given to such power to destroy the generation of men in their works upon the earth?"

And He said to me: "They who will (to do) evil—and how much I hated (it) in those who do it!—over them I gave him power, and to be beloved of them."⁷

And I answered and said: "O Eternal, Mighty One! Wherefore hast Thou willed to effect that evil should be desired in the hearts of men, since Thou indeed art angered over that which was willed by Thee, at him who is doing what is unprofitable in thy counsel⁸?"

XXIV. And He said to me: "Being angered at the nations⁹ on thy account, and on account of the people of thy family who are (to be) separated after thee, as thou seest in the picture the burden (of destiny) that (is laid) upon them¹⁰—and I will tell thee what shall be, and how much shall be, in the last days. Look now at everything in the picture."

And I looked and saw there what was before me in creation; I saw Adam, and Eve existing with him, and with them the cunning Adversary,¹¹ and Cain who acted lawlessly through

¹ Cf. Gen. rabba xx. 8: "Upon thy belly shalt thou go: At the moment when the Holy One . . . said to the serpent upon thy belly shalt thou go the ministering angels descended and cut off its hands and its feet, and its cry went from one end of the world to the other." This legend was well known in antiquity. According to Syncellus (i. 14) the serpent had originally four feet; cf. also Josephus i. 1, 4, who declares that the serpent was deprived of both language and feet. For the punishment of the serpent see Pirke de R. Eliezer xiv. (ed. Friedlander, p. 99 and notes).

² v.l. three.

³ This description really applies to Sammael (or Azazel), who had twelve wings (Pirke de R. Eliezer xiii.), and who descended and, finding the serpent skilful to do evil, mounted and rode upon it. Before its punishment by God the serpent had the appearance of a camel, according to the same authority (ibid.).

⁴ A K omit.

⁵ Lit. "council of the world," so K; A S, "light of the world." Adam (whose body is compounded of the four primal elements) is the microcosm.

⁶ Azazel plays the part elsewhere assigned to Sammael; he uses the serpent as his instrument (cf. Pirke de R. Eliezer xiii.).

⁷ In chap. xiii. (end) the wicked (as distinguished from the righteous) are spoken of as those who "follow" Azazel, and "love" what he wills. They are Azazel's "portion." A striking feature of our book is the way in which the souls and bodies of men are represented as possessed by either good or evil powers.

⁸ A K, world (which may be right). The word in S rendered counsel is an unusual one in this meaning.

⁹ A, men.

¹⁰ This apparently is the answer to the question given at the end of the previous chapter. God allows men to desire evil (with its inevitable punishment later) because of the treatment meted out by the nations to the chosen seed (Abraham and his descendants).

¹¹ Cf. 2 Cor. xi. 3 ("the serpent beguiled Eve in his craftiness").

the Adversary,¹ and the slaughtered Abel, (and) the destruction brought and caused upon him through the lawless one.² I saw there also Impurity,³ and those who lust after it, and its pollution, and their jealousy, and the fire of their corruption in the lowest parts of the earth. I saw there Theft, and those who hasten after it, and the arrangement [of their retribution, the judgement of the Great Assize].⁴ I saw there⁵ naked men, the foreheads against each other, and their disgrace, and their passion which (they had) against each other, and their retribution. I saw there Desire, and in her hand the head of every kind of lawlessness [and her scorn and her waste assigned to perdition].⁶

XXV. I saw there the likeness of the idol of jealousy,⁷ having the likeness of woodwork such as my father was wont to make, and its statue⁸ was of glittering bronze; and before it a man, and he worshipped it; and in front of him an altar, and upon it a boy slain in the presence of the idol.

But I said to Him: "What is this idol, or what is the altar, or ⁹who are they that are sacrificed,⁹ or who is the sacrificer? Or what is the Temple which I see that is beautiful in art, and its beauty (being like) the glory that lieth beneath Thy¹⁰ throne?"

And He said: "Hear, Abraham. This which thou seest, the Temple and altar and beauty, is my idea of the priesthood of my glorious Name, in which dwelleth every single prayer of man, and the rise of kings and prophets, and whatever sacrifice I ordain to be offered to me among my people who are to come out of thy generation.¹¹ But the statue which thou sawest is mine anger¹² wherewith the people¹³ anger me who are to proceed for me from thee. But the man

¹ According to Pirke de R. Eliezer xxi. Cain was the offspring of Eve and Sammael.

² In Ep. Barnabas xv. 5 the Devil is called "the Lawless One" (ὁ ἄνομος): when His Son shall come, and shall abolish the time of the Lawless One (cf. also 2 Thess. ii. 8).

³ Notice that here and below certain evil tendencies are personified (Impurity, Theft, Desire; the catalogue seems to have been influenced by the Decalogue, Commandments vii., viii., x.) In later Kabbalistic books such tendencies are personified as demons; cf. e. g. The Testament of Solomon, § 34 (J.Q.R., xi. 24; 1899), where seven female demons appear before Solomon bearing such names as "Deception," "Strife," "Jealousy," "Power."

⁴ The bracketed clause is missing in S.

⁵ A, also (instead of there).

⁶ Omitted by S. Perhaps the clause is an interpolation; in any case the text appears to be corrupt. The word here rendered scorn (moltshanie, lit. "silence") is sometimes used in this sense, expressing "contempt," "scorn"; see D'yachenko's Church Slavonic Dictionary, s.v.

⁷ Cf. Ezek. viii. 3, 5.

⁸ Or body.

⁹ K, who is the sacrificed one.

¹⁰ S, my (a scribal mistake?).

¹¹ The whole sacrificial system and the Levitical cultus are of divine origin, and embody the divine ideal. The "rise of kings and prophets" is apparently involved in it as a subordinate development from it. The tone of the passage is reminiscent rather of Jubilees. In apocalyptic literature such allusions to the cultus are rare.

¹² "The image of jealousy" is correctly explained here as meaning the image which provokes God's jealousy or anger. Idolatrous practices in Israel are referred to.

¹³ K omits the people.

whom thou sawest slaughtering—that is he who inciteth murderous sacrifices,¹ of (sic) which are a witness² to me of the final judgement, even at the beginning of creation.”

Why Sin is permitted (Chapter XXVI.).

XXVI. And I said: “O Eternal, Mighty One! Wherefore hast Thou established³ that it should be so, and then proclaim the knowledge thereof?”

And He said to me: “Hear, Abraham; understand what I say to thee, and answer me as⁴ I question thee. Why did thy father Terah not listen to thy voice, and (why) did he not cease from the devilish idolatry until he perished [and]⁵ his whole household with him?”

And I said: “O Eternal, [Mighty One]!⁵ (It was) entirely because he did not choose to listen to me; but I, too, did not follow his works.”

And He said [to me]:⁶ “Hear, Abraham. As the counsel⁷ of thy father is in him, and as thy counsel is in thee, so also is the counsel of my will in me ready for the coming days, before thou hast knowledge of these,⁸ or (canst) see with thine eyes what is future in them. How those of thy seed will be, look in the picture.”

A Vision of Judgement and Salvation (Chapter XXVII.).

XXVII. And I looked and saw: lo! the picture swayed and [from it]⁹ emerged, on its left side,¹⁰ a heathen people, and they pillaged those who were on the right side, men and women and children: [some they slaughtered,]⁹ others they retained with themselves.¹¹ Lo! I saw them run towards them through four entrances,¹² and they burnt the Temple with

¹ i. e. sacrifices involving the slaughter of human beings, such as the offering (through fire) of children to Moloch. ² A, witnesses. ³ Or ordained. ⁴ Lit. what.

⁵ S omits. ⁶ S omits. ⁷ i. e. “will.”

⁸ God’s will is free, but so also is man’s. The argument is interesting. From the fact, proved by the two contrary instances of Terah and Abraham, that man’s will is free, the writer justifies God’s freedom to permit sin, hinting, however, that the future will still further justify the divine counsel. The vision that follows (chap. xxvii.) serves to illustrate this.

⁹ Omitted by S.

¹⁰ The use of “right” and “left” throughout these chapters is notable. The conception of the right side being the source of light and purity, while the left is the source of darkness and impurity, is Gnostic, and passed from the Gnostics into the Kabbalah; see further Introduction p. xix. f.

¹¹ Sc. in slavery.

¹² So A K; S (schody), descents (= ? “generations”). The four “entrances” or “descents” by which the heathen make inroads upon the chosen people apparently correspond to the four hundred years of slavery for Israel predicted by God to Abraham in the vision of Gen. xv. (cf. vs. 13). This was interpreted by our apocalypticist, in accordance with current tradition, to refer to Israel’s captivity and subjection by the four oppressive world-powers of the Book of Daniel, understood to be Babylon, Media, Greece, and Rome (cf. chap. ix. above, note¹¹): thus the Palestinian Targum to Gen. xv. 13 runs: And behold, Abram saw four kingdoms which should arise to bring his sons into subjection. It is important to remember that the fourth “entrance” here corresponds to the Roman Empire [cf. also Pirke de R. Eliezer xxviii.]. Possibly “descent” (S) is the right reading here, and means “generation,” a generation being roughly reckoned as equivalent to a hundred years: Heb. דור.

fire, and the holy things that were therein they plundered.¹

And I said: "O Eternal One! Lo! the people (that spring) from me, whom Thou hast accepted, the hordes of the heathen do plunder, and some they kill, while others they hold fast as aliens,² and the Temple they have burnt with fire, and the beautiful things therein they do rob [and destroy].³ O Eternal, Mighty One! If this be so, wherefore hast Thou now⁴ lacerated⁵ my heart, and why should this be so?"

And He said to me: "Hear, Abraham. What⁶ ⁷thou hast seen⁷ shall happen on account of thy seed who anger me by reason of the statue which thou sawest, and on account of the human slaughter in the picture, through zeal in the Temple;⁸ and as thou sawest ⁹so shall it be."⁹

And I said: "O Eternal, Mighty One! May the works of evil (wrought) in ungodliness now pass by, but¹⁰ (show me)¹¹ rather those who fulfilled the commandments, even the works of his (?)¹² righteousness. For thou canst do this."

And He said to me: "The time of the righteous meeteth [them]¹³ first through¹⁴ the holiness (flowing) from kings¹⁵ and righteous-dealing rulers whom I at first created in order from such to rule among them.¹⁵ But from these issue men who care for their interests,¹⁶ as I have made known to thee and thou hast seen."

How long? (Chapters XXVIII.-XXIX.).

XXVIII. And I answered and said: "O Mighty, [Eternal One],¹⁷ hallowed by Thy power! Be favourable to my petition, [for for this hast Thou brought me up here—and shew me].¹⁸ As Thou hast brought me up to Thy height, so make [this]¹⁷ known to me, Thy beloved one, as much as I ask—whether what I saw shall happen to them for long?"¹⁹

¹ The writer obviously has in mind the operations of the Romans under Titus, which ended in the destruction of the Temple by fire in A.D. 70. For the burning and pillaging of the Temple cf. Josephus, War, vi. 4, 5 f.; cf. also 4 Ezra x. 21 f.

² Of those who were not killed in the Roman war, some were reserved for the victor's triumph, some for the arena, and the rest were sold as slaves; cf. Josephus, War, vi. 9, 2 f.

³ Omitted by S.

⁴ A, from now onward.

⁵ K, angered.

⁶ Lit. so much.

⁷ A omits.

⁸ Israel's captivity and sufferings are due to lapse into idolatry.

⁹ So A K; but S omits.

¹⁰ A omits but.

¹¹ Something has fallen out of the text here.

¹² So A K; S, this. [The sentence O Eternal Mighty One . . . his (?) righteousness is rendered according to the text of A K; the text of S here is not in order.]

¹³ So K; A, him; S omits.

¹⁴ So S; A K, the type (set) by.

¹⁵ The "kings" and "righteous-dealing rulers" referred to are, presumably, such as David, Hezekiah, and Josiah, under whose rule the claims of righteousness were recognised and the sovereignty of God, to some extent, realised.

¹⁶ Lit. "for them" (= ? "for themselves")—from the righteous rulers spring sons who are faithless to their heritage (such as Manasseh). The sentence is obscure, and the meaning uncertain.

¹⁷ S omits.

¹⁸ Omitted accidentally in S (by homoioteleuton, "brought up . . . brought up").

¹⁹ Cf. 4 Ezra iv. 33 ff.

And He showed me a multitude of His people, and said to me: “On their account through four issues,¹ as thou sawest, I shall be provoked by them, and in these² my retribution for their deeds shall be (accomplished). But in the fourth outgoing³ of a hundred years⁴ and one hour of the age—the same is a hundred years⁵—it shall be in misfortune among the heathen [but one hour in mercy and contumely, as among the heathen].”⁶

XXIX. And I said: “O Eternal [Mighty One]!⁷ And how long a time is an hour of the Age?”⁸

And He said: “Twelve years⁹ have I ordained of this ungodly Age¹⁰ to rule among the heathen and in thy seed; and until the end of the times it shall be as thou sawest. ¹¹*And do thou reckon and understand and look into the picture.*”

¹ S K (schody) = descents (cf. chap. xxvii. note¹⁹ above); cf. Gen. xv. 13-16: “four descents” = “four generations.”

² Sc. four generations.

³ S, descent (as above).

⁴ i. e. in the fourth generation (cf. Gen. xv. 16).

⁵ In chap. xxx. the coming of the ten plagues on the heathen world is placed “at the passing over of the twelfth hour”; then follows (chap. xxxi.) the Messianic salvation. Apparently the present age is reckoned as enduring for twelve hours (each hour = 100 years), i. e. one day (cf. John xi. 9). The apocalyptic writer may possibly reckon this day as beginning with the founding of the Holy City by David (cf. 4 Ezra x. 46) and culminating in the destruction of the last Temple by Titus, which calamity was to be followed by the period of woes described in chap. xxx., these bringing the present age (or æon) to a close. Now according to Josephus (War, vi. 10) the period from David’s reign in Jerusalem to the destruction of the Temple by Titus amounted to 1179 years. If we suppose the seer to be writing at the close of the first or in the early years of the second century A.D. the period would include about 1200 years. Like all the apocalyptists he obviously supposes himself to be standing on the brink of the new age. Perhaps in the text above “and one hour of the Age” is intended to synchronise with the “fourth out-going of a hundred years.” [In Pirke de R. Eliezer xxviii. a dictum ascribed to R. Elazar ben Azariah runs: (from Gen. xv.) thou mayest learn that the rule of these four kingdoms will only last one day, according to the Day of the Lord (= 1000 years).]

⁶ The bracketed clause is attested by A K, but not by S. It may be an addition to the text. Contumely can hardly be right. Perhaps there was an error in the Greek text from which the Slavonic Version was made; ? τῆς ἰσχυρίας misread ἀτιμίας; read, then, “in mercy and honour.”

⁷ S omits.

⁸ This question has already been answered at the end of the previous chapter (one hour = 100 years); moreover, the reply that follows here does not really answer the question. There is probably something wrong in the text; “hours” and “years” seem to be confused. Perhaps the question originally ran somewhat as follows: How much time is there (in) the hours of the age?

⁹ ? Read hours for years. We may compare 4 Ezra xiv. 11 (“For the world-age is divided into twelve parts”), and the cloud and water vision in Ap. Bar. liii. f., where a similar division appears. If “years” be kept, each year will probably stand for a generation (reckoned at 100 years?); cf. 4 Ezra x. 45 (3000 years = 30 generations).

¹⁰ The present age is the age of ungodliness, where the organised forces of evil are dominant; cf. 1 Enoch xlvi. 7 (“the world of unrighteousness”), 4 Ezra iv. 29 f.

¹¹ The passage printed in italic type that follows can only be regarded as a Christian interpolation (probably a Jewish-Christian one).

And I [looked and]¹ saw a man going out from the left side of the heathen;² and there went out men and women and children, from the side of the heathen, many hosts, and worshipped him.³ And while I still looked there came out from the right side⁴ (many), and some insulted that man, while some struck him⁵; others, however, worshipped him. [And]¹ I saw how these worshipped him, and Azazel ran and worshipped him, and having kissed his face he turned and stood behind him.⁶

And I said: "O Eternal, Mighty One! Who is the man insulted and beaten, who is worshipped by the heathen with Azazel?"

And He answered and said: "Hear, Abraham! The man whom thou sawest insulted and beaten and again worshipped—that is the relief⁷ (granted) by the heathen to the people who proceed from thee, in the last days,⁸ in this twelfth hour⁹ of the Age of ungodliness. But in the twelfth year⁹ of my final Age¹⁰ I will set up this man from thy generation, whom thou sawest (issue) from my people; this one all will follow,¹¹ and such as are called by me¹² (will) join, (even)

¹ S omits.

² The man is clearly intended to be Jesus. His emerging "from the left side of the heathen" is curious. If the text is in order it must apparently refer to the emergence into prominence of the Early Christian Church in the Gentile world. It clearly cannot refer to racial origin, for it is stated further on in the chapter that "the man" sprang from Abraham's "generation" and God's people. But in view of the definite statement below—this man from thy generation whom thou sawest (issue) from my people—it is better to suppose that the text here is out of order: read? from the right side and omit of the heathen as an incorrect gloss.

³ i. e. His followers are to include large numbers from the Gentile world.

⁴ i. e. from the Jewish world.

⁵ Cf. Is. liii. 3.

⁶ The worship of Christ by the Devil (Azazel) is a striking feature in this representation. It is difficult to determine its exact significance here. Does it reflect the Jewish-Christian feeling that the access of so large a part of the heathen world to Christianity endangered the purity of the new faith by inevitably bringing in its train a large admixture of heathenism? It can hardly mean that Azazel had been truly converted. Indeed, his homage is significantly depicted as lip-homage ("kissed his face"; cf. the treacherous kiss of Judas). Perhaps the real meaning is that the kingdom of evil, and the Satanic powers, have been vanquished by Christ (cf. Luke x. 18, Phil. ii. 9, 10, Col. ii. 15, Ephes. i. 21 f.). The homage of Azazel—the head of the unredeemed heathen world—marked the triumph of Christ.

⁷ = ἄνεσις (= Heb. mēnuhā).

⁸ What is meant by the relief (granted) by the heathen to the people who proceed from thee, in the last days? The expression is difficult and obscure. Perhaps the "relief" spoken of means the mitigation of the process of "hardening" that has taken place in Israel (by its rejection of Jesus), which is brought about by the adhesion of some (a remnant) in Israel to the new faith, in conjunction with the great numbers who are streaming in from the Gentile world; cf. Rom. xi., especially xi. 25 ("a hardening in part hath befallen Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in and all Israel shall be saved," and vss. 29-30: "For as ye in time past were disobedient . . . but now have obtained mercy by their disobedience, even so have these also now been disobedient that by the mercy shewn to you they also may obtain mercy").

⁹ Omitted by A (homoioteleuton). For the confusion of "hour" and "year" see note⁸ at the beginning of this chapter.

¹⁰ Lit. of the Age of mine end.

¹¹ Or "imitate," "become like."

¹² Cf. 2 Tim. i. 9 ("God who hath called us with a holy calling"), Ephes. iv. 1, 4, and often.

those who change in their counsels.¹ And those whom thou sawest emerge from the left side of the picture—the meaning is:² There shall be many from the heathen who set their hopes upon him;³ and as for those whom thou sawest from thy seed on the right side, some insulting and striking, others worshipping him—many of them shall be offended at him.⁴ He, however, is testing⁵ those who have worshipped him of thy seed, in that twelfth hour of the End,⁶ with a view to shortening the Age of ungodliness.⁷

“Before the Age of the righteous beginneth to grow,⁸ my judgement shall come upon the lawless heathen through the people of thy seed⁹ who have been separated for me. In those days I will bring upon all creatures of the earth ten plagues,¹⁰ through misfortune and disease and sighing of the grief of their soul. Thus much will I bring upon the generations of men that be upon it on account of the provocation and the corruption of its creatures,¹¹ whereby they provoke me. And then shall righteous men of thy seed be left¹² in the number which is kept

¹ those who change in their counsels, i. e. repent (μετανοεῖν = “change one’s mind or will”).

² Lit. “that (is).”

³ Cf. Is. xi. 10 (“unto him shall the nations seek”), Matt. xii. 21, Rom. xv. 12.

⁴ Cf. Matt. xi. 6, John vi. 66, Rom. xi. 8, etc.

⁵ Cf. Rev. iii. 10 (“the season of trial that is coming upon the whole habitable earth”). The time of “trial” or “testing” referred to is, no doubt, the period of the Messianic woes which precedes the advent of the new age.

⁶ i. e. the time immediately preceding the End of the present Age.

⁷ Cf. Matt. xxiv. 22, Ep. Barnabas iv. 3, Ap. Bar. xx. 2 (“Therefore have I now taken away Sion in order that I may the more speedily visit the world in its season”). In the latter passage the fall of Jerusalem is regarded as hastening the End. Impatient longing for the End is characteristic of the Apocalyptists; see e. g. 4 Ezra iv. 33 ff.

⁸ The coming Age is the “Age of the righteous” (for the expression cf. also chap. xvii. of our Book); it has been “prepared” for them (4 Ezra viii. 52), and they will inherit it (4 Ezra vii. 17). For the metaphor of growth in this connexion cf. 4 Ezra iv. 29, 35; the community of the righteous has already been “sown” (1 Enoch lxii. 8; cf. also 1 Enoch x. 16, “the plant of righteousness will appear”), but its full growth will only become visible after the judgement.

⁹ Judgement on the heathen will be executed by the agency of Israel itself; cf. 1 Enoch xc. 19. In the Midrash rabba on Ruth ii. 19 a saying ascribed to R. Eliezer b. Jacob runs: “Vengeance on the nations of the world is in the hands of the Israelites (Ezek. xxv. 14).”

¹⁰ A saying handed down in the name of R. Eleazar b. Pedath runs: “Just as the Holy One . . . brought (plagues) upon Egypt He will bring (plagues) upon this (wicked) nation [i. e. Rome], as it is said [Is. xxiii. 5]: ‘As at the report from Egypt so shall they be pained at the report of Sov’” (read Sār “adversary,” which is to be understood as meaning “Rome”): see Midrash Tanhuma, ed. Buber, ii. 30; Bacher, Pal. Amovæer ii. 87. For a description of the plagues see the next chapter.

¹¹ On account of the sins of men God’s anger must be visited upon the earth in judgement; cf. Jubilees xxiii. 22, etc. The idea that a time of great calamity and suffering would immediately precede the Messianic Age is a standing feature in Apocalyptic; cf. e. g. Matt. xxiv. 8, Mark xiii. 8 (“the birth-pangs of the Messiah”).

¹² i. e. shall survive the Messianic “woes.” The term “survive,” “be left” (οἱ περιλειπόμενοι, Vulg. qui residui sumus, 1 Thess. iv. 15), became a technical one in Apocalyptic in this connexion; cf. 4 Ezra vi. 25, ix. 7, xiii. 16-24, 26, 48.

secret by me,¹ hastening² in³ the glory of My Name to the place prepared beforehand for them, which thou sawest devastated in the picture;⁴ and they shall live and be established through sacrifices and gifts of righteousness and truth⁵ in the Age of the righteous, and shall rejoice in Me continually;⁶ and they shall destroy those who have destroyed them, And shall insult those who have insulted them,⁷

“And of those who defamed them they shall spit in the face, scorned by Me, while they (the righteous) shall behold Me full of joy, rejoicing with My people, and receiving those who return to Me⁸ [in repentance].⁹

See, Abraham, what thou hast seen,
And [hear]⁹ what thou hast heard,
And [take full knowledge of]⁹ what thou hast come to know.
Go to thy heritage,¹⁰
And lo! I am with you for ever.”

The Punishment of the Heathen and the Ingathering of Israel (Chapters XXX.-XXXI.).

XXX. But while He was still speaking, I found myself upon the earth. And I said: “O Eternal, [Mighty One],¹¹ I am no longer in the glory in which I was (while) on high, and what my soul longed to understand in mine heart I do not understand.”

¹ The number of the elect righteous is pre-determined. This idea recurs in more than one form in Apocalyptic. Here apparently what is meant is that the number of elect righteous who shall survive the Messianic woes has been fixed beforehand, and is a secret known only to God. These living righteous shall enjoy the blessedness of the new Age upon the renovated earth (in Jerusalem). Nothing is said about the resurrection of the righteous dead to share in this felicity. In chap. xxi. the latter enjoy a blessed existence in the heavenly Paradise. Our Book apparently knows nothing of a resurrection. On the other hand, in Rev. vi. 11 it is the number of the righteous dead (the martyrs) that is predetermined. Another application of the same idea is to the whole number of mankind who are to be born, which is predetermined; cf. Ap. Bar. xxiii. 4. For those who survive the period of calamity, and share in the bliss of the new Age, see 4 Ezra vi. 25, vii. 27, ix. 7 f., Ap. Bar. xxix. 2; but in none of these passages is their number said to have been fixed beforehand.

² Cf. 4 Ezra vii. 98.

³ A K, to.

⁴ By the place prepared beforehand (cf. Rev. xii. 6) is here meant Jerusalem (which thou sawest devastated in the picture), presumably the renovated city on a renovated earth. The expression place prepared beforehand certainly suggests the heavenly Jerusalem (cf. Ap. Bar. iv. 2-6), which according to Rev. xxi. 2, 9 f. is to descend from heaven upon the renovated earth. But this is not certain. Our Book may contemplate nothing more than the earthly Jerusalem transformed and glorified.

⁵ The sacrificial cultus in a purified form will be revived in the new Jerusalem; cf. ? 1 Enoch xxv. 6 (“the fragrance thereof” = ? of the incense). Prayer for the restoration of the Temple and cultus is a central feature in the Jewish Liturgy.

⁶ With the restoration of the cultus the righteous will enjoy the privilege of seeing God’s glory continually.

⁷ Cf. Jubilees xxiii. 30 and see note⁹ p. 80.

⁸ ? Heathen who are converted.

⁹ S omits.

¹⁰ Cf. Gen. xv. 15 (Thou shalt go to thy father in peace); A K, my.

¹¹ S omits.

And He said to me: "What is desired in thine¹ heart I will tell thee, because thou hast sought to see the ten plagues which I have prepared for the heathen, and have prepared beforehand² at the passing over of the twelfth hour³ of the earth. Hear what I divulge to thee, so shall it come to pass:⁴ the first⁵ (is) pain of great distress;⁶ the second, conflagration of many cities;⁷ the third, destruction and pestilence of animals⁸; the fourth, hunger of the whole world and of its people⁹; the fifth by destruction among its rulers,¹⁰ destruction by earthquake¹¹ and the sword; the sixth, multiplication of hail and snow;¹² the seventh, the wild beasts will be their grave; the eighth, hunger and pestilence will alternate with their destruction; the ninth, punishment by the sword and flight¹³ in distress; the tenth, ¹⁴thunder and voices¹⁴ and destructive earthquake.¹⁵

¹ A K, mine.

² These also have been pre-determined.

³ i.e. the last hour of the present Age.

⁴ It is God's property to announce beforehand what is to occur and then to bring it to pass; cf. Justin Martyr, Apology i. 14 (end): For this . . . is the work of God to declare a thing shall come to be long before it is in being, and then to bring about that thing to pass according to the same declaration. Cf. also 4 Ezra ix. 6 (Gunkel's rendering of the "times of the Most High"): their beginning is in word (i. e. the prophetic word) and portents, but their end in deeds and marvels.

⁵ The ten "plagues" here enumerated mark the distressful period which precedes the advent of the new Age; they correspond to the "signs" which are a common feature in the traditional eschatology; cf. 4 Ezra iv. 52-v. 13, vi. 13-28, ix. 1-6, xiii. 16 ff., Ap. Bar. xxv.-xxvii., xlviii. 30-38, lxx., 1 Enoch xcix. 4 f., 7-10, c. 1-6 (Dan. xii.). The first of the Ezra passages just cited affords a good example of the contents of these descriptions. It depicts a time of commotions, and the general break-up of moral and religious forces; the heathen world-power (i. e. Rome) will be destroyed; there will be portents in nature, general chaos in society; monstrous and untimely births, the failure of the means of subsistence, and internecine strife; and wisdom and understanding will have perished from the earth. With our passage depicting ten plagues may be compared T.B. Sanh. 97a, which divides the period into seven years; in the first there will be rain on one city and no rain on another (cf. Amos iv. 7); in the second arrows of famine; in the third a great famine in which men, women, and children and pious will perish, and the Torah will be forgotten; in the fourth abundance and dearth; in the fifth great abundance, the people will eat and drink, and the Torah will return; in the sixth voices announcing the coming of the Messiah; in the seventh war, and at its end Messiah ben David will come. In the New Testament, besides the Apocalyptic passage in Matt. xxiv. 8-31 and parallels, there is a marked parallelism with the Apocalypse of the seven trumpets (Rev. viii. 6-ix. 21, x. 7, xi. 14-19), six of which mark partial judgements, while the seventh ushers in the final judgement. Several of the "trumpets" announce judgements like the Egyptian plagues.

⁶ i. e. distressful pain, sickness.

⁷ The fall of fire is one of the portents of the End in Ap. Bar. xxvii. 10; cf. the fiery hail of the seventh Egyptian plague (Ex. ix. 23 f.) and the "first trumpet" (Rev. viii. 6-7); cf. also Rev. xi. 19b ("great hail").

⁸ Cf. the fifth Egyptian plague (murrain among the cattle, Ex. ix. 1 ff.).

⁹ Cf. 4 Ezra vi. 22, Ap. Bar. xxvii. 5-6, Matt. xxiv. 7.

¹⁰ Cf. Ap. Bar. xxvii. 3, 4 Ezra ix. 3.

¹¹ Cf. Ap. Bar. xxvii. 7.

¹² Cf. Ex. ix. 23 f.

¹³ Cf. Matt. xxiv. 16.

¹⁴ K, "voices of thunder."

¹⁵ Cf. Rev. xi. 19b. [Perhaps the passage most closely parallel with our text is Ap. Bar. xxvii. 1-13.]

XXXI. “And then I will sound the trumpet¹ out of the air, and will send mine Elect One,² having in him all my power, one measure³; and this one shall summon⁴ my despised people from the nations,⁵ and I will burn with fire⁶ those⁷ who have insulted them and who have ruled among⁸ them in (this) Age.

“And I will give those who have covered me with mockery to the scorn of the coming Age;⁹ and I have prepared them to be food¹⁰ for the fire of Hades and for ceaseless flight to and fro through the air in the underworld beneath the earth¹¹ [the body filled with worms.¹² For on them shall they see the righteousness of the Creator—those, namely, who have chosen to do my will, and those who have openly kept my¹³ commandments,¹⁴ (and) they shall rejoice with joy over the

¹ The trumpet is blown to announce the Divine intervention and the coming of salvation; it is not a direct summons to the exiles to return (cf. Volz, p. 310); cf. Benediction X in the Shēmōnē ‘Esrē Prayer (Singer, p. 48): Sound the great horn for our freedom; lift up the ensign to gather our exiles, and gather us from the four corners of the earth.

² This title of the Messiah is a favourite one in the “Similitudes” of 1 Enoch; cf. 1 Enoch xlvi. 9, lv. 4, etc. It recurs as a Messianic title in Luke ix. 35, xxiii. 35, and goes back to Is. xlii. 1.

³ i.e. a measure of all the divine attributes—he reflects in little the totality of the divine character. This is an exalted conception, but does not seem to imply more than that the Messiah is a divinely endowed man, full of the power of the Holy Spirit (Is. xi. 1), which makes him free from sin (Ps. Sol. xvii. 36 f.). He is not depicted as a supernatural angelic being like Metatron. He is sent by God at the appointed time; cf. Ps. Sol. xvii. 23, Gal. iv. 4, John xvii. 3.

⁴ Note that it is the Messiah here who summons the outcast Israelites from the nations (so also Ps. Sol. xvii. 28, Matt. xxiv. 31, 4 Ezra xiii. 39). More usually this is performed by God Himself (cf. the prayer cited in note¹ above).

⁵ Cf. Is. lx. 4.

⁶ Punishment of the godless by fire at God’s hands is a common feature in the eschatology. It is the fire of the divine anger that is thought of, and is based upon Mal. iv. 1 (iii. 19); cf. the “fiery stream” and “flaming breath” which the Messiah emits from his mouth to destroy his enemies in 4 Ezra xiii. 10 (interpreted figuratively in verses 36 f.). A adds through him (after I will), i. e. through the Messiah; K, through them.

⁷ i. e. the heathen nations.

⁸ i. e. “over.” Cf. Ap. Bar. lxxii. 6 (“But all those who have ruled over you . . . shall be given to the sword”).

⁹ Those who have scorned shall be scorned; cf. Wisdom iv. 18, Dan. xii. 2, Ps. Sol. ii. 32 f. (“the coming Age” is the Age of the righteous). Possibly renegade Jews are referred to, and are the subject of the remaining part of this chapter.

¹⁰ Cf. Mal. iv. I (iii. 19).

¹¹ Here two conceptions seem to be mixed; there is (1) the idea of “the fire of Hades” (or Hell), which is located beneath the earth (for “Hades” = Hell in this sense: cf. Ps. Sol. xv. 11); this fire consumes their bodies; (2) combined with this is the idea of wandering (flying) restlessly about (properly in the air or outer darkness); cf. 4 Ezra vii. 80. In T. B. Shabb. 152b the souls of the wicked are said to be given no place of rest till the judgement. Here (at the word earth) S ends. The rest of the text (printed in small type) is found both in A and K.

¹² In Judith xvi. 17 “fire and worms” await the heathen enemies of Israel; cf. Ecclus. vii. 17, 1 Enoch xlvi. 6 (“darkness will be their dwelling and worms their bed”), Is. lxvi. 24. Here renegade Jews are probably meant.

¹³ A, thy.

¹⁴ Cf. Is. lxvi. 24, 4 Ezra vii. 93.

downfall of the men who still remain, who have followed the idols and their murders.¹ For they shall putrefy in the body of the evil worm Azazel,² and be burnt with the fire of Azazel's tongue;³ for I hoped that they would come to me,⁴ and not have loved and praised the strange (god),⁵ and not have adhered to him for whom they were not allotted,⁶ but (instead) they have forsaken the mighty Lord."

Conclusion (Chapter XXXII.)

XXXII. "Therefore hear, O Abraham, and see; lo! thy seventh generation ⁷ (shall) go with thee, and they shall go out into a strange land, and they shall enslave them, and evil-entreat them⁸ as it were an hour of the Age of ungodliness⁹ but the nation whom they shall serve I will judge."]¹⁰

ADDITIONAL NOTES

I

I am he who hath been commanded to loosen Hades to destroy him who stareth at the dead.

This obscure clause, which occurs in Jaobel's speech in chap. x., is absent from S. The Slavonic text runs as follows—

Az esm' povelěvy razreshiti ada, istliti divyaščas mertvym.

Dr. St. Clair Tisdall suggests the following rendering—

I am commanded to loosen Hades, to turn to corruption (by) gazing at the dead.

¹ The renegade Jews here referred to are described as idolaters (cf. Ezek. xx. 16, Jer. vii. 9); and the righteous rejoice over their "downfall"; cf. 1 Enoch lvi. 8 ("Sheol will devour the sinners in the presence of the elect"), xciv. 10 ("Your creator will rejoice at your destruction"), xcvii. 2 ("the angels rejoice" over it), Is. lxvi. 24. Notice that idolatry and murder are here conjoined; cf. Acts xv. 29 (according to one view of the text).

² Cf. the Greek Apocalypse of Baruch iv. (the dragon of Hades, which devours the bodies of the ungodly). In 2 Enoch xlii. 1 the guardians of the gates of Hell are said to be "like great serpents."

³ Here the Evil Spirit is identified with Hell; his tongue devours the ungodly; and he himself is "the burning coal of the furnace of the earth" (chap. xiv.). Hell (Gehenna) is essentially a place of fire; cf. Is. xxx. 33 and Mekilta to Ex. xiv. 21.

⁴ ? in repentance.

⁵ i. e. probably Azazel.

⁶ This clearly indicates that renegade Jews are referred to. For a similar reference cf. 4 Ezra viii. 25-31. It would appear that large numbers of Jews had lapsed, after the fall of Jerusalem, into indifference, or even open apostasy; cf. the Rabbinical references to "the people of the land" (am hā-'āres).

⁷ Including Abraham, the seven generations may be reckoned thus: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Levi, Kohath, Amram, Moses.

⁸ Cf. Gen. xv. 13.

⁹ i. e. ? 100 years; cf. chap. xxviii, end.

¹⁰ Cf. Gen. xv. 14. K concludes with the following words: And this, too, said the Lord: Hast thou heard, Abraham, what I have announced to thee, what shall befall thy people in the latter days? And Abraham heard the words of the Lord, and received them into his heart.

Dr. Tisdall explains the meaning thus: "The speaker has power given to him to 'deliver over to corruption' the bodies of the dead by gazing at them. The verb [rendered 'gazing'] strictly denotes marvelling, admiring."

Mr. Landsman writes as follows: "The verb diviyati is used in Slavonic, meaning 'to be ferocious,' 'to rage'; divyaščas means thus 'to stare at' somebody in such a way that he is frightened by the ferocity of the look. It can be translated as Dr. Tisdall translates it, but does this rendering and interpretation harmonise with the context?" Mr. Landsman goes on to suggest that the second line refers to Death personified; cf. Ps. xlix. 14 ("Death shall be their shepherd") and Rev. xx. 13, 14, where "Death and Hades" are "cast into the lake of fire." Then render—to destroy him [i.e. Death] who terrifieth the dead.*

*I am he who hath been commanded to loosen Hades,

This yields an admirable sense, and is probably right. Jaol thus claims to be commissioned to abolish the terrors of Hades and Death.

II

And when they [the Cherubim] had ended the singing, they looked at one another and threatened one another. And it came to pass when the angel who was with me saw that they were threatening each other, he left me and went running to them, and turned the countenance of each living creature from the countenance immediately confronting him in order that they might not see their countenances threatening each other. And he taught them the song of peace which hath its origin in the Eternal One (chap. xviii.).

In addition to the illustration given in note¹⁰ (p. 40) on this passage, the following extract from The Revelation of Moses (Gedulath Moshe), translated by Dr. Garter in The Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for July 1893, p. 576 ("Hebrew Visions of Hell and Paradise") may be quoted—

Moses went to the fifth heaven, and he saw there troops of angels, half of fire and half of snow; and the snow is above the fire without extinguishing it, for God maketh peace between them [as it is said: "He maketh peace in his high places," Job xxv. 2], and all praise the Almighty. Cf also the Midrash Debarim rabba (to Deut. xx. 10), where with reference to the same passage of Job (xxv. 2) it is said: Michael [who presides over the water] is altogether snow, Gabriel is altogether fire, and they stand next each other without being harmed on either side (so also Midrash rabba to Cant. iii. 11); cf. also 2 Enoch xxix. 2.

APPENDIX I

THE LEGEND OF ABRAM'S CONVERSION FROM IDOLATRY

(Cf. Chapters I.-VIII. of our Book.)

ABRAM'S emergence from the prevalent idolatry early became the theme of legend, which has assumed various forms and was widespread. These are collected, with full references, in Beer's Leben Abrahams (Leipzig, 1859), Chaps. I. and II., and are well summarised in J.E. I. 84-87 ("Abraham in apocryphal and Rabbinical Literature").

The earliest literary evidence appears to be some extracts from Jewish Alexandrine works cited by Josephus under the names of Hecataeus and Berosus, of the third and second centuries B.C., and summarised by him (Ant. I. 1, 7): [Abraham] was a person of great sagacity both for understanding all things and persuading his hearers, and not mistaken in his opinions; for which reason he began to have higher notions of virtue than others had, and he determined to renew and to change the opinion all men happened then to have concerning God; for he was the first that ventured to publish this notion, that there was but one God, the Creator of the Universe; and that as to other [gods] if they contributed anything to the happiness of men, that each of them afforded it only according to his appointment, and not by their own power. This his opinion was derived from the irregular phenomena that were visible both on land and sea, as well as those that happen to the sun, and moon, and all the heavenly bodies, thus: "If [said he] these bodies had power of their own, they would certainly take care of their own regular motions; but since they do not preserve such regularity, they make it plain, that so far as they co-operate to our advantage, they do it not of their own abilities, but as they are subservient to him that commands them, to whom alone we ought justly to offer our honour and thanksgiving." For which doctrines, when the Chaldæans and other peoples of Mesopotamia raised a tumult against him, he thought fit to leave that country; and at the command, and by the assistance of God, he came and lived in the land of Canaan.

Another early attestation of the legend occurs in The Book of Jubilees, probably dating from the close of the second century B. C. Here it is related (chap. xi. 16-xii) that Abraham as a child "began to understand the errors of the earth," and at the age of fourteen, in order not to be entangled in the idolatry, practised in connexion with astrology by the whole house of Nahor, separated from his father and family, and prayed to God to save him "from the errors of the children of men." He became an inventor of an improved method of sowing seed, by which it was preserved against the depredations of the ravens. He then made efforts to wean his father from idolatry, but Terah, though acknowledging that his son was right, was afraid to make a public renunciation, and told Abraham to keep silent. Being no more successful with his brothers, Abraham rose by night and set fire to the house of idols. His brother Haran in an attempt to save them perished in the fire, and was buried in Ur of the Chaldees.

Here we meet with a feature which provided a motif for various forms of the legend—viz. the fire which burnt the idols and their house. This is really derived from the etymological meaning of Ur = "fire;" thus "Ur of the Chaldees" is taken to mean "fire of the Chaldees." In our Book the fire descends from heaven and burns the house and all in it (including Terah), Abraham alone escaping. In other forms of the legend Abraham is cast into the fire (by Nimrod), and is miraculously preserved. Philo's account of Abraham's conversion (de Abrahamo, § 15) is as follows:¹

The Chaldeans were, above all nations, addicted to the study of astronomy, and attributed all events to the motions of the stars by which they fancied that all the things in the world were regulated, and accordingly they magnified the visible essence by the powers which numbers and the analogies of numbers contain, taking no account of the invisible essence appreciable only by the intellect. But while they were busied in investigating the arrangement existing in them with reference to the periodical revolutions of the sun and moon and the other planets and fixed-stars, and the changes of the seasons of the year, and the sympathy of the heavenly bodies with the things of earth, they were led to imagine that the world itself was God, in their impious philosophy comparing the creature to the Creator.

The man [Abraham] who had been bred up in this doctrine, and who for a long time had studied the philosophy of the Chaldeans, as if suddenly awaking from a deep slumber and opening the eye of the soul, and beginning to perceive a pure ray of light instead of profound darkness, followed the light, and saw what he had never seen before, a certain governor and director of the world standing above it (κατεῖδεν . . . τοῦ κόσμου τινὰ ἡνιόχον καὶ κυβερνήτην ἐφεστῶτα), and guiding his own work in a salutary manner, and exerting his care and power in behalf of those parts of it which are worthy of divine superintendence.

The legend is cited or referred to in many places in the Rabbinical Literature. The following extract from Bereshith rabba xxxviii. 19 (on Gen. xi. 28) is a good example:

*And Haran died in the presence of his father Terah. R. Hiyya bar R. Idi of Joppa said: "Terah was a maker and seller of idols. On one occasion he went out somewhere, (and) set Abraham to sell in his place. A man came (and) wished to buy (an idol), and he (Abraham) said to him: 'How old art thou?' And he said: 'Fifty or sixty years.' [Abraham] said to him: 'Woe to the man who is sixty years old, and will worship (an image) a day old!' And (the buyer) was shamed and went his way. Another time there came a woman, carrying in her hand a dish of fine flour. 'Here thou art,' said she. 'Offer it (as an oblation) before them (i. e. before the gods).' [Abraham] arose, took a club in his hand, and smashed all the images, and placed the club in the hand of the largest of them. When his father came back, he said to him: 'Who has done this to them?' He [Abraham] said to him: 'Why should I hide (the matter) from thee? A woman came carrying a dish of fine flour. And she said to me: "Here thou art: offer it (as an oblation) before them." I offered (it) before them. Then one said: "I will eat first," and another said: "I will eat first." The one who was greatest among them rose up, took a club, and smashed them.' And [Terah] said to him: 'Why wilt thou fool me? How should they understand (anything)?' [Abraham] said to him: 'Let not thy ears hear what thy mouth says!' [Terah] took him and delivered him to Nimrod. The latter said to him: 'We will worship the fire.' Abraham said to him: 'But we should (rather) worship water.' Nimrod said to him: 'We will worship the water.' [Abraham] said to him: 'If so, we ought to worship the cloud that bears the water.' Nimrod said to him: 'We will worship] the cloud.' He replied to him: 'If so, we ought to worship the wind: it scatters the cloud.' [Nimrod] said to him: 'We should worship] the wind.' He replied: 'We should worship man, who endures, (defies) the wind.' He replied: 'You are bandying words with me: I worship the fire only, (and) lo, I will cast thee into the midst of it; then, let the God whom thou worshipping come and deliver thee from it.' Haran was standing there in doubt. He said: 'At all events if Abraham is victorious I will say I am of Abraham's opinion; but if Nimrod is victorious I will say I am of Nimrod's opinion.' When Abraham descended into the fiery furnace and was delivered, they said to him: 'On whose side art thou?' He said to them: 'Abraham's.' They seized him and threw him into the fire. And his bowels were scorched, and it fell out that he died in the presence of his father. That is the meaning of the verse, and Haran died in the presence of Terah his father."*

¹ Yonge's translation, vol. ii. p. 417.

Another version of the same legend (cf. Tanna debe Eliyaha ii. 25, and see J.E. i. 86) runs as follows:

Terah was a manufacturer of idols and had them for sale. One day when Abraham was left in charge of the shop, an old man came to buy an idol. Abraham handed him one on the top, and he paid the price asked. "How old art thou?" Abraham asked. "Seventy years," he replied. "Thou fool," said Abraham; "how canst thou adore a god so much younger than thyself? Thou wert born seventy years ago, and this god was made yesterday." The buyer threw away the idol and received his money back. The other sons of Terah complained to their father that Abraham did not know how to sell the idols, and it was arranged that he should act as priest to the latter. One day a woman brought a meal-offering for the idols, and as they would not eat he exclaimed: A mouth have they but speak not, eyes have they but see not, ears but hear not, hands but handle not. May their makers be like them, and all who trust in them (Ps. cxv. 5-8); and he broke them in pieces, and burned them. Abraham was thereupon brought before Nimrod, who said: "Knowest thou not that I am god, and ruler of the world? Why hast thou destroyed my images?" Abraham replied: "If thou art god and ruler of the world, why dost thou not cause the sun to rise in the west and set in the east? If thou art god and ruler of the world, tell me all that I have now at heart, and what I shall do in the future?" Nimrod was dumbfounded, and Abraham continued: "Thou art the son of Cush, a mortal man. Thou couldst not save thy father from death, nor wilt thou thyself escape it."

Another form of the legend, after narrating the wonderful nature of Abraham's birth, Nimrod's alarm at the report of the astrologers and magicians in connexion therewith, and his attempt to bribe Terah to give up the child, who, under the charge of a nurse, was hidden by his father in a cave, where he remained for some years, proceeds (cf. Midrash hagadol on Genesis. ed. Schechter p. 189 f.):

When Abraham came forth from the cave, his mind was inquiring into the creation of the world, and he was intent upon all the luminaries of the world, to bow down to them and serve them, in order that he might know which of them was God. He saw the moon, whose light shone in the night from one end of the world to the other, and whose retinue [of shining stars] was so numerous. Said he: "This is God!" (and) he worshipped her all the night. But when at day-break he saw the sun-rise, and at its rising the moon become dark and her strength wane, he said: "The light of the moon only proceeds from the light of the sun, and the world is only sustained by the light of the sun," and so he worshipped the sun all day. At evening the sun set, and its power waned, and the moon and the stars and the constellations emerged (once more). Said [Abraham]: "Verily there is a Lord and a God over these."

A peculiar form of the legend occurs in the Biblical Antiquities of Pseudo-Philo vi. 5-18.¹

According to this Midrashic account, Abram with eleven other men whose names are given, refused to bake bricks for the building of the Tower of Babel. In consequence, they were seized by the people of the land, and brought before the princes, and on their persistent refusal to take any part in the building of the Tower, were condemned to be burnt. A respite of seven days is given them at the intercession of Jectan, "the first prince of the captains," but at the end of this time, if they have not already changed their mind, they are to be handed over for execution. Jectan, a secret friend, contrives their escape to the mountains, and eleven of the men do escape, but Abram refuses to flee, and remains behind. At the end of the seven days, the "people of the land" demand that the imprisoned men shall be produced. Jectan explains that eleven of them "have broken prison and fled by night," but Abram is produced, is cast into the fire, but is miraculously delivered by God,¹ who causes an earthquake which breaks up the furnace and scatters the fire, which “consumed all them that stood round about in the sight of the furnace; and all they that were burned in that day were 83,500. But upon Abram was there not any the least hurt by the burning of the fire.”

¹ Edited for the first time in English by Dr. M. R. James, and published in this Series.

It is obvious from what has been adduced that the legend assumed different forms. The narrative just cited is quite independent of the rest, except for the episode of the fiery furnace. The form also given in our Book is largely independent. Nowhere else do we meet with the details about the idol-gods Merumath and Barisat. The fiery furnace also is absent, and the burning of the idols is effected by fire from heaven. At the same time in chap. vii. of our Book in the speech of Abraham to Terah about the claims to divinity of fire, water, earth, sun, moon, and stars, there is a marked parallelism with the Rabbinical accounts. It is clear that the form of the legend in our Book is due to an independent and free handling of the legendary material, many new features having been introduced in the process.

The legend also occurs in various forms in the Patristic and Mohammedan literature. For the former cf. Clem. Recognitions, i. 32 f., Augustine, De Civitate xvi. 15; and for the latter cf. J.E., i. 87 f. (“Abraham in Mohammedan Legend”). See further Fabricius, Codex pseudepigraphus Vet. Test. (2nd ed., Hamburg, 1722, pp. 335-428), Bonwetsch, pp. 41-55. The later Jewish forms of the legend (as preserved in late Midrashim) have been collected and translated into German by Wünsche, Aus Israels Lehrhallen (1907), i. pp. 14-48 (the original Hebrew texts are printed mainly in Jellinek’s Beth ha-Midrash); cf. also G. Friedlander, Rabbinic Philosophy and Ethics (1912), pp. 47 ff.

APPENDIX II²

All the Palæas begin the story of Abraham as follows:

“But Terah begat Abraham:” and Terah began to do the same work which he saw (being done) in the case of his father Nahor, and worshipped the gods, and offered sacrifices before them, calves, and heifers, and performed everything well-pleasing to the Devil. When Abraham, however, had seen this, and on account of it fell into much reflexion, he said within himself: “These gods are wood, through which my father Terah is deceived, and these gods have no soul in themselves; and possessing eyes they see not, and having ears they hear not, and possessing hands they handle not, and having feet they go not, and possessing noses they smell not, and there is no voice in their mouth. Therefore I am of opinion that in truth my father Terah is deceived. But Abraham having thought thus. . . .

Then some of the MSS. proceed:

Abraham (or I.), however, one day planed the gods, etc. (as in chap. i.); but the rest continue with chap. vii.: [Having thought thus, Abraham] came to his father, etc.

APPENDIX III³

A portion of our Apocalypse is contained in an abbreviated form in the Kukulevic MS. which is described by V. Jagić in his Contributions to the History of the Literature of the Croat and Serbian People (Prilozi k historiji književnosti naroda hrvatskoga i srbskoga), Agram 1868.

¹ According to R. Eliezer b. Jacob it was Michael who delivered Abraham from the fire; but the prevailing view was that it was God Himself; cf. Bereshith rabba xlv. 16.

² See Bonwetsch, p. 9.

³ See Bonwetsch, pp. 9-11.

The MS. dates from the year 1520, and includes on pp. 37^v foll. parts of The Apocalypse of Abraham, in a much abbreviated, dislocated and altered form as compared with the tradition represented by the Russian MSS. This apparently represents an independent South Slavonic Recension of our Book. It runs as follows:¹

A word of righteous Abraham, as God loved Abraham. He was born; in sixty years [i. e. at the age of 60] He [God] had given him (Terah) a son, (even to Terah) who believed in the idols, and manufactured idols, and gave them names. Abraham went and sold the idols. When on a certain day Abraham had lain down in the field, and saw the stars of heaven and everything (made) by God, he surveyed it all in his heart, and said: "O great marvel! These idols have not made it: heaven and earth and everything hath God made, we, however, are senseless men not believing in the Creator of heaven and earth, but we believe in stones and wood, and in vain things, but I see and understand that God is great, who hath created heaven and earth and the whole world."

On a certain day his father carved idols, and told Abraham to prepare (their) food. And Abraham took a god and stood him at the fire behind the pot, and said to him: If thou art a god, pay heed to the pot and to thyself. And then the pot boiled over, and burnt the god's head. And Abraham approached, and saw it, and laughed about it much, and said to his father: "Father, these idols are no good, they cannot protect themselves, how should they protect us?" And his father was angry, and said: "Ills have befallen us, my son, I am not offended." And then Abraham arose and took the idols, and loaded them on an ass, and brought them into the street to sell. And he saw a great marsh, and said to the idols: "If you are gods, take heed to the ass that it do not drown you." And the ass went into the marsh and sank in the mire. And Abraham said to them: "If you were good gods, (then) you would protect . . . and also protect yourselves; but since you are evil gods, you must suffer evil." And he took them and shattered them.

And he returned to his father, and said: "Father, I tell thee the truth; these gods are no good, and you are wrong to believe in them." Thereupon his father flung a knife against him, and Abraham stood aside, and was perplexed in his mind. And he went into the land of Mesopotamia Chaldaea and did not know the way by which to go. Then the angel Uriel came to him, having made himself (in appearance) like a traveller. And Abraham said to the angel: "Tell me, Brother, whence art thou, and whither goest thou?" The angel said to him: "I go to the land of Chaldaea." And Abraham said: "I also go with thee." And the angel said to him: "Come, Brother!" And Abraham saw a large (and) very black eagle sitting and nodding its head at Abraham; and Abraham passing by it was seized with great fear, and said nothing.

And the angel said to him: "Talk, Brother, of nothing but God." And the angel taught him all the time to talk of nothing but godly things. And the angel said to him: "Yonder eagle was indeed the Devil himself, and desired to make thee turn back."

And in that land Abraham abode fifteen years; there he dwelt, (and) thither his father came to him, and his brother Lot, and there Abraham took his wife Sarah.

And the angel came to Abraham, and told him to depart from this land, and to go into the land of Chaldaea (sic), "for there the Lord hath commanded thee to live." Abraham did accordingly. The narrative then proceeds on the basis of the account given in Gen. xx.

It is obvious that this is largely an independent reshaping of the old material. But it contains clear reminiscences both of the legendary and apocalyptic parts of our Book.

¹ As given in a German translation by Dr. L. Masing of Dorpat (in Bonwetsch, pp. 10 f.).

title: Byzantine Theology : Historical Trends and Doctrinal Themes author: Meyendorff, John. publisher: Fordham University Press
isbn10 | asin: 0823209679
print isbn13: 9780823209675 ebook isbn13: 9780585171319
language: English
subject Eastern Orthodox Church--Doctrines--History. publication date: 1987
lcc: BX320.2 .M47 1987eb
ddc: 230/.19
subject: Eastern Orthodox Church--Doctrines--History.

Byzantine Theology

Historical Trends and Doctrinal Themes

John Meyendorff

Fordham University Press
New York

© Copyright 1974, 1979 by Fordham University Press

All rights reserved.

LC 72-94167

ISBN 0-8232-0967-9

Printed in the United States of America

Reprinted from the revised second edition of 1983

7 9 10 8

Meyendorff, John, 1926-

Byzantine theology.

1. Eastern Orthodox ChurchDoctrines. I. Title.

230/.1/ 9

BX320.2 .M47 1983 ISBN 0-8232-0967-9

CONTENTS

Preface to the Second Edition	vii
Introduction: The Character and the Sources of Theology in Byzantium	1
I Historical Trends
1 Byzantine Theology After Chalcedon	19
2 The Christological Issue	32
3 The Iconoclastic Crisis	42
4 Monks and Humanists	54
5 Monastic Theology	66
6 Ecclesiology: Canonical Sources	79
7 The Schism Between East and West	91
8 Encounter with the West	103
9	115

Lex Orandi

II

Doctrinal Themes

10 129

Creation

11 138

Man

12 151

Jesus Christ

13 168

The Holy Spirit

14 180

The Triune God

15 191

Sacramental Theology: The Cycle of Life

16 201

The Eucharist

17 212

The Church in the World

Conclusion: Antinomies 224

Bibliography 229

Index 239

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

The publication of a new edition of this book has given the author an opportunity to correct minor inaccuracies and to add several bibliographical references. It is clear, however, that in a field which is constantly being enriched with new publications, a general survey like this one cannot be fully comprehensive, even if the author feels himself greatly indebted to the findings of many of his colleagues, whose names do not appear in the Bibliography.

The largely positive response which met Byzantine Theology seems to indicate that the attempt at combining the historical and the systematic methods of approach to the subject was basically justified. There was, however, a risk of misunderstanding the use of any adjective in the title, and particularly the adjective "Byzantine," to define "theology." The adjective appears today in a variety of different contexts, and the limit of what is properly "Byzantine" is difficult to determine. On the other hand, the Byzantine theologians themselves did not conceive of their own religious tradition as being culturally or doctrinally limited. They used Scripture and the early Christian Fathers as a constant reference, and, at the same time, claimed to be the spokesmen of true Christian doctrine, as distinct from the non-Chalcedonian East and the Latin West. Furthermore, the modern Orthodox Church identifies herself, in a very particular way, with that "Byzantine" tradition (without excluding the potentiality of other expressions or developments of the same Christian truth), because she sees it as having been historically consistent with the Apostolic faith itself. Under such conditions, an historical survey and, particularly, an attempt at a systematic account of Byzantine theology could easily be interpreted either as confessionally biased or, on the contrary, as deliberately rejecting the claim of the Byzantines themselves and of modern Orthodox theology, in the name of historical objectivity.

The author can certainly understand the critics who, in expressing their views about the book, have reflected one or the other of these mutually exclusive interpretations. He is firmly convinced that it is both possible and necessary to study Byzantium and Byzantine theology, not only as carriers of religious orthodoxy, but also as historical phenomena of mixed cultural content. Theological orthodoxy itself cannot be fully defined and conceptually expressed without careful and critical historical research, which serves to overthrow idols and to avoid misconceptions. On the other hand, this same research, if it is really objective, shows the existence of a remarkable and theologically consistent tradition, which includes the Greek Fathers of the fourth century, the christology of Cyril of Alexandria, and the synthesis of Maximus the Confessor and of Gregory Palamas. In the author's opinion, this consistent tradition represents the mainstream of theological thought in Byzantium and coincides with the very content of Orthodox religious experience.

I fully realize that the existence of the "mainstream" is challenged by some historians. Some would claim, for example, that the group of anti-Palamite theologians of the fourteenth century were, in fact, the true representatives of the earlier patristic thought, which was being betrayed by Palamas. The debate on this point was started earlier in this century by Martin Jugie and was recently resumed by several authors, including particularly Gerhard Podskalsky. The issue has a number of historical, philosophical, and, certainly, confessional implications; it must be pursued further.

The debate itself shows that Byzantine theology involved crucial issues of Christian thinking and experience, which continue to be at the center of theological thinking today. Thus, a purely historical approach inevitably leads to a debate on substance.

The author would like to repeat here his acknowledgments from the original edition of this work. He is particularly indebted to the late Edwin A. Quain, S.J., formerly Editorial Associate of Fordham University Press, who was not sparing of his time, energy, and extraordinary competence in improving the text, and also to the Rev. Walter J. Burghardt, S.J., Editor of Theological Studies, for reading the manuscript and making several useful suggestions. He also owes thanks to Professor Jaroslav Pelikan, Dean of the Graduate School, Yale University, for allowing him pre-publication access to and use of his monumental The Christian Tradition.

J.M.

INTRODUCTION

THE CHARACTER AND THE SOURCES OF THEOLOGY IN BYZANTIUM

Centuries of struggle and super-human effort will be required to go beyond Hellenism, by liberating it from its natural attachments and its ethnic and cultural limitations, before it will finally become a universal form of Christian truth.

VLADIMIR LOSSKY, Vision of God, 58.

Ancient culture proved to be plastic enough to admit of an inner "transfiguration." . . . Christians proved that it was possible to re-orient the cultural process, without lapsing into a pre-cultural state, to reshape the cultural fabric in a new spirit. The same process which has been variously described as a "Hellenization of Christianity" can be construed rather as a "Christianization of Hellenism."

GEORGES FLOROVSKY, "Faith and Culture," St. Vladimir's Quarterly, 4, 1-2 [1955-1956], 40.

Emperor Constantine (324-337) ended the period of confrontation between Christianity and the Roman Empire. He also abandoned the ancient capital, and moved the center of political and cultural life of what was then seen as the "civilized world" to the site of an ancient Greek city on the rivers of the BosphorusByzantium. It was officially called Constantinople, the "New Rome," and remained the capital of an Empire still called "Roman" for over eleven centuries, until its fall to the Turks in 1453.

Especially after the disappearance of the ancient Christian centers in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, Constantinople became the unquestionable center of Eastern Christianity. Its bishop assumed the title of "ecumenical patriarch." In the Balkans, in the great Eastern European plain, in the Caucasus, its missionaries converted immense territories to the Christian faith. In fact, the "New Rome" became the cradle of civilization for the Middle East and Eastern Europe, just as the "old Rome" has been for the Latin West.

The aim of this book is to describe the categories of theological thought as they were shaped in the framework of Byzantine Christian civilization, its philosophy of life, its liturgy, and its art, and as they persist in contemporary Eastern Orthodoxy. The central theme, or intuition, of Byzantine theology is that man's nature is not a static, "closed," autonomous entity, but a dynamic reality, determined in its very existence by its relationship to God. This relationship is seen as a process of ascent and as communionman, created in the image of God, is called to achieve freely a "divine similitude"; his relationship to God is both a givenness and a task, an immediate experience and an expectation of even greater vision to be accomplished in a free effort of love. The dynamism of Byzantine anthropology can easily be contrasted with the static categories of "nature" and "grace" which dominated the thought of post-Augustinian Western Christianity; it can prove itself to be an essential frame of reference in the contemporary theological search for a new understanding of man.

As a culture and civilization, Byzantium died long ago; yet the quality of its impact on the historical development of human society is still open to question. Since the time of Gibbon, historians have cited social immobilism, lack of creativity in the fields of science and technology, and a sacralized view of the state as its major defects. But it is the contention of this book that Byzantium made its real and permanent contribution to the history of mankind in the field of religious thought. The continuous attraction of Byzantine art and the remarkable survival of Eastern Christianity throughout the most dramatic of social changes are the best available signs that Byzantium did indeed discover something fundamentally true about man's nature and its relationship to God.

To express this "theocentric" view of man so akin to the contemporary attempts to build a "theocentric anthropology" Byzantine theologians used the concepts of Greek philosophy, particularly the notion of theosis, or "deification." In the last century, Adolf Harnack passed severe judgments on the "Hellenized Christianity" of the Greek Fathers, but he is unlikely to be followed by many today. The unavoidable necessity of reformulating and rethinking the Christian faith in the light of changing cultural patterns is widely recognized, and the effort of the Greek Fathers to formulate Christianity in the categories of Hellenism can only be viewed as legitimate. Actually, Byzantine theology, as Lossky realized, was nothing but a continuous effort and struggle to express the tradition of the Church in the living categories of Greek thought, so that Hellenism might be converted to Christ.

It is legitimate to ask whether this effort was successful, but it is impossible to deny that it was justified in its basic intent. This book attempts to describe the major historical trends of Byzantine theology, always relating them to its main theme, and, in a second part, to show, in a more systematic form, that the results of Byzantine theological thought can also be envisaged as a synthesis. It is not our intention simply to describe the idea of "deification" and its development in Greek patristic thought (numerous technical studies are available on that subject), but to analyze the entire historical development of theological ideas in Byzantium concerning God-man relationships. Whether one deals with Trinitarian or Christological dogma, or whether one examines ecclesiology and sacramental doctrine, the main stream of Byzantine theology uncovers the same vision of man, called to "know" God, to "participate" in His life, to be "saved," not simply through an extrinsic action of God's, or through the rational cognition of propositional truths, but by "becoming God." And this theosis of man is radically different in Byzantine theology from the Neoplatonic return to an impersonal One: it is a new expression of the neo-testamental life "in Christ" and in the "communion of the Holy Spirit."

1. Chronological Limits

There are decisive reasons for viewing as specifically Byzantine the period which followed the Council of Chalcedon (451) and the barbarian invasion of Italy. The council resulted in the Monophysite schism, which severed Constantinople from Alexandria and Antioch (the ancient Eastern centers of theological creativity) and from the entire non-Greek East. Latins and Greeks, meanwhile, although they still belonged to the same Catholic imperial Church, began to develop an increasing sense of estrangement from one another, as divergent trends in Christology, ecclesiology, and pneumatology appear very clearly in the context of the unparalleled cultural and intellectual superiority of Constantinople.

Historical circumstances thus placed Byzantium in an exclusive, preeminent, and, to some degree, self-sufficient, position, from which it was to develop a theological tradition, both synthetic and creative.

For several centuries, Byzantium would be vitally concerned with pulling together the parts of a disintegrating Christian world: by maintaining its Christological commitment to the Council of Chalcedon and to the Tome of Leo, it would keep bridges toward the West intact, in spite of all the tensions; and by remaining rigidly faithful to the Alexandrian Christology of Athanasius and Cyril, it would also tryunfortunately without successto keep all doors open to the Monophysites.

These Christological commitments and debates imply a concept of the relationship between God and man, a theology of "participation" which would, through the creative synthesis of Maximus the Confessor, serve as a framework for the entire development of Byzantine Christian thought until the fall of Constantinople to the Turks. Thus, between the patristic age and later-Byzantine theology, there exists an essential continuityas the present study will attempt to showspanning almost exactly a millennium of Christian history in the East, from the Council of Chalcedon to the fall of Constantinople.

This continuity does not express itself, however, in any formal authority or pattern which would have been acceptable during that entire period. It lies rather in a consistent theological way of thought, in a consistent understanding of man's destiny in relation to God and to the world. "God became man," Athanasius writes, "so that man may become God." This fundamental statement of Alexandrian theology, which was to dominate the entire theological discussion about "deification," prompted many problems. Pantheism, escapism from history, and Platonizing spiritualism are the obvious dangers, and, though orthodox Chalcedonian theology generally remains aware of them, it implies the positive concept of man as a being called to overcome constantly his own created limitations. Man's real nature is considered not as "autonomous" but as destined to share divine life which had been made accessible in Christ. In this concept, man's role in the created world can be fulfilled only if he keeps intact the "image" of God which was part of his very humanity from the beginning.

From the Christological controversies of the fifth century to the debates on the "essence" and "energy" of God in the fourteenth, all the major crises of Byzantine theological thought can be reduced to one or the other aspect of this basic Christian issue. Authors as different as Leontius of Jerusalem and Gregory Palamas, Maximus the Confessor and Symeon the New Theologian, Photius and Nicholas Cabasilas, can here be found in basic agreement. It is this consensus which distinguishes Byzantine theology, taken as a whole, from the post-Augustinian and Scholastic West, and makes possible the attempt, which we undertake in the second part of our study, at a systematic presentation of Byzantine Christian thought.

2. A Living Tradition

This presentation is rendered difficult, however, by the very character of Byzantine church life, as it is reflected in the theological literature. In the Byzantine period, as in the patristic, neither the councils nor the theologians show particular interest in positive theological systems. With a few exceptions, such as the Chalcedonian definition, the conciliar statements themselves assume a negative form; they condemn distortions of the Christian Truth, rather than elaborate its positive content which is taken for granted as the living Tradition and as a wholesome Truth standing beyond and above doctrinal formulae. By far the greatest part of the theological literature is either exegetical or polemical, and in both cases the Christian faith is assumed as a given reality, upon which one comments, or which one defends, but which one does not try to formulate exhaustively. Even John of Damascus, sometimes referred to as the "Aquinas of the East" because he composed a systematic Exposition of the Orthodox Faith (De fide orthodoxa), produced only a short textbook, not a theological system; if his thought lacks anything, it is precisely that original philosophic creativity which a new system would presuppose.

The lack of concern for systematization, however, does not mean a lack of interest in the true content of the faith or an inability to produce exact theological definitions. On the contrary. No civilization has ever lived through more discussions on the adequacy, or inadequacy, of words reflecting religious truths. The homoousion as distinct from the homoiousion, "of two natures" or "in two natures"; two wills or one will; latreia of icons or proskynesis of images; the created or uncreated character of the divine "energies"; procession "from the Son" or "through the Son" these were issues debated by Byzantine Christians for centuries. It would seem, then, that the Greek Christian spirit consisted precisely in optimistically believing that human language is fundamentally adequate to express religious truth and that salvation depends upon the exact expression used to convey the meaning of the Gospel. Yet these same Greek Christians firmly confessed the incapacity of conceptual language to express the whole truth, and the incapability of the human mind to attain the essence of God. There was in Byzantium, therefore, an antinomy in the very approach to theology: God has really revealed Himself in Christ Jesus, and the knowledge of His Truth is essential to salvation, but God is also above the human intellect and cannot be fully expressed in human words.

In Byzantium, theology was never a monopoly of professionals or of a "teaching church." During the entire Byzantine period, no church council went unchallenged, and attempts by several emperors to regulate their subjects' consciences by decree were checked not so much by a consistently independent hierarchy as by the tacit opposition of the entire body of the Church. This lack of a clearly and juridically defined criterion of orthodoxy implied that the responsibility for the truth was shared by all. The majority of the laity, of course, followed the most pre-eminent bishops, whose magisterial responsibility was never denied, or monastic leaders, who often played a central role in doctrinal disputes; but the simple faithful also knew how to decide for themselves, especially when the episcopate was divided. It is sufficient to recall here the witness of Gregory of Nazianzus, complaining about salesmen discussing the concept of "consubstantial" in the market place.

Yet imperial interventions in theological debates, which today appear as intolerable intrusions of the secular power into the sacred precincts of the Church, were considered quite normal at a time when the emperor was required by law to be "glorified in his divine zeal and versed in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity." 1 Though no one was ready to grant the emperor the privilege of infallibility, still no one objected to the principle of his expressing theological views which de facto acquired greater, and sometimes decisive, weight because they were pronounced by the Autokrator.

Caesaropapism, however, never became an accepted principle in Byzantium. Innumerable heroes of the faith were constantly exalted precisely because they had opposed heretical emperors; hymns sung in church praised Basil for having disobeyed Valens, Maximus for his martyrdom under Constans, and numerous monks for having opposed the iconoclastic emperors of the eighth century. These liturgical praises alone were sufficient to safeguard the principle that the emperor was to preserve, not to define, the Christian faith.

Throughout Byzantine history, it was actually the monks who were the real witnesses of the Church's internal independence. That the Byzantine Church was primarily monastic is reflected in the character of Greek theology. It is no wonder that emperors who endeavored to strengthen iconoclasm had first to sponsor an anti-monastic movement in the Church, for monasticism was, of necessity, hostile to the caesaropapistic system for which some emperors showed a predisposition.

Numbering thousands in Constantinople itself, in the major cities, and in practically every corner of the Byzantine world, the monks consistently opposed doctrinal compromises; they defended a rigorous orthodoxy, but at times they could also place their zeal at the service of Monophysitism or of Origenism. From the sixth century on, candidates for the episcopacy were chosen almost exclusively from the ranks of the monks; thus Byzantine spirituality and much of the Byzantine liturgy were shaped by monks. That Byzantine Christianity lacked what today would be called a "theology of the secular" is largely the result of the predominant position of monasticism. Yet this very predominance prevented the Christian Church from becoming totally identified with the empire, which constantly tended to sacralize itself and to assimilate the divine plan of salvation to its own temporal interests. The numerical, spiritual, and intellectual strength of Byzantine monasticism was the decisive factor which preserved in the Church the fundamental eschatological dimension of the Christian faith.

The last major preliminary observation to be made concerning the specific character of Byzantine theology is the importance of the liturgy in the Byzantine religious outlook. In Eastern Christendom, the Eucharistic liturgy, more than anything else, is identified with the reality of the Church itself, for it manifests both the humiliation of God in assuming mortal flesh, and the mysterious presence among men of the eschatological kingdom. It points at these central realities of the faith not through concepts but through symbols and signs intelligible to the entire worshipping congregation. This centrality of the Eucharist is actually the real key to the Byzantine understanding of the Church, both hierarchical and corporate; the Church is universal, but truly realized only in the local Eucharistic assembly, at which a group of sinful men and women becomes fully the "people of God." This Eucharist-centered concept of the Church led the Byzantines to embellish and adorn the sacrament with an elaborate and sometimes cumbersome ceremonial, and with an extremely rich hymnography, in daily, weekly, paschal, and yearly cycles. Besides the sacramental ecclesiology implied by the Eucharist itself, these hymnographical cycles constitute a real source of theology. For centuries the Byzantines not only heard theological lessons and wrote and read theological treatises; they also sang and contemplated daily the Christian mystery in a liturgy, whose wealth of expression cannot be found elsewhere in the Christian world. Even after the fall of Byzantium, when Eastern Christians were deprived of schools, books, and all intellectual leadership, the liturgy remained the chief teacher and guide of Orthodoxy. Translated into the various vernacular languages of the Byzantine world—Slavic, Georgian, Arabic, and dozens of others—the liturgy was also a powerful expression of unity in faith and sacramental life.

3. Scripture, Exegesis, Criteria

The Christian East took a longer time than the West in settling on an agreed canon of Scripture. The principal hesitations concerned the books of the Old Testament which are not contained in the Hebrew Canon ("shorter" canon) and the Book of Revelation in the New Testament. Fourth-century conciliar and patristic authorities in the East differ in their attitude concerning the exact authority of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Esther, Judith, and Tobit. Athanasius in his famous Paschal Letter 39 excludes them from Scripture proper, but considers them useful for catechumens, an opinion which he shares with Cyril of Jerusalem. Canon 60 of the Council of Laodicea—whether authentic or not—also reflects the tradition of a "shorter" canon. But the Quinisext Council (692) endorses the authority of Apostolic Canon 85, which admits some books of the "longer" canon, including even 3 Maccabees, but omits Wisdom, Tobit, and Judith. John of Damascus (ca. 753), however, considers Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus as "admirable," yet fails to include them in the canon.² Therefore, in spite of the fact that Byzantine patristic and ecclesiastical tradition almost exclusively uses the Septuagint as the standard Biblical text, and that parts of the "longer" canon especially Wisdom are of frequent liturgical use, Byzantine theologians remain faithful to a "Hebrew" criterion for Old Testament literature, which excludes texts originally composed in Greek. Modern Orthodox theology is consistent with this unresolved polarity when it distinguishes between "canonical" and "deuterocanonical" literature of the Old Testament, applying the first term only to the books of the "shorter" canon.

Among the writings of the New Testament, the Book of Revelation was accepted into the canon only with reluctance. It is omitted from the canon in the lists of the Council of Laodicea (canon 60), in Apostolic Canon 85, and by Cyril of Jerusalem.³ The commentators of the School of Antioch also ignore it, reflecting the view prevailing in the Church of Syria. In the Byzantine liturgical rite, which was dependent upon Syria and Palestine, Revelation is the only book of the New Testament which is never used for liturgical reading. The position of the School of Alexandria, however, expressed in particular by Athanasius and followed, in the eighth century, by John of Damascus, was finally endorsed by the Byzantine Church. After the sixth century, no one expressed any doubt about the canonicity of Revelation.

The written form of the apostolic message was always understood by the Byzantines in the framework of "apostolic tradition" the wider, living, and uninterrupted continuity of the apostolic Church. The famous sentence of Basil of Caesarea (379) on Scripture and Tradition can be considered to reflect the consensus of later Byzantine theologians: "We do not content ourselves with what was reported in Acts and in the Epistles [the term ho apostolos, translated here as "Acts and Epistles," designates the liturgical book containing all the New Testament writings, except the four Gospels and Revelation] and in the Gospels; but, both before and after reading them, we add other doctrines, received from oral teaching, and carrying much weight in the mystery [of the faith]." 4 The "other doctrines" which Basil mentions are, essentially, the liturgical and sacramental traditions which, together with the more conceptual consensus found in the continuity of Greek patristic theology, always served in Byzantium as a living framework for the understanding of Scripture.

In exegetical methods as in their theory of knowledge, the Byzantines accepted the patristic criterion set in the fourth and fifth centuries. By harmonizing the fundamental ideas of the Cappadocian Fathers on the Trinity with the Christological thought of the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries, John of Damascus could compose his De fide orthodoxa, which would serve as a theological textbook during the following period. Other, less imaginative authors composed even more simple florilegia of patristic quotations, or "panoplies" refuting all heresies. Much of Byzantine theological literature is of a strictly anthological nature. Still, a living theology also developed, especially in monastic circles.

In any attempt to review the major doctrinal themes of Byzantine theology, constant reference to the Fathers of the classical period is unavoidable, for they served as the major traditional authorities for the Byzantines. Yet in acknowledging that in the Church every Christian, and the saint in particular, possesses the privilege and opportunity of seeing and experiencing the truth, the same Byzantines presupposed a concept of Revelation which was substantially different from that held in the West. Because the concept of theologia in Byzantium, as with the Cappadocian Fathers, was inseparable from theoria ("contemplation"), theology could not be as it was in the West a rational deduction from "revealed" premisses, i.e., from Scripture or from the statements of an ecclesiastical magisterium; rather, it was a vision experienced by the saints, whose authenticity was, of course, to be checked against the witness of Scripture and Tradition. Not that a rational deductive process was completely eliminated from theological thought; but it represented for the Byzantines the lowest and least reliable level of theology. The true theologian was the one who saw and experienced the content of his theology; and this experience was considered to belong not to the intellect alone (although the intellect was not excluded from its perception), but to the "eyes of the Spirit," which place the whole man in intellect, emotions, and even senses in contact with divine existence. This was the initial content of the debate between Gregory Palamas and Barlaam the Calabrian, which started the theological controversies of the fourteenth century (1337-1340).

Revelation, therefore, was limited neither to the written documents of Scripture nor to conciliar definitions, but was directly accessible, as a living truth, to a human experience of God's presence in His Church. This possibility of an immediate contact with God has been seen by some historians of Eastern Christian thought as a form of Messalianism, a term which, since the fourth century, has designated an anti-hierarchical and anti-sacramental monastic sect repeatedly condemned by the councils. But the mainstream of Eastern Christian gnosiology, which indeed affirms the possibility of direct experience of God, is precisely founded upon a sacramental, and therefore hierarchically structured, ecclesiology, which gives a Christological and pneumatological basis to personal experience and presupposes that Christian theology must always be consistent with the apostolic and patristic witness.

This experiential character of revelation has a direct bearing on the notion of "development": Byzantine theologians generally took it for granted that new revelations could never be added to the unique witness of the apostles. Precisely because their understanding of the Truth was not conceptual, the theologians could not admit either that Truth was expressed by the New Testament writings in a verbally and conceptually exhaustive manner, or that the experience of the Fathers and of the saints could enrich the content of the apostolic faith.

Nothing new could be learned about Christ and salvation beyond what the apostles "have heard, have seen with their eyes, have looked upon and touched with their hands, concerning the word of life" (1 Jn 1:1). The experience of the saints would be fundamentally identical with that of the apostles: the notions of "development" or "growth" could be applied only to the human appropriation of divine Truth, not to Truth itself, and, of course, to the conceptual elaboration of Church doctrine, or to the refutation of heresies.

In Jesus Christ, therefore, the fullness of Truth was revealed once and for all. To this revelation the apostolic message bears witness, through written word or oral tradition; but, in their God-given freedom, men can experience it to various degrees and in various forms. The world to which this witness is announced continually raises new challenges and new problems. The very complexity of the human being; the reluctance of the Byzantine Christian mind to reduce theology to one particular form of human appropriation the intellectual; the character of the New Testament message, concerned not with abstract truths, but with a Person; the absence in the Byzantine Church of a permanent, infallible criterion of truth: all these elements contributed, in Byzantium, to an understanding of Christianity as a living experience, for whose integrity and authenticity the sacramental structure of the Church is certainly responsible, but whose living content is carried on, from generation to generation, by the entire community of the Church.

These same elements also determined that the evolution of theology in the Byzantine Church could only have been a slow and organic process, requiring a tacit agreement of the entire body of the hierarchy and the faithful. No significant changes of theology or of Church polity could ever be imposed by Church authority alone; and when such attempts were made, they resulted either in failure or in prolonged resistance or even in schism.

Thus, the experiential nature of theology produced a theological conservatism (not a subjectivism, as one might expect if one misunderstands experience for individualistic mysticism) because the experience of the saints and all Christians are called to be saints was always understood as necessarily identical with that of the apostles and the Fathers. Actually, the unity of the Church in time and in space was conceived as experiential unity in the one Christ, to whom the apostles witnessed in the past and whom all generations will contemplate again when He comes in power on the last day.

But if there is no development in the content of the faith, i.e., in the person of Christ, always identical with Himself but only in its formulations and in its relatedness to the changing world, what was the significance for the Byzantines of doctrinal definitions and conciliar statements? Their very text gives the answer: all the ecumenical councils, beginning with Ephesus (431) the first whose minutes are preserved emphasize explicitly that doctrinal definitions are not ends in themselves, and that the council fathers reluctantly proceed to define issues of doctrine only to exclude the wrong interpretations proposed by heretics. The most famous of the conciliar definitions, that of the Council of Chalcedon, is also most explicit in this regard. The conciliar decree begins with a solemn reaffirmation of the creeds of Nicaea and of Nicaea-Constantinople, and proceeds to declare, in reference to the latter:

This wise and salutary formula of divine grace sufficed for the perfect knowledge and confirmation of religion; for it teaches the perfect doctrine concerning Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and sets forth the Incarnation of the Lord to those who faithfully receive it. But, inasmuch as persons undertaking to nullify the preaching of the truth have through their individual heresies given rise to empty babblings . . . this present holy, great, and ecumenical council, desiring to exclude every device against the Truth, and teaching that which is unchanged from the beginning, has at the very outset decreed that the faith of the 318 fathers [of Nicaea] shall be preserved inviolate. 5

The definition on the two natures of Christ, which follows that preamble, is thus considered simply as a means to protect what had already been said at Nicaea. It actually starts again with the standard formula "Following the holy fathers. . . ." Identical formulae are used by all the Byzantine councils in the succeeding period.

The really important implication of this attitude concerns the very notion of Truth, which is conceived, by the Byzantines, not as a concept which can be expressed adequately in words or developed rationally, but as God Himself personally present and met in the Church in His very personal identity. Not Scripture, not conciliar definitions, not theology can express Him fully; each can only point to some aspects of His existence, or exclude wrong interpretations of His being or acts. No human language, however, is fully adequate to Truth itself, nor can it exhaust it. Consequently, Scripture and the Church's magisterium cannot be considered as the only "sources" of theology. Orthodox theology cannot fail to check its consistency with them, of course, but the true theologian is free to express his own immediate encounter with the Truth. This is the authentic message maintained most explicitly by the Byzantine "mystical" tradition of Maximus the Confessor, Symeon the New Theologian, and Gregory Palamas.

4. Theology, Positive and Negative

The whole of Byzantine theology and particularly its "experiential" character would be completely misunderstood if one forgets its other pole of reference: apophatic, or negative, theology.

Usually associated with the name of the mysterious sixth-century author of the Areopagitica, the form of apophaticism which will dominate Byzantine thought is, in fact, already fully developed in the fourth century in the writings of the Cappadocian Fathers against Eunomios. Rejecting the Eunomian view that the human mind can reach the very essence of God, they affirm the absolute transcendence of God and exclude any possibility of identifying Him with any human concept. By saying what God is not, the theologian is really speaking the Truth, for no human word or thought is capable of comprehending what God is. The ascent of the human soul to God is thus described by Gregory of Nyssa as a process of elimination which, however, never truly reaches a positive end:

[The soul] rises afresh and in the spirit passes through the intelligible and hypercosmic world . . . ; it passes through the assembly of celestial beings, looking to see if its Beloved is among them. In its quest it passes through the whole angelic world and when it does not find the One it seeks among the blessed ones it encounters, it says to itself: "Can any of these at least comprehend the One whom I love?" But they hold their tongues at this question, and by their silence make him realize that the One whom he seeks is inaccessible even to them. Then, having by the action of the Spirit passed through the whole of the hypercosmic city, having failed to recognize the One he desires among intelligible and incorporeal beings, and abandoning all that he finds, he recognizes the One he is seeking as the only One he does not comprehend. 6

The process of elimination is, therefore, a necessary stage in the knowledge of God. It is an intellectual process, but also a spiritual purification (katharsis) which discards all forms of identifying God with that which is not God i.e., all idolatry. But the paradox is that, by itself, the process does not allow man to know God, except as the Unknowable and Incomprehensible, even if the experience of this transcendence is itself a positive Christian experience. On this point, orthodox patristic tradition is clearly distinct from both the Gnostic and the Neoplatonic traditions, represented in Christianity by Clement of Alexandria and by Origen. Neoplatonic thought had affirmed the inaccessibility of God to the human mind, but viewed this inaccessibility as the result of the fallen character of the soul and, in particular, of its union with a material body. When the mind returns to its original and natural state where God wants it to be it is indeed united, according to Origen, with the divine essence itself: its ascent reaches a definite end in perfection, knowledge, and blessedness. But at this point Origen's God ceases to be the absolute Other, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, and becomes the god of the philosophers. And for this reason Gregory of Nyssa, who otherwise tasted so much of the charms of Origenism, affirms that God is inaccessible even to celestial beings.

The Greek Fathers affirm in their apophatic theology, not only that God is above human language and reason because of man's fallen inadequacy, but that He is inaccessible in Himself. Human knowledge concerns only "beings," i.e., the level of created existence. On this level, therefore, it can be said that "God does not exist." For the pseudo-Dionysius, God is "non-being" (me on). This is the theme of the famous Chapter 5 of Dionysius' Mystical Theology.⁷ The Plotinian concepts of the "monad" which Origen had applied to God⁸ are for pseudo-Dionysius quite irrelevant to a description of God's existence. God, he writes, is "neither the One, nor Unity."⁹

Byzantine theologians were fully aware of the fact that "negative" theology was known to Neoplatonic thought as an intellectual method of approaching the mystery of God, and that it did not necessarily imply that God was absolutely unknowable in Himself. Barlaam the Calabrian made the point clear when he wrote:

If you want to know whether the Greeks understood that the superessential and anonymous Good transcends intelligence, science, and all other achievement, read the works of the PythagoreansPantaenetus, Brotinos, Philolaos, Charmidas, and Philoxenoswhich are devoted to that subject; there you will find the same expressions as the great Dionysius employs in his Mystical Theology. . . . Plato too understood divine transcendence. 10

And Gregory Palamas in fact agrees with Barlaam when he recognizes that monotheism and the concept of God as a philosophical Absolute were accepted by the pagans, and that "apophatic theology necessarily follows from this."¹¹ But the formal, intellectual "apophatism" of the Greek philosophers differs from the Biblical notion of transcendence, for transcendence leads to a positive meeting with the Unknown, as the Living God, to a "contemplation greater than knowledge."¹² Christian theology is based on this notion.

A possibility of experiencing God through means other than intellectual knowledge, emotion, or the senses stands behind the Greek patristic understanding of the Christian faith and theology. This means simply an opening of God, His existence outside of His own nature, His actions or "energies" through which He voluntarily reveals Himself to man, as well as a peculiar property of man, which permits him to reach outside of the created level. The meeting of God's love and "energy" and of man's capability of transcending himself is what makes an encounter possible, a "contemplation greater than knowledge" to which the Fathers refer as the "eyes of faith," "the Spirit," or, eventually, "deification."

Theology, therefore, may and should be based on Scripture, on the doctrinal decisions of the Church's magisterium, or on the witness of the saints. But to be a true theology, it must be able to reach beyond the letter of Scripture, beyond the formulae used in definitions, beyond the language employed by the saints to communicate their experience. For only then will it be able to discern the unity of Revelation, a unity which is not simply an intellectual coherence and consistency, but a living reality experienced in the continuity of the one Church throughout the ages: the Holy Spirit is the only guarantor and guardian of this continuity; no external criterion which would be required for man's created perception or intellection would be sufficient.

Thus Byzantium never knew any conflict, not even a polarization between theology and what the West calls "mysticism." Indeed, the whole of Eastern Christian theology has often been called "mystical." The term is truly correct, provided one remember that in Byzantium "mystical" knowledge does not imply emotional individualism, but quite the opposite: a continuous communion with the Spirit who dwells in the whole Church. It implies as well the constant recognition of the inadequacies of the human intellect and of human language to express the fullness of truth, and the constant balancing of positive theological affirmations about God with the corrective of apophatic theology. Finally, it presupposes an "I-Thou" relationship with God i.e., not knowledge only, but love.

Commenting upon Ecclesiastes 3:7 "a time to keep silence, and a time to speak" Gregory of Nyssa suggests to the theologian that

In speaking of God, when there is question of His essence, then is the time to keep silence. When, however, it is a question of His operation, a knowledge of which can come down even to us, that is the time to speak of His omnipotence by telling of His works and explaining His deeds, and to use words to this extent. In matters which go beyond this, however, the creature must not exceed the bounds of its nature, but must be content to know itself. For, indeed, in my view, if the creature never comes to know itself, never understands the essence of the soul or the nature of the body, the cause of being . . . , if the creature does not know itself, how can it ever explain things which are beyond it? Of such things it is the time to keep silence; here silence is surely better. There is, however, a time to speak of those things by which we can in our lives make progress in virtue. 13

The character and method of Byzantine theology are determined, therefore, by the problem of the relationship between God and the world, between creator and creation, and involve an anthropology, which finds its ultimate key in Christology. This unavoidable sequence will determine the subjects of the following chapters.

Notes

1. Epanagoge tou nomou, 9th C., III, 8, ed. C. E. Zachariae von Lingenthal, in J. Zepos, P. Zepos, Jus Graecoromanum, 2 (Athens, 1931), p. 242.
2. John of Damascus, De fide orthodoxa, IV, 17; PG 94:1180_{BC}.
3. Cyril of Jerusalem, Horn. cat., 4, 36; PG 33:500_{BC}.
4. Basil of Caesarea, On the Holy Spirit, 27; ed. B. Pruche, Sources Chrétiennes 17 (Paris, 1945), p. 234.
5. Chalcedon, Definitio fidei, Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta (Bologna: Istituto per le Scienze Religiose, 1973), p. 84.
6. Gregory of Nyssa, In Cant. or. VI; ed. W. Jaeger (Leiden: Brill, 1960), 6:182; PG 44:893_B.
7. PG 3:1045_D-1048_B.
8. Origen, De princ., I, 1, 6. Ed. B. Koetschau, GCS, 22.
9. Pseudo-Dionysius, Mystical Theology; PG 3:1048_A.

10. Barlaam the Calabrian, Second Letter to Palamas, ed. G. Schiro, Barlaam Calabro: epistole (Palermo, 1954), pp. 298-299.
11. Gregory Palamas, Triads, II, 3, 67; ed. J. Meyendorff (Louvain: Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense, 1959), p. 527.
12. Ibid., 53; p. 493.
13. Gregory of Nyssa, Commentary on Ec., sermon 7; PG 44:732_D; ed. W. Jaeger (Leiden: Brill, 1962) 5:415-416; trans. H. Musurillo in From Glory to Glory: Texts from Gregory of Nyssa's Mystical Writings (New York: Scribner, 1961), p. 129.

I HISTORICAL TRENDS

1

Byzantine Theology After Chalcedon

Constantinople, the great cultural melting pot, the "New Rome" and capital of the empire, did not produce any really outstanding theologian in the fifth and sixth centuries; but the city witnessed the great theological debates of the day, since their conclusion often depended upon imperial sanction. Bishops, monks, exegetes, and philosophers, coming to the capital to seek favor and support, created around the episcopal see of the imperial city from which the government's theological advisers were usually drawn a convergence of ideas and a predisposition to syncretic, compromise solutions. The bishops of Constantinople and their staffs, however, were still able to defend explicit theological convictions, even against the imperial will, as the lonely pro-Chalcedonian stand adopted by the patriarchs Euphemius (489-495) and Macedonius II (495-511), under the reign of the Monophysite emperor Anastasius, bears witness. Thus, a theology which can be termed specifically "Byzantine," in contrast to the earlier currents of Eastern Christian thought centered mainly in Egypt and Syria, comes into being during the post-Chalcedonian period. It would receive official sanction under Justinian (527-565) and expression in the balanced synthesis of Maximus the Confessor (662).

It would seem that no individual figure played a decisive role in the formation of this theology, and one is equally hard-pressed to locate any school or other intellectual center in the capital where theological thought was creatively elaborated. Though it seems reasonable to assume that a theological school for the training of higher ecclesiastical personnel was connected with the patriarchate, sources about its character or the level of its teaching are wanting. A center of theological learning is attested at the famous monastery of the Akoimetai (the "Non-Sleepers"), and others certainly existed elsewhere, but very little is specifically known about them. Theologians who were active during the fifth and sixth centuries often received their training in distant parts of the empire, such as Syria or Palestine. The Lavra of St. Sabbas near Jerusalem, for example, was the scene of violent debates between competing Origenist factions.

The imperial, secular University of Constantinople, founded by Constantine and reorganized by a decree of Theodosius II (408-450), did not include theology among its subjects; yet it certainly served as a channel for the perpetuation of ancient Greek philosophical ideas. The university remained bilingual (Greek and Latin) until the seventh century and, until the reign of Justinian, included pagans among its professors. But the drastic measures taken by Justinian, in excluding both pagans and non-Orthodox Christians from the teaching profession and in dosing the pagan University of Athens, must have emphasized that the role of secular studies in Christian Byzantium was purely ancillary. Even if a small circle of intellectuals perpetuated the philosophical traditions of the ancient Greeks, the official position of both Church and state now considered philosophy as at best a tool for expressing Revelation, but it never admitted that philosophy was entitled to shape the very content of theological ideas. In practice, one might readily admit that Aristotelian logic be taught in the schools, but one would be consistently distrustful of Platonism because of its metaphysical implications. Yet Platonism would subsist, mainly through patristic literature, and especially through the Origenist tradition; but it would never be formally acknowledged as a valid expression of religious ideas.

Conservative in form and intent, Byzantine theology in the age of Justinian continually referred to tradition as its main source. The Christological debates of the period, in particular, consisted chiefly of a battle between exegetes of Scripture, about philosophical terms adopted by Christian theology in the third and fourth centuries, and about patristic texts making use of these terms. Liturgical hymnology, which began to flourish at this time, incorporated the results of the controversies and often became a form of credal confession. The various elements of Byzantine theological traditionalism dominant in the fifth and sixth centuries constituted the basis of further creativity in the later periods, and require very special attention.

1. Exegetical Traditions

It is necessary for those who preside over the churches . . . to teach all the clergy and the people . . . , collecting out of divine Scripture the thoughts and judgments of truth, but not exceeding the limits now fixed, nor varying from the tradition of the God-fearing Fathers. But if any issue arises concerning Scripture, it should not be interpreted other than as the luminaries and teachers of the Church have expounded it in their writings; let them [the bishops] become distinguished for their knowledge of patristic writings rather than for composing treatises out of their own heads.

This text of Canon 19 of the Council in Trullo (692) reflects the traditionalist and conservative character of the Byzantine approach to theology and to exegesis in particular, and explains the presence, in all monastic and private libraries of Byzantium, of innumerable copies of patristic catenae, "chains" of authoritative interpretations of particular Biblical texts, expressing, or claiming to express, the continuity of exegetical tradition.

Even though the consensus patrum reached by this method was in some instances partial and artificial, the standard Church teaching came to rely on it, especially when it was sanctified by liturgical and hymnographical usage. The Bible was always understood not simply as a source of revealed doctrinal propositions, or as a description of historical facts, but as a witness to a living Truth which had become dynamically present in the sacramental community of the New Testament Church. The veneration of the Virgin, Mother of God, for example, was associated once and for all with a typo-logical interpretation of the Old Testament temple cult: the one who carried God in her womb was the true "temple," the true "tabernacle," the "candlestick," and God's final "abode." Thus, a Byzantine who, on the eve of a Marian feast, listened in church to a reading from the Book of Proverbs about "Wisdom building her house" (Pr 9:1ff.) naturally, and almost exclusively, thought of the "Word becoming flesh" i.e., finding His abode in the Virgin. The identification of the Old Testament Wisdom with the Johannine Logos had been taken for granted since the time of Origen, and no one would have thought of challenging it. As early as the fourth century, when much of the Arian debate centered on the famous text "The Lord created me at the beginning of his works" (Pr 8:22), it was quite naturally interpreted by the Arians in favor of their position. Athanasius, and other members of the Nicæan party, declined to challenge the identification between Logos and Wisdom, preferring to find references to other texts supporting the uncreated character of the Logos-Wisdom. No one questioned the established exegetical consensus on the identification itself.

Much of the accepted Byzantine exegetical method had its origin in Alexandrian tradition and its allegorism. St. Paul, in describing the story of Abraham's two sons as an allegory of the two covenants (Ga 4:23), gave Christian sanction to a non-literal method of interpreting Scripture, known as midrash, which had developed among Palestinian rabbis in pre-Christian times. Thus, in pushing the allegorical method of interpreting Scripture to its very extremes, the Alexandrian Hellenistic milieu, common to Philo, Clement, and Origen, could refer to the illustrious precedent of St. Paul himself. Allegory was, first of all, consonant with the Hellenic, and especially the Platonic, concern for eternal things as opposed to historical facts. The Greek intellectual's main difficulty in accepting Christianity often lay in the absence of direct speculation on the Unchangeable, since his philosophical training had led him to associate changeability with unreality. The allegorical method, however, allowed the possibility of interpreting all concrete, changeable facts as symbols of unchangeable realities. History itself was thus losing its centrality and, in extreme cases, was simply denied.

But consonance with Hellenism was not the only element which contributed to the widespread use of allegory in exegesis. The method provided an easy weapon against Gnosticism, the main challenge to Christianity in the second century. The major Gnostic systems especially those of Valentinus and Marcion opposed the Demiurge, the Yahweh of Judaism, to the true God manifested in the New Testament. Christian apologists used allegory to "redeem" the Old Testament and counteracted the Gnostic dualism with the idea that the Old and the New Testaments have one and the same "spiritual" meaning and reflect a continuous Revelation of the same true God.

Origen also made use of this concept of the "spiritual meaning" in his notion of Tradition. The Spirit which had inspired the Biblical writers was also present in the "spiritual men" of the Christian Church. The saint alone, therefore, could decipher the authentic meaning of Scripture.

The Scriptures [Origen writes] were composed through the Spirit of God and they have not only that meaning which is obvious, but also another which is hidden from the majority of readers. For the contents of Scripture are the outward forms of certain mysteries and the images of divine things. On this point the entire Church is unanimous, that while the whole Law is spiritual, the inspired meaning is not recognized by all, but only by those who are gifted with the grace of the Holy Spirit in the word of wisdom and knowledge. 1

Although it raises the important problem of authority in exegesis, this passage certainly expresses a view largely taken for granted in medieval Byzantine Christendom, and explains the concern for a consensus patrum, expressed in a formal way in the canon of the Council in Trullo quoted at the beginning of this section.

In addition to Alexandrian allegorism, the Byzantine tradition of exegesis incorporated the more sober influence of the School of Antioch. The opposition between Alexandria and Antioch which found a well-known and violent expression in the Christological debates of the fifth century should not be exaggerated on the level of exegesis. The chief minds of the Antiochian school Diodore of Tarsus (ca. 330-ca. 390), Theodore of Mopsuestia (ca. 350-428), and Theodoret of Cyrus (ca. 393-ca. 466) did not deny the possibility of a spiritual meaning in Biblical texts; yet they reacted strongly against the elimination of the literal, historical meaning and against an arbitrary allegorism based on Platonic philosophical presuppositions foreign to the Bible. Thus, the notion of theoria ("contemplation"), which implies the possibility of discovering a spiritual meaning behind the letter of the text, was not rejected, but the emphasis was placed upon what actually happened or was said historically, as well as upon the moral or theological implications of the text.

The theological authority of the School of Antioch was shattered by the condemnation of Nestorius, a pupil of Theodore of Mopsuestia, at Ephesus in 431, and by the anathemas against the Three Chapters (Theodore of Mopsuestia, and the anti-Cyrrillian writings of Theodoret of Cyrus and Ibas of Edessa) pronounced by the Second Council of Constantinople in 553. After 553, the scriptural commentaries of Theodore, one of the greatest exegetes of early Christianity, could be preserved only clandestinely in Syriac or Armenian translations, while the Greek original survived only in fragments scattered in the catenae. But the tradition of Antiochian exegesis survived in the exegetical works of Theodoret, which were never prohibited, and even more so in the writings of Theodore's friend John Chrysostom, by far the most popular of all Greek ecclesiastical writers. His definition of typology, as opposed to allegory, as "a prophecy expressed in terms of facts" ² and his concern for history served as safeguards against the spiritualizing excesses of the Alexandrian tradition in late-Byzantine exegetical literature, while still leaving room for theoria, i.e., fundamentally a Christ-oriented typological interpretation of the Old Testament.

2. Philosophical Trends

The philosophical trends in post-Chalcedonian Byzantium were determined by three major factors: (1) the patristic tradition and its implications—the transfer, for example, of the Cappadocian Trinitarian terminology to the problem of the hypostatic union of the two natures in Christ; (2) the ever-reviving Origenism with its implied challenge to the Biblical doctrine of creation and to Biblical anthropology; (3) the continuing influence of non-Christian Neoplatonism upon intellectuals (Justinian's closing of the University of Athens put a physical end to a center of thought and learning, only recently adorned by the last major figure of pagan Greek philosophy, Proclus [410-485]). In all three cases the basic issue implied was the relation between ancient Greek thought and Christian Revelation.

Some modern historians continue to pass very divergent judgments on the philosophy of the Greek Fathers. In his well-known Histoire de la philosophie, Emile Bréhier writes: "In the first five centuries of Christianity, there was nothing which could properly be called Christian philosophy and which would imply a scale of intellectual values either original or different from that of the pagan thinkers."³ According to Bréhier, Christianity and Hellenic philosophy are not opposed to each other as two intellectual systems, for Christianity is based on revealed facts, not on philosophical ideas. The Greek Fathers, in accepting these facts, adopted everything in Greek philosophy which was compatible with Christian Revelation. No new philosophy could result from such an artificial juxtaposition. A seemingly opposite view, more in line with the classical appraisal of Adolf Harnack, has been expressed by H. A. Wolfson whose book on The Philosophy of the Church Fathers presents the thought of the Fathers as "a recasting of Christian beliefs in the form of a philosophy [which] thereby produc[ed] also a Christian version of Greek philosophy." ⁴ Finally, the monumental work of Claude Tresmontant La Métaphysique du Christianisme et la naissance de la philosophie chrétienne (Paris: Editions du Seuil, 1961) strongly maintains the historical existence of a Christian philosophy which the Fathers consistently defended against the Hellenic synthesis. This philosophy implies basic affirmations on creation, on unity and multiplicity, on knowledge, freedom, and so on, incompatible with Hellenism, and is fundamentally Biblical. "From the point of view of metaphysics," he writes, "Christian orthodoxy is defined by its fidelity to the metaphysical principles found in Biblical theology."⁵ Therefore, if the Greek Fathers were orthodox, they were not, properly speaking, "Greek." Actually, in modern historical and theological writing, there is no term more ambiguous than "Hellenism." Thus, Georges Florovsky makes a persistent plea for "Christian Hellenism," meaning by the term the tradition of the Eastern Fathers as opposed to Western medieval thought,⁶ but he agrees fundamentally with Tresmontant on the total incompatibility between Greek philosophical thought and the Bible, especially on such basic issues as creation and freedom.⁷

Therefore, Tresmontant's and Florovsky's conclusions appear to be fundamentally correct, and the usual slogans and clichés which too often serve to characterize patristic and Byzantine thought as exalted "Christian Hellenism," or as the "Hellenization of Christianity," or as Eastern "Platonism" as opposed to Western "Aristotelianism" should be avoided.

A more constructive method of approaching the issue and of establishing a balanced judgment consists in a preliminary distinction between the systems of ancient Greek philosophy the Platonic, the Aristotelian, or the Neoplatonic and individual concepts or terms. The use of Greek concepts and terminology was an unavoidable means of communication and a necessary step in making the Christian Gospel relevant to the world in which it appeared and in which it had to expand. But the Trinitarian terminology of the Cappadocian Fathers, and its later application to Christology in the Chalcedonian and post-Chalcedonian periods, clearly show that such concepts as ousia, hypostasis, or physis acquire an entirely new meaning when used out of the context of the Platonic or Aristotelian systems in which they were born. Three hypostases united in one "essence" (ousia), or two "natures" (physeis) united in one hypostasis, cannot be a part of either the Platonic or Aristotelian systems of thought, and imply new personalistic (and therefore non-Hellenic) metaphysical presuppositions. Still the Trinitarian and Christological synthesis of the Cappadocian Fathers would have dealt with a different set of problems and would have resulted in different concepts if the background of the Cappadocians and the audience to which they addressed themselves had not been Greek. Thus, Greek patristic thought remained open to Greek philosophical problematics, but avoided being imprisoned in Hellenic philosophical systems. From Gregory of Nazianzus in the fourth century to Gregory Palamas in the fourteenth, the representatives of the Orthodox tradition all express their conviction that heresies are based upon the uncritical absorption of pagan Greek philosophy into Christian thought.

Among the major figures of early Christian literature, only Origen, Nemesis of Emesa, and pseudo-Dionysius present systems of thought which can truly be defined as Christian versions of Greek philosophy. Others, including even such system-builders as Gregory of Nyssa and Maximus the Confessor, in spite of their obvious philosophical mentality, stand too fundamentally in opposition to pagan Hellenism on the basic issues of creation and freedom to qualify as Greek philosophers. Origen and pseudo-Dionysius suffered quite a distinct posthumous fate which will be discussed later, but the influence of Nemesis and of his Platonic anthropological "system" was so limited in Byzantium, in contrast to its widespread impact on Western medieval thought, that the Latin translation of his work Peri physeos anthropou (De natura hominis) was attributed to Gregory of Nyssa. 8

Thus, as most historians of Byzantine theology will admit, the problem of the relationship between philosophy and the facts of Christian experience remained at the center of the theological thought of Byzantium, and no safe and permanent balance between them has ever been found. But is such a balance really possible if "this world" and its "wisdom" are really in permanent tension with the realities of the kingdom of God?

3. The Problem of Origenism

Recent research has cast a completely new light on the history of Origenism in the fifth and sixth centuries. The publication of the works of Evagrius Ponticus, in particular, has clarified the issues which divided rival monastic parties in Egypt, in Palestine, and in other areas of Eastern Christendom.

While the Trinitarian problematics of Origen served as one of the starting points for the Arian controversies of the fourth century, his views on creation, the Fall, man, and God-man relations fascinated the first Greek intellectuals to the point of inducing them to join the monastic movement. In his system, monastic asceticism and spirituality find a justification, but contradict the basic presuppositions of Biblical Christianity. As a result, Origen and his disciple Evagrius were condemned in 400 by Theophilus of Alexandria and in 553 at Constantinople II. But even these condemnations did not preclude the lasting influence of their systems, which served as background for the integrated Christian philosophy of Maximus the Confessor. Origenism thus remained at the center of the theological thought of post-Chalcedonian Eastern Christianity, and its influence on spirituality and theological terminology did not end with the condemnation of the Origenistic system in 553, but continued at least until the iconoclastic crisis of the eighth century.

Origen was undoubtedly the most successful of the early apologists of Christianity. His system made the Christian religion acceptable to Neoplatonists, but the acceptance of Christianity on Origenistic terms does not necessarily imply the rejection of the basic Neoplatonic concepts of God and of the world. If the Cappadocian Fathers, for example, after reading Origen in their student years, were finally led to orthodox Christianity, others, such as their friend and contemporary Evagrius Ponticus, developed Origenism in quite a different direction.

In his famous De principiis, Origen first postulates creation as an eternal act of God. God has always been the all-powerful Creator, and "we cannot even call God almighty if there are none over whom He can exercise His power." ⁹ But since Origen is very careful to refute the Aristotelian doctrine of the eternity of matter, he maintains that the ever-existing created world is a world of "intellects," not of matter. The basic Platonizing spiritualism implied here will always appeal to monastic circles looking for a metaphysical justification of asceticism. The next step in Origen's thought is to consider that the "intellectual" world, which includes "all rational natures" that is, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, the Angels, the Powers, the Dominions, and other Virtues, as well as man himself in the dignity of his soul are one unique substance." ¹⁰ Later patristic tradition will oppose to this idea the notion of the absolute transcendence of God expressed in apophatic theology, but for Origen the monistic structure encompassing God and the "intellects" in one single substance is broken only by the Fall. Misusing their "freedom," the intellects committed the sin of revolting against God. Some sinned heavily, and became demons; others sinned less, and became angels; others still less, and became archangels. Thus each received a condition proportionate to its own sin. The remaining souls committed sins neither heavy enough to rank with the demons nor light enough to become angels, and so it was that God created the present world, linking the soul with a body as a punishment.¹¹ The present visible world, which includes man understood as an intellect transformed through sin into a body is the result of the Fall; man's ultimate destiny is dematerialization and a return to a union with God's substance.

Evagrius Ponticus significantly developed this Origenistic system by applying it to Christology. According to Evagrius, Jesus Christ was not the Logos taking flesh, but only an "intellect" who had not committed the original sin and, thus, was not involved in the catastrophe of materialization. He assumed a body in order to show the way toward a restoration of man's original union with God. 12 Around this teaching of Evagrius', serious conflicts, which lasted until the reign of Justinian, arose between feuding monastic parties. At the center of these disturbances, the Lavra of St. Sabbas in Palestine, some monks claimed to be "equal to Christ" (isochristoi), since in them, through prayer and contemplation, the original relationship with God, which also existed in Christ, had been restored. This extreme and obviously heretical form of Origenism was condemned first by imperial decree, then by the ecumenical council of 553. The writings of Origen and Evagrius were destroyed, to be preserved only partially in Latin or Syriac translations, or protected by pseudonyms. Ancient Hellenism had to give way once again to the basic principles of Biblical Christianity.

4. Pseudo-Dionysius

The condemnation of Origen and Evagrius did not mean, however, the total disappearance of the Platonic world-view from Byzantine Christianity. The Hellenic concept of the world as "order" and "hierarchy," the strict Platonic division between the "intelligible" and the "sensible" worlds, and the Neoplatonic grouping of beings into "triads" reappear in the famous writings of a mysterious early-sixth-century author who wrote under the pseudonym of Dionysius the Areopagite. The quasi-apostolic authority of this unknown author went unchallenged in both East and West throughout the Middle Ages.

Historians of Eastern Christian thought usually emphasize the role of Dionysius together with that of Gregory of Nyssa and of Maximus the Confessor in expounding apophatic theology. According to Vladimir Lossky, Dionysius, far from being "a Platonist with a tinge of Christianity," is the very opposite: "a Christian thinker disguised as a Neoplatonist, a theologian very much aware of his task, which was to conquer the ground held by Neoplatonism by becoming a master of its philosophical method."¹³ And, indeed, several elements of Dionysius' thought appear as successful Christian counterparts both to Neoplatonic and to Origenistic positions. Dionysius specifically rejects Origen's notion of the knowledge of God "by essence," since there cannot be "knowledge" of God. For knowledge can apply only to "beings," and God is above being and superior to all opposition between being and non-being. With God, there can be a "union," however: the supreme end of human existence; but this union is "ignorance" rather than knowledge, for it presupposes detachment from all activity of the senses or of the intellect, since the intellect is applicable only to created existence. God, therefore, is absolutely transcendent and above existence, and as long as one remains in the categories of existence can be described only in negative terms.¹⁴ God does, however, make Himself known outside of His transcendent nature: "God is manifested by His 'powers' in all beings, is multiplied without abandoning His unity." 15 Thus, the concepts of beauty, being, goodness, and the like, reflect God, but not His essence, only His "powers" and "energies"¹⁶ which are not, however, a diminished form of deity, or mere emanations, but themselves fully God, in whom created beings can participate in the proportion and analogy proper to each. Thus, the God of Dionysius is again the living God of the Bible and not the One of Plotinus, and, in this respect, Dionysius will provide the basis for further positive developments of Christian thought.

One must remember, however, that Dionysius' theology proper i.e., his doctrine of God and of the relationship between God and the world is not wholly original (in fact, its essential elements appear in the writings of the Cappadocian Fathers), and that, through his hierarchical view of the universe, Dionysius exercised a highly ambiguous influence, especially in the fields of ecclesiology and sacramental theology.

If, for Origen, the hierarchy of created beings—angels, men, demons—is the result of the Fall, for Dionysius it is an immovable and divine order through which one reaches "assimilation and union with God."¹⁷ The three "triads" or nine orders of the celestial hierarchy and the two "triads" of the ecclesiastical hierarchy are essentially a system of mediations. Each order participates in God "according to its capacity," but this participation is granted through the order immediately superior.¹⁸ The most obvious consequences of that system occur in the field of ecclesiology; for Dionysius, the ecclesiastical hierarchy, which includes the triads "bishops (hierarchs)-priests-deacons" and "monks-laymen-catechumens (sinners)," is nothing but an earthly reflection of the celestial orders; each ecclesiastical order, therefore, is a personal state, not a function in the community. "A hierarch," Dionysius writes, "is a deified and divine man, instructed in holy knowledge."¹⁹ And since the hierarchy is primarily a gnostic, or an initiator, there is fundamentally no difference between his role and that of a charismatic. The same applies, of course, to the other orders.²⁰

And, since Dionysius also holds very strictly to the Platonic divisions between the intellectual and material orders, the material being only a reflection and a symbol of the intellectual, his doctrine of the sacraments is both purely symbolic and individualistic; the function of the Eucharist, for example, is only to symbolize the union of the intellect with God and Christ.²¹

Our conclusion to these brief comments on Dionysius must be, therefore, that in areas where he transcends Neoplatonism the area of the theologia he is a real Christian, without, however, being truly original; but that his doctrine of the hierarchies, even if it represents a genuine attempt to integrate the Neoplatonic world-view into the Christian framework, is an obvious failure, the consequences of which have led to much confusion, especially in the fields of liturgy and of ecclesiological formulations. One wonders, too, if the Western Scholastic doctrine of the sacerdotal "character" and, to a lesser extent, the confusion, frequent in the Byzantine East, between the role of the ecclesiastical hierarchy and that of "holy men" do not go back ultimately to Dionysius.

5. Liturgy

The appearance of the Dionysian writings coincides chronologically with a turning point in the history of Christian liturgy. When Justinian closed the last pagan temples and schools, Christianity became unquestionably the religion of the masses of the empire. The Christian liturgy, originally conceived as the cult of small persecuted communities, now came to be celebrated in immense cathedrals such as the magnificent "Great Church," Hagia Sophia in Constantinople, one of the glories of Justinian's reign with thousands of worshippers in attendance. This completely new situation could not help but influence both the practice and the theology of the liturgy. The Eucharist, for example, could no longer really retain the external character of a community meal. The great mass of the people in attendance consisted of nominal Christians who could hardly meet the standard required of regular communicants. Starting with John Chrysostom, the clergy began to preach that preparation, fasting, and self-examination were the necessary prerequisites of communion, and emphasized the mysterious, eschatological elements of the sacrament. The eighth and ninth centuries witnessed such additions as the iconostasis-screen between the sanctuary and the congregation, and the use of the communion spoon, a means to avoid putting the sacramental elements into the hands of laymen. All these developments were aimed at protecting the mystery, but they resulted in separating the clergy from the faithful and in giving to the liturgy the aspect of a performance, rather than of a common action of the entire people of God.

The writings of pseudo-Dionysius contributed to the same trend. The author's ideas about God's grace descending upon the lower ranks of the hierarchy through the personal mediation of the hierarchs did much to shape new Byzantine liturgical forms, which he considered only as symbols revealing the mysteries to the eyes of the faithful. Appearances and disappearances of the celebrant, veiling and unveiling of the elements, opening and closing of the doors, and various gestures connected with the sacraments often originated in the rigid system of the hierarchical activity as described by Dionysius, and found ready acceptance in a Church otherwise concerned with preserving the mysterious character of the cult from profanation by the masses now filling the temples.

Fortunately Dionysian theology has had practically no effect upon such central texts as the baptismal prayer and the Eucharistic canons. It served principally to develop and explain the extremely rich fringes with which Byzantium now adorned the central sacramental actions of the Christian faith, without modifying its very heart, and thus leaving the door open to authentic liturgical and sacramental theology which would still inspire the mainstream of Byzantine spirituality.

Another very important liturgical development of the fifth and sixth centuries was the large-scale adoption of hymnography of a Hellenistic nature. In the early Christian communities, the Church hymnal was comprised of the psalter and some other poetic excerpts from Scripture, with relatively few newer hymns. In the fifth and sixth centuries, however, with the insistence on more liturgical solemnity (often copied from court ceremonial) in the great urban churches, and the unavoidable Hellenization of the Church, the influx of new poetry was inevitable.

This influx met strong opposition in monastic circles, which considered it improper to replace Biblical texts of the liturgy with human poetic compositions, but the resistance was not a lasting one. In fact, in the eighth and ninth centuries, the monks took the lead in hymnographical creativity.

But as early as the sixth century, the religious poetry of Romanos the Melode was regarded as revolutionary in Constantinople. The models of his poetry and music were generally localized in Syria where poetic religious compositions had already been popularized by Ephraem (373).

Born in Emesus, Romanos came to Constantinople under Anastasius (491-518) and soon attained great fame by composing his kontakia. Generally based upon a Biblical theme, or exalting a Biblical personality, the kontakion is essentially a metrical homily, recited or chanted by a cantor and accompanied by the entire congregation singing a simple refrain. It follows a uniform pattern beginning with a short prelude and followed by a series of poetic strophae.

Romanos' poetry generally relies on imagery and drama, and contains little or no theology; the Christological debates of the period, for example, are not at all reflected in his kontakia. Written in simple popular Greek, they must have played a tremendous role in bringing the themes of Biblical history to the masses; they undoubtedly strengthened profoundly that understanding of Christianity centered on the liturgy which became so characteristic of the Byzantines.

Some of Romanos' kontakia remain in the liturgical books in an abridged form, and the pattern which he established was reproduced, almost exactly, in the famous Akathistos hymnos, one of the most popular pieces of Byzantine hymnography. Although, as we shall see later, subsequent hymnographical patterns, formed in the monasteries, were quite different from those of Romanos, the work of the great melode of the sixth century played a central role in shaping Byzantine Christianity, as distinct from the Latin, the Syrian, the Egyptian, and the Armenian.

The cultural framework of Byzantine theology after Chalcedon was increasingly limited to the Greek-speaking world. The wealth of the various non-Greek traditions of early Christianity especially the Syrian and the Latin was less and less taken into account by the theologians of the imperial capital. One should remember, however, that, until the emergence of the twelfth-century revival of theology in the West, Constantinople remained the unquestioned intellectual center of Christendom, with very little competition. One understands therefore that it developed a sense of increasing, though regrettable, self-sufficiency.

Notes

1. Origen, De principiis, Praefatio 8; ed. B. Koetschau, GCS 22 (1913), 14.6-13; trans. G. W. Butterworth, On the First Principles (London: SPCK, 1936), p. 5.
2. John Chrysostom, De paenitentia, hom. 6, 4; PG 49:320.
3. Émile Bréhier, Histoire de la philosophie (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1931), II, 494.
4. H. A. Wolfson, The Philosophy of the Church Fathers (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1956), I, vi.
5. Claude Tresmontant, La Métaphysique du christianisme et la naissance de la philosophie chrétienne (Paris: du Scull, 1961), p. 23.
6. Georges Florovsky, "The Eastern Orthodox Church and the Ecumenical Movement," Theology Today 7 (April 1950), 74-76.
7. Georges Florovsky, "The Idea of Creation in Christian Philosophy," Eastern Church Quarterly 8 (1949), 53-77.
8. See Étienne Gilson, La philosophie au Moyen-Âge (2nd ed., Paris: Payot, 1952), pp. 72-77.
9. Origen, De principiis, I, 2, 10; ed. Koetschau, p. 42; trans.

Butterworth, p. 23.

10. Quoted by Jerome in Ep. 124, ad Avit., 15.

11. See anathemas of the Council of Constantinople (553) as given in F. Diekamp, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten im sechsten Jahrhundert und das fünfte allgemeine Concil (Münster, 1898), pp. 90-96.

12. The essential texts are found in A. Guillaumont, Les "Kephalaia Gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origénisme chez les Grecs et les Syriens (Paris: du Seuil, 1962), esp. pp. 156-160.

13. Vladimir Lossky, Vision of God (London: Faith Press, 1963), pp. 99-100.

14. Pseudo-Dionysius, Mystical Theology, V; PG 3:1045_D1048_A.

15. Lossky, Vision, p. 102.

16. See, chiefly, pseudo-Dionysius, On the Divine Names, II; PG 3:636ff.

17. Pseudo-Dionysius, On the Celestial Hierarchy, III, 2; PG 3:165_A.

18. See R. Roques, L'univers dionysien: Structure hiérarchique du monde selon le pseudo-Denys (Paris: Aubier, 1954), p. 98ff.

19. Pseudo-Dionysius, On the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, I, 3; PG 3:373_C.

20. See the analysis of Roques, L'univers dionysien, pp. 172ff.

21. Ibid., pp. 267, 269.

2

The Christological Issue

Throughout the millennium between the Council of Chalcedon and the fall of Constantinople, Byzantine theological thought was dominated by the Christological problem as it was defined in the dispute between Cyril and Nestorius and in the subsequent discussions and conciliar decrees. It must be remembered, however, that the central issue in these debates was the ultimate fate of man.

Western Christological thought, since the early Middle Ages, has been dominated by the Anselmian idea of redemption through "satisfaction"; the idea that Jesus offered to the Father a perfect and sufficient sacrifice, propitiatory for the sins of mankind, has been at the center of Christological speculation, playing a prominent role in modern historical research on the patristic age. The result is that Christology has been conceived as a topic in itself, clearly distinct from pneumatology and anthropology. But if one keeps in mind the Greek patristic notion that the true nature of man means life in God, realized once and for all, through the Holy Spirit, in the hypostatic union of the man Jesus with the Logos and made accessible to all men, through the same Holy Spirit, in the humanity of Christ, in His body, the Church, Christology acquires a new and universal dimension. It cannot be isolated any longer from either the doctrine of the Holy Spirit or the doctrine of man, and it becomes a key for the understanding of the Gospel as a whole.

The issue of "participation in God's life" and of "deification" stands as a necessary background to the clash between Alexandrian and Antiochian Christology in the fifth century. When the great exegetes of AntiochDiodore of Tarsus, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Nestorius, and even Theodoret of Cyrusemphasize the full humanity of the historical Jesus, they understand this humanity not merely as distinct from the divinity, but as "autonomous" and personalized. If "deified," Jesus could no longer be truly man; he must simply be the son of Mary if he is to be ignorant, to suffer, and to die. It is precisely this understanding of humanity as autonomous which has attracted the sympathies of modern Western theologians toward the Antiochians, but which provoked the emergence of Nestorianism and the clash with Alexandria. For the concept of "deification" was the very argument with which Athanasius had countered Arius: "God became man, so that man may become God." The great Cappadocian Fathers also shared this argument, and by it they were convinced, as were the vast majority of the Eastern episcopate, of the truth of the Nicaean faith, in spite of their original doubts concerning the term "consubstantial."

Thus, the essential "good news" about the coming of new lifehuman because it is also divinewas expressed by Cyril of Alexandria and not by the more rational scheme defended by Nestorius. Cyril lacked the vocabulary, however, and the flexibility to satisfy those who feared the Monophysite temptation of seeing in Jesus a God who ceased to be also man. Cyril's formula of "one nature [or, hypostasis] incarnated," in leaving the door open to the Orthodox distinction between the divine nature per se and the "divine nature incarnated" and, therefore, recognizing the reality of the "flesh," was still a polemical, anti-Nestorian formula, not a balanced and positive definition of who Christ is. The Chalcedonian definition of 451two natures united in one hypostasis, yet retaining in full their respective characteristicswas therefore a necessary correction of Cyril's vocabulary. Permanent credit should be given to the Antiochiansespecially to Theodoretand to Leo of Rome for having shown the necessity of this correction, without which Cyrillian Christology could easily be, and actually was, interpreted in a Monophysite sense by Eutyches and his followers.

But the Chalcedonian definition, balanced and positive as it was, lacked the soteriological, charismatic impact which had made the positions of Athanasius and Cyril so appealing. Political and ecclesiastical rivalries, personal ambitions, imperial pressures aimed at imposing Chalcedon by force, abusive interpretations of Cyril in the Monophysite sense, as well as misinterpretations of the council by some Nestorianizing Antiochians who saw in it a disavowal of the great Cyrilall provoked the first major and lasting schism in Christendom.

Understandably, the Byzantine emperors tried to restore the religious unity of the empire. In the second half of the fifth century they made several unhappy attempts to heal the schism by avoiding the issue. But the issue proved to be real, and the passions high. Thus Justinian I (527-565), the last great Roman emperor, after several attempts to achieve unity by imperial decree again turned to conciliar procedure.

In the age of Justinian, four major theological positions can be easily discerned:

1. The Monophysites

Although most of the Monophysites were ready to anathematize Eutyches, as well as the idea that Christ's humanity was "confused" with His divinity, they held steadfastly to the theology and terminology of Cyril of Alexandria. Just as the "old Nicaeans" in the fourth century had refused to accept the formula of the three hypostaseis introduced by the Cappadocian Fathers because Athanasius had not used it, so the leaders of fifth- and sixth-century Monophysitism—Dioscoros of Alexandria, Philoxenus of Mabbugh, and the great Severus of Antioch—rejected the Council of Chalcedon and the Christological formula of "one hypostasis in two natures" because Cyril had never used it, and because they interpreted it as a return to Nestorianism. The danger of Eutychianism, they claimed, was not serious enough to justify the Chalcedonian departure from Cyril's terminology. They objected most violently, and this objection may be the really serious difference between their Christology and Chalcedonian orthodoxy to the idea that the two natures, after the union, "retain in full their proper characteristics."

2. The Strict Dyophysites

The strict Dyophysites were Chalcedonians who still rigidly maintained the Antiochian Christology, and who objected to some of Cyril's propositions, such as the Theopaschite formula: "One of the Holy Trinity suffered in the flesh." For them, the subject of suffering is Jesus, the son of Mary, not the divine Logos. But, one may ask, is there not then in Christ a duality of subjects? The existence of this party in the Chalcedonian camp and the influence exercised by its representatives—Theodoret of Cyrus until his death around 466, Gennadios of Constantinople (458-471), his successor Macedonios (495-511), and others—provided the Monophysites with their main arguments for rejecting Chalcedon as a Nestorian council and as a disavowal of Cyril.

3. The Cyrillian Chalcedonians

The Cyrillian Chalcedonians, who were obviously the majority at the council itself, never admitted that there was a contradiction between Cyril and Chalcedon. Neither terminology was considered an end in itself, but only the appropriate way of opposing Nestorianism and Eutychianism respectively. The position of the Cyrillian Chalcedonians, as distinct from the strict Dyophysite position, is symbolized by the acceptance of the Theopaschite Cyrillian formula. The representatives of this tendencythe "Scythian monk" John Maxentios, John the Grammarian, Ephraem of Antioch, Leontius of Jerusalem, Anastasius of Antioch, Eulogius of Alexandria, Theodore of Raithudominated Byzantine theology in the sixth century and won the support of Justinian I. Recent historians (among them, Joseph Lebon and Charles Moeller) often designate this tendency as "neo-Chalcedonian," implying that the strict Dyophysite understanding of Chalcedon is the only correct one and that Antiochian Christology is preferable to Cyrillian. The implications of the debate on this point are very broad, in both Christological and anthropological fields, for it questions the very notion of "deification."

4. The Origenists

The Origenists, involved in violent controversies but influential at the court in the beginning of Justinian's reign, offered their own solution based upon the quite heretical Christology of Evagrius Ponticus. For them Jesus is not the Logos, but an "intellect" not involved in the original Fall, and thus united hypostatically and essentially with the Logos. The writings of Leontius of Byzantium, the chief representative of Origenist Christology in Constantinople, were included in the pro-Chalcedonian polemical arsenal, however, and his notion of the enhypostaton was adopted by Maximus the Confessor and John of Damascus, who, of course, rejected the crypto-Origenistic context in which it originally appeared.

The Fifth Ecumenical Council (553), convoked by Justinian in order to give formal ecclesiastical approval to his attempts at making Chalcedon acceptable to the Monophysites, was a triumph of Cyrillian Chalcedonianism. It approved Justinian's earlier posthumous condemnation of the Three Chapters, and, though Theodore was personally condemned as a heretic and the teacher of Nestorius, Ibas and Theodoret, whom the Council of Chalcedon had officially accepted as orthodox, were spared as persons; their writings directed against Cyril, however, fell under the anathemas of 553. Thus, the authority of Chalcedon was formally preserved, but the strict Dyophysite interpretation of its decisions was formally rejected. The council very strongly reaffirmed the unity of subject in Christ (anathemas 2, 3, 4, 5) and, hence, formally legitimized the Theopaschite formula (anathema 10). This formula was henceforth chanted at every liturgy in the hymn "The Only-Begotten Son of God," which has been attributed to Justinian himself. Though anathema 13 gave formal approval to the Twelve Chapters of Cyril against Nestorius, anathema 8 specified that if one should use the Cyrillian formula "one nature incarnated," the word "nature" would stand for hypostasis. Thus, in joining the Orthodox Church, the Monophysites were not required to reject anything of Cyrillian theology, but only to admit that Chalcedon was not a Nestorian council.

Unfortunately, by 553 the schism was too deeply rooted in Egypt and Syria, and the conciliar decision had no practical effect. The decision represents, however, a necessary pre-condition for any future attempts at reunion and an interesting precedent of a reformulation of an article of faith, already defined by a council, for the sake of "separated" brethren who misunderstand the previous formulation.

The Council of 553 also adopted a series of anathemas against Origen and Evagrius Ponticus. The Gnostic Chapters of Evagrius help greatly in understanding the meaning of these decisions, which were directed, not as was previously thought against non-existent heresies attributed to Origen, but against an active group of Evagrians, closely connected with the Christological debates of the day. Despite these condemnations, however, some aspects of the thought of Origen, Evagrius, and Leontius of Byzantium continued to exercise an influence on the development of theological thought and of spirituality.

The condemnation of Origenism in 553 was, therefore, a decisive step in Eastern Christian theology, which then committed itself to a Biblical view of creation, of an anthropocentric universe, of man as a coherent psychosomatic whole, of history as a linear orientation toward an ultimate eschaton, of God as a personal and living being independent of all metaphysical necessity.

The decision of 553, however, did not close the Christological debate. Actually, each doctrinal definition at Ephesus, Chalcedon, Constantinople — by solving some issues had raised new ones. The schism of the Monophysites remained a political nuisance to the empire and a threat to the Church, which in the East would soon be faced with the Persian Zoroastrian and the Moslem challenges. The reaffirmation of Cyrillian orthodoxy in 553 raised the permanent issue of the two stages in Cyril's personal attitude: his proclamation, against Nestorius, of Christ's unity (especially the Twelve Anathemas), and his later stand, more appreciative of Antiochian fears. Thus, in 430 Cyril did not admit that a distinction could be drawn in Christ's actions between those which were divine and those which were only human, but in his famous letter to John of Antioch in 433, he admits that such a distinction is inevitable.

Monophysites, after Chalcedon, generally preferred the "first Cyril" to the "second." Severus, their great theologian, admitted duality in Christ's being, but for him this duality was a duality "in imagination," while "in actuality" there was only one nature, or being. This position leads directly to Monoenergism: "one is the agent," writes Severus, "and one is the activity." ¹ For terminological reasons, however, the Monophysites were generally reluctant to speak of "one will" in Christ because of the possible Nestorian associations. In Antiochian Christology it was possible to say that the two natures were united by one common "will."

The Persian wars of Emperor Heraclius (610-641) again deeply involved the Byzantine government in unionist policies with the Monophysites, especially with the Armenians. Patriarch Sergius (610-638), Heraclius' friend and theological adviser, devised a formula of union, according to which the Monophysites would accept the Chalcedonian formula of the "two natures" with the specification that they were united into one "energy" and one will. The policy reached a measure of success both in Armenia and in Egypt, and local unions were concluded. Monoenergism and Monotheletism, however, met with staunch opposition on the part of some Chalcedonians, led by Sophronius, Patriarch of Jerusalem, and by Maximus the Confessor. In spite of the support given to it by Heraclius and his successors, Monotheletism was finally condemned by the Sixth Ecumenical Council in 680, which restated the Chalcedonian affirmation that in Christ each nature keeps the entirety of its characteristics, and, therefore, there are two "energies" or wills, the divine and the human, in Christ.

Maximus the Confessor (ca. 580-662) the architect of this decision, dominates the period intellectually, and, in many respects, may be regarded as the real Father of Byzantine theology. For in his system one finds a Christian philosophical counterpart to Origen's myth of creation, and, as the real foundation of Christian spiritual life, a doctrine of "deification" based on Cyril's soteriology and on Chalcedonian Christology.

Maximus never tried, or had the opportunity, to compose an ordered analysis of his system. His writings include only a large collection of Ambigua, a most unsystematic compilation of commentaries on obscure passages from Gregory of Nazianzus or from pseudo-Dionysius, a collection of "Answers to Questions" by Thalassius, several series of Chapters (short sayings on spiritual or theological matters), and a few polemical treatises against the Monothelites. In these membra disjecta, however, one discovers a most coherent view of the Christian faith as a whole, formed quite independently of the Monothelite controversy. His attitude against the Monothelites thus acquires even greater strength, precisely because its roots go much deeper than the casual historical circumstances in which it had to be expressed and which led Maximus himself to torture and a martyr's death.

In Origen's system immobility is one of the essential characteristics of true being; it belongs to God, but also to creatures as long as they remain in conformity with God's will. Diversity and movement come from the Fall. For Maximus, however, "movement," or "action," is a fundamental quality of nature. Each creature possesses its own meaning and purpose, which reflect the eternal and divine Logos "through whom all things were made." The logos of every creature is given to it not only as a static element but also as the eternal goal and purpose which it is called to achieve.

At this point Maximus' thought uses the Aristotelian concept of each nature's having its own "energy," or existential manifestation. The Cappadocian Fathers had applied the same principle to their doctrine of the three hypostaseis in God. Gregory of Nyssa, in particular, had to defend himself against the accusation of tritheism; the three hypostaseis are not three Gods because they have one nature, as is evident from the fact that there is only one "energy" of God. Already, then, in Cappadocian thought, the concept of "energy" is linked with that of nature. Maximus could therefore refer to tradition in opposing the Monothelite contention that "energy" reflects the one hypostasis or person or actor, and that therefore Christ could have only one "energy."

In Maximian thought, man occupies quite an exceptional position among the other creatures. He not only carries in himself a logos; he is the image of the divine Logos, and the purpose of his nature is to acquire similitude with God. In creation as a whole, man's role is to unify all things in God, and thus to overcome the evil powers of separation, division, disintegration, and death. The "natural," God-established "movement," "energy" or will, of man is therefore directed toward communion with God, or "deification," not in isolation from the entire creation, but leading it back to its original state.

One understands at this point why Maximus felt so strongly that both Monoenergism and Monothelitism betray the Chalcedonian affirmation that Christ was fully man. There cannot be a true humanity where there is no natural, authentic human will or "movement."

But if the human will is nothing but a movement of nature, is there a place for human freedom? And how can the Fall and man's revolt against God be explained? These questions, to which Origen gave such great importance, find in Maximus a new answer. Already in Gregory of Nyssa, true human freedom does not consist in autonomous human life, but in the situation which is truly natural to man's communion with God. When man is isolated from God, he finds himself enslaved to his passions, to himself, and, ultimately, to Satan. Therefore, for Maximus, when man follows his natural will, which presupposes life in God, God's cooperation and communion, he is truly free. But man also possesses another potential, determined not by his nature, but by each human person, or hypostasis, the freedom of choice, of revolt, of movement against nature, and, therefore, of self-destruction. This personal freedom was used by Adam and Eve and, after the Fall, in separation from God, from true knowledge, from all the assurance secured by "natural" existence. It implies hesitation, wandering, and suffering; this is the gnostic will (gnome, opinion), a function of the hypostatic, or personal, life, not of nature.

In Christ, human nature is united with the hypostasis of the Logos and, while remaining fully itself, is liberated from sin, the source of which is the gnostic will. Because it is "en-hypostasized" in the Logos Himself, Christ's humanity is perfect humanity. In the mysterious process which started with His conception in the Virgin's womb, Jesus passed through natural growth, ignorance, suffering, and even death all of them experiences of the fallen humanity which He had come to save and He fulfilled through the resurrection the ultimate human destiny. Christ could thus be truly the savior of humanity because in Him there could never be any contradiction between natural will and gnostic will. Through the hypostatic union, His human will, precisely because it always conforms itself to the divine, also performs the "natural movement" of human nature.

The doctrine of "deification" in Maximus is based upon the fundamental patristic presupposition that communion with God does not diminish or destroy humanity, but makes it fully human. In Christ the hypostatic union implies the communication of idioms (perichoresis ton idiomaton). The characteristics of divinity and humanity express themselves "in communion with each other" (Chalcedonian definition), and human actions, or "energies," have God Himself as their personal agent. It can be said, therefore, that "God was born," that Mary is the Theotokos, and that the "Logos was crucified" while birth and death remain purely human realities. But it can and must also be said that a man rose from the dead and sits at the right hand of the Father, having acquired characteristics which "naturally" belong to God alone: immortality and glory. Through Christ's humanity, deified according to its hypostatic union with the Logos, all members of the Body of Christ have access to "deification" by grace through the operation of the Spirit in Christ's Church.

The essential elements of Maximian Christology provided the permanent terminological and philosophical framework for Byzantine thought and spirituality. They were adopted, together with the Trinitarian doctrine of the great Cappadocian Fathers, in the Exact Exposition of the Orthodox Faith of John of Damascus (first half of the eighth century), which served as a standard doctrinal textbook in Byzantium. They also provided the most authoritative frame of reference in most of the doctrinal controversies which arose in the East during the Middle Ages.

The following chapter, which is concerned with iconoclasm, will show that the Christological issue recurred indirectly in the eighth and ninth centuries. But even later, Christological debate was reopened, quite specifically, especially in the Comnenian period, and conciliar decisions on the matter were included in the Synodikon.

Around 1087, a Constantinopolitan monk named Nilus, who was involved in theological discussions with the Armenians, was condemned for holding that the humanity of Christ was united with God "by adoption" (thesei) only. 2 The Monophysite Armenians were, of course, maintaining the concept of a union "by nature" (physei). In opposing them, Nilus had apparently weakened the Orthodox doctrine of "hypostatic" union to the point of making it sound Nestorian. In 1117, the Synod of Constantinople dealt with the similar case of Eustratius, Metropolitan of Nicaea, who, like Nilus, had engaged in polemics with Armenians and had expressed orthodox Christology in terms very similar to those of Theodore of Mopsuestia. The humanity assumed by Christ not only was distinct from His divinity but found itself in a position of "servitude"; it was in a position of "worshipping God," of being "purified," and to it alone belongs the human title of high-priest, a term unsuitable to God. In condemning the opinions of Eustratius, the synod reiterated the decisions of the Fifth Council against the Christology of the Three Chapters.³

The very Cyrillian conclusion of the council against Eustratius led to further Christological debates, which this time centered on the meaning of the Eucharistic sacrifice. The deacon Soterichos Panteugenos, Patriarch-Elect of Antioch, affirmed that the sacrifice could not be offered to the Holy Trinity, for this would imply that the one Christ performs two opposing actions, the human action of offering and the divine action of receiving, and would mean a Nestorian separation and personalization of the two natures. Nicholas, Bishop of Methone in the Peloponnese, a major Byzantine theologian of the twelfth century, responded to Soterichos with an elaboration of the notion of hypostasis based on the ideas of Leontius of Byzantium and Maximus the Confessor. The hypostatic union is precisely what permits one to consider God as performing humanly in the act of offering, while remaining God by nature and, therefore, receiving the sacrifice. To Soterichos, Nicholas opposed the conclusion of the prayer of the Cheroubikon, whose author, as modern research shows, is none other than Cyril of Alexandria himself, but which is a part of both Byzantine liturgies (attributed respectively to Basil and to John Chrysostom): "For it is Thou who offerest and art offered, who receivest and art Thyself received." Nicholas, whose views were endorsed by the Council of 1156-1157, shows that neither the Eucharist nor the work of Christ in general can be reduced to a juridical notion of sacrifice conceived as an exchange. God does not have to receive anything from us: "We did not go to Him [to make an offering]; rather He condescended toward us and assumed our nature, not as a condition of reconciliation, but in order to meet us openly in the flesh." 4

This "open meeting in the flesh" received further emphasis in 1170 in connection with the condemnation of Constantine of Kerkyra and his supporter John Eirenikos as crypto-Monophysites. Their point was to refuse to apply John 14:18 ("My Father is greater than I") to the distinction between the divinity and the humanity of Christ. The text, they said, concerned the hypostatic characteristics in the Holy Trinity, fatherhood being by definition "greater" than sonship, while the humanity of Christ, which according to the Council of 553 is distinguishable from the divinity only "in our mind," is deified and wholly "one" with the divinity. It cannot, therefore, be "smaller" than the divinity in any sense. By rejecting this view, the Council of 1170 reaffirmed once again the decisions of Chalcedon and Constantinople¹¹ about the divinity of Christ, hypostatically united to a real and active humanity, "created, depictable, and mortal." Than such humanity, divinity is certainly "greater."

The very technical Christological discussions of the twelfth century, in fact, reconsidered all the major issues which had been debated in the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries. The Byzantine Church remained fundamentally faithful to the notion of what Georges Florovsky once called an "asymmetrical union" of God and man in Christ: while the hypostatic source of life the goal and pattern remains divine, man is not diminished or swallowed by the union; he becomes again fully human. This notion is also expressed in the Eucharistic sacrifice, a unique act in which no single action of Christ's is represented in isolation, or reduced to purely human concepts, such as an "exchange," or a "satisfaction." Christ, as the Synodikon proclaims every year on the Sunday of Orthodoxy, "reconciled us to Himself by means of the whole mystery of the economy, and by Himself and in Himself, reconciled us also to His God and Father, and, of course, to the most holy and life-giving Spirit." 5

Notes

1. Quoted by J. Lebon, Le Monophysitisme sévérien, étude historique, littéraire et théologique sur la résistance monophysite au Concile de Chalcédoine jusqu'à la constitution de l'Église jacobite (Louvain dissertation, 1909), pp. 445-446.
2. Anna Comnena, Alexiad, X, 1; ed. B. Leib (Paris, 1943), II, 187-188; Synodikon, ed. J. Gouillard, Travaux et mémoires 2 (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1967), pp. 202-206. On possible connections between several Byzantine theological trends and Paulician dualism, see N. G. Gersoyan, "Byzantine Heresy: A Reinterpretation," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 25 (1971), 87-113.
3. See P. Joannou, "Der Nominalismus und die menschliche Psychologie Christi: das Semeioma gegen Eustratios von Nikaia (1117)," Byzantinische Zeitschrift 47 (1954), 374-378.
4. Nicholas of Methone, Treatise Against Soterichos, ed. A. Demetrakopoulos, Bibliothek Ekklesiastike (repr. Hildesheim: Olms, 1965), pp. 337-338.
5. Filth Anathema Against Soterichos in Synodikon ed. Gouillard, p. 75.

3

The Iconoclastic Crisis

The long iconoclastic struggle, which recurred frequently in Byzantine theology, was intimately connected with the Christological issue which had divided Eastern Christianity in the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries.

1. Appearance of the Movement

The emperors of the eighth and ninth centuries initiated and supported the iconoclastic movement, and from the start issues of both a theological and a non-theological nature were inseparably involved in this imperial policy.

From contemporary sources and modern historical research, three elements within the movement seem to emerge:

A. A Problem of Religious Culture. From their pagan past, Greek-speaking Christians had inherited a taste for religious imagery. When the early Church condemned such art as idolatrous, the tridimensional form practically disappeared, only to reappear in a new, Christian two-dimensional version. Other Eastern Christians, particularly the Syrians and the Armenians, were much less inclined by their cultural past to the use of images. It is significant, therefore, that the emperors who sponsored iconoclasm were of Armenian or Isaurian origins. Moreover, the non-Greek-speaking East was almost entirely Monophysite by the eighth century and, as we shall see, Monophysitism tacitly or explicitly provided the iconoclasts with the essence of their theological arguments.

B. Confrontation with Islam. After the Arab conquest of Palestine,

Syria, and Egypt, the Byzantine Empire found itself in constant confrontation militarily and ideologically with Islam. Both Christianity and Islam claimed to be world religions, of which the Byzantine emperor and the Arab caliph were, respectively, the heads. But in the accompanying psychological warfare, Islam constantly claimed to be the latest, and therefore the highest and purest, revelation of the God of Abraham, and repeatedly leveled the accusations of polytheism and idolatry, against the Christian doctrine of the Trinity and the use of icons. It was to the charge of idolatry that the Eastern-born emperors of the eighth century responded. They decided to purify Christianity to enable it better to withstand the challenge of Islam. Thus, there was a measure of Islamic influence on the iconoclastic movement, but the influence was part of the cold war against Islam, not the conscious imitation of it.

c. The Heritage of Hellenic Spiritualism. The controversy begun by Emperors Leo III (717-741) and Constantine V (741-775) seems to have been determined initially by the non-theological factors described above. But the iconoclasts easily found in the Greek Christian tradition itself new arguments not directly connected with condemned Monophysitism or with foreign cultural influences. An iconoclastic trend of thought, which could be traced back to early Christianity, was later connected with Origenism. The early apologists of Christianity took the Old Testament prohibitions against any representation of God just as literally as the Jews had. But in their polemics against Christianity, Neoplatonic writers minimized the importance of idols in Greek paganism and developed a relative doctrine of the image as a means of access to the divine prototype and not as a dwelling of the divine himself, and used this argument to show the religious inferiority of Christianity. Porphyry, for example, writes:

If some Hellenes are light-headed enough to believe that the gods live inside idols, their thought remains much purer than that [of the Christians] who believe that the divinity entered the Virgin Mary's womb, became a foetus, was engendered, and wrapped in clothes, was full of blood, membranes, gall, and even viler things. 1

Porphyry obviously understood that the belief in an historical incarnation of God was inconsistent with total iconoclasm, for an historical Christ was necessarily visible and depictable. And, indeed, Christian iconography began to flourish as early as the third century. In Origenistic circles, however, influenced as they were by Platonic spiritualism which denied to matter a permanent, God-created existence and for whom the only true reality was "intellectual," iconoclastic tendencies survived. When Constantia, sister of the Emperor Constantine, visited Jerusalem and requested an image of Christ from Eusebius of Caesarea, she received the answer that "the form of a servant," assumed by the Logos in Jesus Christ, was no longer in the realm of reality and that her concern for a material image of Jesus was unworthy of true religion; after His glorification, Christ could be contemplated only "in the mind."² There is evidence that the theological advisers of Leo III, the first iconoclastic emperor, were also Origenists with views most certainly identical to those of Eusebius. Thus a purely "Greek" iconoclasm, philosophically quite different from the Oriental and the Islamic ones, contributed to the success of the movement.

2. Iconoclastic Theology

It seems that no articulate theology of iconoclasm developed in a written form before the reign of Constantine v Copronymos (741-775). The emperor himself published theological treatises attacking the veneration of icons and gathered in Hieria a council claiming ecumenicity (754). The Acts of this assembly are preserved in the minutes of the Seventh Ecumenical Council, the Second of Nicaea, which formally rejected iconoclasm (787).

It is remarkable that Constantine, in order to justify his position, formally referred to the authority of the first six councils; for him iconoclasm was not a new doctrine, but the logical outcome of the Christological debates of the previous centuries. The painter, the Council of Hieria affirmed, when he makes an image of Christ can paint either His humanity alone, thus separating it from the divinity, or both His humanity and His divinity. In the first case he is a Nestorian; in the second case he assumes that divinity is circumscribed by humanity, which is absurd; or that both are confused, in which case, he is a Monophysite. 3

These arguments do not lack strength and must have impressed his contemporaries, but they fail to account for the Chalcedonian affirmation that "each nature preserves its own manner of being." Obviously, even if they formally rejected Monophysitism, the iconoclasts supposed that the deification of Christ's humanity suppressed its properly human individual character. They also seem to have ignored the true meaning of the hypostatic union, which implies a real distinction between nature and hypostasis. In being assumed by the hypostasis of the Logos, human nature does not merge with divinity; it retains its full identity.

Another aspect of the iconoclasts' position was their notion of the image, which they always considered to be identical or "consubstantial" with the prototype. The consequence of this approach was that a material image could never achieve this identity and was always inadequate. The only true "image" of Christ which they would admit is the sacramental one of the Eucharist as the "image" and "symbol" of Christ, a notion which was drawn from pseudo-Dionysius.⁴

3. Orthodox Theology of Images: John of Damascus and the Seventh Council

Some discussion about images must have taken place in Byzantium as early as the late-seventh century and is reflected in Canon 82 of the Council in Trullo. The importance of this text lies in the fact that it locates the issue of religious representation in the Christological context:

In certain reproductions of venerable images, the precursor is pictured indicating the lamb with his finger. This representation was adopted as a symbol of grace. It was a hidden figure of that true lamb who is Christ our God, shown to us according to the Law. Having thus welcomed these ancient figures and shadows as symbols of the truth transmitted to the Church, we prefer today grace and truth themselves as a fulfillment of this law. Therefore, in order to expose to the sight of all, at least with the help of painting, that which is perfect, we decree that henceforth Christ our God must be represented in His human form, and not in the form of the ancient lamb. 5

Thus the image of Christ already implied for the fathers of the Council in Trullo a confession of faith in the historical Incarnation, which could not be properly expressed in the symbolic figure of a lamb and which needed an image of Jesus "in His human form."

Before Leo III had issued his formal decrees against the images, Germanus I (715-730) the Patriarch of Constantinople, used the same Christological argument against the incipient iconoclasm of the court:

In eternal memory of the life in the flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, of His passion, His saving death, and the redemption of the world which results from them, we have received the tradition of representing Him in His human form. i.e., in His visible theophany understanding that in this way we exalt the humiliation of God the Word. 6

Germanus thus became the first witness of Orthodoxy against iconoclasm in Byzantium. After his resignation under imperial pressure, the defense of images was taken over by the lonely and geographically remote voice of John of Damascus.

Living and writing in the relative security assured to the Christian ghettos of the Middle East by the Arab conquerors, this humble monk of the Monastery of St. Sabbas in Palestine succeeded, by his famous three treatises for the defense of the images, in uniting Orthodox opinion in the Byzantine world. His first treatise begins with the reaffirmation of the Christological argument: "I represent God, the Invisible One, not as invisible, but insofar as He has become visible for us by participation in flesh and blood."⁷ John's main emphasis is on the change which occurred in the relationship between God and the visible world when He became man. By His own will, God became visible by assuming a material existence and giving to matter a new function and dignity.

In former times, God, without body or form, could in no way be represented. But today, since God has appeared in the flesh and lived among men, I can represent what is visible in God [to horaton tou theou]. I do not venerate matter, but I venerate the creator of matter, who became matter for my sake, who assumed life in the flesh, and who, through matter, accomplished my salvation. 8

In addition to this central argument, John insists on secondary and less decisive issues. The Old Testament, for example, was not totally iconoclastic, but used images, especially in temple worship, which Christians are entitled to interpret as prefigurations of Christ. John also denounced the iconoclasts' identification of the image with the prototype, the idea that an icon "is God." On this point the Neoplatonic and Origenist traditions, which were also used by the iconoclasts, supported the side of the Orthodox; only the Son and the Spirit are "natural images" of the Father, and therefore consubstantial with Him, but other images of God are essentially different from their model, and therefore not "idols."

It is this discussion on the nature of the image which provided the basis for the very important definition of the cult of images adopted by the Seventh Ecumenical Council in 787. The image, or icon, since it is distinct from the divine model, can be the object only of a relative veneration or honor, not of worship which is reserved for God alone.⁹ This authoritative statement by an ecumenical council clearly excludes the worship of images often attributed to Byzantine Christianity.

The misunderstanding on this point is a very old one and is partly the result of difficulties in translation. The Greek proskynesis ("veneration") was already translated as adoratio in the Latin version of the Conciliar Acts used by Charlemagne in his famous Libri Carolini which rejected the council. And, later, even Thomas Aquinas who, of course, accepted Nicaea "admitted a "relative adoration" (latria) of the images, a position which gave the Greeks the opportunity of accusing the Latins of idolatry at the Council of Hagia Sophia in 1450.¹⁰

In spite of its very great terminological accuracy in describing the veneration of icons, Nicaea II did not elaborate on the technical points of Christology raised by the iconoclastic Council of Hieria. The task of refuting this council and of developing the rather general Christological affirmations of Germanus and John of Damascus belongs to the two major theological figures of the second iconoclastic period: the reigns of Leo V (813-820), Michael II (820-829), and Theophilus (829-842). Theodore the Studite and Patriarch Nicephorus.

4. Orthodox Theology of Images: Theodore the Studite and Nicephorus

Theodore the Studite (759-826) was one of the major reformers of the Eastern Christian monastic movement. In 798 he found himself at the head of the Constantinopolitan monastery of Studios (the name of the founder), which by then had fallen into decay. Under Theodore's leadership the community there rapidly grew to several hundred monks and became the main monastic center of the capital. The Studite Rule (Hypotyposis) in its final form is the work of Theodore's disciples, but it applied his principles of monastic life and became the pattern for large cenobitic communities in the Byzantine and Slavic worlds. Theodore himself is the author of two collections of instructions addressed to his monks (the "small" and the "large" Catecheses) in which he develops his concept of monasticism based upon obedience to the abbot, liturgical life, constant work, and personal poverty. These principles were quite different from the eremitical, or "hesychast," tradition and were derived from the rules of Pachomius and Basil. The influence of Theodore upon later developments of Byzantine Christianity is also expressed in his contribution to hymnography; many of the ascetical parts of the Triodion (proper for Great Lent) and of the Parakletike, or Oktoechos (the book of the "eight tones"), are his work or the work of his immediate disciples. His role in conflicts between Church and state will be mentioned in the next chapter.

In numerous letters to contemporaries, in his three Antirrhetics against the iconoclasts, and in several minor treatises on the subject, Theodore actively participated in the defense of images.

As we have seen, the principal argument of the Orthodox against the iconoclasts was the reality of Christ's manhood; the debate thus gave Byzantine theologians an opportunity to reaffirm the Antiochian contribution to Chalcedonian Christology, and signaled a welcome return to the historical facts of the New Testament. From the age of Justinian, the humanity of Christ had often been expressed in terms of "human nature," assumed as one whole by the New Adam. Obviously, this Platonizing view of humanity in general was insufficient to justify an image of Jesus Christ as a concrete, historical, human individual. The fear of Nestorianism prevented many Byzantine theologians from seeing a man in Christ, for "a man," implying individual human consciousness, seemed for them to mean a separate human hypostasis. In Theodore's anti-iconoclastic writings this difficulty is overcome by a partial return to Aristotelian categories.

Christ was certainly not a mere man; neither is it orthodox to say that He assumed an individual among men [ton tina anthropon] but the whole, the totality of the nature. It must be said, however, that this total nature was contemplated in an individual manner for otherwise how could it have been seen? in a way which made it visible and describable . . . , which allowed it to eat and drink. . . . 11

Humanity for Theodore "exists only in Peter and Paul," i.e., in concrete human beings, and Jesus was such a being. Otherwise, Thomas' experience of placing his finger into Jesus' wounds would have been impossible. 12 The iconoclasts claimed that Christ, in virtue of the union between divinity and humanity, was indescribable, and therefore that no image of Him was possible; but, for Theodore, "an indescribable Christ would be an incorporeal Christ; . . . Isaiah [8:3] described him as a male being, and only the forms of the body can make man and woman distinct from one another."¹³

The firm stand on Christ's individuality as a man again raised the issue of the hypostatic union, for in Chalcedonian Christology the unique hypo-stasis or person of Christ is that of the Logos. Obviously, then, the notion of hypostasis cannot be identified with either the divine or the human characteristics; neither can it be identical with the idea of human consciousness. The hypostasis is the ultimate source of individual, personal existence, which, in Christ, is both divine and human.

For Theodore, an image can be the image only of an hypostasis, for the image of a nature is inconceivable.¹⁴ On the icons of Christ, the only proper inscription is that of the personal God "He who is," the Greek equivalent of the sacred tetragrammaton YHWH (Yahweh) of the Old Testament, never such impersonal terms as "divinity" or "kingship" which belong to the Trinity as such and thus cannot be represented.¹⁵ This principle, rigidly followed in classical Byzantine iconography, shows that the icon of Christ is for Theodore not only an image of "the man Jesus," but also of the incarnate Logos. The meaning of the Christian Gospel lies precisely in the fact that the Logos assumed all the characteristics of a man, including describability, and His icon is a permanent witness of this fact.

The humanity of Christ, which makes the icons possible, is a "new humanity," having been fully restored to communion with God, deified in virtue of the communication of idioms, bearing fully again the image of God. This fact is to be reflected in iconography as a form of art: the artist thus receives a quasi-sacramental function. Theodore compares the Christian artist to God Himself, making man in His own image: "The fact that God made man in His image and likeness shows that iconography is a divine action."¹⁶ In the beginning God created man in His image. By making an icon of Christ the iconographer also makes an "image of God," for this is what the deified humanity of Jesus truly is.

By position, temperament, and style, Nicephorus, Patriarch of Constantinople (806-815), was the opposite of Theodore. He belongs to the series of Byzantine patriarchs, between Tarasius and Photius, who were elevated to the supreme ecclesiastical position after a successful civil career. As patriarch he followed a policy of oikonomia and suspended the canonical penalties previously imposed upon the priest Joseph who had performed the "adulterous" marriage of Constantine VI. This action brought him into violent conflict with Theodore and the monastic zealots. Later deposed by Leo v (in 815) for his defense of icons, he died in 828 after having composed a Refutation of the iconoclastic council of 815, three Antirrhetics, one Long Apology, and an interesting treatise Against Eusebius and Epiphanius, the main patristic references of the iconoclasts.

Nicephorus' thought is altogether directed against the Origenist notion, found in Eusebius' letter to Constantia, that deification of humanity implies dematerialization and absorption into a purely intellectual mode of existence. The patriarch constantly insists on the New Testament evidence that Jesus experienced weariness, hunger, and thirst, like any other man. 17 In dealing with the issue of Jesus' ignorance, Nicephorus also tries to reconcile the relevant scriptural passages with the doctrine of the hypostatic union in a way which, for different reasons, was not common in Eastern theology. In Evagrian Origenism, ignorance was considered as coextensive with, if not identical to, sinfulness. The original state of the created intellects before the Fall was that of divine gnosis. Jesus was precisely the non-fallen intellect and, therefore, eminently and necessarily preserved the "knowledge of God" and, of course, any other form of inferior gnosis. The authors of the age of Justinian, followed by both Maximus and John of Damascus, denied any ignorance in Christ in virtue of the hypostatic union, but, probably also under the influence of a latent Evagrianism, they interpreted the Gospel passages speaking of ignorance on the part of Jesus as examples of his oikonomia, or pastoral desire, to be seen as a mere man, and not as expressions of real ignorance. Nicephorus stands in opposition to that tradition on this point, although he admits that the hypostatic union could suppress all human ignorance in Jesus, in virtue of the communication of idioms, the divine knowledge being communicated to the human nature. He maintains that divine economy in fact required that Christ assume all aspects of human existence, including ignorance: "He willingly acted, desired, was ignorant, and suffered as man."¹⁸ In becoming incarnate the Logos assumed not an abstract, ideal humanity, but the concrete humanity which existed in history after the Fall, in order to save it. "He did not possess a flesh other than our own, that which fell as a consequence of sin; He did not transform it [in assuming it], . . . He was made of the same nature as we, but without sin, and through that nature He condemned sin and death."¹⁹

This fullness of humanity implied, of course, describability, for if Christ were undescrivable, His Mother, with whom He shared the same human nature, would have to be considered as undescrivable as well. "Too much honor given to the Mother," Nicephorus writes, "amounts to dishonoring her, for one would have to attribute to her incorruptibility, immortality, and impassibility, if what by nature belongs to the Logos must also by grace be attributed to her who gave Him birth."²⁰

The same logic applies to the Eucharist which, as we have seen, the

iconoclasts considered as the only admissible image or symbol of Christ. For Nicephorus and the other Orthodox defenders of images, this concept was unacceptable because they understood the Eucharist as the very reality of the Body and Blood of Christ, and precisely not as an "image," for an image is made to be seen, while the Eucharist remains fundamentally food to be eaten. By being assumed into Christ the Eucharistic elements do not lose their connection with this world, just as the Virgin Mary did not cease to be part of humanity by becoming the Mother of God. "We confess," writes Nicephorus, "that by the priest's invocation, by the coming of the Most Holy Spirit, the Body and Blood of Christ are mystically and invisibly made present . . ."; and they are saving food for us "not because the Body ceases to be a body, but because it remains so and is preserved as body." 21

Nicephorus' insistence upon the authenticity of Christ's humanity at times leads him away from classical Cyrillian Christology. He evades Theopaschism by refusing to admit either that "the Logos suffered the passion, or that the flesh produced miracles. . . . One must attribute to each nature what is proper to it,"²² and minimizes the value of the communication of idioms which, according to him, manipulates "words."²³ Obviously Theodore the Studite was more immune to the risk of Nestorianizing than was Nicephorus. In any case, the necessity of reaffirming the humanity of Christ and, thus, of defending His describability, led Byzantine theologians to a revival of elements of the Antiochian tradition and, thus, to a proof of their faithfulness to Chalcedon.

5. Lasting Significance of the Issue

The iconoclastic controversy had a lasting influence upon the intellectual life of Byzantium. Four aspects of this influence seem particularly relevant to theological development.

A. At the time of the Persian wars of Emperor Heraclius in the seventh century, Byzantium turned away culturally from its Roman past and toward the East. The great confrontation with Islam, which was reflected in the origins and character of iconoclasm, made this trend even more definite. Deprived of political protection by the Byzantine emperors, with whom they were in doctrinal conflict, the popes turned to the Franks and thus affiliated themselves with the emerging new Latin Middle Ages. As a result the social, cultural, and political background of this separation became more evident; the two halves of the Christian world began to speak different languages, and their frames of reference in theology began to diverge more sharply than before.

Byzantium's turn to the East, even if it expressed itself in a certain cultural osmosis with the Arab world, especially during the reign of Theophilus, did not mean a greater understanding between Byzantine Christianity and Islam; the confrontation remained fundamentally hostile, and this hostility prevented real dialogue. John of Damascus, who himself lived in Arab-dominated Palestine, spoke of Mohammed as the "forerunner of the Anti-Christ." 24 Giving second-hand quotations from the Koran, he presented the new religion as nothing more than gross superstition and immorality. Later-Byzantine literature on Islam rarely transcended this level of pure polemics.

However, even if this orientation eastward was not in itself an enrichment, Byzantium remained for several centuries the real capital of the Christian world. Culturally surpassing the Carolingian West and militarily strong in resisting Islam, Byzantine Christianity kept its universalist missionary vision, which expressed itself in a successful evangelization of the Slavs and other Eastern nations. But its later theological development took place in an exclusively Greek setting. Still bearing the title of "Great Church of Constantinople-New Rome," it became known to both its Latin competitors and its Slavic disciples as the "Greek" Church.

B. Whatever role was played in the Orthodox victory over the iconoclasts by high ecclesiastical dignitaries and such theologians as Patriarch Nicephorus, the real credit belonged to the Byzantine monks who resisted the emperors in overwhelming numbers. The emperors, especially Leo III and Constantine V, expressed more clearly than any of their predecessors a claim to caesaropapism. Thus the iconoclastic controversy was largely a confrontation between the state and a non-conformist, staunchly independent monasticism, which assumed the prophetic role of standing for the independence of the Gospel from the "world." The fact that this role was assumed by the monks, and not by the highest canonical authority of the Church, underlines the fact that the issue was the defense, not of the Church as an institution, but of the Christian faith as the way to eternal salvation.

The monks, of course, took their role very seriously and preserved, even after their victory, a peculiar sense of responsibility for the faith, as we saw in the case of Theodore the Studite. Theologically they maintained a tradition of faithfulness to the past, as well as a sense of the existential relevance of theology as such. Their role in later-Byzantine theological development remained decisive for centuries.

c. The theological issue between the Orthodox and the iconoclasts was fundamentally concerned with the icon of Christ, for belief in the divinity of Christ implied a stand on the crucial point of God's essential indescribability and on the Incarnation, which made Him visible. Thus the icon of Christ is the icon par excellence and implies a confession of faith in the Incarnation.

The iconoclasts, however, objected on theological grounds, not only to this icon, but also to the use of any religious pictures, except the cross, because, as their Council of 754 proclaims, they opposed "all paganism."

Any veneration of images was equated with idolatry. If the goal pursued by Constantine v to "purify" Byzantine Christianity, not only of the image cult, but also of monasticism, had been achieved, the entire character of Eastern Christian piety and its ethos would have evolved differently. The victory of Orthodoxy meant, for example, that religious faith could be expressed, not only in propositions, in books, or in personal experience, but also through man's power over matter, through aesthetic experience, and through gestures and bodily attitudes before holy images. All this implied a philosophy of religion and an anthropology; worship, the liturgy, religious consciousness involved the whole man, without despising any functions of the soul or of the body, and without leaving any of them to the realm of the secular.

D. Of all the cultural families of Christianity the Latin, the Syrian, the Egyptian, or the Armenian the Byzantine was the only one in which art became inseparable from theology. The debates of the eighth and ninth centuries have shown that in the light of the Incarnation art could not retain a "neutral" function, that it could and even must express the faith. Thus through their style, through symbolic compositions, through the elaborate artistic programs covering the walls of Byzantine churches, through the permanent system which presided over the composition of the Byzantine iconostasis, icons became an expression and a source of divine knowledge. The good news about God's becoming man; about the presence among men of a glorified and deified humanity, first in Christ, but also through Him and the Holy Spirit in the Virgin Mary and in the saints all this "adornment of the Church" was expressed in Byzantine Christian art. Eugene Trubetskoi, a Russian philosopher of the early-twentieth century, called this expression "contemplation in colors." 25

Notes

1. Porphyry, Against the Christians, fragment 77; ed. A. Harnack, AbhBerlAk (1916), 93.
2. Text of Eusebius' letter in Nicephorus, Contra Eusebium, ed. J. B. Pitra, Spicilegium Solesmense (Paris, 1852; repr. Graz, 1962), I, 383-386.
3. Mansi, XIII, 252_{AB}, 256_{AB}.
4. Ibid., 261_D-264_C. See pseudo-Dionysius, Celestial Hierarchy; PG 3:124_A.
5. Mansi, XI, 977-980.
6. Germanus I, De haeresibus et synodis; PG 98:80_A.
7. John of Damascus, Or. I; PG 94:1236_C.
8. Ibid.; PG 94:1245_A.
9. Mansi, XIII, 377_D.
10. Ibid., XXXII, 103.
11. Theodore the Studite, Antirrhetic 1; PG 99:332_D-333_A.
12. Ibid., III; PG 99:396_C-397_A.
13. Ibid., 409_C.

14. Ibid., 405_A.
15. Theodore the Studite, Letter to Naucrati, II, 67; PG 99:1296_{AB}; see also Antirrh., III; PG 99:420_D.
16. Antirrh., III; PG 99:420_A.
17. Nicephorus, Antirrh., I; PG 100:272_B.
18. Ibid., 328_{BD}.
19. Nicephorus, Contra Eusebium, ed. Pitra, I, 401.
20. Antirrh.; PG 100:268_B.
21. Ibid., 440, 447.
22. Ibid., 252_B.
23. Ibid., 317_B.
24. John of Damascus, De Haer.; PG 94:764_A.
25. E. Trubetskoi, Umozrenie v Kraskakh (Moscow, 1915-1916; repr. Paris: YMCA Press, 1965); trans. Icons: Theology in Color (New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1973).

4

Monks and Humanists

In 843 the Byzantine Church celebrated the "triumph of orthodoxy" over iconoclasm, a triumph which was interpreted as a victory over all the heresies which until that time had divided Christendom. The document composed for the occasion, the famous Synodikon, commemorates the champions of the true faith, condemns the heretics, and implicitly presupposes that Byzantine society had reached an internal stability which would never allow further division. In fact, new conflicts and crises did occur, and the Synodikon would have to be expanded. But the tendency to freeze history, to consider their empire and Church as expressing the eternal and unchangeable form of God's revelation, would be a permanent and mythological feature of Byzantine civilization, even though it was constantly challenged by historical realities. In the ninth century itself, Byzantine society was, in fact, a divided society divided politically, intellectually, and theologically.

During the entire iconoclastic period, Byzantium had been culturally cut off from the West and fascinated with the military and intellectual challenge of Islam. When, in 787 and in 843, communion was finally re-established with the Church of Rome, the hostile emergence of the Carolingian Empire prevented the restoration of the old orbis Christianorum. Moreover, the resumption of the veneration of icons was a victory of Greek traditions, as distinct from the Oriental, non-Greek cultural iconoclasm of the Isaurians. The result of these historical developments was the emergence of the Byzantine Church from the iconoclastic crisis as more than ever a "Greek" church. It might even have become a purely national church, such as the Armenian, if the empire had not expanded again in the ninth and tenth centuries under the great emperors of the Macedonian dynasty, and if the evangelization of the Slavs and the subsequent expansion of Byzantine Christianity into Eastern Europe, one of the major missionary events of Christian history, had not taken place. Unlike the West, however, where the papacy "passed to the barbarians" after their conversions, Constantinople, the "New Rome," remained the unquestionable and unique intellectual center of the Christian East until 1453. This "Rome" was culturally and intellectually Greek, so much so that Emperor Michael III, in a letter to Pope Nicholas I, could even designate Latin as a "barbarian" and "Scythian" tongue.

The Hellenic character of Byzantine civilization brought into theology the perennial problem of the relationship between the ancient Greek "mind" and the Christian Gospel. Although the issue was implicit in much of the theological literature in the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries, it had not been raised explicitly since the closing of the pagan universities by Justinian. In the ninth century, following the intellectual renewal which had taken place under Theophilus (829-842), the last iconoclastic emperor, Byzantine scholars undertook more vigorously the study of ancient pagan authors. The University of Constantinople, endowed and protected by the Caesar Bardas and distinguished by the teaching of the great Photius, became the center of this first renaissance. Scholars such as Photius, Arethas, and Michael Psellos promoted encyclopedic curiosity and encouraged the copying of ancient manuscripts. Much of our knowledge of Greek antiquity is the direct result of their labors. On the whole, their interest in ancient philosophy remained rather academic, and coexisted easily with the equally academic and conservative theology which predominated in the official circles of the Church. When John Italos, in the eleventh century, attempted a new synthesis between Platonism and Christianity, he immediately incurred canonical sanction. Thus Byzantine humanism always lacked the coherence and dynamism of both Western Scholasticism and the Western Renaissance, and was unable to break the widespread conviction of many Byzantines that Athens and Jerusalem were incompatible. The watchdogs in this respect were the leading representatives of a monasticism which persisted in a staunch opposition to "secular wisdom."

This polarity between the humanists and the monks not only appeared on the intellectual level; it manifested itself in ecclesiastical politics. The monks consistently opposed the ecclesiastical "realists" who were ready to practice toleration toward former iconoclasts and imperial sinners, and toward unavoidable political compromises and, at a later period, state-sponsored doctrinal compromises with the Latin West. Conflicts of this sort occurred when Patriarchs Tarasius (784-806) and Methodius I (843-847) accepted into the episcopate former supporters of official iconoclasm, when the same Tarasius and Nicephorus I (806-815) condoned the remarriage of Emperor Constantine VI, who had divorced his first wife, and when in 857 Patriarch Ignatius was forced to resign and was replaced by Photius. These conflicts, though not formally theological, involved the issue of the Christian witness in the world, and, as such, greatly influenced Byzantine ecclesiology and social ethics.

Theodore the Studite

Theodore was, in the ninth century, both the model and the ideologist of the rigorist monastic party which played a decisive role in the entire life of Byzantine Christendom.

In the preceding chapter Theodore's contribution to the theology of images as an aspect of Chalcedonian Christological orthodoxy was discussed. His impact on the history of monasticism is equally important. Severely challenged by iconoclastic persecutions, Byzantine monasticism had acquired the prestige of martyrdom, and its authority in Orthodox circles was often greater than that of the compromise-minded hierarchy. Under Theodore's leadership it became an organized and articulate bulwark of canonical and moral rigorism.

For Theodore, monastic life was, in fact, synonymous with authentic Christianity:

Certain people ask, whence arose the tradition of renouncing the world and of becoming monks? But their question is the same as asking, whence the tradition of becoming Christians? For the One who first laid down the apostolic tradition also ordained six mysteries: first, illumination; second, the assembly or communion; third, the perfection of the chrism; fourth, the perfections of priesthood; fifth, the monastic perfection; sixth, the service for those who fall asleep in holiness. 1

This passage is important not only because monasticism is counted among the sacraments of the Church in a list strikingly different from the post-Tridentine "seven sacraments" but also, and chiefly, because the monastic state is considered one of the essential forms of Christian perfection and witness. Through detachment, through the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, through a life projected into the already-given reality of the kingdom of God, monasticism becomes an

"angelic life." The monks, according to Theodore, formed an eschatological community which realizes more fully and more perfectly what the entire Church is supposed to be. The Studite monks brought this eschatological witness into the very midst of the imperial capital, the center of the "world," and considered it normal to be in almost constant conflict with the "world" and with whatever it represented. They constituted a well-organized group. Their abbot abhorred the spiritual individualism of the early Christian hermits, and built Studios into a regimented, liturgical, working community, in accordance with the best cenobitic traditions stemming from Basil and Pachomius.

For Theodore and his disciples, "otherworldliness" never meant that Christian action was not needed in the world. Quite to the contrary. The monks practiced and preached active involvement in the affairs of the city so that it might conform itself as far as possible to the rigorous criteria of the kingdom of God as they understood it. The iconoclastic emperors persecuted the monks for their defense of the icons, of course, but also for their attempts to submit the earthly Christian empire to the imperatives and requirements of a transcendent Gospel. Their Orthodox successors, obliged to recognize the moral victory of the monks and to solicit their support, also found it difficult to comply with all their demands. The conflict over the second marriage of Constantine _{VI} (795) which Patriarchs Tarasius and Nicephorus tolerated, but which Theodore and the Studites considered "adulterous" ("moechian schism"), provoked decades of discussion over the nature of oikonomiai.e., the possibility of circumventing the letter of the law for the ultimate good of the Church and of the individual's salvation. This principle, invoked by the council of 809, and discussed at greater length in the next chapter, was challenged by Theodore not so much in itself as in the concrete case of Constantine _{VI} "Either the emperor is God, for divinity alone is not subject to the law, or there is anarchy and revolution. For how can there be peace if there is no law valid for all, if the emperor can fulfill his desires commit adultery, or accept heresies, for example while his subjects are forbidden to communicate with the adulterer or the heretic?" 2

Theodore was certainly not an innovator in his attitude toward the state. For his was the attitude of Athanasius, of John Chrysostom, of Maximus the Confessor, and of John of Damascus, and it would be that of a large segment of Byzantine churchmen in later centuries; it merely illustrates the fact that Byzantine society was far from having found the "harmony" between the two powers about which Justinian spoke in his Novella 6. The action and witness of the monks was always present in Byzantium to demonstrate that true harmony between the kingdom of God and the "world" was possible only in the parousia.

Theodore's ideology and commitments normally led him away from the Constantinian parallelism between the political structure of the empire and the structure of the Church, a parallelism endorsed in Nicaea and best exemplified in the gradual elevation of the bishop of Constantinople to "ecumenical patriarch." Theodore, of course, never formally denied the canonical texts which reflected it but, in practice, often referred to the principle of apostolicity as a criterion of authority in the Church, rather than to the political pre-eminence of certain cities. The support given to the Orthodox party during the iconoclastic period by the Church of Rome, the friendly correspondence which Theodore was able to establish with Popes Leo III (795-816) and Paschal I (817-824), contrasted with the internal conflicts which existed with his own patriarchs, both iconoclastic and Orthodox. These factors explain the very high regard he repeatedly expressed toward the "apostolic throne" of old Rome. For example, he addressed Pope Paschal as "the rock of faith upon which the Catholic Church is built." "You are Peter," he writes, "adorning the throne of Peter." 3 The numerous passages of this kind carefully collected by modern apologists of the papacy⁴ are, however, not entirely sufficient to prove that Theodore's view of Rome is identical to that of Vatican I. In his letters, side by side with references to Peter and to the pope as leaders of the Church, one can also find him speaking of the "five-headed body of the Church,"⁵ with reference to the Byzantine concept of a "pentarchy" of patriarchs. Also, addressing himself to the patriarch of Jerusalem, he calls him "first among the patriarchs" for the place where the Lord suffered presupposes "the dignity highest of all."⁶

Independence of the categories of "this world," and therefore of the state, was the only real concern of the great Studite. The apostolic claim of Rome, but also the no less real, but much less effective, claims of the other Eastern patriarchs, provided him with arguments in his fight against the Byzantine state and Church hierarchies. Still, there is no reason to doubt that his view of the unity of the Church, which he never systematically developed, was not radically different from that of his contemporaries, including Patriarch Photius, who, as we shall see, was always ready to acknowledge the prominent position of Peter among the apostles, but also considered that the authority of Peter's Roman successors was dependent upon, not the foundation of, their orthodoxy. In Rome, Theodore the Studite saw that foremost support of the true faith, and expressed his vision and his hope in the best tradition of the Byzantine superlative style.

The ancient monastic opposition to secular philosophy does not appear in Theodore's writings. Theodore himself seemed even to have liked exercises in dialectics, as his early correspondence with John the Grammarian, a humanist and later an iconoclastic patriarch, seems to show. But the anti-humanist tendency would clearly appear among his immediate disciples, the anti-Photians of the ninth century.

Photius (ca. 820-ca. 891)

The dominant figure in Byzantine religious, social, and political life in the ninth century, Photius is also the father of what is generally called Byzantine "humanism." In his famous Library, an original and tremendously important compilation of literary criticism, he covers Christian writers of the early centuries, as well as a number of secular authors; similarly, in his Responses to Amphilochius, a collection of theological and philosophical essays, he displays a wide secular knowledge and an extensive training in patristic theology.

In all his writings Photius remains essentially a university professor. In philosophy his main interest is logic and dialectics; hence, his very clear predisposition to Aristotle, rather than to Plato. In theology he remains faithful to the positions and problematics of the early councils and Fathers. His love for ancient philosophy does not lead him to any tolerance toward a man like Origen, whose condemnation by the Fifth Council he accepts without reservation, 7 or like Clement of Alexandria, in whose main writing, the Hypotyposeis, Photius found the "impious myths" of Platonism .8

His extensive erudition often provides us with detailed critical analysis of, and exact quotations from, authors about whom, without his notes, we should know nothing. The Christological controversies of the fifth and sixth centuries in particular attracted Photius' attention. Despite his predilection for Antiochian exegesis and for theologians of the Antiochian school,⁹ he remains rigorously faithful to the Cyrillian exegesis of the Council of Chalcedon, which prevailed in Byzantium under Justinian, and devotes long and, for us, precious attention to some of its important spokesmen.¹⁰

On other theological issues, Photius remains in very formal agreement with traditional patristic and conciliar positions. But he does not seem to have accepted fully or to have understood the implications of the absolute apophaticism of a Gregory of Nyssa, and his doctrine of God in relation to creation seems to approach the Latin Scholastic concept of the actus purus.¹¹ But careful analysis of Photius' thought would be required to assert his exact position on this point. In any case, his authority was invoked by the Byzantine anti-Palamites of the fourteenth century against the real distinction between essence and "energy" in God maintained by Palamas and endorsed by the councils of the period.¹² In addition, his devotion to secular learning and his liberal use of oikonomia made him, during his lifetime and after, rather unpopular in monastic circles.

In one aspect, Photius obviously dominated his contemporaries and the Middle Ages as a whole: his sense of history, of historical development, and of tradition. This sense is apparent in every codex (chapter) of the Library. Thus, in analyzing the book of a priest Theodore, who defended the authenticity of the Dionysian writings, Photius carefully lists the arguments against authenticity and concludes with the simple statement that the author "tries to refute these objections and affirms that in his opinion the book of the great Dionysius is genuine."¹³ Even if, on other occasions, Photius takes Dionysian authenticity for granted, the passage just cited clearly shows Photius' intellectual honesty in acknowledging the impossibility of explaining the way in which Dionysius can foretell "traditions which grew old only gradually in the Church and took a long time to develop."¹⁴

This acknowledgment of the development of tradition and also of a possible and legitimate variety in ecclesiastical practices and rules plays a significant role in Photius' attitude toward Pope Nicholas I and toward the Church of Rome. Accused by the pope of having been elevated from the lay state to the patriarchate in six days, a practice forbidden in Western tradition but never formally opposed in the East, Photius writes: "Everyone must preserve what is defined by common ecumenical decisions, but a particular opinion of a Church Father or a definition issued by a local council can be followed by some and ignored by others. . . ." He then refers to such issues as shaving, fasting on Saturdays, and a celibate priesthood, and continues: "When faith remains inviolate, the common and catholic decisions are also safe; a sensible man respects the practices and laws of others; he considers that it is neither wrong to observe them nor illegal to violate them." 15

Photius' concern for the "common faith" and "ecumenical decisions" is illustrated in the Filioque issue. Since modern historical research has clearly shown that he was not systematically anti-Latin, his position in the dispute can be explained only by the fact that he took the theological issue itself seriously. Not only did he place the main emphasis on the Filioque in his encyclical of 866, but even after ecclesiastical peace had been restored with Pope John VIII in 879-880, and after his retirement from the patriarchate, Photius still devoted many of his last days to writing the Mystagogy of the Holy Spirit, the first detailed Greek refutation of the Latin interpolation of Filioque into the Creed.

As the Mystagogy clearly shows, Photius was equally concerned with this unilateral interpolation into a text which had won universal approval, and with the content of the interpolation itself. He made no distinction between the canonical and theological aspects of the issue and referred to the popes, especially to Leo III and to John VIII, who had opposed the interpolation, as opponents of the doctrine of the "double procession." The weakness of Photius' treatment of the issue lies in the fact that he had no access to the sources of Latin theology. He knew, however, that the Latin Fathers favored the Filioque, and refers specifically to Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerome (although the first and the last can hardly be regarded as proponents of the Filioque); but he obviously had not read their writings. His refutation of the Latin position is therefore based on oral information alone.

Whatever its shortcomings and its difficult and sharply dialectical style, the Mystagogy makes clear the basic Byzantine objection to the Latin doctrine of the Trinity: that it understands God as a single and philosophically simple essence, in which personal or hypostatic existence is reduced to the concept of mutual relations between the three Persons. If the idea of consubstantiality requires that the Father and the Son together be the one origin of the Spirit, essence in God necessarily precedes His personal existence as three hypostases. For Photius, however, "the Father is the origin [of the Son and of the Holy Spirit] not by nature, but in virtue of His hypostatic character." 16 To confuse the hypostatic characters of the Father and the Son by attributing to them the procession of the Spirit is to fall into Sabellianism, a modalist heresy of the third century, or rather into semi-Sabellianism. For Sabellius had confused the three Persons into one, while the Latins limit themselves to the Father and the Son, but then fall into the danger of excluding the Spirit from the Godhead altogether.¹⁷

Thus, Photius clearly demonstrates that behind the dispute on the Filioque lie two concepts of the Trinity: the Greek personalistic concept, which considers the personal revelation of the Father, the Son, and the Spirit as the starting point of Trinitarian theology; and the Latin, Augustinian approach to God as a simple essence, within which a Trinity of persons can be understood only in terms of internal relations.

In opposing the Latin view of the Trinity, Photius does not deny the sending of the Spirit through the Son to the world, in the "economy" of salvation, as the link between the deified humanity of Jesus and the entire body of the Church and of creation.¹⁸ He would not be opposed, therefore, to speaking of a procession of the Spirit through, or from, the Son in this last sense. Neither does he oppose the West as such. He repeatedly acknowledges the authority of the Latin Fathers and of the Church of Rome where the interpolated creed was not yet used at the time. He claims and there is no reason to doubt his sincerity to be concerned only with the unity of the East and West in the one, catholic faith defined by the ancient councils. Unfortunately, after him history would drive the two halves of Christendom even further apart, and Photius' fundamental broadmindedness and sense of history would be sorely lacking on both sides.

Michael Psellos (1018-1078)

After the age of Photius, Byzantine intellectuals found a freer and fuller access to the sources of ancient Greek philosophy. With Michael Psellos we discover a personality who is, to a large extent, the product of this early-medieval Byzantine renaissance. Psellos' contribution to theology is actually very limited and only indirect. Since in the accepted Byzantine world-view, religion and philosophy were in fact inseparable, he can and must be mentioned as a major phenomenon in the history of Byzantine Christianity.

"I want you to know," he writes, "that Hellenic wisdom, while it fails to render glory to the divine and is not unfailing in theology, knows nature as the Creator made it."¹⁹ This acknowledgment of the ancients' competence in understanding nature implies a basis for natural theology, a knowledge of the Creator through the creatures. Elements of this approach existed, of course, among the Apologists of the second and third centuries and were developed by Origen and by the Cappadocian Fathers. But, first and foremost, responsible churchmen, they emphasized the religious gap between Christianity and ancient Hellenism. For them Hellenic wisdom was a tool for apologetics, not an end in itself. Occasionally, Psellos himself recognizes this incompatibility; for example, he refutes Plato's concept of a world of ideas subsistent in themselves, and not only in the divine intellect.²⁰ But these reservations come to his mind from explicit and formal definitions of the Church, rather than from any deep conviction. He certainly expresses the true state of his mind more accurately when he writes: "To be born to knowledge I am satisfied with the throes of Plato and Aristotle: they give me birth and form me."²¹

In fact, the rather formal theological conservatism which prevailed in official circles of the Church made possible, in men like Psellos, the resurgence of a Neoplatonism approximately identical to what it had been in the sixth century. In him and his contemporaries there was, in fact, very little true encounter between theology and philosophy. Psellos certainly remained a Christian, but if there is any emotional thrust to his thought, it consists in finding agreement, and not opposition, between Platonism and Christianity, and it is of little concern to him if the agreement is artificial. Psellos is quite happy, for example, to discover the Trinity, as well as the Biblical world of angels and saints, in Homer.²²

This example of formal and artificial adaptation of Hellenism to the Gospel shows the limitations of what has been called Byzantine humanism. It obviously lacked the living stamina which made Western Scholasticism possible after the rediscovery of Aristotle or the Italian Renaissance after the decline of medieval civilization. Even if he knew Plato and Aristotle better than those in the West ever did, Psellos remained a medieval Byzantine i.e., a man committed to tradition, and loyal, at least formally, to the rigid norms of official theology. He was not a great theologian, and his loyalty to official theology prevented him from becoming a really great philosopher. Fundamentally, his thought remains eclectic. The principles of Neoplatonism—fidelity to Aristotle in logic and natural philosophy, coupled with Platonic metaphysics—were precisely appropriate to his frame of mind. "As far as I am concerned," he confesses, "I collected the virtue and the potential of everyone; my reasoning is varied and is a melding of every single idea into one. And I myself am one out of many. If one reads my books, one discovers that they are many out of one."²³

No brilliancy of expression, no exquisite sophistication of style was sufficient to transform this eclecticism into an original and creative system of philosophy. Real creativity and living thought continued in the circles which Psellos considered infested with unhealthy and irrational mysticism. It is doubtful, however, whether Psellos at any time even met or read the most authentic representatives of monastic spirituality, his contempo-aries, such as Symeon the New Theologian. If he had, they would have been unlikely to understand each other at all.

The Trials of John Italos (1076-1077, 1082)

A disciple of Psellos' and his successor as hypatos ton philosophon, i.e., as head of the university, John Italos ("the Italian," probably an Italo-Greek) was formally brought to trial on charges of heresy and condemned for his exaggerated use of ancient philosophy in general and, in particular, for holding Platonic views on the origin and nature of the world. The importance of his two successive trials is emphasized by the fact that, for the first time since 843, new extensive doctrinal paragraphs were added to the Synodikon to be read yearly on the Sunday of Orthodoxy. By condemning Italos, the Byzantine Church thus created a pattern which could be, and indeed was, used in later times.

The published writings of John Italos do not contain all the teachings of which he was accused, but it cannot be excluded a priori that he actually held them in his oral teaching. In any case, the decisions of the synod concerning him have an importance beyond his personality, as a position taken officially by the Church.

In the eleven anathemas referring to the case of Italos in the Synodikon, the first ten are purely doctrinal and were issued in 1076-1077; the final one is a formal personal condemnation published in 1082.²⁴ The doctrinal position taken by the synod concerns two major issues:

- 1) Ancient Greek philosophers were the first heresiarchs; in other words, all the major Christian heresies resulted from their influence and, therefore, the seven councils, by condemning the heretics, also implicitly condemned the philosophers (Anath. 5). Actually, after Tertullian, patristic literature frequently ascribed to philosophy the responsibility for all heresies. The position of the synod, therefore, was not entirely new, but its restatement in the eleventh century was of very great importance for medieval Byzantium. A distinction was admitted, however, between those who accept the "foolish opinions" of the philosophers and those who pursue "Hellenic studies" for instruction only (Anath. 7). The second attitude was not considered automatically wrong. The synodal decision corresponds somewhat to the positive attitude, accepted in conservative circles and present even in Psellos, toward the study of Aristotle's Organon as opposed to the study of Plato. Though Aristotle was generally considered to be a teacher of logic and physics, subjects useful "for instruction," Plato implied a metaphysical stand incompatible with Christianity.

2) The anathemas condemn a series of Platonizing positions attributed to Italos and almost identical with the Origenistic theses rejected by Justinian and the Council of 553: pre-existence and the transmigration of souls, denial of bodily resurrection, eternity of matter, self-subsistent world of ideas, and so forth.

Even after the condemnation of Italos, learned Byzantines continued, of course, to read, to copy, and to study ancient Greek authors, but any attempt to follow the ancients' "foolish opinions" was now automatically a crime against the true faith. No doubt, the decisions of 1076-1077, while clearly encouraging the traditional monastic abhorrence of "Hellenism," constituted a serious new handicap for the development of humanism.

Greek in its language and culture, Byzantium thus took a much more negative stand toward Greek philosophy than the West ever did. On the eve of the period when the West would commit its mind to the philosophy of the ancients and enter the great epoch of Scholasticism, the Byzantine Church solemnly refused any new synthesis between the Greek mind and Christianity, remaining committed only to the synthesis reached in the patristic period. It assigned to the West the task of becoming more Greek than it was. Obviously, this was an option of the greatest importance for the future of theology and for relations between East and West.

Notes

1. Theodore the Studite, Ep. II, 165 (to Gregory); PG 99:1524_B.
2. Theodore the Studite, Ep. I, 36 (to Euprepianus); PG 99:1032_{CD}.
3. Theodore the Studite, Ep. II, 12; PG 99:1152_C.
4. See, for example, S. Salaville, "La primauté de Saint Pierre et du pape d'après Saint Théodore Studite (759-826)," Échos d'Orient 17 (1914), 23-42; and A. Marin, Saint Théodore (Paris: Lecoffre, 1906), p. 1, who calls Theodore "the last Catholic of Byzantium." Similarly, in his letter to Leo Sacellarius (PG 99:1417_c) he wrote: "And who are their [the Apostles'] successors? he who occupies the throne of Rome and is the first; the one who sits upon the throne of Constantinople and is the second; after them, those of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. That is the Pentarchic authority in the Church. It is to them that all decision belongs in divine dogmas" (quoted in F. Dvornik, Byzantium and the Roman Primacy [New York: Fordham University Press, 1966], p. 101).

5. Theodore the Studite, Ep. II, 63 (to Naucratus); PG 99:1281_B.

6. Theodore the Studite, Ep. II, 15; PG 99:1161_{AB}.

7. Photius, Library, codex 8, 18, etc.

8. Ibid., codex 109.

9. See the long article on Diodore of Tarsus, Library, codex 223, and his appreciation of Theodoret of Cyrus, ibid., codex 46.

10. See codices on Eulogius of Alexandria, 182, 208, 225-227, which, in fact, are detailed monographs on this author. On Ephrem of Antioch, see Library, codex 228.

11. "The divine is in the universe both by essence and by energy." Amphil., 75; PG 101:465_{BC}.

12. See Akindynos, Against Palamas, in Codex Monacensis graecus 223, foll. 283_v, 293_v, 298_v, 305, 311_v, etc.

13. Library, codex 1.

14. Ibid.

15. Ep. 2 to Pope Nicholas; PG 102:604_d-605_d.

16. Mystagogy of the Holy Spirit, 15; PG 102:293_A.

17. Ibid., 9, 23; PG 102:289_B, 313_{BC}.

18. Ibid., 94.

19. Michael Psellos, Address to His Negligent Disciples, ed. J. F. Boissonade (Nuremberg, 1838; repr. Amsterdam: Hakkert, 1964), p. 151.

20. Ed. C. Sathas, Bibliotheca graeca medii aevi (Venice, 1872), V, 442.

21. Address to His Negligent Disciples, p. 146.

22. See B. Tatakis, La philosophic byzantine (Paris: Alcan, 1949), p. 199.

23. Michael Psellos, On the Character of Some Writings, ed. J. F. Boissonade, p. 52.

24. See J. Gouillard, Synodikon, pp. 56-60, 188-202.

5

Monastic Theology

The role of the monks in the triumph of Orthodoxy over iconoclasm illustrates their traditional involvement in theological debates in Byzantium; Byzantine monasticism thus appears not only as a school of spiritual perfection, but also as a body which feels responsibility for the content of the faith and for the fate of the Church as a whole. At the same time, the particularity of the monastic polity and ideology, its foundation upon the notion that "the Kingdom of God is not of this world," and its opposition to all compromises with "this world's" requirements, gave rise in Byzantium to a theology which can properly be called "monastic." In contrast with the formal conservatism of official ecclesiastical circles and in opposition to the traditions of secular Hellenism, this theology happened also to be the most dynamic and creative current in Byzantine thought as a whole.

It is well known that, very early in its development, monasticism became a diversified movement. Between the extreme eremitism of Antony of Egypt and the absolute and organized cenobitism of Pachomius, there was a whole scale of intermediary forms of monastic life practiced everywhere in Eastern Christendom and gradually spreading to the West. Between the hermits also frequently called "hesychasts" and the cenobites there was often competition and, at times, conflict; but the entire Eastern monastic movement remained united in its basic "other-worldliness" and in the conviction that prayer, whatever its form, was the fundamental and permanent content of monastic life. Some monastic centers such as the monastery of Studios may have been relatively "activist," developing social work, learning, manuscript copying, and other practical concerns; but, even then, the liturgical cycle of the monastic office remained the absolute center of the community's life and, generally, comprised at least half of the monk's daily schedule.

As a whole, the monastic community taught the Byzantines how to pray. The cenobites developed a liturgical system (which was gradually adopted by the whole Church until today the Eastern Church knows no ordo but the monastic one), while the hesychasts created a tradition of personal prayer and continuous contemplation. In both cases, prayer was understood as a way to reach the goal of Christian life as such: participation in God, theosis through communion with the deified humanity of Christ in the Holy Spirit. The cenobites generally emphasized the sacramental or liturgical nature of this communion, while the hesychasts taught that experience was to be reached through personal effort. In post-iconoclastic Byzantium, the two traditions generally interpenetrated to a greater extent, and we find, for example, that the prophet of personal mysticism, Symeon the New Theologian, spent most of his life in cenobitic communities located in the city of Constantinople. Since theologically and spiritually there was no opposition between the hermits and the cenobites, it is, therefore, possible to speak of a single monastic theology.

1. The Origins of Monastic Thought: Evagrius and Macarius

The role of Evagrius Ponticus (399) in the shaping of early monastic spirituality was recognized by historians early in this century. The authentic text of his Gnostic Centuries, with their quite heretical Christology, explains his condemnation by the Council of 553. Seen as an expression of his metaphysical systema developed Origenism Evagrius' spiritual doctrine itself becomes somehow suspect. But, in the Byzantine tradition taken as a whole, it will be used for centuries out of its original and heretical context; and its extraordinary psychological relevance will be exploited fully. We will mention here two major aspects of Evagrian thought because of their permanence in later tradition: the doctrine of the passions and the doctrine of prayer.

According to Evagrius, the true nature of the "mind" is to be fixed in God, and anything which detaches it from God is evil. Thus, since the Fall, the human mind is captured with self-love, which generates "thoughts"; "thoughts," a definitely pejorative term in Evagrius, imply interest in sensible things and distraction from God. Acting upon the passible part of the soul, they can lead it to passions. These passions form a very definite hierarchy, beginning with the casual attachment to the most inevitable of all human sensible needs, food, and ending with demonic possession, with love for oneself. The eight steps which constitute this hierarchy are: gluttony, fornication, avarice, grief, wrath, weariness, vainglory, and pride. 1 With very slight variations, this classification of the passions and the psychological structure of the human mind which it presupposes will be retained by John Cassian, John Climacus, Maximus the Confessor, and almost all the Eastern ascetical writers. The first goal of monastic "practice" is to subdue the passions and reach a state of "passionlessness" a detachment from senses and "thoughts" which makes a restoration of the true original relationship between the mind and God possible. Beginning with the elementary monastic virtues, fasting and celibacy, the life of the monk can gradually subdue the other passions and reach true detachment.

Union then becomes possible through prayer. It is Evagrius who first coins the term "prayer of the mind" which will become standard in Byzantine hesychasm. Prayer is "the proper activity of the mind,"² "an impassible state,"³ and the "highest possible intellection."⁴ In this "state" of prayer, the mind is totally liberated from every "multiplicity"; it is "deaf and dumb" to every perception of the senses.⁵ According to Evagrius, as we know now, prayer also means that the mind is in an "essential union" with the deity; thus Evagrian monks of the sixth century could boast that they were "equal to Christ." But Evagrius' teaching on prayer will be understood in a much more orthodox way by generations of Byzantine monks, and the credit for this reinterpretation of Evagrian spirituality belongs, in a large degree, to the writings attributed to Macarius of Egypt.

Macarius of Egypt was a contemporary and teacher of Evagrius' in the desert of Scete. Fifty Homilies and several other writings of an unknown author of the early-fifth century have been attributed to Macarius, who, it is now certain, was never a writer. The influence of this anonymous writer, conventionally called "Macarius," was enormous.

While Evagrius identifies man with the "intellect" and conceives Christian spirituality as a dematerialization, Macarius understands man as a psychosomatic whole, destined to "deification." To the Origenistic and Platonic anthropology of Evagrius, he opposes a Biblical idea of man, which makes it inconceivable for the "mind" or the "soul" to have its final destiny in separation from the body. From this anthropology follows a spirituality based upon the reality of Baptism and the Eucharist as ways of union with Christ and of "deification" of the entire human existence in all its aspects, including the corporeal. "The fire which lives inside, in the heart, appears then [on the last day] openly and realizes the resurrection of the bodies."⁶

In Macarius, the Evagrian "prayer of the mind" thus becomes the "prayer of the heart"; the center of man's psychosomatic life, the heart, is the "table where the grace of God engraves the laws of the Spirit";⁷ but it also can be a "sepulcher," where "the prince of evil and his angels find refuge."⁸ The human heart is thus the battlefield between God and Satan, life and death. And the monk devoting his entire existence to prayer chooses, in fact, to be at the forefront of this battle, in a direct and conscious way. For the presence of God is a real fact which the "inner man" perceives "as an experience and with assurance."⁹ In Macarius, just as in some books of the Old Testament, and especially in the Psalms, the role played by the heart is undeniably connected with a physiology which sees in this particular organ the center of the psychosomatic life of man. This means, in practice, that whenever the "heart" is mentioned, the author simply means man's inner personality, the "I" at its very depth. In any case, the "heart" never designates the emotional side of man alone, as it sometimes will in the West.

The notion of the coexistence of God and Satan in the heart of man, and the call for a conscious experience of grace, have led some modern historians to identify the Homilies of Macarius with the writings of a Messalian leader. If this accusation were true, it would involve Macarius, as well as much of the later monastic spirituality of Byzantium, where Macarius enjoyed unquestionable authority and where his ideas, especially the notion of the conscious experience of God, remained dominant. But the exact definition of what Messalianism really means, and the absence in Macarius of some basic Messalian positions such as anti-sacramentalism makes the hypothesis highly improbable. Even if the unknown author of the Macarian Homilies belonged to a tradition which eventually bifurcated between sectarian and orthodox spiritualities, his anthropology and his concept of human destiny were certainly closer to the New Testament than was that of the Evagrian Origenists; and his influence, acting as a Biblical counterpart, contributed indirectly to salvaging for posterity the tradition of pure prayer which, in Evagrius, had a rather dubious context.

2. The Great Spiritual Fathers

An Origenistic spiritualism and Messalian pseudo-prophetism in which prayer and visions are supposed to replace the sacraments were the two main temptations of Eastern Christian monasticism. The examples of Evagrius and Macarius show that in the fourth and fifth centuries it may not have been easy to draw a line in the monastic milieu between the orthodox and the sectarians. After several conciliar decrees against Messalianism (at Side in 390, at Constantinople in 426, and at Ephesus in 431), and the condemnation of Evagrius in 553, confusion became impossible; but clarification had begun to emerge in the monastic milieu itself at the very time when the councils were legislating on the issue. We will mention here briefly three authors of major importance who, after assimilating the major contributions of both the Evagrian and the Macarian traditions, gave to Eastern Christian spirituality its classical forms.

Diadochus, a bishop of Photice in Epirus, in the fifth century, and a participant at the Council of Chalcedon (451), is the author of Gnostic Chapters and of a few minor spiritual works. The title of his principal work betrays his relation to Evagrius; still, the major inspiration of Diadochus' doctrine of prayer approximates Macarius', though at a greater distance from Messalianism than that of the author of the Spiritual Homilies.

Baptism, for Diadochus, is the only foundation of spiritual life:
"Grace

is hidden in the depth of our mind from the very moment in which we were baptized, and gives purification both to the soul and to the body." 10 This concern for the wholeness of man is expressed by a mysticism of the "heart," as opposed to the Evagrian insistence on the "mind." Actually, Diadochus, just like Macarius, locates the mind, or soul, "in the heart":

Grace hides its presence in the baptized, waiting for the initiative of the soul; but when the whole man turns toward the Lord, then grace reveals its presence to the heart through an ineffable experience. . . . And if man begins his progress by keeping the commandments and ceaselessly invoking the Lord Jesus, then the fire of holy grace penetrates even the external senses of the heart. . . .11

Diadochus, on several occasions in his Chapters, clarifies the ambiguity of the Macarian tradition on the issue of the coexistence of God and Satan in the heart; but he is fully in agreement with Macarius in affirming that Christians do, and even must, experience consciously and even "externally" (i.e., not only "intellectually" in the Evagrian sense) the presence of the Spirit in their hearts. His definition of the Christian faith as a personal experience will be appropriated by Symeon the New Theologian and other Byzantine spiritual writers. In the writings of Diadochus, the teaching on incessant prayer, adopted from Evagrius and Macarius, presupposes a constant invocation of the name of Jesus;¹² an essential orientation of spirituality toward the Person of the Incarnate Logos, with a resurgence of the role played in Biblical theology by the concept of the "name" of God, thus replaces in Diadochus the much more abstract and spiritualistic understanding of prayer in Evagrius.

Better known in the West since the Middle Ages and more exalted in the East (where a special celebration in its honor takes place on the Fifth Sunday of Lent), the personality of John Climacus "the author of

The Ladder" abbot of the monastery on Mount Sinai, is another great witness of monastic spirituality based upon invocation of the "name of Jesus." Very little is known of his life, and even the date of his death is not solidly established (it is generally believed to have taken place some time around 649).

His famous book, The Ladder of Paradise, has more definite leanings toward Evagrianism than has the Chapters of Diadochus, as can be seen from its detailed classification of the passions and from the extreme forms of asceticism which John required from his monks and which certainly denote Origenist spiritualism. This extremism pleased the French Jansenists of the seventeenth century, who contributed to the popularity of The Ladder in the West. But John's positive teaching about prayer, like that of Macarius and Diadochus, is centered on the person and the name of Jesus: it thus denotes a purely Christian incarnational foundation, and involves the whole man, not just the "mind."

"Let the memory of Jesus be united to your breathing: then you will understand the usefulness of hesychia." 13 In John, the terms "hesychia" ("silence," "quietude") and "hesychasts" designate quite specifically the eremitic, contemplative life of the solitary monk practicing the "Jesus prayer." "The hesychast is the one who says 'My heart is firm' [Ps 57:8]; the hesychast is the one who says 'I sleep, but my heart is awake' [Sg 5:2]. Hesychia is an uninterrupted worship and service to God. The hesychast is the one who aspires to circumscribe the Incorporeal in a fleshly dwelling. . . ."14

The terminology which John uses will gain particular popularity among the later Byzantine hesychasts, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, with their practice of connecting mental prayer with breathing; it is not a priori impossible that the practice was known in Sinai in the time of John. In any case, he understands "deification" as a communion of the whole man with the transfigured Christ. The "memory of Jesus" meant precisely this, and not a simple "meditation" on the historical Jesus or on any particular episode in His life. Warnings against any evoking, through imagination, of figures external to the "heart" is constant in Eastern Christian spiritual tradition. The monk is always called to realize in himself (his "heart") the objective reality of the transfigured Christ, which is neither an image nor a symbol, but the very reality of God's presence through the sacraments, independent of any form of imagination.

At this point one should understand the necessary and unavoidable link which exists in this tradition between spirituality and theology. If any single author succeeded in formulating this link, he is Maximus the Confessor.

We have already seen the heroic and lonely role of Maximus in the Christological controversy, and his ability to integrate into a consistent Christological and anthropological system the issues which were at stake between the orthodox and the Monothelites. His ability to view the problems of the spiritual life as they arose in his time in the light of the Evagrian and Macarian heritages on one side, and of orthodox Christology on the other, is similarly remarkable.

Origen and Evagrius certainly occupied the first place in Maximus' readings and intellectual formation. In his doctrine of the spiritual life he adopts the Evagrian hierarchy of passions, as well as the concept of "passionlessness," as the goal of ascetic praxis. In Evagrius the detachment from "passions" is a negative achievement, through which a total emptiness from any sensation of the soul or of the body is supposed to be achieved, in order for the mind to realize its divine nature and recover its essential union with God through knowledge; this concept obviously implies an Origenistic anthropology in which any connection of the "mind" with either a "soul" or a "body" is a consequence of the Fall. As a result, in Evagrius, true detachment is also detachment from virtues; and active love itself is superseded by knowledge. In Maximus, however, love is understood, not only as the highest virtue, but as the only true result of detachment. Because of "passionlessness," love can be perfectly equal for all, since human preferences are the result of imperfection. 15 Ultimately, human love, which necessarily includes an element of desire (eros), must be transformed, by a gift of God, and thus become agape.¹⁶

This transformation of the Evagrian spirituality parallels in Maximus a basic modification of Origenism in the doctrine of creation and implies a positive view of man, whose ultimate destiny does not consist of an absorption into God's essence, but in a "natural activity" made possible through a God-given active love. The total transcendence and inaccessibility of the essence of God becomes, in Maximus, before him in Gregory of Nyssa, and after him in later Byzantine theology a matter of Christian faith fundamental for spiritual life.¹⁷ If love, and not "essential gnosis," is the highest goal of spiritual life, man, while united with God, remains totally himself in his nature and activity; but he also enjoys communion with the activity of God, which alone can guarantee his total liberation from "passion" and transform his eros into agape. In Byzantine monastic spirituality, to "follow the commandments," i.e., active love, will therefore remain both a condition and a necessary aspect of the vision of God.

To achieve his balanced understanding of spiritual life, Maximus did not rely only on the monastic spiritual tradition. He was first of all a consistent Chalcedonian, and thus he approached the problem with a fundamental conviction that each nature of Christ keeps, as nature, its characteristics and activity. "Deification" does not suppress humanity, but makes it more authentically human.

3. Opposition to Secular Philosophy

The traditional unpopularity of Byzantium in the Western Middle Ages and in modern times has been somewhat moderated by the recent recognition that it was Byzantine scholars who preserved the treasures of Hellenic antiquity and transmitted them to the Italian Renaissance. If the transmission is, indeed, a fact (all the available manuscripts of the authors of Greek classical antiquity are Byzantine, and often monastic, in origin), it remains that, throughout Byzantine intellectual history, the positive interest in pagan philosophy, which kept reappearing in intellectual circles, was always staunchly opposed, often by the official Church and always by the monks. The official conciliar statements against the "Hellenic myths" the term implies essentially Platonic metaphysics appeared in 553, under Justinian, and later at the condemnation of Italos and at the Palamite councils of the fourteenth century. More subtly, but no less decisively, the gradual abandonment of Origenistic concepts was also a victory of the Bible over the Academy.

In spite of a widespread view that Eastern Christian thought is Platonic, in contrast to Western Aristotelianism, an important corrective must be found in the fact that the above-mentioned condemnations of various forms of Platonism were repeated yearly, as part of the Synodikon of Orthodoxy, in all churches on the First Sunday of Lent. The universities taught Aristotle's logic as part of the "general curriculum" required from students under the age of eighteen; but the pious families prevented their children from continuing their education on a higher level, where students were required to read Plato. This generally explains the ever-recurring remark by hagiographers that saints, especially monks, stopped their education at eighteen to enter monasteries.

In monastic circles, denunciations of "secular philosophy" are constant; and the polarization which occurs in the ninth century between the party of the monastic "zealots" (often followers of Theodore the Studite) on the one hand, and that of the higher secular clergy on the other, is intellectual as well as political. The monks oppose compromises with the state, but they also reject the renaissance of secular humanism. Patriarch Ignatius, Photius' great competitor, supported by the monastic party, is known to have snubbed the promoters of secular philosophy;¹⁸ Symeon the New Theologian writes virulent verses against them;¹⁹ and Gregory Palamas (1359) orients his entire polemic against Barlaam the Calabrian on the issue of the "Hellenic wisdom" which he considers to be the main source of Barlaam's errors. Perhaps it is precisely because Byzantium was "Greek-speaking" and "Greek-thinking" that the issue of Greek philosophy, in its relation to Christianity, remained alive among the Byzantines. In any case, monastic thought continued to remind them of their conversion to the faith preached by a Jewish Messiah and their becoming a "new Jerusalem."

4. Christian Faith as Experience: Symeon the New Theologian

In Macarius and in Diadochus, we noted the identification of the Christian faith itself with a conscious-experience of God. Symeon the New Theologian (949-1022) will be the prophet of that idea in medieval Byzantium. Disciple of a Studite monk, the "New Theologian" a title given to him by his later admirers in order to identify him with John the Evangelist and Gregory of Nazianzus, both often called "Theologians" in Byzantine literature started his monastic life as a novice at the Studion. But the strict regimentation of the big monastery was obviously foreign to his temperament, and he withdrew to the small community of St. Mamas, also in Constantinople, where he was soon elected abbot and ordained priest. His leadership at St. Mamas lasted more than twenty-five years, but ended in a conflict when a monastic party in his community complained to the ecclesiastical authorities about the demands he imposed on his monks. Exiled, then rehabilitated, Symeon spent his last years composing spiritual writings quite unique in their mystical originality, their poetic quality, and their influence on later Byzantine thought. His works include Catechetical Discourses addressed to the monks of St. Mamas, Theological and Ethical Treatises, fifty-eight hymns, and several minor writings.

Symeon has often been classified as a major representative of the hesychast tradition in Byzantium, following in the line of Evagrius and Macarius, and anticipating Gregory Palamas. This classification should be accepted only with reservations, however, since Symeon neither makes any specific mention of "prayer of the mind" nor insists on any clearly formulated theological distinction between "essence" and "energy" in God. But it is clear that Symeon stands for the basic understanding of Christianity as personal communion with, and vision of, God, a position which he shares with hesychasm and with the patristic tradition as a whole. Like all prophets, he expresses the Christian experience without definite concern for precise terminology. It is, therefore, easy to find him at variance with any established tradition, or with any theological system. In the midst of the tradition-minded Byzantine society, Symeon stands as a unique case of personal mysticism, but also as an important witness of the inevitable tension in Christianity between all forms of "establishment" and the freedom of the Spirit.

Often autobiographical, Symeon's writings are centered on the reality of a conscious encounter with Christ; and here, obviously, he follows Macarius. "Yes, I beg you," he addresses his monks, "let us try, in this life, to see and contemplate Him. For if we are deemed worthy to see Him sensibly, we shall not see death; death will have no dominion over us [Rm 6:9]." 20 The notion of "sensible" vision makes Symeon, as well as Macarius, border on Messalianism; but it is generally recognized today²¹ that Symeon's intent differs fundamentally from that of the sectarians who defined "experience" in opposition to the sacramental structure of the Church. What Symeon wants to make clear is that the Kingdom of God has indeed become an attainable reality, that it does not belong only to the "future life," and that, in this life, it is not restricted to the "spiritual" or "intellectual" part of man alone, but involves his entire existence. "Through the Holy Spirit," he writes, "the resurrection of all of us occurs. And I do not speak only of the final resurrection of the body. . . . [Christ] through His Holy Spirit grants, even now, the Kingdom of heaven."²² And in order to affirm that this experience of the Kingdom is not, in any sense, a human "merit," a simple and due reward for ascetic practice, Symeon insists on its "sudden" and unexpected character. In passages where he recalls his own conversion, he likes to emphasize that he was not aware of who was pulling him out of the "mud" of the world to show him finally the beatitude of the Kingdom. 23

Symeon's prophetic insistence that the Christian faith is an experience of the living Christ met with resistance; the legalistic and minimalistic view of Christianity, limiting the faith to the performance of "obligations," seemed much more realistic to monks and laymen alike. For Symeon, these minimalists were modern heretics:

Here are those whom I call heretics [he proclaims in a homily addressed to his community]: those who say that there is no one in our time in our midst who would observe the commandments of the Gospel and become like the holy Fathers . . . [and] those who pretend that this is impossible. These people have not fallen into some particular heresy, but into all the heresies at once, since this one is worse than all in its impiety. . . . Whoever speaks in this way destroys all the divine scriptures. These anti-Christ's affirm: "This is impossible, impossible!"²⁴

Symeon was involved, at the end of his life, in violent conflict with Stephen, a former metropolitan of Nicomedia who had become a syncellus, or administrative official, of the patriarchate, on the issue of the canonization of his spiritual father, Symeon the Pious, which he had performed in his community without the proper hierarchical sanction. The New Theologian was given an opportunity to raise the question of authority in the Church, by opposing the charismatic personality of the saint to that of the institution. His statements on this problem can be very easily interpreted as anti-hierarchical in principle: according to Symeon, if one accepts the episcopate without having received the vision, one is nothing but an intruder.²⁵ On this point, Symeon reflects a frame of mind which had existed in both ancient and Byzantine Christianity, in pseudo-Dionysius, and in the Macarian tradition of monasticism; but the subjectivism, which may be involved in such an interpretation, is an ecclesiological problem in itself.

Here, as always, Symeon is not directly concerned with rationalization; his purpose is to formulate the tension between the Kingdom and "this world," to affirm that the tension between the "institution" and the "event" is built into the very existence of the Church in history. The New Theologian's realistic sacramentalism shows clearly that this tension, not the denial of the sacramental nature of the Church, is his true concern. The Byzantine Church canonized Symeon the New Theologian, and generations of Eastern Christians have seen in him the greatest mystic of the Middle Ages. By so doing, Byzantine Christianity has recognized that, in the Church, the Spirit alone is the ultimate criterion of truth and the only final authority.

5. Theology of Hesychasm: Gregory Palamas

The debates which took place in fourteenth-century Byzantium involved a series of issues, including forms of monastic spirituality. The discussion, however, was fundamentally a theological one: the hesychast method of prayer was debated in the light of earlier tradition concerning knowledge of God, Christology, and anthropology. The endorsement given by the Byzantine Church to the hesychast theologians implied a stand on these basic issues of the Christian faith as well. The debate originated in a confrontation between an Athonite monk, Gregory Palamas (1296-1359), and a Calabrian Italo-Greek "philosopher," Barlaam. At the beginning, the issue was the doctrine of man's knowledge of God and the nature of theology. For Palamas, immediate knowledge of God, in Christ, is available to all the baptized and, therefore, is the real basis and criterion of true theology; Barlaam insisted, however, on the unknowability of God, except through indirect, created means revealed Scripture, induction from creation, or exceptional mystical revelations. In fact, the issue was not radically different from the one which Symeon the New Theologian had debated with certain of his monks, who denied the possibility of a direct vision of God. At a second stage of the debate, Barlaam also attacked, as a form of Messalian materialism, the psychosomatic method of prayer practiced by Byzantine hesychasts.

Although this method is held by some as a return to the origins of monasticism, it appears only in explicit, written documents of the late-thirteenth and early-fourteenth centuries. It is described in particular by Nicephorus the Hesychast, an anonymous author whose Method of Holy Prayer and Attention is attributed, by some manuscripts, to Symeon the New Theologian, and to Gregory of Sinai (1255-1346), who became widely known in Slavic countries. Undoubtedly, the method was widely known, for Gregory Palamas quotes, among its adepts, such major figures of the Church as Patriarch Athanasius I (1289-1293, 1303-1310) and Theoleptus, Metropolitan of Philadelphia (1250-1321/26).²⁶ The method consisted in obtaining "attention" (prosoche) the first condition of authentic prayer by concentrating one's mind "in the heart," retaining each breath, and reciting mentally the short prayer: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy upon me." Parallelisms in non-Christian Eastern spiritual practices are easy to find, and "materialistic" abuses may have occurred among Byzantine monks. But the major representatives of fourteenth-century hesychasm are unanimous in saying that the psychosomatic method is not an end in itself, but only a useful tool for placing a man literally "in attention," ready to receive the grace of God provided, of course, he deserve it by "observing the commandments." Barlaam objected to this method with a Platonic view of man: any somatic participation in prayer can only be an obstacle to a true "intellectual" encounter. The Council of 1341 condemned Barlaam for his attacks on the monks. Still, several Byzantine theologians Gregory Akindynos, Nicephorus Gregoras, and, later, the Thomist Prochoros Cydones continued to protest against the theological positions of Palamas. Palamas, however, received final conciliar endorsement of his theology successively in 1347, 1351, and, posthumously, in 1368, when he was also canonized.

The theological positions of Gregory Palamas may be summarized in the three following points:

1) Knowledge of God is an experience given to all Christians through Baptism and through their continuous participation in the life of the Body of Christ in the Eucharist. It requires the involvement of the whole man in prayer and service, through love for God and neighbor; and then it becomes recognizable not only as an "intellectual" experience of the mind alone, but as a "spiritual sense," which conveys a perception neither purely "intellectual" nor purely material. In Christ, God assumed the whole of man, soul and body; and man as such was deified. In prayer for example, in the "method" in the sacraments, in the entire life of the Church as a community, man is called to participation in divine life: this participation is also the true knowledge of God.

2) God is totally inaccessible in His essence, both in this life and in the future; for only the three divine hypostases are "God by essence." Man, in "deification," can become God only "by grace," or "by energy." The inaccessibility of the essence of God was one of the basic affirmations of the Cappadocian Fathers against Eunomius and also, in a different context, against Origen. Affirming the absolute transcendence of God is only another way of saying that He is the Creator ex nihilo: anything which exists outside of God exists only through His "will" or "energy," and can participate in His life only as a result of His will or "grace."

3) The full force with which Palamas affirms God's inaccessibility and the equally strong affirmation of deification and of participation in God's life, as the original purpose and the goal of human existence, also give full reality to the Palamite distinction between "essence" and "energy" in God. Palamas does not try to justify the distinction philosophically: his God is a living God, both transcendent and willingly immanent, who does not enter into preconceived philosophical categories. However, Palamas considers his teaching to be a development of the Sixth Council decisions that Christ has two natures, or "essences," and two natural wills, or "energies." 27 Fox Christ's humanity itself, enhypostasized as it is in the Logos and thus having become truly God's humanity, did not become "God by essence"; it was penetrated with the divine energy through the circumincessio idiomatum and, in it, our own humanity finds access to God in His energies. The energies, therefore, are never considered as divine emanations, or as a diminished God. They are divine life, as given by God to

His creatures; and they are God, for in His Son He truly gave Himself for our salvation.

The victory of Palamism in the fourteenth century was therefore the victory of a specifically Christian, God-centered humanism for which the Greek patristic tradition always stood, in opposition to all concepts of man which considered him as an autonomous or "secular" being. Its essential intuition that "deification" does not suppress humanity, but makes man truly human, is, of course, greatly relevant for our own contemporary concerns: man can be fully "human" only if he restores his lost communion with God.

Notes

1. Evagrius Ponticus, Praktikos; PG 40:1272-1276.
2. Pseudo-Nilus (Evagrius), De Oratione, 84; PG 79:1185_B.
3. Ibid., 52.
4. Ibid., 34_A.
5. Ibid., 11.
6. Macarius of Egypt, Hom., 11, 1; ed, Dörries, pp. 96-97.
7. Ibid., 15, 20; p. 139.
8. Ibid., 11, 11; p. 103.
9. Ibid., 1, 12; p. 12.
10. Diadochus, Cap. 77, 78; ed. E. des Places, SC, 5 bis (Paris: Cerf, 1955), pp. 135-136.
11. Ibid., 85; pp. 144-145.
12. See ibid., 31, 32, 61, 88.

13. John Climacus, The Ladder of Paradise, Degree 28; PG 88:1112_C.
14. Ibid., Degree 27; PG 88:1097_{AB}.
15. On Evagrius and Maximus, see Lars Thunberg, Microcosm and Mediator: The Theological Anthropology of Maximus the Confessor (Lund: Gleerup, 1965), pp. 317-325.
16. See P. Sherwood, in Maximus the Confessor, The Ascetic Life, ACW 21 (Westminster: Newman, 1955), p. 83.
17. See Lossky, Vision of God, pp. 9-10.
18. Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Preface to the Eighth Council, Mansi XVI, 6.
19. I. Hausherr, ed., in OrientChr 12 (1928), 45.
20. Symeon the New Theologian, Cat. II; ed. B. Krivochéine, Syméon le Nouveau Théologien, Catéchèses, SC 96 (Paris: Cerf, 1963), pp. 421-424.
21. See J. Darrouzès, SC 122, Introduction, p. 26.
22. Symeon the New Theologian, Cat. VI, ed. Krivochéine, pp. 358-368.
23. Symeon the New Theologian, Euch. 2; ed. Krivochéine, pp. 47-73.
24. Cat. 29; ed. Krivochéine, pp. 166-190.
25. Cap. Eth., 6; ed. J. Darrouzès, pp. 406-454.
26. Gregory Palamas, Triads, I, 2; ed. J. Meyendorff, Défense des saints hésychastes, Specilegium Sacrum Lovaniense 30 (Louvain, 1959), p. 99.
27. Synodal Tome of 1351; PG 151:722_B.

6

Ecclesiology: Canonical Sources

In Greek Patristic literature, accepted throughout the entire Byzantine period as the ultimate expression of Church tradition, there was, generally speaking, no systematic treatment of "ecclesiology." This does not mean, however, that such factors of Christian life as Church order, the sacraments, and tradition were not central for the Byzantines. A major source of our knowledge of Byzantine ecclesiological ideas is constituted by ancient canonical texts: conciliar decrees, commentaries, and later synodal legislation. Even imperial laws concerning the Church, inasmuch as they were accepted as guiding principles of ecclesiastical polity, often witness to ecclesiastical consciousness essentially identical to that of the conciliar canons.

Viewed from a juridical point of view, the entire body of Byzantine canonical sources hardly constitutes a coherent whole. The attempts at codification, which we shall mention later, are far from exhaustive and do not eliminate important contradictions. They were never intended to provide the Byzantine Church with a complete corpus juris. Many Western polemicists have pointed to this state of affairs as an essential weakness of Eastern Christianity, which has failed to provide itself with an independent and consistent canon law, and, thus, has surrendered to the power of the state. These judgments, however, have generally taken for granted that the Church is a divine "institution" whose internal existence could be adequately defined in juridical terms, a presupposition which Byzantine Christians did not consider. For them the Church was, first of all, a sacramental communion with God in Christ and the Spirit, whose membership the entire Body of Christ is not limited to the earthly oikoumene ("inhabited earth") where law governs society, but includes the host of angels and saints, as well as the divine head. The management of the earthly Church was certainly recognized as a necessary task, and there the use of juridical terms and concepts was unavoidable; but these concepts never exhausted the ultimate reality of the Church of God, and could be determined occasionally by the councils, or even left to the benevolent and, in principle, Christian care of the emperors.

This attitude did not mean, however, that the Byzantines were either indifferent toward the canons or juridically incompetent. Quite the contrary. They were generally aware that at least certain canons reflected the eternal and divine nature of the Church, and that it was a Christian and absolute duty to obey them. Yet, Roman traditions were always strong enough in Byzantium to maintain almost permanently a series of highly competent ecclesiastical lawyers who advised the emperors on decrees concerning the Church, and also introduced principles of Roman Law into ecclesiastical legislation and jurisprudence. But again, they always understood their role as subordinate to the more fundamental and divine nature of the Church, expressed in a sacramental and doctrinal communion, uniting heaven and earth. And they recognized that there was no canonical legislation in heaven (for if "justification comes by law, then Christ died in vain" [Ga 2:21]), and that their task was a limited one.

1. The Councils and the Fathers

The standard Byzantine canonical collection which will also form the basis of canon law in Slavic countries and in the modern Orthodox Church the so-called Nomocanon in XIV Titles (its origin and development will be mentioned later) contains the following canonical texts of purely ecclesiastical origin:

- i. The Apostolic Canons, an early collection of eighty-five disciplinary rules, which served, in the first half of the fourth century, as a standard canonical text in Syria. Its content, in many ways, reflects the practices of the pre-Nicaean period, but is certainly not of genuinely apostolic origin. A shorter collection (fifty canons) was translated into Latin by Dionysius Exiguus (late-fifth century), and was widely accepted in the West. The introduction of the full series of eighty-five canons into the canon law of the Church of Constantinople was the work of Patriarch John ^{III}, Scholasticus (565-577) and was endorsed by the Quinisext Council (692). The difference between the shorter and the longer collections will play a role in Greco-Latin polemics.

II. The Canons of the Ecumenical Councils:

1. Nicaea (325)20 canons.
2. Constantinople ^I (381)7 canons.
3. Ephesus (431)8 canons.
4. Chalcedon (451)30 canons.
5. The Quinisext (or "Fifth-Sixth") Council; also known as the Council in Trullo and often referred to in Byzantine texts as the "Sixth Council" (692), because its entire canonical corpus was given post factum an "ecumenical" status in being procedurally attributed to the ecumenical councils of 553 and 680102 canons.

6. Nicaea II (787)22 canons.

III. The Canons of Local Councils:

1. Ancyra (314)25 canons.

2. Neocaesarea (314-325)15 canons.

3. Antioch (341)25 canons.

4. Sardica (343)20 canons.

5. Gangra (first half of fourth century)21 canons.

6. Laodicea (fourth century?)60 canons.

7. Constantinople (394)1 canon.

8. Carthage (419)133 (sometimes 147) canons; also known as Codex canonum ecclesiae Africanae, this collection of canons resulted from the continuous legislation by African councils, which was compiled in 419.

9. Constantinople (859-861); also known as "First-Second," because the two councils of 859 and 861 were, for reasons of convenience, considered as a single assembly17 canons.

10. Constantinople (879-880), sometimes referred to as "Eighth Ecumenical"3 canons.

IV. The Canons of the Holy Fathers: The patristic texts gathered in this category were, for the most part, occasional letters or authoritative answers written to individuals. In collections they are often divided, or classified, in "canons." The following authors appear in the

Nomocanon:

1. Dionysius of Alexandria (265).
2. Gregory of Neocaesarea (270).
3. Peter of Alexandria (311)
4. Athanasius of Alexandria (373).
5. Basil of Caesarea (379) [a very authoritative collection of 92 "canons"].
6. Gregory of Nyssa (395).
7. Gregory of Nazianzus (389).
8. Amphilochius of Iconium (395).
9. Timothy of Alexandria (355).
10. Theophilus of Alexandria (412).
11. Cyril of Alexandria (444).
12. Gennadius, ₁ of Constantinople (471).

Later Byzantine collections also include texts by the patriarchs of Constantinople, Tarasius (809), John the Faster (595), Nicephorus (818), and Nicholas III (1084-1111), which also entered the Slavonic Kormchaya Kniga. Obviously, this entire series of authoritative canonical texts is conceived, first of all, as a frame of references and standards, different in kind and in importance. The most important collection of canons is probably that of the Council in Trullo (692), conceived by its convener, Emperor Justinian II, as a first attempt to codify earlier conciliar legislation. Actually, most of these texts including the Apostolic Canons and the Canons of the Fathers receive their authority from the Trullan Council. It must be noted, however, that although the Quinisext is invested with "ecumenical" authority in the Byzantine Church tradition, it has never been received as such in the West. Actually, since it explicitly condemns several Latin liturgical and canonical practices, it already clearly implies an understanding of Church tradition and authority differing from that of the Latin Church.

2. Imperial Legislation

The principle stated earlier about the transitory and relative significance of law in Church polity can serve now as a key for the understanding of the easy and practically unchallenged acceptance in the East of imperial legislation in the field of Church administration, once the emperor himself became a member of the Church and had agreed to protect the basic sacramental and doctrinal principles upon which the Church is built. No text ever gave the emperor the power to define or formulate these principles; but it was universally accepted that he had a responsibility for relating them to the empirical realities of history, and thus to manage, where necessary, the practical affairs of the visible Church. This is the meaning of the famous words attributed to Constantine "I have been established by God as the supervisor of the external affairs of the Church" ¹ and consistently applied in the legislation of Justinian. The Codex and the Novellae contain a set of laws concerning the Church which cover a much wider range of ecclesiastical functions and activities than does the entire conciliar legislation before and after Justinian, A fine example of Justinian's style is his edict of 528 concerning the mode of selecting candidates for the episcopacy:

Taking ever every forethought for the most holy churches and for both honor and glory of the Holy Immaculate and Consubstantial Trinity, through which we have believed that both we ourselves and the common polity will be saved, and also following the holy apostles' teaching . . . , by the present law we ordain that, as often as in any city whatever it should happen that the episcopal see is vacant, a vote by the persons inhabiting the said city should be taken concerning three persons who have borne a character for correct faith and holiness of life and the other virtues, so that from these the most suitable should be selected for the episcopates. . . .2

The famous Novella 6 contains, on the other hand, a full set of bylaws for the Church's existence in the framework of the Roman imperial system.

It was self-evident that, in principle, there could be no contradiction between ecclesiastical canons and imperial laws. Justinian himself ordered that canons had "force of law" 3 (legum vicem, Nov. 131, 1), but later Byzantine commentators admitted the possibility of a contradiction between canons and imperial laws; in that case the canons were to be preferred.⁴ Actually, it is always important to remember that, in spite of all the power which was accorded them in ecclesiastical affairs, the emperors were above neither the dogmas nor the canons of the Church. The explicit denial of doctrinal authority to the emperors by anti-iconoclastic writers like John of Damascus and Theodore the Studite, and the opposition of Patriarch Nicholas I Mystikos (901-907, 912-925) to the uncanonical fourth marriage of Emperor Leo VI (886-912), are among the many examples available. The above reservations in no way exclude the fact that it is impossible to understand Byzantine ecclesiastical polity and consciousness without taking imperial legislation into consideration. After the Code of Justinian, the greatest body of important texts is found among the Leges Novellae, which were promulgated by Justinian and by his successors, especially Leo VI (886-912), as complements to the Code.

Other important collections of laws relevant for the Church are the Ecloga of the Isaurians, issued between 739 and 741, which includes modifications of Justinian's legislation, especially in marriage and divorce laws. Basil I (867-886) published major legislative texts, partly codifying, partly modifying, earlier legislation: the Procheiron, which appeared between 870 and 878, was a handbook for lawyers which, like the Ecloga, contains laws on marriage and on ecclesiastical affairs. A Title VII on forbidden marriages, a Title XI on divorce, a Title ^{xxviii} on qualifications and procedure for clergy appointments. The so-called Basilics, which appeared partly under Basil ⁱ and partly under his successor Leo ^{vi}, reproduced some of Justinian's laws, but omitted others, thus making a selection important for medieval Byzantine and Slavic ecclesiastical practices. The exact character of another text, which also appeared under the Macedonians and was probably drafted by Patriarch Photius, is not so clear: the Epanagoge ("Recapitulation of the Law") is well known for its description of the emperor and the patriarch of Constantinople as "the most exalted and the most necessary members of society"; it also contains legislation on matters of clerical discipline (Titles ^{viii} and ^{ix}), on the legal status of Church property (Title ^x), and on marital law (Titles ^{xvii} and ^{xxi}). It is not quite clear whether the Epanagoge was ever formally promulgated and acquired force of law, but it is often quoted and reproduced in later legal collections. Its scheme of a God-established dyarchy of the emperor and of the patriarch in line with Justinian's theory of "symphony" between Church and state, but exalting in particular the unique position of the "ecumenical patriarch" of Constantinople as a high official of the empire is close to the ideology which prevailed in Byzantium in the ninth century after the victory over imperial iconoclasm. Later, this scheme became a standard program in Slavic countries, where national "patriarchs" shared the dyarchy with various local rulers.

3. Codifications of Ecclesiastical Law

Besides the famous Codex, the era of Justinian naturally saw the appearance of codified ecclesiastical legislation, although various forms of chronological and systematic collections had existed earlier. Both during the reign of Justinian and in the years which followed his death, John III Scholasticus, Patriarch of Constantinople (565-577), a lawyer by formation, contributed most to this codification. He is credited with having composed a Collection of Fifty Titles which divided the conciliar canons according to subjects, as well as a parallel collection of imperial laws, divided into eighty-seven chapters (Collectio LXXXVII capitulorum). The end of the sixth century was marked by the appearance of another, anonymous collection similar to that of John Scholasticus', but subdivided into fourteen Titles, with a parallel collection of imperial laws under the same headings. The anonymous author was familiar with the work of a Western contemporary and colleague, the monk Dionysius Exiguus (555), the author of the first Latin collection of conciliar canons, and adopted from him the "African canonical code," which, as "the canons of the Council of Carthage," enjoyed great authority in Byzantium. The entire work of John Scholasticus, as well as that of the anonymous author, was re-edited and completed in the following centuries in the form of Nomocanons. The principle of this new form of canonical handbook obviously reflects the need of a Byzantine lawyer, canonist, or ecclesiastical official to have under systematically arranged headings the entire active legislation on problems arising in the life of the Church.

The Nomocanon in Fourteen Titles, the final form of which took shape in 883 probably under the supervision of Photius, covered a much greater number of texts, and, in general, gave greater satisfaction to generations of canonists. Moreover, it often served as a basis for later canonical commentaries. Both Nomocanons were translated into Slavic. The Nomocanon in Fourteen Titles served as the basis for the standard Slavic canonical collection in its various versions, the so-called Kormchaya Kniga. Together with the Nomocanons, several canonical reference books circulated in the Byzantine world. A Canonical Synopsis by Stephen of Ephesus, dating probably from the sixth century, later revised and completed, included a commentary by Aristenos. In the fourteenth century, two prominent lawyers of Thessalonica published systematic collections in which canons were clearly separated from imperial laws: Constantine Harmenopoulos, well known by historians of Roman Law for his Hexabiblon, also compiled an Epitome of canons, which served as the appendix to his compendium of civil law; and Matthew Blastares, a priest and monk, produced a canonical "collection," accompanied by several more-recent documents and critical articles on canonical issues.

4. Authoritative Commentaries and Criticism

Under the reign of John II Comnenos (1118-1143), John Zonaras, an encyclopedic Byzantine scholar and historian, composed a commentary on the anonymous canonical collection in fourteen titles. A systematic mind, Zonaras clarifies the canonical texts in order of importance. In doing so, he adopts a logically coherent, but historically artificial, scheme which considers the so-called Apostolic Canons to be of greater authority than conciliar texts, and the decisions of ecumenical councils of greater weight than those of local councils; he attributes the least value to the canons of individual "fathers." The difficulty in applying this logical principle consistently (for ecumenical councils often issued decrees of passing and casual significance, while important doctrinal and ecclesiological points are made in texts which Zonaras would consider "secondary") was undoubtedly felt by Zonaras' contemporary, Alexios Aristenos, the author of a more literal and brief commentary based upon a shortened collection, or epitome, of canons. His aim is mainly to explain the meaning of the texts in their historical setting, rather than to judge their relation to each other and their respective importance.

The third great commentator of the twelfth century, Theodore Balsamon, in his major work based on Photius' Nomocanon in its entirety, pursued a specific task, entrusted to him by Emperor Manuel I Comnenos (1143-1180) and ecumenical Patriarch Michael of Anchialos (1170-1178): a coordination between ecclesiastical and imperial legislation. The task implied, in fact, a codification of the imperial laws, some of which contained contradictions in their stipulations concerning the Church. Balsamon's concrete task involved those instances when a law of Justinian included in the Nomocanon was either omitted or contradicted in the Basilics. As a principle, he gives preference to the Basilics over Justinian and, consequently, in some cases, over Photius' Nomocanon. Balsamon's greater emphasis on imperial legislation in its more recent form does not prevent him from affirming explicitly the precedence of ecclesiastical canons over laws, 5 though in practice he does, at times, overrule clear conciliar definitions by referring to imperial laws.⁶ This emphasis on the role of the emperor prompts Balsamon also to stress the authority of the ecumenical patriarch in general Church affairs; he always visualizes the Church as centralized in the framework of an ideally universal Christian empire.

An abundant canonical literature, whose authors it would be impossible to enumerate here, discussed issues arising from the canons, from imperial legislation, and from the commentaries: this literature, mostly polemical in nature, constitutes one of the major sources for our understanding of Byzantine medieval ecclesiology, which otherwise was not expounded in any systematic way.

One of the major issues arising in this literature is the canonical relationship between the patriarch and the provincial primates, or metropolitans. Actually, the controversies on this issue touched implicitly upon the role of the emperor in Church affairs; for it was an agreed fact that the ecumenical patriarch was not only an ecclesiastical, but a state, official. His secular function was expressed in the right to crown the emperor (a privilege which dated from the tenth century), and through the custom of his assuming the regency in case of need. The patriarch's appointment as a state official formally depended upon an "investiture" by the emperor, which followed an election of three candidates by the synod.⁷ Meanwhile, the texts foresaw no official intervention of the emperor in the election of local metropolitans, and several canons even severely condemned it. Thus, dependence or independence of the metropolitans upon the patriarch as civil servants involved their relation to the emperor as well.

In the tenth century, a discussion arose between Euthymios, Metropolitan of Sardis, who defended the right of the patriarch to choose metropolitans from among the three candidates presented by the synod, and an anonymous author who interpreted the canons as attributing to the patriarch the right of the ordination of the metropolitans, but not that of election. Nicetas, Metropolitan of Amaseia, then wrote a treatise in favor of patriarchal rights.⁸

It seems that the debate ended in favor of imperial and patriarchal centralization, an idea which had also been expressed in Balsamon's commentaries (particularly on Canon 28 of Chalcedon). But, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, as the imperial power weakened, the patriarchate acquired greater prestige independent of the empire. A series of patriarchs of the Paleologan period simultaneously asserted a greater independence from the state and a wider authority over the metropolitans. Patriarch Athanasius I (1289-1293, 1303-1310) even dismissed the synod altogether. His unedited correspondence and encyclicals offer a considerable canonical and ecclesiological interest.⁹ The example of Athanasius will be followed by the patriarchs of the fourteenth century, especially Callistos and Philotheos, with their concept of "universal leadership" (kēdemonia panton), which they attribute to the patriarch of Constantinople, and which is reflected in the patriarchal Acts of their time.

5. Synodal and Patriarchal Decrees

During the entire Byzantine period, the patriarch of Constantinople was the de facto head of the Eastern Church as a whole. His authority was first described as a "privilege of honor after the Bishop of Rome" (Second Ecumenical Council, Canon 3); the Fourth Council in its famous Canon 28 spoke of privileges "equal" to those of Rome and gave to the bishop of the capital a wide patriarchal jurisdiction, as well as a right to receive appeals against the judgments of regional primates. These privileges and rights were based only on the prestige of the "imperial city" and never led to any notion of patriarchal infallibility. It was inevitable, however, that major doctrinal issues were solved in Constantinople by the patriarch and the bishops who, around him, constituted a permanent synod. More representative assemblies, sometimes presided over by the emperor and including the other Eastern patriarchs or their delegates, met on exceptional occasions to solve the more important issues. Major decisions of this permanent magisterium are included in the Synodikon of Orthodoxy, a lengthy liturgical text which, since 843, has been read in all churches on the First Sunday of Lent and commemorates the end of iconoclasm. The Synodikon in its various versions and the documents issued by the patriarchal synod are primary sources for our knowledge of Byzantine ecclesiological self-understanding.

Beginning with a solemn thanksgiving for the triumph of Orthodoxy over "all heresies," the text of the Synodikon contains a particular commemoration of the defenders of the true faith during the iconoclastic period; it adds praises for the orthodox patriarchs of the subsequent period and, finally, anathemas against various heretics. Since the end of the ninth century, the document has received some additions as a result of several later doctrinal disputes, which were solved by synodal decrees in Constantinople.

The listing of the patriarchs for the period between 715 and 1416 is, in itself, an important witness to the ways in which various internal and external problems were solved. The successive mention of Ignatius,

Photius, Stephen, Anthony, Nicholas, and Euthymius as "orthodox patriarchs of eternal memory" 10 shows that the famous schisms which occurred in the ninth and tenth centuries between Ignatius and Photius, and between Nicholas and Euthymius, and the mutual excommunications which ensued, were simply considered as not having taken place. But the omission among the names of the patriarchs of the late-thirteenth century of the names of Nicephorus II (1260-1261), Germanus III (1265-1267), John XI Beccos (1275-1282), Gregory II of Cyprus (1283-1289), and John XII Cosmas (1294-1303) reflects the rejection of the Union of Lyons (1274) and the terms of the reconciliation of the "Arsenites" with the official Church in 1310. The Arsenites had refused to recognize the deposition of Patriarch Arsenius Autoreianus in 1260, and obtained in 1310 his full rehabilitation, as well as a partial damnatio memoriae for several of his successors.¹¹

The Synodikon also portrays the Byzantine magisterium in action against the Platonism of John Italos (1076-1077, 1082), as well as the Christological deviations of John's contemporary, Nilus the Calabrian, those of Eustratius of Nicaea (1117), Soterichos Panteugenos (1155-1156), Constantine of Corfu, and John Eirenikos (1169-1170), and, finally, the solution given to the great doctrinal disputes on "deification" and the "energies" in the fourteenth century. The Acts of the patriarchal synod, unfortunately, are not preserved for the entire period, but only for the last two centuries of the Byzantine Empire. They represent an inexhaustible source of information on Church-state relations, canonical procedures, and the practice of oikonomia, one of the important illustrations of the manner in which the Byzantines understood the relationship of law and grace in the Christian Church.

6. Oikonomia

In both historical and theological literature, the principle of oikonomia is often referred to to illustrate the particularly Byzantine ability to interpret the law arbitrarily to suit political or personal purposes. Such a use betrays an obvious misunderstanding of the term, and is an injustice both to the principle itself and to its proper application. The term oikonomia does not belong originally to legal vocabulary; meaning "household management," it designates in the New Testament the divine plan of salvation: "He has made known to us in all wisdom and insight the mystery of his will, according to his purpose which he set forth in Christ as a plan [oikonomia] for the fullness of time, to recapitulate all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth" (Ep 1:9-10; v. also 3:2-3). But this divine plan for the management of history and of the world has been entrusted to men. For Paul, preaching of the word is an oikonomia, entrusted by God (1 Co 9:17), and, therefore, we should be regarded as "servants of Christ and stewards [oikonomoi] of the mysteries of God" (1 Co 4:1). More specifically, the "management" or "stewardship" belongs to those who fulfill the ministry of leading the Church: "The Church, of which I became a minister according to the divine office [oikonomia] which was given to me for you" (Col 1:24-25). In the Pastorals, the oikonomia belongs particularly to the episkopos: "For a bishop, as God's steward [oikonomos], must be blameless" (Tt 1:7).

Among the Greek Fathers, oikonomia has the standard meaning of "incarnation history," especially during the Christological controversies of the fifth century. In a subsidiary way it is also used in canonical texts, and then, obviously, places the pastoral "management" entrusted to the Church in the context of God's plan for the salvation of mankind. Thus, in his famous Letter to Amphilochius, which became an authoritative part of the Byzantine canonical collections, Basil of Caesarea, after reaffirming the Cyprianic principle about the invalidity of baptism by heretics, continues: "If, however, this becomes an obstacle to [God's] general oikonomia, one should again refer to custom and follow the Fathers who have managed [the Church]." The "custom" to which Basil refers was current "in Asia," where "the management of the multitude" had accredited the practice of accepting baptism by heretics. In any case, Basil justifies "economy" by the fear that too much austerity will be an obstacle to the salvation of some.¹² In the Latin versions of the New Testament, and in later ecclesiastical vocabulary, the term oikonomia is very consistently translated by dispensatio. In Western canon law, however, the term dispensatio acquired a very definite meaning of "exception to the law granted by the proper authority." The text of Basil quoted above, and innumerable references to oikonomia in Byzantine canonical literature, clearly interpret it in a much wider sense. What is at stake is not only an exception to the law, but an obligation to decide individual issues in the general context of God's plan for the salvation of the world. Canonical strictures may sometimes be inadequate to the full reality and universality of the Gospel, and, by themselves, do not provide the assurance that, in applying them, one is obedient to the will of God. For the Byzantines to use an expression of Patriarch Nicholas Mystikos (901-907, 912-925) oikonomia is "an imitation of God's love for man"¹³ and not simply an "exception to the rule."

Occasionally, oikonomia whether the word itself is used or not becomes part of the rule itself. Canon 8 of Nicaea, for example, specifies that Novatian bishops be received as bishops whenever the local episcopal see is vacant, but that they be accepted as priests, or chorepiskopoi, when a Catholic bishop already occupies the local see. In this case, the unity and welfare of the Church are concepts which supersede any possible notion of the "validity" of ordination outside the canonical boundaries of the Church, and oikonomia i.e., God's plan for the Church represents a living flexibility extending beyond a legalistic interpretation of sacramental validity.

Oikonomia, on the other hand, plays an important role in Byzantine marriage law. This law, as we shall see later, aims fundamentally at expressing and protecting the notion that the unique Christian marriage, a sacramental reality, is projected "in reference to Christ and the Church" (Ep 5:32) into the eternal Kingdom of God. Marriage, therefore, is not simply a contract, which is indissoluble only while both parties remain in this world, but an eternal relationship not broken by death. In accordance with St. Paul (1 Co 7:89), second marriage is tolerated, but not considered "legitimate" in itself, whether it is concluded after the death of one partner or after a divorce. In both cases, it is tolerated twice only "by economy," as a lesser evil, while a fourth marriage is excluded.

Of its nature, oikonomia cannot be defined as a legal norm, and practical misuses and abuses of it have frequently occurred. Throughout its entire history, the Byzantine Church has known a polarization between a party of "rigorists," recruited mainly in monastic circles, and the generally more lenient group of Church officials supporting a wider use of oikonomia, especially in relation to the state. In fact, oikonomia, since it permits various possible ways of implementing the Christian Gospel practically, implies conciliation, discussion, and, often, unavoidably, tension. By admitting representatives of the two groups in the catalogue of its saints Theodore the Studite, as well as the patriarchs Tarasius, Nicephorus, and Methodius; Ignatius, as well as Photius the Church has given credit to them all, as long as it recognized that the preservation of the orthodox faith was their common concern. In fact, no one in Byzantium ever denied the principle of oikonomia; rather everyone agreed with Eulogius, Patriarch of Alexandria (581-607), when he wrote: "One rightly can practice oikonomia whenever pious doctrine remains unharmed." 14 In other words, oikonomia concerns the practical implications of Christian belief, but it never compromises with the truth itself.

Notes

1. De Vita Constantini, 4, 24; PG 20:1172_{AB}.
2. Codex Justinianus I, 3, 41; English text in P. R. Coleman-Norton, Roman State and Christian Church, III (London: SPCK, 1966), no. 579, p. 1017.
3. Novella 131, 1.
4. Balsamon, Commentary on Nomocanon, I, 2; PG 104:981_C.
5. Ibid.
6. See his commentary on Laodicea 58 and Quinisext 59 forbidding celebration of sacraments in private homes, but overruled by Novella 4 of Leo VI; ed. cit., II, 440; See Les nouvelles de Léon VI, edd. P. Noailles and A. Dain (Paris: Belles Lettres, 1944), pp. 20-21.

7. Constantine Porphyrogenctos, De ceremoniis, II, 14; PG 112:1044_A; Symeon of Thessalonica, De sacris ordinibus; PG 155:440_D.
8. All texts and French translation in J. Darrouzès, Documents inédits d'écclesiologie byzantine (Paris: Institut français d'études byzantines, 1966).
9. R. Guiland, "Correspondance inédite d'Athanase, patriarche de Constantinople," Mélanges Diehl 1 (Paris, 1930), pp. 131-140; M. Banescu, "Le patriarche Athanase I et Andronic II," Académie roumaine, Bulletin de la section historique 23 (1942), 1-28.
10. Synodikon, ed. J. Gouillard, II, 103.
11. On the Arsenites, see I. Troitsky, Arseny i Arsenity (St. Petersburg, 1874; repr. London: Variorum, 1973 [with introduction and bibliographical updating by J. Meyendorff]).
12. Basil of Caesarea, Ep. ad Amphiloichium; PG 32:669_B.
13. Nicholas Mystikos, Ep. 32 (to the pope), ed. A. Mai, Spieilegium Romanum 10 (1844), 300; PG 111:213_A.
14. Eulogius, quoted by Photius in Library, 227; ed. R. Henry (Paris: Belles Lettres, 1965), 4:112.

7

The Schism Between East and West

The christological controversies of the fifth century, as we have seen, provoked a final break between Byzantine Christendom and the other ancient spiritual families of the East: Syriac, Egyptian, and Armenian. The Greeks and the Latins remained alone, in their common faithfulness to Chalcedon, as the two main cultural expressions of Christianity inside the Roman world. The schism which finally separated them cannot be identified with any particular event or even be dated precisely. Political opposition between Byzantium and the Frankish Empire, gradual estrangement in thought and practice, divergent developments in both theology and ecclesiology, played their respective parts in this process. But in spite of the historical factors which pushed the two halves of Christendom further and further apart, there were political forces working in favor of union: the Byzantine emperors, for example, systematically tried from the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries to re-establish ecclesiastical communion with Rome and thus gain Western support against the Turks.

In fact, neither the schism, nor the failure of the attempts at reunion can be explained exclusively by socio-political or cultural factors. The difficulties created by history could have been resolved if there had been a common ecclesiological criterion to settle the theological, canonical, or liturgical issues keeping the East and the West apart. But the medieval development of the Roman primacy as the ultimate reference in doctrinal matters stood in obvious contrast with the concept of the Church prevailing in the East. Thus, there could not be agreement on the issues themselves, or on the manner of solving them, as long as there was divergence on the notion of authority in the Church.

1. The Filioque

The Byzantines considered the Filioque issue as the central point of disagreement. In their eyes, the Latin Church, by accepting an interpolated creed, was both opposing a text adopted by the ecumenical councils as the expression of the universal Christian faith, and giving dogmatic authority to an incorrect concept of the Trinity. Among the Byzantines, even the moderates, like Peter, Patriarch of Antioch, who objected to the systematic anti-Latinism of his colleague in Constantinople, Michael Cerularius, considered the interpolation as an "evil, and even the worst of evils." 1

Generally, the Byzantines lacked a full knowledge of the complicated historical circumstances which led to the acceptance of the Filioque in the West: the interpolation of the creed in Spain in the sixth century as a means of strengthening the anti-Arian position of the Spanish Church; the spreading of the interpolated creed in the Frankish Empire; Charlemagne's use of it in his anti-Greek polemic; the post factum reference by Frankish theologians to Augustine's De Trinitate to justify the interpolation (which Augustine never envisaged), and, finally, the acceptance of the Filioque in Rome, probably in 1014. Photius offered the first open Greek refutation in 866, when he saw in the interpolated creed not only an alteration by some Frankish "barbarians" in the distant West, but also a weapon of anti-Byzantine propaganda among the nearby Bulgarians, who had recently been converted to Christianity by the Greeks and for whom the Byzantine patriarch considered himself directly responsible.

In his encyclical to the Eastern patriarchs (866), Photius considers the Filioque as the "crown of evils" introduced by the Frankish missionaries in Bulgaria.² We have already seen that his major theological objection to the interpolation was that it presupposed a confusion of the hypostatic characters of the Persons of the Trinity and was, therefore, a new form of modalism, or "semi-Sabellianism." After the Council of 879-880, which solemnly confirmed the original text of the creed and formally anathematized anyone who would either "compose another confession of faith" or corrupt the creed with "illegitimate words, or additions, or subtractions,"³ Photius considered himself fully satisfied. To celebrate what he considered a final victory of Orthodoxy, he composed a detailed refutation of the doctrine of the "double procession" in his famous Mystagogy in which he also praised Pope John VIII for having made the triumph possible.⁴

After the final adoption of the Filioque in Rome and throughout the West, the issue was bound to be raised at every encounter, polemical or friendly, between Greeks and Latins. Byzantine literature on the subject is extremely voluminous and has been reviewed in reference works by Martin Jugie, Hans-Georg Beck, and others. The arguments raised by Photius "the Filioque is an illegitimate interpolation," "it destroys the monarchy of the Father" and "relativizes the reality of personal, or hypostatic existence, in the Trinity" remained at the center of the discussion. But often, the controversy was reduced to an interminable enumeration by both sides of patristic texts collected in favor of the respective positions of the Greeks and of the Latins.

The battles around ancient authorities often concentrated on texts by those Fathers especially Athanasius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Epiphanius of Cyprus whose main concern was anti-Arian or anti-Nestorian polemics, i.e., the establishment of Christ's identity as the eternal and pre-existing divine Logos. In reference to the Holy Spirit, they unavoidably used expressions similar to those also adopted in sixth-century Spain where the interpolation first appeared. Biblical texts, such as John 20:22 ("He breathed on them and said: Receive the Holy Spirit"), were seen as proofs of the divinity of Christ: if the "Spirit of God" is also the "Spirit of Christ" (cf. Rm 8:9), Christ is certainly "consubstantial" with God. Thus it is also possible to say that the Spirit is the "proper" Spirit of the Son, ⁵ and even that the Spirit "proceeds substantially from both" the Father and the Son.⁶ Commenting upon these texts and acknowledging their correspondence with Latin patristic thought, Maximus the Confessor rightly interprets them as meaning not that "the Son is the origin of the Spirit," because "the Father alone is the origin of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," but that "the Spirit proceeds through the Son, expressing thus the unity of nature."⁷ In other words, from the activity of the Spirit in the world after the Incarnation, one can infer the consubstantiality of the three Persons of the Trinity, but one cannot infer any causality in the eternal personal relationships of the Spirit with the Son.

However, those whom the Byzantines called Latinophrones the "Latin-minded" and especially John Beccos (1275-1282), enthroned as patriarch by Emperor Michael VIII Paleologus with the explicit task of promoting in Byzantium the Union of Lyons (1274), made a significant effort to use Greek patristic texts on the Spirit's procession "through the Son" in favor of the Latin Filioque. According to the Latinophrones, both "through the Son" and "from the Son" were legitimate expressions of the same Trinitarian faith.

The usual counter-argument of the Orthodox side was that in Biblical or patristic theology procession "from" or "through" the Son designates the charismata of the Spirit, and not His hypostatic existence.⁸ For indeed pneuma can designate the giver and the gift; and, in the latter case, a procession of the "Spirit" from or through the Son i.e., through the Incarnate, historical Christ happens in time, and thus does not coincide with the eternal procession of the Spirit from the hypostasis of the Father, the only "source of divinity."

This counter-argument was recognized as insufficient, however, by the major Orthodox Byzantine theologians of the thirteenth and the fourteenth centuries. Gregory of Cyprus, a successor of Beccos' on the patriarchal throne (1283-1289) and chairman of the council (1285) which officially rejected the Union of Lyons, had this assembly approve a text which, while condemning the Filioque, recognized an "eternal manifestation" of the Spirit through the Son.⁹ What served as a background to the council's position is the notion that the charismata of the Spirit are not temporal, created realities, but the eternal, uncreated grace or "energy" of God. To this uncreated divine life, man has access in the body of the Incarnate Logos. Therefore, the grace of the Spirit does indeed come to us "through" or "from" the Son; but what is being given to us is neither the very hypostasis of the Spirit nor a created, temporal grace, but the external "manifestation" of God, distinct from both His persons and His essence. The argument was also taken over and developed by Gregory Palamas, the great Byzantine theologian of the fourteenth century, who, like Gregory of Cyprus, formally recognizes that as energy, "the Spirit is the Spirit of Christ, and comes from Him, being breathed and sent and manifested by Him, but in His very being and His existence, He is the Spirit of Christ, but is not from Christ, but from the Father." 10

As time went on, it became increasingly clear that the Filioque dispute was not a discussion on words for there was a sense in which both sides would agree to say that the Spirit proceeds "from the Son" but on the issue of whether the hypostatic existence of the Persons of the Trinity could be reduced to their internal relations, as the post-Augustinian West would admit, or whether the primary Christian experience was that of a Trinity of Persons, whose personal existence was irreducible to their common essence. The question was whether tri-personality or consubstantiality was the first and basic content of Christian religious experience. But to place the debate on that level and to enter into a true dialogue on the very substance of the matter, each side needed to understand the other's position. This unfortunately never occurred. Even at the Council of Florence, where interminable confrontations on the Filioque issue took place, the discussion still dealt mainly with attempts at accommodating Greek and Latin formulations. The council finally adopted a basically Augustinian definition of the Trinity, while affirming that the Greek formulations were not in contradiction with it. This, however, was not a solution of the fundamental issue.

2. Other Controversies

Photius, in his encyclical of 867, also had criticized several liturgical and canonical practices introduced by Frankish missionaries in Bulgaria (opposition to a married priesthood, confirmation performed only by bishops, fasting on Saturdays), but his criticism was directed at the fact that the missionaries were requiring from the newly-baptized Bulgarians complete abandonment of Greek usages. He did not yet consider diversity in practice and discipline as an obstacle to Church unity. The Latin interpolation of the creed and the doctrine which it reflected were the only doctrinal issues which, according to Photius, were leading to schism.

This attitude will generally predominate among the best theologians of Byzantium. Peter of Antioch (ca. 1050) and Theophylact of Bulgaria (ca.

1100) explicitly state that the Filioque is the only issue dividing East and West. And even at a later period, when the separate development of the two theologies was bound to create new problems, one finds many prominent Byzantines failing to raise any issue in their anti-Latin treatises other than that of the procession of the Holy Spirit.

On the less enlightened level of popular piety, however, polemics took a sharper tone and were often oriented toward peripheral issues. When well-intentioned, but ill-informed, Frankish reformers in Bulgaria under Photius, or in Italy under Michael Cerularius, attacked the practices of the Greek Church, the Church often answered with a counterattack on Latin discipline and rites. Thus, the schism of the eleventh century was almost exclusively a dispute about ritual practices. In addition to the issues quoted by Photius, Michael Cerularius mentions among "Latin heresies" the use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist, the leniency of the Latin fast, baptism by one and not three immersions, and other similar issues. 11

Cerularius' list of heresies was frequently repeated, and often expanded, by later polemicists. Of the problems mentioned in the list, however, the only one to be viewed consistently by the Greeks as a theological issue and even sometimes placed on a level of importance comparable to that of the Filioque is that of the azymes, the use of unleavened bread in the Latin Eucharistic celebration. Thus, in the late Middle Ages, Greek and Slavic peoples often characterized the Latins as azymites.

The arguments brought against the Latin practice by Cerularius' friends and contemporaries Leo of Ohrid and Nicetas Stethatos and repeated by their successors can be reduced to three: (1) the use of unleavened bread is Judaic; (2) it contradicts the historic evidence as recorded in the Synoptics (Jesus took "bread"); and (3) its symbolic value is that of "death," not of "life," for yeast in the dough is like the soul in the body. The weakness of these arguments requires no demonstration. The second point in particular implies the solution of several exegetical and historical problems: Was the Last Supper a paschal meal? In that case unleavened bread would have been used. Or did Jesus deliberately violate the law in order to institute a "new" covenant? Can the word artos, which normally designates ordinary bread, also mean "unleavened bread"?

The third argument was also raised by Greek polemicists in the Christological context of anti-Armenian polemics. Nicetas Stethatos himself was involved in arguments against the Armenians, who, after the conquests of the Macedonian emperors of the tenth century, were in close contact with Byzantium. The Armenians were using unleavened bread in the Eucharist, and the Greeks drew a parallel between this practice and the Monophysite, more precisely, Apollinarian Christology of the Armenians: bread, symbolizing Christ's humanity, in order to reflect Chalcedonian orthodoxy, must be "animated" and dynamic, in full possession of the living energies of humanity. By imitating the Monophysite Armenians in their use of the "dead" azymes, the Latins themselves were falling into Apollinarianism, and denying that Christ, as man, had a soul. Thus, during the Middle Ages and afterward, in Greek and Slavic countries, Latins were considered as having fallen into the "Apollinarian heresy": the charge appears, for example, in the writings of the monk Philotheus, the famous Russian sixteenth-century ideologist of "Moscow, the third Rome."

After the late-thirteenth century, the growing Scholastic precisions, which appeared in contemporary Latin theology, concerning the fate of the souls after death and purgatory fire, were reflected in the various encounters between Latin and Greek theologians. The unionist Profession of Faith, which had to be signed by Emperor Michael ^{VIII} Paleologus (1259-1282), included a long clause alarming that the souls, before enjoying the fruits of repentance in heaven, "were purified after death through the fire of Purgatory" and that prayer for the departed was able to alleviate their "pains." ¹² Although the Byzantine tradition had always acknowledged that prayers for the dead were both licit and necessary, that the solidarity of all the members of the Body of Christ was not broken by death, and that, through the intercession of the Church, the departed could get closer to God, it ignored the notion of redemption through "satisfaction," of which the legalistic concept of "purgatory pains" was an expression. On this point most Byzantine theologians were more puzzled than impressed by the Latins, and they never succeeded in placing the issue in the wider context of the doctrine of salvation, the only level on which a successful refutation and alternative could be found. Even in Florence, where, for the first time, a prolonged dialogue on the issue took place, the discussion was limited to particulars and was never concerned with the notion of redemption as such.¹³ It ended with the weary acceptance, by the Greek majority, of a detailed and purely Latin definition of the issue.

In the decades preceding the Council of Florence, the growing knowledge among Byzantines of the Latin liturgical practices led to the emergence of another issue between the churches, that of the relationship in the Eucharist canon between the words of institution and the invocation of the Spirit, or epiclesis. Reproaching the Latins for the absence of an epiclesis in the Roman canon of the Mass, Byzantine polemicists pointed out the fact that all sacramental acts are effected through the Holy Spirit. Nicholas Cabasilas (before 1391), the famous spiritual writer, in his Explanation of the Divine Liturgy,¹⁴ invokes in favor of this point the authority of the Latin rite itself, whose Christian authenticity he thus explicitly recognizes. He recalls that an invocation of the Spirit is part of the Latin rite of ordination and that the Roman Mass includes in the oration supplices te rogamus a prayer for the gifts, which follows the words of institution, a fact which, according to Cabasilas, means that the words of institution are not consecratory in themselves. Whatever the strength of this last argument, it is clear that the Greek insistence on an explicit invocation of the Spirit is very much in line with the traditional patristic theology of the sacraments, especially when it considers the epiclesis not as a "formula" of consecration, opposed to the Latin one, but as the normal and necessary fulfillment of the Eucharistic prayer, of which the words of institution also constitute a fundamental part.

3. Authority in the Church

Most of the controversy which set Greek against Latin in the Middle Ages could have been solved easily if both churches had recognized a common authority able to solve the unavoidable differences created by divergent cultures and historical situations. Unfortunately, behind the various doctrinal, disciplinary, and liturgical disputes stood an ecclesiological dichotomy. Any historian today would recognize that the medieval papacy was the result of a long doctrinal and institutional development in which the Eastern Church had either no opportunity or no desire to participate. Orthodox and Roman Catholics still argue whether this development was legitimate from the point of view of Christian revelation.

The reformed papacy of the eleventh century used a long-standing Western tradition of exegesis when it applied systematically and legalistically the passages on the role of Peter (especially Mt 16:18, Lk 22:32, and Jn 21:15-17) to the bishop of Rome. This tradition was not shared by the East, yet it was not totally ignored by the Byzantines, some of whom used it occasionally, especially in documents addressed to Rome and intended to win the popes' sympathy. But it was never given an ultimate theological significance. The personal role of Peter as the "rock" upon which the Church was built was readily recognized by Byzantine ecclesiastical writers. Only late polemicists, systematically anti-Latin, tended to diminish it; but this was not the case among the most enlightened of the Byzantine theologians. Thus, according to Photius, Peter is "the chief of the apostolic choir, and has been established as the rock of the Church and is proclaimed by the Truth to be keybearer of the Kingdom of Heaven." 15 Numerous passages, similar to that of Photius, can be found in Byzantine ecclesiastical literature and hymnography. Their true significance, however, cannot be understood apart from more general presuppositions on the nature of the Christian faith and the manner of its preservation and continuity in the Church.

Origen, the common source of patristic exegetical tradition, commenting on Matthew 16:18, interprets the famous logion as Jesus' answer to Peter's confession: Simon became the "rock" on which the Church is founded because he expressed the true belief in the divinity of Christ. Origen continues: "If we also say 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God,' then we also become Peter . . . for whoever assimilates to Christ, becomes rock. Does Christ give the keys of the kingdom to Peter alone, whereas other blessed people cannot receive them?" 16 According to Origen, therefore, Peter is no more than the first "believer," and the keys he received opened the gates of heaven to him alone: if others want to follow, they can "imitate" Peter and receive the same keys. Thus the words of Christ have a soteriological, but not an institutional, significance. They only affirm that the Christian faith is the faith expressed by Peter on the road to Caesarea Philippi. In the whole body of patristic exegesis, this is the prevailing understanding of the "Petrine" logia, and it remains valid in Byzantine literature. In the twelfth-century Italo-Greek homilies attributed to Theophanes Kerameus, one can still read: "The Lord gives the keys to Peter and to all those who resemble him, so that the gates of the Kingdom of heaven remain closed for the heretics, yet are easily accessible to the faithful."17 Thus, when he spoke to Peter, Jesus was underlining the meaning of the faith as the foundation of the Church, rather than organizing the Church as guardian of the faith. The whole ecclesiological debate between East and West is thus reducible to the issue of whether the faith depends on Peter, or Peter on the faith. The issue becomes clear when one compares the two concepts of the succession of Peter.

If many Byzantine ecclesiastical writers follow Origen in recognizing this succession in each believer, others have a less individualistic view of Christianity; they understand that the faith can be fully realized only in the sacramental community, where the bishop fulfills, in a very particular way, Christ's ministry of teaching and, thus, preserves the faith. In this sense, there is a definite relationship between Peter, called by Christ to "strengthen his brethren" (Lk 22:32), and the bishop, as guardian of the faith in his local church. The early Christian concept, best expressed in the third century by Cyprian of Carthage,18 according to which the "see of Peter" belongs, in each local church, to the bishop, remains the longstanding and obvious pattern for the Byzantines. Gregory of Nyssa, for example, can write that Jesus "through Peter gave to the bishops the keys of heavenly honors."¹⁹ Pseudo-Dionysius, when he mentions the "hierarchs" i.e., the bishops of the earthly Church refers immediately to the image of Peter.²⁰ Examples taken from the later period, and quite independent of anti-Latin polemics, can easily be multiplied. Peter's succession is seen wherever the right faith is preserved, and, as such, it cannot be localized geographically or monopolized by a single church or individual. It is only natural, therefore, that the Byzantine will fail to understand the developed medieval concept of Roman primacy. Thus, in the thirteenth century, shortly after the capture of Constantinople by the Crusaders (1204), we can read Nicholas Mesarites, addressing the Latins:

You try to present Peter as the teacher of Rome alone. While the divine Fathers spoke of the promise made to him by the Savior as having a catholic meaning and as referring to all those who believed and believe, you force yourself into a narrow and false interpretation, ascribing it to Rome alone. If this were true, it would be impossible for every church of the faithful, and not only that of Rome, to possess the Savior properly, and for each church to be founded on the rock, i.e., on the doctrine of Peter, in conformity with the promise. 21

Obviously, this text of Mesarites' implies a concept of the Church which recognizes the fullness of catholicity in each local church, in the sense in which the Apostolic Fathers could speak, for example, of the "catholic church sojourning in Corinth." Catholicity, and therefore also truth and apostolicity, thus become God-given attributes belonging to each sacramental, Eucharist-centered community possessing a true episcopate, a true Eucharist, and, therefore, an authentic presence of Christ. The idea that one particular church would have, in a full theological sense, more capacity than another to preserve the faith of Peter was foreign to the Byzantines. Consensus of bishops, and not the authority of one particular bishop, was for them the highest possible sign of truth. Hence their constant insistence on the authority of the councils and their inability to understand the Roman concept of the papacy. It is not, however, that the very idea of primacy was foreign to the Byzantines; but they generally understood it as a matter for conciliar legislation, not as a God-given function of a particular church.

4. Two Ideas of Primacy

One important difference between eastern and western attitudes deserves particular emphasis. . . . The idea of apostolicity played a very limited role in the development of the Church in the eastern provinces, but . . . Rome owed its prestige in Italy and in other western provinces . . . to the veneration in which young Christian communities of the West held St. Peter . . . whose successors the Roman bishops claimed to be.²²

Historians have often cited the fact that Rome was the only local church of the West which could claim "apostolic" foundation and attract pilgrimages ad limina apostolorum. In the East, innumerable cities, or lesser localities, could authentically attribute their foundation to Peter, Paul, John, Andrew, or other Apostles. These various "apostolicities" did not entail any jurisdictional claims: the bishop of Jerusalem was still, in the fourth century, only a suffragan of the metropolitan of Caesarea, the civil capital of Palestine.

When the Council of Nicaea, in its famous Canon 6, vaguely mentioned the "ancient customs" which recognized an exceptional prestige to the churches of Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome, the selection of these particular churches was determined not by their apostolic foundation, but by the fact that they were located in the most important cities of the empire.

For if apostolicity were the criterion, as later Western interpretations insist, the position of Alexandria, purported to have been founded by a minor apostolic figure, Mark, could not be greater than Antioch's, where Peter's presence is attested by the New Testament.

The East remained pragmatic in its definition of universal or local primacies among the churches, and this attitude made conflict inevitable as soon as Rome recognized an absolute and dogmatic significance to the "apostolic" criterion of primacy. Actually, in the Byzantine Empire, "pragmatism" meant adjustment to the structure of the state, and this adjustment explains the text of Canon 28 of the Council of Chalcedon:

The Fathers rightly granted privileges to the throne of old Rome, because it was the imperial city. And one hundred and fifty most religious bishops [of Constantinople, 381], actuated by the same considerations, gave equal privileges to the most holy throne of new Rome, justly judging that the city, which is honored with the presence of the emperor and the senate and enjoys equal privileges with the old imperial Rome, should, in ecclesiastical matters also, be magnified as she is and rank next after her.

This text was in no way meant to suppress the prestige of Rome (it was directed against the pretensions of Dioscorus of Alexandria, whom the Council of Chalcedon deposed); but it certainly excluded the "Petrine" interpretation of Roman primacy, and was in conformity with the logical development of ecclesiastical organisms in the Byzantine period which, since the era of Constantine, had admitted the principle that ecclesiastical administration coincided with the secular structure of the Empire. 23

As we have seen above, the succession of Peter was considered to be involved in the episcopal office present in every church, and was envisaged as a responsibility in which any "successor of Peter," including the bishop of Rome, could fail. A theologian of the fifteenth century, Symeon of Thessalonica, could thus write:

One should not contradict the Latins when they say that the bishop of Rome is the first. This primacy is not harmful to the Church. Let them only prove his faithfulness to the faith of Peter and to that of the successors of Peter. If it is so, let him enjoy all the privileges of Peter. . . .24

5. The Meaning of the Schism

Cultural and historical differences may easily lead to theological divergences; but such divergences need not become contradictions and incompatibilities.

There were differences and even violent conflicts between the East and West as early as the fourth century, but in spite of ever-recurring tension, there existed, until the eleventh century, a mutually recognized procedure for solving difficulties: the council. Joint councils, meeting generally in the East, convened by the emperor, and at which Roman legates were given a place of honor, served as the ultimate tribunals to solve the standing issues. Thus the crisis which set Photius against Pope Nicholas I was finally ended at the last council (879-880) to follow that procedure and one which still ranks, according to the Orthodox Church, on almost the same level as the earlier ecumenical councils.

The German-oriented reformed papacy of the eleventh century was definitely no longer attuned to this type of conciliarity. The Crusades did much to antagonize the two culturally distinct civilizations of the East and of the West. And when the papacy, shaken by the Great Western Schism, and Byzantium, threatened by the Turks, finally agreed to hold a union council at Florence, it was too late to create the atmosphere of mutual respect and trust which alone would have permitted an authentic theological dialogue.

Notes

1. Peter of Antioch, Letter to Michael; ed. Cornelius Will, Acta et scripta quae de controversiis ecclesiae graecae et latinae extant (Leipzig, 1856), p. 196.
2. Photius, Encyclical, 8; PG 102:725_C.
3. Mansi, XVII, 520_E.
4. Photius, Mystagogy, 89; PG 102:380-381.
5. Athanasius, To Serapion, III, 1; PG 26:625_B.

6. Cyril, Thesaurus; PG 68:148_A.
7. Maximus the Confessor, Letter to Marinus; PG 91:136_{AD}.
8. The argument is found in Photius, Mystagogy, 59; PG 102:337.
9. Gregory of Cyprus, Tome of 1285; PG 142:240_C.
10. Gregory Palamas, Apodictic Treatise, I, 9; ed. B. Bobrinskoy, in P. Chrestou, Palama Syngrammata (Thessaloniki, 1962), I, 37.
11. Michael Cerularius, Letter to Peter of Antioch; ed. Will, Acta et Scripta, pp. 179-183.
12. Mansi, XXIV, 70_A.
13. See the major documents on this discussion published by L. Petit in PatrOr, 15 (Paris, 1903), pp. 1-168.
14. Nicholas Cabasilas, Explanation of the Divine Liturgy, chs. 29-30; ed. Perichon, SC 4 bis (Paris: Cerf, 1967), pp. 179-199; trans. J. M. Hussey and P. A. McNulty (London: SPCK, 1960), pp. 71-79.
15. Photius, Hom., 1; trans. in C. Mango, The Homilies of Photius (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1958), p. 50.
16. Origen, Hom. in Matt., XII, 10; ed. Klostermann GCS 40 (Leipzig, 1935), pp. 85-89.
17. Theophanes Kerameus, Hom., 55; PG 142:965_A. For a more general view of patristic exegesis on Matthew 16:18, see particularly J. Ludwig, Die Primatworte Mt. 16, 18, 19 in der altkirchlichen Exegese (Münster, 1952); and J. Meyendorff, "St. Peter in Byzantine Theology," The Primacy of Peter in the Orthodox Church, ed. J. Meyendorff (London: Faith Press, 1963), pp. 7-29.

18. On Cyprian, see, for example, A. d'Alès, La théologie de St. Cyprien (Paris: Beauchesne, 1922); P.-Th. Camelot, "St. Cyprien et la primauté," Istina 4 (1957), 421-434; cf. also M. Bévenot's introduction and notes for Cyprian De catholicae ecclesiae unitate in ACW 25. (Westminster: Newman, 1957.)

19. Gregory of Nyssa, De castigatione; PG 46:312c.

20. Pseudo-Dionysius, Eccl. hier., VII, 7; PG 3:561-564.

21. Nicholas Mesarites, in A. Heisenberg, ed., Neue Quellen zur Geschichte des lateinischen Kaisertums und der Kirchenunion, II. Die Unionverhandlungen von 30. Aug. 1206, in AbhMünchAk, phil. Klasse (1923) II, 34-35.

22. Francis Dvornik, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1958), p. 39.

23. J. Meyendorff, Orthodoxy and Catholicity (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1956), p. 74.

24. Symeon of Thessalonica, Dialogus contra haereses, 23; PG 155:120_{AB}.

8

Encounter with the West

With the exception of Barlaam the Calabrian, no major participant of the great theological controversies, which ended in 1351, had anything but a casual knowledge of Western theology. Discussions between Greeks and Latins revolved around formulae which were used by both sides, each in a totally different context. And Barlaam himself, in spite of his double theological formation, was hardly a prominent representative of Western theological thought; he was, rather, a manipulator of ideas, and probably influenced by Nominalism.

Meanwhile, the formal conciliar decisions of 1341 and 1351, endorsing a theology of real "participation" of man in God and, therefore, of a real distinction between "essence" and "energy" in God, were clearly incompatible with the prevailing Latin theology of the time. A significant dialogue on the content of these decisions, as well as on their true relation to patristic tradition on the one hand and Latin Scholasticism on the other, would have required much time, wide historical knowledge, and true openness of mind. These conditions were obviously lacking on both sides but and this will be the main point of this chapter they were in the process of being realized in Byzantium during the last century of the empire.

1. The Circle of Cantacuzenos

Father-in-law of the legitimate emperor John v Paleologos, and himself emperor between 1347 and 1354, John Cantacuzenos exercised a decisive influence in assuring the triumph of Palamism in Byzantium, and, after his abdication, remained for almost forty years a powerful political and intellectual force in Byzantine society. Having accepted monastic tonsure in 1354, he nonetheless kept at his personal disposal enough funds and influence to act as a generous Maecenas for Byzantine intellectuals. Traveling between Constantinople and Mistra in the Peloponnese, he sponsored, in both his main residences, the copying of manuscripts and the development of scholarly projects.

A theologian himself, he is the author of learned apologies of Palamism and of a lengthy refutation of Islam. During his entire life, however, he never lost sight of Western Christianity and, several times, participated in debates with papal envoys. Ecclesiastical union with Rome was consistently on the diplomatic agenda of the time as a condition for a Western crusade against the menacing Turks. Many Byzantines, including Emperor John v Paleologus, who succeeded Cantacuzenos, were ready to accept hastily all papal conditions in order to achieve immediate military relief. Supported by a majority in Church circles especially by the disciples of Palamas who were occupying major positions in the hierarchy Cantacuzenos defended the idea that union could be achieved only through a solution, at a joint council, of the theological issues dividing East and West. He was probably, and justifiably, skeptical that Western help could be decisive in any case, and, together with a majority of the Byzantine population, envisaged Turkish conquest as a possibility preferable to a betrayal of Orthodoxy.

He was never opposed to contacts with the West, however, repeatedly proposed a serious theological dialogue, and actively supported careful preparation on the Byzantine side for this eventual encounter. Knowledge of Latin theological thought was a necessary precondition, of course, and it is in the circle of Cantacuzenos that Latin theological sources were systematically translated into Greek. The emperor himself used some of them in his polemics against Islam, but his secretary and friend Demetrios Cydones devoted his entire life, with Cantacuzenos' approval and support, to the translation and study of Thomism. Meanwhile, another friend, Nicholas Cabasilas, was reviving sacramental mysticism in the best tradition of the Greek Fathers. Speaking to the legate Paul in 1367, Cantacuzenos develops his conviction that union will never be achieved by imperial decree:

"This is impossible in our Church," he said, "since faith can never be forced." ¹ His view of the situation was all the more realistic since the greater part of the Orthodox world was then out of the reach of the Byzantine emperor. The greater mass of the Greeks were already under Turkish occupation, the Balkan Slavs were politically and ecclesiastically independent, and the Russians were unlikely to accept lightly any union schemes drafted without their participation. Byzantium could not hope to legislate in Church matters as it had in the time of Photius, but could hope only to provide intellectual leadership in the forthcoming dialogue. Cantacuzenos did what he could to give Byzantium the necessary intellectual tools to produce, as a condition for Church union, what he and his contemporaries considered a real possibility: a theological victory of the East over the West at a union council.

Out of the groundwork laid by the circle of Cantacuzenos grew two or three generations of intellectuals who often adopted radically divergent attitudes toward the main theological options of the day. Investigation of their writings and thought has only recently begun but, at the present stage of our knowledge, it is already clear that, in spite of several individual casualties and major mistakes, an "in depth" encounter with Western theology was in the making.

2. Humanists and Thomists

The encyclopedic interests of Cantacuzenos led him to grant support to all forms of knowledge, including the study of secular philosophy tradition at all times alive in a small group of Byzantine aristocrats and intellectuals. Synodal decrees of the eleventh and twelfth centuries had warned the humanists against the dangers of considering Greek philosophy as a criterion of theological thought, but Barlaam of Calabria originally a protégé of Cantacuzenos went beyond the permissible by reducing theology to the level of intellectual wisdom and discursive knowledge. The Council of 1341 signaled his defeat and condemnation. The capture of imperial power by Cantacuzenos in 1347 coincided with the total victory of Palamas and the Hesychasts, and was seen as a disaster by the humanists, among whom the Antipalamite party recruited most of its members. Clearly, the Byzantine Church was rejecting Platonizing humanism and refusing to accept the very patterns of humanistic civilization which the West was in the process of adopting. ² It is precisely at this time that several prominent humanists, whose intellectual forefathers Photius, Michael Psellos, Theodore Metochites had despised the Latins as "barbarians," discovered in the Latin West, and particularly in Italy, the last refuge of true Hellenism.

Demetrios Cydones (ca. 1324-ca. 1398), a close political associate of Cantacuzenos', certainly belongs to this category. Staunchly Orthodox in his youth, he sometimes worried that the protocol requirements for an imperial ambassador to the pope, which would force him to address the Roman pontiff as "beatitude," "holiness," "common pastor,"

"Father," and "Vicar of Christ," might be harmful to his faith.³ But then, suddenly, he discovered Thomism. When his diplomatic functions led him to learn Latin from a Dominican of Pera, he used the Summa contra Gentiles as an exercise book, and the effect on this friend of Barlaam, disappointed by the recent victory (in 1347) of the Hesychasts, was astounding. The Latins, whom the Byzantines considered incapable of rising above the military or merchant professions,⁴ knew Greek philosophy! "Because the Byzantines did not care for their own [Greek] wisdom, they considered Latin reasonings to be Latin inventions." In fact, if only one took the time to unveil the meaning of Latin books, hidden by a foreign tongue, one would find that "they show great thirst for walking in those labyrinths of Aristotle and Plato, for which our people never showed interest."⁵

With the approval and support of Cantacuzenos, Demetrios continued his work of translation. The entire Summa contra Gentiles, most of Summa

theologica, as well as important texts of Augustine and Anselm, were made accessible, in Greek versions, to Demetrios' contemporaries and to the following generations of Byzantine theologians. Cantacuzenos himself used Demetrios' translation of the Refutation of the Koran by the Dominican Ricoldo da Montecroce as a source book for his writings against Islam.

Translation work, contacts with Latins, travels to Italy, confirmed Demetrios Cydones in his conviction that Thomism was actually more "Greek" than Palamism. And in that he was certainly right. His enthusiasm for the intellectual possibilities of both Scholasticism and the Italian Renaissance finally led him to become the main adviser of Emperor John v in his union policies. Around 1363 he, unofficially, joined the Roman Catholic Church. He published several treatises in defense of the Filioque, written from the Thomist point of view which he had adopted; but after the synodal condemnation of his brother Prochoros (also a translator of Thomas and convinced Antipalamite) in 1368 by the reigning patriarch, Philotheos, he could have no further hope about the future of secular Hellenism in Byzantium. He continued, however, with conviction and obvious sincerity to play a political role as a promoter of union until his death. But in order to understand the true significance of his conversion, we should remember that it is ancient Greece and not Rome or Constantinople which for him is the ultimate criterion of wisdom. In 1365-1369, for example, in a letter to the philosopher George, his preference for St. Thomas is determined by Thomas' superiority over Plato; 6 and his charming little treatise *De contemnenda morte*⁷ discusses immortality in purely Platonic terms, without a single reference to the Christian faith. Of course, Demetrios simultaneously wrote technical theological treatises and sermons without direct philosophical overtones. This double intellectual life was characteristic of Byzantine humanists before and after Cydones. The religious evolution of many Latinophrones of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries followed the same pattern.

Whatever the case of the brothers Cydones, the effect exercised by their translations was much wider than their personal options and convictions, and led some Greeks to adopt straightforwardly the Roman Catholic faith and even to join the Dominican order. Such is the case of Manuel Calecas (1410) and of Maximus Chrysoberges (ca. 1430), in whose conversions Greek humanism seems to have played a lesser role than in Demetrios'. Others, like the scholar Manuel Chrysoloras (1415) found in St. Thomas not so much theological "truth" as a proof of Latin intellectual respectability. Manuel accepted an offer to teach Greek in Florence and later played a leading role at the Council of Constance, where he was even a candidate for the papacy. In the next generation, the famous Cardinal Bessarion followed a very similar intellectual and personal career, without personally becoming a Thomist. For all these intellectuals imbued with "Greek wisdom," Palamism symbolized a rejection of secular humanism. It was Prochoros Cydones who, for the first time, wrote refutations of Palamism using Thomist arguments: Thomism and Latinophroney thus became the obvious solution for the small group of intellectuals who opposed Palamite thought.

But Palamite theologians also profited from the translations. Some of them even tried to overcome the dilemma between Palamism and Thomism. Nilus Cabasilas, who succeeded Gregory Palamas as Archbishop of Thessalonica (1363), but who earlier had been the teacher of Demetrios Cydones, is described by Demetrios as "passionately enthusiastic about the books of Thomas." ⁸ He was the first among the Greeks with a full knowledge of Latin theology to write in favor of Palamism and against the Filioque. To a lesser extent, the same is true of Joseph Bryennios (1439), a learned "teacher," knowledgeable in Latin, ambassador to the Council of Constance, who nevertheless remained fiercely opposed to any doctrinal compromise with the Latins. Another Thomist-Palamite, George-Gennadios Scholarios, was active in Florence before becoming the first patriarch under Turkish occupation.

3. Palamite Theologians: Nicholas Cabasilas

The persistence of opposition against Palamism by isolated but influential intellectuals and the implications of the controversy for East-West relations explain the very great number of Byzantine Palamite writings during the period. Together with those of Nilus Cabasilas and Joseph Bryennios, the names of John Cantacuzenos and of Patriarch Philotheos Kokkinos (1353-1354, 1364-1376) are particularly important.

Also found among the members of the close circle of Cantacuzenos is the remarkable lay theologian Nicholas Cabasilas (ca. 1320-ca. 1390). A nephew of Nilus Cabasilas, Nicholas was an intimate friend and correspondent of Demetrios Cydones. His background was very similar to Demetrios', and he pursued a like political career in the shadow of Cantacuzenos. But after Cantacuzenos' abdication (1354), Cydones committed himself totally to the cause of union with the Latins, and Cabasilas became an original exponent of traditional and patristic sacramental theology.

The main theological writings of Nicholas Cabasilas are The Life in Christ, a vast spiritual and theological commentary on the sacraments, an Explanation of the Divine Liturgy, and three Mariological sermons. Occasionally, important theological thought is also to be found in his Encomia ("laudations") of various saints. Although some authors have seen little rapport between his theology and Palamas',⁹ between them there is, in fact, total unity of inspiration and purpose: to affirm that communion with God in Christ through the Spirit is the only true meaning of human life. Cabasilas actually did write a brief but violent pamphlet against the Antipalamite Nicephoros Gregoras and clearly took sides in the controversy. His major theological writings are also conceived as an implicit manifesto against the ideology of the humanists, many of them his personal friends. His thought represents anything but a mystical escape from the issues of the day. He did not explicitly quote Palamas, but many passages of The Life in Christ are paraphrases of Palamas' Triads. Similarly, he practically never quotes the Fathers of the Church, but parallels with the sacramental passages of John Chrysostom or Cyril of Alexandria can be found on almost every page of The Life in Christ. The greatness of Cabasilas is that he succeeded in defending a theology of communion with God in a challenging age without being either scholastic, or polemical. What Palamas rendered in terms of concepts, Cabasilas expressed as an existential reality not only for Hesychast monks but also for every Christian. To understand the theological achievement of fourteenth-century Byzantium, it is essential to read Palamas and Cabasilas together.

In his Interpretation of the Divine Liturgy, Cabasilas still sometimes seems derivative of pseudo-Dionysius and his symbolism. But when he is compared with Dionysius himself and with other medieval liturgical writers, it becomes clear that Cabasilas represents a step toward a sacramental realism more congenial with the early Christian understanding of the sacraments. This realism permeates The Life in Christ, where the author is more concerned with sacramental theology and spirituality than with explaining individual details of the rites. In the first chapter, Cabasilas takes pains to show that the divine life, which will be "perfected" in the eschaton, is, nonetheless, a living experience, accessible in the present age. 10 Baptism is a new birth to this life. As in the earlier Greek Fathers, the positive notion of "new birth," rather than the negative concept of a "remission of sin," dominates Cabasilas' theology of baptism. In the new life, which he enters by baptism, man receives an "experience": "He becomes eye to see the light."¹¹

If baptism gives new being, chrismation the gift of the Spirit bestows "energy" and "movement," i.e., the free personal enjoyment of baptismal grace.¹² In the Eucharist, Christ gives man not "something of Himself, but Himself"; "this is the most-praised wedding, to which the Bridegroom leads the Church as a Virgin Bride . . . , when we become flesh of His flesh and bone of His bone."¹³ The paradox of the Church's existence is that "as children, we remain free, but we also depend on Him as His members."¹⁴ Sanctification comes only from Christ,¹⁵ but sanctity consists in conforming our wills to His divine will. Cabasilas makes this last point clear when he discusses the concept of "sainthood" in the Church: miracles are unmerited gifts of God and do not constitute sanctity a free human achievement.¹⁶

Side by side with the Pauline image of Christ as Head of the Church, Cabasilas will speak of Jesus as the "heart" of the Body: "As the risen Christ does not know death, so the members of Christ will never taste death. How can death touch members in communion with a living heart?" This passage and its parallels lead us to an understanding of the very personal manner in which Cabasilas describes the Christian mystery, 17 and show his indebtedness to the anthropology of Macarius, which was predominant in Hesychast circles, and which locates the center of the psycho-somatic human complex precisely in the heart.

An ecclesiology understood through the Eucharist which, for Cabasilas, is the "completion" of all sacraments, not simply one of them;¹⁸ a spirituality founded on a living experience of Christ; and a theocentric anthropology: these legacies of Cabasilas are clearly in contrast with the ideology of the humanists. This contrast does not mean, however, that Cabasilas expressed, at any time, even in his polemics, any systematic prejudice against the Latin West. We have already seen that even when he accuses the Latins of having dropped the epiclesis from the Eucharistic canon, he involves the authority of the Latin rite itself, whose legitimacy he thus recognizes. Obviously, his attitude toward the Western Church is similar to that of his friend Cantacuzenos, who took some pains to explain Palamite theology to the legate Paul and sought a free dialogue at a joint council; or even to that of Patriarch Philotheos who endorsed the project and invited the other patriarchs to take part, expressing the wish, however, that "at the council, our doctrine may be shown better than that of the Latins, so that they may join us in a common confession."¹⁹ In the following century, when the conciliar project was finally accepted by the pope, the Palamite Mark of Ephesus will take the boat for Ferrara with the same aspirations and hopes.

4. Florenge

In spite of the numerous non-theological factors which contributed to the circumstances in which the Council of Ferrara-Florence was held, the event itself is of great theological significance. Its convocation represented a major concession on Rome's part a concession which the popes of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries had systematically refused to make, in spite of numerous Byzantine requests. The holding of a union council where all differences would be freely discussed including those to which Rome had already agreed would in fact put Western doctrinal developments somehow on trial. This papal concession was possible only because of the "conciliarist" challenge by the Councils of Constance and Basel. In order to show that there could not be a council without a pope, Eugene IV conceded that the pope also needed a council.

But if a small group of "Latin-minded" humanists among the Byzantines were ready for union through the simple acceptance of papal teachings, the vast majority including the conservative Palamites considered the council as the normal way to union on the basis of Orthodoxy. Yet the impressive and formally very representative Byzantine delegation which came to Ferrara was hampered by serious handicaps. First, it was internally divided on the issue of knowledge: although they had formally ascribed to Palamism at their episcopal consecrations, several important members actually were Barlaamites, and therefore skeptical on the issue of whether true knowledge of divine truths is actually attainable. Secondly, in spite of prolonged contacts with the West in the previous decades, the Byzantines (perhaps under the influence of their theory of "pentarchy" which recognized the pope as patriarch of the whole West) seemed not to have understood the deep implications of the ecclesiological problems which were dividing the West, and they failed to capitalize on the division. They chose to negotiate with the pope, under the impression that he was able to speak for all Latins and to raise immediate military help against the Turks. And, finally, the representative character of the Byzantine delegation was only formalthe delegation, in fact, had been selected from among the tiny élite of Constantinople, which by then was a moribund city of fewer than 50,000 inhabitants, 20 and of a few scattered possessions in the Aegean. The millions of Eastern Christiansbishops, clergy, laityin the Middle East, Asia Minor, and the Balkans were already under Turkish occupation, adapting themselves to the new situation and generally skeptical of eventual Latin Crusades. Muscovite Russia, meanwhile, was suspicious of the West anyhow.

Still, these handicaps did not prevent the Council of Ferrara-Florence from providing an occasion for useful, dramatic, and fundamentally free theological dialogue.

The decree Laetentur caeli, finally signed on July 6, 1439, was the result, and it was quite different from the theological "victory" expected by the circle of Cantacuzenos. The decree eliminates one point of contention between Greeks and Latins: the problem of the Eucharistic bread, by declaring that both leavened and unleavened bread may be used in the sacrament; and includes three doctrinal definitions: on the procession of the Holy Spirit, on purgatory, and on the Roman primacy.

Concerning the Filioque, the decree affirms the presupposition that no substantial difference exists between the Greek and Latin Fathers in their theology of the Trinity and defines the procession in traditional Latin, Augustinian terms (ex utroque aeternaliter tanquam ab uno principio et unica spiratione procedit). Furthermore, it explicitly reaffirms that the word Filioque was legitimately (licite ac rationabiliter) added to the creed. It was understood, however, that the Greeks would not be required to modify the text of the creed in their own use of it.

The definition on purgatory as long and as detailed as the text dealing with the procession was equally out of line with the generally accepted

Eastern thinking on the soul's fate after death. It formulated the Latin medieval doctrine on purification after death, which was required whenever no sufficient "fruits of repentance" were manifested before death. The definition included the formal statement that unbaptized souls "descend immediately to hell" (mox in infernum descendere).

The definition on the primacy affirmed that the Roman pontiff, "true vicar of Christ," is "the head of the whole Church, the Father and Teacher of all Christians," and that to him, in the blessed Peter, "was given full power to feed, to rule, and to govern the universal Church." The definition was manifestly directed at the Western conciliarists, even more than at the Greeks, and, in this particular respect, it achieved the desired result actually the only major result of the Council of Florence. 21 The Byzantines relieved their consciences by securing an insertion, which in their minds was a limitation of papal power: it was to be exercised "in accordance with the acts of the ecumenical councils and the holy canons."

Orthodox apologetics has frequently maintained that the Greeks were under physical and mental strain when they signed this text, but this position is difficult to support since Mark of Ephesus refused to sign and left for home unharmed. One must therefore presume that the others, at the moment of signing, thought themselves right either theologically or, at least, politically. Most of them soon changed their minds, and those who remained faithful to their signature integrated themselves fully into the world of the Italian Renaissance and papal politics and had no further theological influence upon their compatriots.

Four personalities of the Greek delegation played a leading intellectual role in Ferrara, in Florence, and in the years immediately following the council: Mark, Metropolitan of Ephesus; Bessarion, Metropolitan of Nicaea; and two lay Archontes, George Scholarios and Gemisthos Pletho. Bessarion led the majority of Greeks who finally signed the decree of union; the others represent three rather different forms of opposition to union.

Mark Eugenikos (1392-1444) was made Metropolitan of Ephesus in the year before the council (1437). In theology, he had studied with Joseph Bryennios, and in philosophy, with Gemistos Pletho; under Pletho, he had received a much more elaborate philosophical training than was customary in monastic circles. Mark's view of the Latin West coincided with that of the circle of Cantacuzenos in the preceding century; and he had been willing to recognize the council as ecumenical until he lost hope that what he considered to be the truth would prevail at the assembly. At the beginning of the sessions in Ferrara, prompted by Cardinal Cesarini, Mark delivered to Pope Eugenius a preliminary address in which he called upon the "most holy Father" to receive "his children coming from the East" and "seeking his embrace." But he also stressed the minimum condition for true unity: the removal of the interpolation introduced unilaterally by the Latins into the common creed. 22 As discussions progressed in quite an opposite direction, his attitude, understandably, grew bitter. In the discussions, he and Bessarion were usually the main Greek spokesmen. His weakest point was a certain inability to go beyond the formal points under discussion: purgatory, Filioque, epiclesis and to reach real issues, such as the juridical Anselmian concept of "justification," or the difference between the Cappadocian and Augustinian Trinitarian theologies. A lack of historical perspective on both sides and the conviction that all the Fathers must always agree with one another created an impasse: there were no alternatives but to accept or reject the Latin view. When Mark refused to sign, the pope is said to have declared: "We have accomplished nothing." 23 Obviously, Eugenius IV was aware by then of the real situation in the East and knew that Mark represented much better the prevailing mentality of the East than did the other members of the Greek delegation. Until his death, Mark remained the head of the anti-unionists in Constantinople. He is a saint of the Orthodox Church.

A lifelong admirer of Thomism and a Thomist theologian in his own right, George Scholarios is an intellectual enigma awaiting modern scholarly investigation. "O excellent Thomas," he writes in a preamble to some of his treatises, "why did heaven give you birth in the West? [If you had been born in the East,] you would not have defended the deviations of the Western Church on the procession of the Holy Spirit and on the distinction between the essence of God and His energy, and you would be our impeccable master in doctrine, just as you still are in the field of ethics." 24 With this attitude, similar to that of Nilus Cabasilas' acceptance of Thomism, except on the points of the procession and of Palamism he went to Florence and acted there in full support of union until shortly before the council's conclusion. He then left for Constantinople but avoided an explicit stand until, in 1444, Mark of Ephesus, on his deathbed, entrusted him with the leadership of the Orthodox party. He accepted, assumed the monastic garb under the name of Gennadios, and was affirmed patriarch by Mohammed II in 1453, after the fall of Constantinople. It is quite possible that men like Scholarios if Byzantine theology had not died a violent death in 1453 would have been able to prepare the dialogue in depth which failed in Florence but which alone could have led to true union.

George Gemistos (ca. 1360-1452), a layman like Scholarios and better known by his surname "Pletho" consonant with "Plato" was among the orators chosen by the Greeks as their spokesmen at the Council of Ferrara-Florence. He did not make great use of the privilege in the public sessions but was quite active in the behind-the-scenes discussions of the Greeks. What was probably unknown to many and discovered only later, especially by Scholarlos, is that Pletho had dropped his essential commitment to the Christian religion and had replaced it, for himself and for a group of disciples, with a Platonizing paganism. According to the best available study on Pletho, his involvement in Christian theological discussions was therefore "perfectly hypocritical."²⁵ In Florence, he supported Mark Eugenikos, but left with Scholarios before the proclamation of union; still he seems to have accepted the union later. In any case, none of these gestures could have an ultimate significance for him. A convinced determinist in his philosophy of history,²⁶ he could not believe that either Western help or faithfulness to Orthodoxy could do anything to change the predetermined fate of the Hellenes. In Pletho, therefore, "secular humanism" reached its greatest extent, and seems to have amounted almost to an escape from the realities of history.

Pletho's defeatism was certainly not acceptable, as such, to all Byzantine humanists: the case of one of his pupils and close friends, Bessarion of Nicaea (1402-1472), is the best example. Already a monk in 1429, Bessarion was chosen metropolitan in 1436 when the council was in the making; his ecclesiastical career, however, did not prevent him from maintaining close humanist sympathies and concerns. His obviously sincere religious evolution in Florence (which followed a path directly opposite to that of Scholarios: originally a staunch proponent of Orthodoxy, Bessarion eventually became a leader of the unionist party) can best be explained by his fundamental attitude toward theological knowledge, which was similar to that of Barlaam of Calabria. Since no fundamental and experiential knowledge could be obtained on the main issue dividing Greeks and Latins, the Filioque, there was no reason why the Latin West could not play the role of savior, or at least become the refuge for the eternal values of Hellenism. It is significant that the entire literary legacy of Bessarion, with the exception of the few theological orations immediately required by the debates in Ferrara and Florence, deals with Greek philosophy. His monumental Refutations of the Blasphemies Directed Against Plato represents a manifesto of the principles which constitute the philosophy of his master, Pletho. The letter of totally pagan inspiration which he addressed to the son of Pletho after Pletho's death seems even to indicate that he was a secret member of Pletho's pagan sect.²⁷ The presence, in Bessarion's library, of Pletho's autograph with the sacred ordo of the sect seems to confirm the fact, which can certainly not be disproved by Bessarion's long, honorable diplomatic service in the curia of the humanist popes of the second half of the fifteenth century. Greek in spirit he indeed remained, much more successfully than his compatriots in the East; but how much of a Christian theologian?

The personality and intellectual evolution of Bessarion is the best possible illustration of the fact that if "the definition of Florence about the primacy of the papacy had dealt a death-blow to Conciliarism"²⁸ and thus changed the course of Western Church history by making the Reformation inevitable, it actually bypassed the issues dividing East and West and, stiffening the positions of both sides, made the schism a much deeper reality than it had been.

Notes

1. See J. Meyendorff, "Projets de Concile oecuménique en 1367: un dialogue inédit entre Jean Cantacuzène et légat Paul," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 14 (1960), 174.
2. See J. Meyendorff, Introduction à l'étude de Grégoire Palamas (Paris: du Scull, 1959), p. 194.
3. Demetrios Cydonès, Letter I in Demetrius Cydonès, Correspondance, ed. G. Camelli (Paris: Belles Lettres, 1930), p. 2.
4. Demetrios Cydonès, Apology I. in G. Mercati, "Notizie di Procoro e Demetrio Cidone . . .," Studi e Testi 56 (1931), 365.
5. Ibid., 366.
6. Demetrios Cydonès, Letter 33; ed. R. J. Loenertz, SeT 186 (1956), 66.
7. Demetrios Cydonès, De contemnenda morte; PG 154:1169-1212.
8. Demetrios Cydonès, Apology III; in Mercati, "Notizie," 391.
9. See, for example, H.-G. Beck, KTLBR, p. 781.
10. Nicholas Cabasilas, Life in Christ; PG 150:496_D.
11. Ibid.; PG 150:560_C-561_A.
12. Ibid.; PG 150:569_A, -580_C.
13. Ibid.; PG 150:593_D.
14. Ibid.; PG 150:600_A.

15. For this see Cabasilas' commentary on the exclamation "The holy things to the holy" in the liturgy; see also Life in Christ, PG 150:613_A.
16. Cabasilas, "On St. Theodora," PG 150:753-772.
17. A good discussion of this can be found in M. Lot-Borodine, Nicholas Cabasilas (Paris: l'Orante, 1958), pp. 114-116.
18. Cabasilas, Life in Christ; PG 150:585_B.
19. Patriarch Philotheos, Letter to the Patriarch of Bulgaria; PG 152:1412_B.
20. See A. M. Schneider, "Die Bevölkerung Konstantinopels im XV. Jahrhundert," Göttingen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Nachrichten phil.-hist. Klasse (Göttingen, 1949), 235-237.
21. J. Gill, The Council of Florence (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1959), p. 411.
22. Ferrariae gesta, ed. I. Gill (Rome: Pontificium Institutum Orientalium Studiorum, 1952), Vol. 5, fasc. 1, pp. 28-34.
23. Syropoulos, Mémoire, X, 15; Les "Mémoires" du Grand Ecclesiarque de l'Eglise de Constantinople Sylvestre Syropoulos (Paris: Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1971), p. 496.
24. G. Scholarios, Oeuvres complètes, edd. L. Petit and M. Jugie (Paris: Bonne Presse, 1928-1936), VI, 1.
25. F. Masai, Pléthon et le Platonisme de Mistra (Paris: Belles Lettres, 1956), p. 321.
26. Ibid., p. 98.
27. Kardinal Bessarion, ed. L. Mohler (Paderborn: Schöningh, 1942), III, 468-469; see the comments and French translation in Masai, Pléthon, pp. 306-307.
28. Gill, Council of Florence, p. vii.

9

Lex Orandi

Byzantine' Christianity is known for the wealth of its liturgy, a wealth which reflects indeed a theological or, rather, an ecclesiological position. Through the liturgy a Byzantine recognized and experienced his membership in the Body of Christ. While a Western Christian generally checked his faith against external authority (the magisterium or the Bible), the Byzantine Christian considered the liturgy both a source and an expression of his theology; hence, the very great conservatism which often prevailed both in Byzantium itself and in post-Byzantine times in matters of liturgical tradition and practice. The liturgy maintained the Church's identity and continuity in the midst of a changing world.

This conservatism does not mean, however, that the liturgical structures of the Byzantine Church did not undergo substantial evolution. Since neither theology nor liturgical piety could remain completely aloof from the issues arising from history, by studying them together we can follow the evolution of the religious mind of Byzantium. In spite of its conservatism as a living Christian tradition, Byzantine liturgy responded creatively to the changes of history. The interplay of continuity and change, unity and diversity, faithfulness to a central prototype and local initiative, is unavoidable in the lex orandi of the Church. The study of this interplay in Byzantium is a prerequisite for an understanding of its lex credendi.

1. The "Great Church" of Constantinople

The famous temple built by Justinian and dedicated to Christ, "the Wisdom of God," or "Hagia Sophia," remained for centuries the greatest religious edifice in Christendom. Serving as a cathedral for the "archbishop of New Rome," the "ecumenical" patriarch, it provoked amazement in the whole world and had a great aesthetic and, therefore, missionary impact. When the ambassadors of the Russian prince Vladimir of Kiev visited it in 988, they confessed that they wondered whether "they were still on earth, or in heaven," and the Russian Chronicle interprets the adoption of Byzantine Christianity by the Russians as an effect of their report. 1 But the influence of the "Great Church" was felt not only by the "barbarians"; other Christian communities, possessing a tradition of their own, accepted it as well. During the Byzantine occupation of Italy (sixth-seventh centuries), the Roman Church adopted a great number of Byzantine hymns.² The Syrian Jacobites, in spite of their separation from Orthodoxy on the Christological issue, translated and adopted much of Byzantine hymnography, mostly during the Byzantine reconquest of the Middle East under the Macedonian dynasty (867-1056).³ A similar influence on Armenia is well known.

This prestige accorded Constantinople is particularly remarkable since there is no evidence of any ecclesiastical or imperial policy of imposing its usages by law or by administrative measures. In the Orthodox world itself, which was directly in the orbit of Constantinople and which became even more liturgically centralized than the Roman world, liturgical diversity persisted until the fifteenth century (cf. Symeon of Thessalonica). But this liturgical centralization resulted, not from the deliberate policy of a central power, but from the extraordinary cultural prestige of Constantinople, the imperial capital. The adoption of a liturgical practice or tradition by the "Great Church" meant a final sanction and, ultimately, a quasi-guarantee of universal acceptance.

With the exception of the few, rather superficial, elements which were borrowed from imperial court ceremonial, the liturgy of the "Great Church" was a synthesis of disparate elements, rather than an original creation.⁴ This synthetic and "catholic" character reflects faithfully the role of Byzantium in politics and in theology. As an empire, Byzantium had to integrate the various cultural traditions which composed it, and as the center of the imperial Church, it continually attempted to maintain a balance between the various local theological trends which divided Christendom after the fourth century.

The form of the Byzantine liturgy and hence its theology was determined by the following main elements:

A. The early Christian, pre-Constantinian nucleus, to which the Byzantine Church (as well as all the other major traditions of the Christian East) remained very closely faithful in the celebration of the two mysteries which "recapitulate" all the others: baptism and the Eucharist.⁵ In spite of the totally different conditions of Christian life and of the adoption of infant baptism as a universal pattern, the rite of baptism retained the wording and the essential forms shaped in the second and third centuries. Performed by full immersion, it remained an elaborate and solemn representation of the paschal mystery, and of the "passage" from the old life to the new, of the renunciation of Satan, and the union with Christ. The rite remained virtually free of later forms of symbolism and unaffected by extra-sacramental theological developments. Confirmation, performed by a priest with "holy chrism" blessed by a bishop, was never separated from baptism; the neophyte, even if only a child, was then admitted immediately to the Eucharist.

The pre-Constantinian nucleus is less in evidence in the developed Byzantine Eucharist, whose peripheral parts have been embellished with symbolism and interpreted as a sacramental re-enactment of the life of Christ. Its central part, i.e., the Eucharistic canon itself, retains very faithfully, however, the original form and the Jewish root of the Eucharist. This is true of both Eucharistic liturgies which replaced, in the Byzantine world, the more ancient Palestinian liturgy of "St. James": the liturgies of Basil and of John Chrysostom. Both date essentially from the fourth or fifth century, with the direct authorship by Basil of Caesarea (379) almost certain in the case of the canon bearing his name. But Basil used a more ancient tradition which he attributed to the apostles themselves. His Eucharistic prayer "is assuredly one of the most beautiful and most harmonious formulas of this type bequeathed to us by Christian antiquity. . . , very close to the most ancient wording of the Christian prayer, with expressions that are still very near to the Jewish prayer itself."⁷

According to the medieval Byzantine ordo reflected by the twelfth-century canonist Balsamon,⁸ the liturgy of John Chrysostom is the usual Eucharistic form celebrated throughout the year, except during Lent; Basil's is used only on ten solemn occasions. The ancient liturgy of "St. James," however, was not entirely forgotten in Jerusalem and a few other local communities. Of ecclesiological importance is the fact that the Eucharist remained a solemn, festal celebration in Byzantium, and presupposed, in principle, the gathering around the Lord's table by the entire local Christian community. The contrast with Western medieval developments is, in this respect, quite striking. Not only does the Byzantine Church ignore "low Masses," or Masses of intention; it does not consider the daily celebration of the Eucharist as a norm, except in monasteries. Moreover, a priest is not allowed to celebrate more than once on the same day; nor can a single altar serve each day for more than one Eucharist. These rules place the ecclesiological reality of the one Church, realized in the one Eucharist, above all pastoral conveniences or practical considerations. As in the early Church, the Eucharist is never the action of a particular group of faithful, nor does it serve any partial or accidental purpose; it is always offered "on behalf of all and for all" by the entire Church.

B. The liturgical evolution of the so-called "cathedral" rite, a designation applied by A. Baumstark to the practice of the major city-churches, as distinct from the monastic communities.⁹ A manuscript preserves a description of this rite as it was practiced at Hagia Sophia from 802 to 806,¹⁰ and Symeon of Thessalonica (1429) describes a "chanted vigil" belonging to the same tradition, although he recognizes that, in his times, it was no longer practiced in its pure form even at Hagia Sophia. 11

Devoting comparatively little time to scriptural reading, or psalmody, this rite had favored the mushrooming of hymnography and the development of the liturgy as a "mystery," or "drama." It was indeed difficult to preserve the communal concept of Christian worship, or the notion that the Eucharist is a communion meal, when the liturgy began to be celebrated in huge basilicas holding several thousand worshippers. But since the early Christian community was now transformed into a crowd of nominal Christians (a transformation described as a real tragedy by Chrysostom in his famous sermons at Constantinople), it was necessary for the Church to emphasize the sacred character of the Christian sacraments, to protect them from secular profanation, and to surround them with veils and barriers, thus practically excluding the mass of the laity from active participation in their celebration, except through the singing of hymns.

This evolution, which could have been a purely practical and pastoral, and thus justifiable, development, acquired a not altogether healthy theological expression, of which the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy of pseudo-Dionysius is the most explicit witness. We described earlier the way in which the "earthly" liturgy was explained by Dionysius as a symbolic and only symbolic representation of an unchangeable hierarchy of beings who stand between the individual Christian and his God. After Dionysius, the liturgy began to play the role of a Gnostic initiation, and the notion of common life in Christ was often lost. But sacramental realism and a more traditional view of the liturgy were preserved in the rite itself, and theologians like Nicholas Cabasilas, in their writings about the liturgy, were able to overcome the ambiguous tradition of individualism and Gnostic symbolism which Dionysius had introduced in the sixth century.

c. Monasticism: From the beginning of the Constantinian era, a monastic type of worship existed concurrently with the emerging "cathedral" type and soon entered into competition with it. It was characterized by a number of autonomous units of common worship (vespers, compline, midnight prayer, matins, and the four canonical hours, completed in Jerusalem with "mid-hours"), by its almost exclusive use of psalmody, and by its original opposition to hymnography.¹² A monastic office could be practically continuous through day and night as it was, for example, in the monastery of the "Non-sleepers" in Constantinople. The monastic communities also developed the penitential aspects of the later Byzantine synthesis: Lenten cycle, prostrations, fasting.

The earliest available descriptions of the Typikon of the monastery of Studion in Constantinople and of the Palestinian Typikon of St. Sabbas preserve the liturgical orders of these two major monastic centers around the tenth century. At that time both had already lost the original sobriety of monastic worship: not only had they dropped opposition to hymnography; both had become major centers of hymn-writing (Theodore at the Studion, John of Damascus at St. Sabbas). On the other hand, the symbolic Gnosticism of pseudo-Dionysius had by then widely influenced monastic circles: if the goal of the earthly Church was to imitate the "celestial hierarchies," the monks considered themselves as fulfilling a fortiori the purpose of the "angelic life." Actually, a common acceptance of the Dionysian understanding of the liturgy must have brought the "monastic" and the "cathedral" type closer together.

But their initial integration did not occur in Constantinople. There the Typikon of the "Great Church" and that of the Studion were still clearly distinct in the tenth century (when the Studite rule, as modified by Patriarch Alexis, was brought to Kiev and adopted by Theodosius of the Caves). Integration occurred in Jerusalem, where monastic practices were accepted within the original "cathedral" rite around the eleventh century. The Latin occupation of Constantinople (1204-1261) and the subsequent decadence of the Studion may have contributed to the adoption of the integrated Typikon of Jerusalem by the "Great Church" of Constantinople and its generalization in the Byzantine world.¹³ The great Hesychast patriarchs of the fourteenth century, especially Philotheos Kokkinos, were the main agents of this liturgical unification.

The adoption of a single system of liturgy for both secular and monastic churches facilitated liturgical unification throughout the Church. Byzantine dominance in the Christian East led, in fact, to an even greater liturgical centralization than Rome could ever achieve in the West. The difference, however, was that no particular ecclesiological significance was attached to this centralization, which was due only to the inimitable cultural prestige of the "Great Church."

Actually, the Byzantine rite was not Constantinopolitan by origin, but Syrian in its first version and Palestinian in the second. Yet the opportunity presented to newly converted peoples to translate the liturgy into their respective tongues counterbalanced the disadvantages of centralization and constituted a powerful tool for missionary activity. In any case, the liturgy remained, in the Orthodox Church, a major expression of unity.

Equally important was the adoption, by the Byzantine Church, of a monastic Typikon to regulate the liturgical life of the entire Christian community. Actually, on this point, the other Eastern Christian spiritual families—the Copts, the Jacobites, the Armenians—were in the same predicament. By accepting monastic spirituality as a general pattern for its worship, the Christian East as a whole expressed the eschatological meaning of the Christian message. The very magnitude of the liturgical requirements described in the Typikon, the impossibility for an average community to fulfill them integrally, and the severity of penitential discipline implied in the liturgical books always served as a safeguard against any attempt to identify the Church too closely with the present aion, and as a signpost of the Kingdom to come. If properly understood, the Eastern liturgy places the Church in a state of permanent eschatological tension.

2. The Liturgical Cycles

In its fully developed form, reached in the fourteenth century, the Byzantine rite is still essentially dominated by the paschal theme of the early Christian message: in Christ, man passes from slavery to freedom, from darkness to light, from death to life. Byzantine liturgy may frequently use conceptual definitions, formal doctrinal confessions, or romantic poetry as we shall see in our discussion of hymnography but it is impossible to understand its structure and the internal logic of its cycles without grasping the dynamic suggestion of a passage from the "old" to the "new," which is the central theme of almost every liturgical unit. Variations on this theme appear everywhere. The misery of man's existence in the "old Adam" is given more or less emphasis, just as the bliss of new life is considered either as an already present reality or as a goal still to be achieved.

Each cycle normally corresponds to a particular liturgical book. The daily cycle, found in the Expanded Psalter, or its abbreviated form, the Horologion, uses the paschal theme in connection with the daily alternation of light and darkness. Following, in its permanent, unchangeable structure, the ancient monastic patterns, which used to shun hymnography, Byzantine vespers and matins select almost exclusively scriptural texts to connect the coming of night with man's fall and separation from God and sunrise with the advent of Christ, the "true light." Vespers begin with an evocation of creation (Ps 104) and a suggestion of man's helplessness after the Fall (Pss 140, 141, 129, 116), and end with the prayer of Simeon (Lk 2:29-32), the hope of salvation, the idea that night and death can also become blessed repose for those who hope in the coming of the Messiah. Alternating the themes of repentance and hope, matins represent an ascension toward the meeting of light: the ten Biblical canticles including the eminently paschal Canticles of Moses (Ex 15:1-18; Dt 32:1-43) and of the Three Youths in Babylon (Dn 3:26-56, 67-88) are part of a psalmodic ensemble, called a canon, which culminates in the Magnificat (Lk 1:46-55) and the Benedictus (Lk 1:68-79) combined. At sunrise the triumphant Psalms 148, 149, 150 (the Latin lauds), the exclamation "Glory to Thee, who has shown us the light," and the doxology reflect the Christian joy and assurance of God-given salvation.

Vespers obviously aim at suggesting the "old" situation of man, and thus the developed Byzantine rite includes Old Testament readings only at vespers. Matins, by contrast, are highlighted on certain appointed days by readings from the Gospels. The weekly cycle also uses the theme of the "old" and the "new," centering it on Sunday, the "eighth day," 14 the "day of the Lord" and of His second coming (Rv 1:10), the day of His resurrection and of His presence in the Eucharist. Still, the "old" Jewish Sabbath is not simply discarded: it is the day of awaiting, of commemoration of the dead, who expect resurrection, and also the day when Christ, in the tomb, descended into Hell to assure the dead of the forthcoming liberation. Thus Saturday is considered, together with Sunday, as a Eucharistic day, even during Lent.

The feast of Easter serves as the movable center of the yearly cycle. It has a period of preparation (Lent) and a fifty-day celebration (Pentecost), and its date determines the following liturgical year. For each of these periods there is a corresponding liturgical book containing the pertinent hymnography: the Triodion for Lent, the Pentecostarion for the period between Easter and Pentecost, and the Oktoekhos (Book of eight tones) containing the cycle of eight weeks, which repeats itself between the Second Sunday after Pentecost and the following Lent.

Finally, the twelve volumes of the Menaion (Book of months) contain proper offices for each day of the calendar year. The very great amount of hymnographic material which was gradually accepted into the Menaion through the centuries is very uneven in quality, but the offices of the major feasts and of principal saints are generally celebrated with hymns composed by the best liturgical poets of Byzantium. Like the Western Sanctoral, the Menaion represents a later, post-Constantinian development of the liturgy, based on historical interest for past events, on local piety connected with the veneration of particular saints and their relics, and on pilgrimages to holy places in Palestine. In each case, however, the Menaion establishes a connection with the central, paschal content of the Christian faith. Thus, for example, the feasts of the Nativity (December 25) and of the Epiphany of Christ (January 6) are preceded by periods of preparation which are patterned, hymnographically and musically, on the offices of Holy Week. Through this evocation, the cross and the Resurrection are shown as the ultimate goal of the Incarnation.

The three major cycles of the yearly feasts commemorate the lives of Christ, the Virgin Mary, and John the Baptist. The Christological cycle includes the feasts of the Annunciation, Nativity, Epiphany, Circumcision, "Meeting" with Simeon (February 2), and the Transfiguration. The feast of the Exaltation of the Cross (September 14) is also part of this cycle. The cycle of the Virgin includes the commemoration of her conception, nativity, presentation, and dormition. The cycle of John the Baptist is an early Palestinian creation with a Biblical foundation and serves as the model for the Mariological cycle. It includes the feasts of conception, nativity, and decollation. This entire system, represented iconographically on the so-called "Deisis" a composition often shown centrally in the iconostasis and including the central figure of Christ flanked by Mary and John suggests a parallelism between the Mother and the Precursor, the two representatives of the human race who stood closest to Jesus. No particular liturgical attention is paid to St. Joseph, except for a relatively modest commemoration on December 26, when he is included with other "ancestors" of Christ.

The Menaion contains explicit commemoration, however, of numerous Old Testament figures prophets, kings, and others the theological implication being that, after Christ's descent into Hell, they, as well as those who pleased God in the new dispensation, are alive in Him.

3. Hymnology

The introduction of massive hymnology in the "cathedral" rite is generally connected with the name of Romanos the Melode. There is very little historical evidence showing the reasons why the kontakia by Romanos and his imitators were very soon replaced, in Byzantine liturgical cycles, by different types of hymnography, but it may be assumed that the kontakion had to face monastic opposition. Although it dealt primarily with Biblical themes and often paraphrased Biblical texts, the kontakion nevertheless constituted a substitute for the Biblical psalms or canticles themselves, and encouraged the use of music which the monks considered too secular. The long poetical pieces of Romanos of course had no organic place in the increasingly rigid and strictly Biblical framework of vespers, matins, and other liturgical units as they were being elaborated in the monastic Typika. Yet the fact that Romanos' poetry, though explicitly Chalcedonian and Cyrillian, generally stood aloof from the great Christological disputes of the sixth and seventh centuries may also have contributed to the emergence of a hymnography more distinctly theological and doctrinal than the kontakia.

The original ascetic opposition of many monastic centers against hymnographical creativity did not persist. By the fifth century, Auxentios (in Bithynia ca. 470) was composing troparia, short poetical pieces of two or three sentences, sung according to the pattern of Biblical psalmody and probably in conjunction with Biblical psalms or canticles.¹⁵ This style of hymnography served as the alternative for the long and independent kontakia of Romanos. Short troparia, or stikhera, were composed to be sung after each verse of the regular Biblical texts accepted as parts of vespers and matins, rather than as independent liturgical services. Complete series of troparia were written to accompany the ten Biblical canticles of matins. These series received the convenient appellation of canon, or "rule." They often include, after the sixth ode, a vestigial remnant of a kontakion of Romanos, while parts of the same kontakion are paraphrased in other stikhera or troparia (Nativity services, for example). Thus a few short pieces of Romanos' poetry were kept in the liturgical books after the final adoption, in the ninth or tenth century, of the new patterns of hymnography. Palestinian monks of the Lavra of St. Sabbas (Andrew, who later became bishop in Crete, John of Damascus, Cosmas of Maiuma) seem to have played, in the early-eighth century, a decisive role in the reform, which was in fact a compromise between the original Biblical strictness of the monastic rule and the free lyricism of Romanos.

In the final form it assumed in the ninth century the later enrichments were only peripheral the Byzantine hymnographical system is a poetic encyclopedia of patristic spirituality and theology. Its importance for our understanding of Byzantine religious thought cannot be exaggerated. Medieval Byzantium never attributed to schools, to intellectual speculation, or even to the magisterium the importance which they acquired in the West, but the centuries-old hymnographical tradition will be referred to for example by Gregory Palamas against Barlaamas a certain criterion of orthodoxy and as an expression of Church tradition par excellence. It will remain so in the Slavic and other areas, where Byzantine Christianity will be spread.

The difficulty in using hymnographical materials as a source for theology lies in the tremendous volume and diversity of the hymns. Of course, the many hagiographical legends and poetic exaggerations found in them can be used only in the context in which they were originally written. The Byzantines, however, obviously understood the difference between doctrinal statements and poetry, for some hymns are explicitly called dogmatika troparia; those of Saturday vespers, for example, which were always dedicated to the meaning of the Incarnation in terms of the Chalcedonian definition:

Who will not bless you, O all-holy Virgin? Who will not sing praises to the One whom you bore? The only-begotten Son, who shone forth before all ages from the Father, the same came forth from you, O pure one. Ineffably He became incarnate, being by nature God, and became man by nature for our sakes; not being divided in two persons, but known in two natures without confusion. Him do you beseech, O pure and blessed one, that He will have mercy on our souls [Tone 6].

This text, obviously, is meant to be a confession of faith as well as a prayer or a piece of religious poetry. Other boundlessly emotional hymns addressed to Mary, the Theotokos, use Biblical images and symbols to describe her role in salvation history:

Hail, O earth unsown! Hail, O bush which burned, yet was not consumed! Hail, O abyss unfathomable! Hail, O bridge leading to heaven, and lofty ladder, which Jacob saw! Hail, O divine container of manna! Hail, O abrogation of the curse! Hail, O recall of Adam! The Lord is with you [Annunciation vespers].

The Marian emotionalism displayed by Byzantine hymnographers the same ones who were able to use the strictest possible theological language in other texts is often an expression of liturgical wisdom and common sense. The liturgy of the Church, a sacred play involving the whole of man, must assume and transform all forms of human feeling and must not be restricted to satisfying only his intellectual capacity. The alternation and correlation between the various aspects of religious experience is probably the secret of the lasting impact exercised by Byzantine Church hymnography upon generations of human souls.

This humaneness of Byzantine hymnography is also shown in the Triodion, a book for use during the Lenten period, composed in large part by Theodore the Studite and his immediate disciples. A monument of monastic spirituality, the Triodion assumes a patristic system of anthropology according to which man is truly man only when he is in real communion with God: then also is he truly free. In his present fallen state, however, man is a prisoner of Satan and, as we saw in connection with the spiritual doctrine of Evagrius, his liberation and salvation presuppose the suppression of his "passions" i.e., of that which makes him love creatures rather than God. The way to "passionlessness" (apatheia) is through repentance:

O how many are the good things I miss! How beautiful the Kingdom I lost through my passions! I spent the wealth I once possessed by transgressing the commandment. Alas, O impassionate soul! You were condemned to fire eternal. But, before end comes, call on Christ, our God. Accept me as the prodigal son, O God, and have mercy on me [Sunday of the prodigal son, vespers].

Abstinence and asceticism are the tools proposed to fight passions, but, even if the ascetic note is somewhat exaggerated, the true dimension of the Christian life and hope is never lost: "The Kingdom of God is neither food nor drink, but joy in the Holy Spirit," proclaims a stikheron of the first week of Lent; "Give money to the poor, have compassion on the suffering: this is the true fast which pleases God." Monastic-oriented asceticism does not make the authors lose sight of marriage, family life, and social responsibility:

Marriage is honorable, the couch is blameless; for Christ, in advance, blessed the one and the other by partaking food in the flesh and by changing water into wine in Cana . . . , so that you may change, O soul [Canon of Andrew of Crete, ode 9].

But all the appeals to "repentance" and to "change" would be meaningless if a foretaste of the blessed and joyful Kingdom to come were not also given. The triumphant hymns of the paschal night, composed by John of Damascus, paraphrasing a paschal sermon of Gregory of Nazianzus, are an immortal monument of Christian joy:

This is the day of resurrection!
Let us shine joyfully, O peoples!
The Pascha of the Lord, the Pascha!
From death to life, and from earth to heaven,
Christ has led us, and we sing hymns of victory.

O Christ, the great and holy Pascha,
O wisdom, Word, and Power of God!
Permit us to partake more fully of Thee
In the unending day of Thy Kingdom.

Notes

1. "The Russian Primary Chronicle," trans. S. H. Cross, Harvard Studies in Philology and Literature 12 (1930), 199.
2. A. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée (Chévtogne, 1953), pp. 109-113.
3. Ibid., pp. 104-106.
4. See A. Schmemmann, "The Byzantine Synthesis," Introduction to Liturgical Theology (London: Faith Press, 1966), pp. 116-166.
5. Gregory Palamas, Hom. 60; ed. S. Oikonomos (Athens, 1861), p. 250.
6. Basil of Caesarea, On the Holy Spirit, 27; ed. B. Pruche, SC 17 (Paris: Cerf, 1945), p. 233.
7. Louis Bouyer, Eucharist (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1968), pp. 302-303.
8. PG 119:1033.
9. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée, p. 124.

10. ^{MS} Patmos 266, published by A. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie Liturgicheskikh Rukopisei (Kiev, 1901) I, 1-152.
11. Symeon of Thessalonica; PG 155:556^D.
12. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée, p. 114.
13. See M. Skaballanovich, Tolkovy Tipikon (Kiev, 1910), pp. 410-416.
14. Basil of Caesarea, On the Holy Spirit, 27; Pruche ed., p. 237.
15. See the Life of Auxentios, ActSS., Feb. 11, 770ff.

II DOCTRINAL THEMES

The historical outline found in the first nine chapters of this book was an attempt to cover the theological controversies, the distinctive tendencies, and the basic sources of theological thought in Byzantium. We now turn to a more systematic picture of Byzantine theology. No Byzantine theologian ever attempted to write a Summa. This does not mean, however, that behind the issues debated by theologians there was not a basic unity of inspiration, and the sense of a single, consistent tradition of faith. Of course, the East was less prone than the West to conceptualize or to dogmatize this unity of tradition. It preferred to maintain its faithfulness to the "mind of Christ" through the liturgy of the Church, through the tradition of holiness, through a living gnosis of the Truth. In any systematic presentation of Byzantine theology, there is, therefore, a danger of forcing it into the mold of rational categories foreign to its very nature. This is precisely what occurred in many textbooks of dogmatic theology which appeared in the Orthodox East after the eighteenth century, which claimed to remain faithful to the theology of the Byzantine Fathers. They have been ably characterized by Georges Florovsky as expressions of a "Western captivity" of the Orthodox mind. For, it is not enough to quote an abundance of proof-texts from patristic or Byzantine authors: true consistency requires a unity of method and congeniality of approach.

I have attempted to achieve this by adopting in the following chapters a plan of exposition which conforms to the content of the Christian experience itself: man, created and fallen, meets Christ, accepts the action of the Spirit, and is thus introduced into communion with the Triune God. The reader will judge for himself whether or not this plan is more adequate than the other to the subject matter itself.

Inevitably, a systematic exposition of doctrinal themes in Byzantine theology requires frequent reference to writings which sometimes fall outside the chronological limits defined in the Introduction. It is impossible, for example, to speak of either anthropology or Trinitarian theology in Byzantium without referring to Origen and to the doctrines of the great Fathers of the fourth century, whom the Byzantines recognized as their teachers par excellence.

It was also inevitable, on the other hand, that my treatment of the Byzantine authors be influenced by the fact that., as an Orthodox theologian, I personally see the great tradition of the undivided Church as continuing in Byzantium and, through it, carrying its message to modern times as well.

10

Creation

Patristic thought on creation developed within the framework of age-long polemics against Origenism. The issue in the debate was the Greek concept of an eternal cosmos and the Biblical linear view of history, which began with the creative fiat. The starting point of Origen's view on the origin of the world was that the act of creation was an expression of God's nature and that, since this nature is changeless, there could never be a "time" when God would not be creating. Consequently, the world has always existed, because God's goodness has always needed an object. ¹ In Origenism, eternity of creation was, in fact, ontologically indistinguishable from the eternity of the Logos. Both proceeded eternally from God. This identification led Arius, after he had rejected the eternity of creation, to the concept that the Logos had also been generated in time. The anti-Arian theology of Athanasius of Alexandria defined the categories which became standard in later Byzantine authors: the distinction between generation and creation.

1. Creator and Creatures

For Athanasius,² creation is an act of the will of God, and will is ontologically distinct from nature. By nature, the Father generates the Son and this generation is indeed beyond time but creation occurs through the will of God, which means that God remains absolutely free to create or not to create, and remains transcendent to the world after creating it. The absence of a distinction between the nature of God and the will of God was common to Origen and to Arius. To establish this distinction constitutes the main argument of Athanasius.

It is totally impossible to consider the Father without the Son, because "the Son is not a creature which came into being by an act of will; by nature He is the proper Son of the essence [of the Father]."3 The Son, therefore, is God by nature, while "the nature of creatures which came into being from nothing is fluid, impotent, mortal, and composite."4 futing the Arian idea that the Logos was created in view of the world, Athanasius affirms that "it is not He who was created for us, but we were created for Him." 5 In God the order of nature precedes the order of volitive action,⁶ and is both superior to and independent of it. Because God is what He is, He is not determined or in any way limited in what He does, not even by His own essence and being.
Re-

Divine "nature" and created "nature" are, therefore, separate and totally dissimilar modes of existence. The first is totally free from the second. Yet creatures depend upon God; they exist "by His grace, His will, and His word . . . so that they can even cease to exist, if the Creator so wishes."⁷ In Athanasius, therefore, we have advanced quite far from Origen's cosmos, which was considered a necessary expression of God's goodness identified with divine nature itself. At this point one discovers that the notion of creation, as expressed by Athanasius, leads to a distinction in God between His transcendent essence and His properties, such as "power" or "goodness," which express His existence and action ad extra, not His essence.

The difference in nature between God and His creatures, as well as the distinction between the "natural" generation of the Son by the Father, and creation "by act of will," is emphasized by both Cyril of Alexandria⁸ and John of Damascus.⁹ The difference also represents the ontological raison d'être of the Chalcedonian definition on the "two natures" of Christ. The two natures can be understood as being in "communion" with each other, as "hypostatically" united, but they can never be "confused" i.e., considered as "one nature."

Athanasius' insistence on the transitory character of creation should not mislead us. What he wants to show is a contrast between the absolute, self-sufficient nature of God, and the dependence upon Him of all created nature. He certainly does not want to reduce created existence to a mere "phenomenon." God's creative act produced a new "created" order, another "essence" distinct from His own; an "essence" worthy of God, deserving of His love and concern, and fundamentally "very good." God does not create, as in Origen, simply a collection of equal intellects, which find a meaning of existence only in contemplating the essence of God and which are diversified only as a consequence of their Fall. Because creation is an essence, and not simply a phantom or a mirage, there is a sense in which its meaning is found in itself, for even God "loves" the world, i.e., considers it as a reality vis-à-vis Himself. Even when it is assumed by the Logos in a hypostatic union, created nature, according to the Chalcedonian definition, "preserves its properties." The implication of this created autonomy was developed in particular by Maximus the Confessor and by the Orthodox theologians of the iconoclastic period. Let us only emphasize here that the very ideas of providence, love, and communion, which reflect the creator's action toward the world, presuppose difference and distinction between Him and His creation.

2. The Divine Plan

Creation in time i.e., the possibility of a true beginning of created existence presents the major cleavage between Greek thought and Biblical Revelation. But the idea of an eternal plan, which God put into effect when He created the world in time, is not inconsistent with the concepts found in the Jewish "wisdom" literature, and even more concretely in the Johannine theology of the Logos, and responds to at least some preoccupations of Greek philosophical thought.

Throughout its history, Byzantine theology, both "Greek" and Biblical as it was, struggled with the possibility of integrating, into a consistent Christian view of creation, a theory of divine "ideas" about the world. The Platonic kosmos noetos had to be rejected, inasmuch as it represented an eternal reality outside of God, both impersonal and "substantial," which would limit the absolute freedom of the creative act, exclude creation ex nihilo, and tend to diminish the substantial reality of visible creation by considering it only as a shadow of eternal realities. This rejection was accomplished implicitly by the condemnation of Origen in 553 and explicitly in the synodal decisions against John Italos in 1081. Meanwhile, patristic and Byzantine thought developed in reaction to Origenism. Gregory of Nazianzus, for example, speaks of "images of the world" as thoughts of God. 10 These "thoughts" do not limit the freedom of a personal God, since they remain distinct from His nature. Only when He creates in time do they become "reality." 11 The thoughts are the expressions also of divine will, 12 not of divine nature; they are "perfect, eternal thoughts of an eternal God." 13 Since there cannot be anything created "in God," the thoughts, or ideas about the world, are uncreated expressions of divine life, which represent the unlimited potentiality of divine freedom. God creates the world, not "out of them," but out of nothing. The beginning of the world is the beginning of a totally new reality, put forward by the act of creation which comes from God and conforms to His eternal plan.

The existence in God of eternal, uncreated "potentiality," which is not God's essence, nor the world's, nor an essence in itself, but which implies a certain contingency toward creation, presupposes an antinomical concept of God which will find different forms of expression in Byzantine theology. To describe it, Georges Florovsky writes that "we have to distinguish, as it were, two modes of eternity: the essential eternity in which only the Trinity lives, and the contingent eternity of the free acts of Divine grace."¹⁴ Actually, on this point, Byzantine theology reached a direct sense of the difference between the impersonal philosophical notion of God as an absolute, and the Biblical understanding of a God personal, transcendent, and free.

To express the relationship between creator and creatures, the great Maximus the Confessor uses the old theology of the Logos as center and living unity of the logos of creation. The terminology already existed in Philo and Origen. But, whereas for Origen the logoi as logoi exist only in an essential unity with the one Logos, for Maximus their real and "logical" existence is also expressed in their diversity. The great difference between Origen and Maximus is that Maximus rejects Origen's view of visible creation as diversified only through the Fall. The "goodness" of creation, according to Maximus, resides in creation itself, and not only in its unity with divine essence. But creation cannot be truly "good" unless its differentiated logoi, which pre-existed as "thoughts" and "wills" of God, are fixed in Him and preserve communion with the one "super-essential" divine Logos. 15 Creatures, therefore, do not exist only "as logoi," or only by the fact that God eternally "knows them"; they exist "by themselves" from the very moment when God put His foreknowledge into action. In His thought, eternally, creatures exist only potentially, while their actual existence occurs in time. This temporal, actual existence of created beings is not autonomous, but centered in the one Logos, and is in communion with Him. There is a sense, therefore, in which "the one Logos is many logoi, and the many are one"; "the One is many according to creative and unifying procession of the One into the many, but the many are One according to the providence which leads the many to turn up toward the One, as their all-powerful principle."16 Paradoxically, therefore, the creatures are one in the one Logos, who, however, is "super-essential" and above participation.17 "Thus, the logoi are to Maximus not identical either with the essence of God or with the existence of the things in the created world. In fact, an apophatic tendency is combined in Maximus with an anti-pantheistic tendency. . . . This is effected, above all, thanks to the understanding of the logoi as decisions of God's will."¹⁸

By remaining faithful to the Athanasian distinction between nature and will, Maximus succeeds in building an authentically Christian ontology of creation, which will remain, throughout the history of Byzantine thought, a standard and virtually unchallenged authority.¹⁹ This ontology presupposes a distinction in God between "nature" (or "essence") and "energy," a distinction which will later be called "Palamism." It presumes a personal and dynamic understanding of God, as well as a dynamic, or "energetic," conception of created nature.

3. The Dynamism of Creation

For Origen, the original, intellectual creation is static. It finds its true logical existence in the contemplation of God's essence, and its first move- ment is a form of rebellion against God. Change and diversity in creation are consequences of the Fall and, therefore, are fundamentally evil. For Maximus, and the entire Byzantine theological tradition, the movement (kinesis) of creatures is the necessary and natural consequence of their creation by God.²⁰ God, therefore, in creating the world, placed outside of Himself a system of dynamic beings, which are different from Him in that they change and move toward Him.²¹ The logos of every creature consists, therefore, in being essentially active;²² there is no "nature" without "energy" or movement.

This dynamic conception of created nature constitutes Maximus' main argument against the "Monoenergists" of the seventh century, whose Christology considered Christ's humanity as having lost its genuinely human "energy" or will because of its union with divinity. But, for Maximus, created nature would lose its very existence if it were deprived of its proper energy, its proper purpose, and its proper dynamic identity. This proper movement of nature, however, can be fully itself only if it follows its proper goal (skopos), which consists in striving for God, entering into communion with Him, and thus fulfilling the logos, or divine purpose, though which and for which it is created. The true purpose of creation is, therefore, not contemplation of divine essence (which is inaccessible), but communion in divine energy, transfiguration, and transparency to divine action in the world. We shall discuss later the anthropological and Christological dimensions of this concept of creation. But it also has obvious cosmological implications.

In general, the Byzantines accepted cosmological concepts inherited from the Bible or from antiquity. So hesitant were they to push scientific knowledge further that it has even been written that "the meager accomplishment of the Byzantines in the natural sciences remains one of the mysteries of the Greek Middle Ages."²³ In any case, it does not seem that Byzantine theology is to blame for that failure, for theology affirmed the dynamism of nature and, therefore, contained the fundamental incentive for studying and, eventually, controlling its development.

During the entire Byzantine Middle Ages, Basil's homilies On the Hexaemeron, were the standard and most authoritative text on the origin, structure, and development of the world. Supporting Athanasius' opposition to the Hellenic and Origenistic concept of creation as an eternal cyclical repetition of worlds, and affirming creation in time, Basil maintains the reality of a created movement and dynamism in creatures. The creatures do not simply receive their form and diversity from God; they possess an energy, certainly also God-given, but authentically their own. "Let the earth bring forth" (Gn 1:24): "this short commandment," says Basil, "immediately became a great reality and a creative logos, putting forth, in a way which transcends our understanding, the innumerable varieties of plants. . . . Thus, the order of nature, having received its beginning from the first commandment, enters the period of following time, until it achieves the overall formation of the universe." 24 Using scientific knowledge as it existed in his time, as well as the Stoic terminology of the "seminal reasons," Basil remains theologically independent from his non-Biblical sources. For example, he rejects the Stoic idea that the logoi of creatures are the true eternal essences of beings, a concept which could lead to the eternal return "of worlds after their destruction."25 Like Athanasius and Maximus, Basil remains faithful to the Biblical concept of absolute divine transcendence and freedom in the act of creation; divine providence, which gave being to the world through the logoi, also maintains it in existence, but not at the expense of the world's own created dynamism, which is part of the creative plan itself.

The existence of the world as dynamic "nature" (i.e., as a reality "outside of" God for whom it is an object of love and providence), following its own order of evolutive growth and development, implies the possibility of purely objective scientific investigation of creatures by the human mind. This does not mean, however, that created nature is ontologically "autonomous." It has been created in order to "participate" in God, who is not only the prime mover and the goal of creation, but also the ultimate meaning (logos) of its permanence. "God is the principle, the center and the end," writes Maximus, "insofar as He acts without being passive. . . . He is the principle, as creator; He is the center, as providence, and He is the end, as conclusion, for All things come from him, by him and toward him [Rm 11:36]."26 A scientific knowledge which would ignore this ultimate meaning of creation would, therefore, be dangerously onesided.

4. Sanctification of Nature

In its present, defective state, created nature fulfills its destiny quite inadequately. The Biblical, anthropocentric concept of the world is preserved in Greek patristic literature: nature suffers from the Fall of man, the "microcosm," to whom God had granted the control of nature and who, instead, preferred to be controlled by it. As a result, instead of revealing, through its internal meaning (logos) and purpose (skopos), the divine plan for creation and, through this, God Himself, nature became the domain and instrument of Satan: throughout creation, the "natural energy," which conforms to the original divine plan, is in struggle with the destructive forces of death. The dramatic character of the present existence of creation is generally taken for granted by Byzantine theologians, but it is most explicitly formulated in liturgy and spirituality.

The Byzantine rite of Baptism has inherited from Christian antiquity the strong initial emphasis on exorcism. The deliberate renunciation of Satan, the sacramental expulsion of the forces of evil from the soul of the candidate for baptism imply a passage from slavery under the "prince of this world" to freedom in Christ. Liturgical exorcisms, however, are concerned not only with the demonic forces controlling the human soul. The "Great Blessing of Water" on the Feast of the Epiphany exorcises the cosmos, whose basic element, water, is seen as a refuge of "nestling dragons." The frequent mention of the demonic forces of the universe in liturgical and patristic texts should be understood in a theological context, for they cannot be reduced to Biblical or medieval mythologies alone, even if they often reflect mythological beliefs. The "demonic" in nature comes from the fact that creation fell out of its original meaning and direction. God had entrusted control over the world to man His own "image and likeness." But man chose to be controlled by the world and, thereby, lost his freedom. He then became subject to cosmic determinism, to which his "passions" attach him and in which ultimate power belongs to death. This is the interpretation which Gregory of Nyssa and Maximus apply to the passage of Genesis 3:21 about the "garments of skin" given to Adam and Eve after the Fall. Rejecting Origen's identification of the "garments" with material bodies an interpretation based upon the Origenistic idea on the pre-existence of souls Maximus describes the change in man's situation only in terms of a new dependence upon the animal side of the world's existence. Instead of using the potentialities of his nature to raise himself and the whole of creation to God, man submitted himself to the desires of his material senses. 27 As a result, the world which was originally created by God, as "very good" became for man a prison and a constant temptation, through which the "prince of this world" establishes his reign of death.

By sanctifying water, food, and plants, as well as the results of man's own creativity, such as works of art or technology (the Byzantine liturgy is very rich in sacramental actions of sanctification, or blessing), the Church replaces them all in their original and true relation, not only to God, but also to man, who is God's "image." To proclaim God's control over the universe, as the Blessing of Epiphany does, amounts in fact to affirming that man is no longer a slave to cosmic forces:

The immaterial powers tremble before Thee; the sun praises Thee; and the moon worships Thee; the stars are Thy servants; and light bows to Thy will; the tempests tremble and the springs adore Thee. Thou didst spread out the heavens like a tent; Thou didst set the land upon the waters. . . . [Therefore,] heeding the depth of Thy compassion, O Master, Thou couldst not bear to see humanity defeated by the devil, and so Thou didst come and didst save us. . . . Thou didst free the children of our nature. . . .

Thus, sanctification of nature implies its demystification. For a Christian, the forces of nature cannot be divine; nor can they be subject to any form of natural determinism: the resurrection of Christ, by breaking the laws

Of nature, has liberated man from slavery to nature, and he is called to realize his destiny as lord of nature in God's name.

Byzantine liturgy, when it proclaims the sanctification of the cosmos, frequently mentions, not only the demonic powers which have usurped authority over the world, but also the "bodiless powers of heaven" who cooperate with God and man in the restoration of the original and "natural" order in the world. Yet Byzantium has never had a universally accepted system or description of the angelic World, with the exception of the Celestial Hierarchy of pseudo-Dionysius, in which each of the nine orders of angels is considered as an intermediary between the highest power above it and the form of existence below. The goal of Dionysius is to preserve, inside an outwardly Christian system of thought, a hierarchical concept of the universe adopted from Neoplatonism.

In spite of its very widespread, but rather peripheral, influence, the Dionysian concept of the angelic world never succeeded in eliminating the more ancient and more Biblical ideas about the angels. Particularly striking is the opposition between the very minor role ascribed by Dionysius to the "archangels" (second rank from the bottom of the angelic hierarchy) and the concept found in Jewish apocalyptic writings, including Daniel, Jude, and Revelation, where the archangels Michael and Gabriel rank as the "chief captains" of God's celestial armies. This idea has been preserved in the liturgy, which should be considered as the main and most reliable source of Byzantine "angelology."

Involved in the struggle against the demonic powers of the cosmos, the angels represent, in a way, the ideal side of creation. According to Byzantine theologians, they were created before the visible world, 28 and their essential function is to serve God and His image, man. The scriptural idea that the angels perpetually praise God (Is 6:3; Lk 2:13) is a frequent theme of the Byzantine liturgy, especially of the Eucharistic canons, which call the faithful to join the choir of angels i.e., to recover their original fellowship with God. This reunion of heaven and earth, anticipated in the Eucharist, is the eschatological goal of the whole of creation. The angels contribute to its preparation by participating invisibly in the life of the cosmos.

Notes

1. Origen, De principles, 1, 2, 10; ed. Koetschau, pp. 41-42; trans. Butterworth, p. 23.
2. See G. Florovsky, "The Concept of Creation in Saint Athanasius," Studia Patristica VI, part IV, TU 81 (Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 1962), 36-37.
3. Athanasius, Contra Arianos, III, 60; PG 26:448-449.
4. Contra Gentes, 41; PG 25:81_{CD}.
5. Contra Arianos, II, 31; PG 26:212_B.
6. Ibid., II, 2; PG 26:149_C.

7. Ibid., I, 20; PG 26:55_A.
8. See, for example, Thesaurus, 15; PG 75:276_B; ibid., 18; PG 75:313_C.
9. De fide orth., I, 8; PG 94:812-813.
10. See especially Gregory of Nazianzus, Carm. theol. IV de mundo, V, 67-68; PG 37:421.
11. John of Damascus, De fide orth., II, 2; PG 94:865.
12. Ibid., I, 9; PG 94:837.
13. Maximus the Confessor, Schol.; PG 4:317.
14. Georges Florovsky, "The Idea of Creation in Christian Philosophy," EChurchQ 8 (1949), 67.
15. See Lars Thunberg, Microcosm and Mediator, pp. 76-84.
16. Maximus the Confessor, Amb. 7; PG 91:1081_C.
17. Ibid.; PG 91:1081_B.
18. Thunberg, Microcosm and Mediator, p. 81.
19. See S. L. Epifanovich, Prepodobnyi Maksim Ispovednik i Vizantiiskoe bogoslovie (Kiev, 1915), pp. 136-137.
20. See J. Meyendorff, Christ in Eastern Christian Thought (Washington: Corpus, 1969), pp. 100-102.
21. See Maximus the Confessor, Ad Thal., 60; PG 90:621_A.
22. Maximus the Confessor, Amb.; PG 91:1057_B.
23. Milton V. Anastos, "The History of Byzantine Science: Report on the Dumbarton Oaks Symposium of 1961," Dumbarton Oaks Papers

16 (1962), 411.

24. Basil of Caesarea, In Hex., hom. 5; PG 29:1160_D.

25. Ibid., 3; PG 29:73_C.

26. Maximus the Confessor, Cap. gnostica, I, 10; PG 91:1085_D-1088_A.

27. See, in particular, Maximus the Confessor, Ad Thal. 61; PG 90:628_{AB}.

28. Gregory Nazianzus, Or. 38, 9; PG 36:320_C; John of Damascus, De fide orth., II, 3; PG 94:873.

11

Man

The view of man prevailing in the Christian East is based upon the notion of "participation" in God. Man has been created not as an autonomous, or self-sufficient, being; his very nature is truly itself only inasmuch as it exists "in God" or "in grace." Grace, therefore, gives man his "natural" development. This basic presupposition explains why the terms "nature" and "grace," when used by Byzantine authors, have a meaning quite different from the Western usage; rather than being in direct opposition, the terms "nature" and "grace" express a dynamic, living, and necessary relationship between God and man, different by their natures, but in communion with each other through God's energy, or grace. Yet man is the center of creation a "microcosm" and his free self-determination defines the ultimate destiny of the universe.

1. Man and God

According to Maximus the Confessor, God, in creating man, "communicated" to him four of His own properties: being, eternity, goodness, and wisdom. 1 Of these four divine properties, the first two belong to the very essence of man; the third and the fourth are merely offered to man's willful aptitude.

The idea that his "participation" in God is man's particular privilege is expressed in various ways, but consistently, in the Greek patristic tradition. Irenaeus, for example, writes that man is composed of three elements: body, soul, and Holy Spirit;² and the Cappadocian Fathers speak of an "efflux" of the Holy Spirit in man.³ Gregory of Nyssa, in his treatise On the Creation of Man, in discussing man before the Fall, attributes to him the "beatitude of immortality," "justice," "purity."

"God is love," writes Gregory, "and source of love. The creator of our nature has also imparted to us the character of love. . . . If love is absent, all the elements of the image are deformed."⁴ Jean Daniélou's comments on this passage may, in fact, be extended to Greek patristic thought as a whole:

Gregory identifies realities which Western theology considers distinct. He ascribes to man certain traits, such as reason or freedom, which the West attributes to the [created] spirit; others such as apatheia or love (called grace by Westerners), attributed to divine life; as well as the effects of final glorification: incorruptibility and beatitude. For Gregory, the distinctions do not exist. 5

Thus, the most important aspect of Greek patristic anthropology, which will be taken for granted by the Byzantine theologians throughout the Middle Ages, is the concept that man is not an autonomous being, that his true humanity is realized only when he lives 'in God' and possesses divine qualities. To express this idea, various authors use various terminologies Origenistic, Neoplatonic, or Biblical; yet there is a consensus on the essential openness of man, a concept which does not fit into the Western categories of "nature" and "grace."

As we saw in the passage of Maximus' cited at the beginning of this section, the "natural" participation of man in God is not a static givenness; it is a challenge, and man is called to grow in divine life. Divine life is a gift, but also a task which is to be accomplished by a free human effort. This polarity between the "gift" and the "task" is often expressed in terms of the distinction between the concepts of "image" and "likeness." In Greek, the term homoiosis, which corresponds to "likeness" in Genesis 1:26, suggests the idea of dynamic progress ("assimilation") and implies human freedom. To use an expression of Gregory Palamas': Adam, before the Fall, possessed "the ancient dignity of freedom."⁶ Thus there is no opposition between freedom and grace in the Byzantine tradition: the presence in man of divine qualities, of a "grace" which is part of his nature and which makes him fully man, neither destroys his freedom, nor limits the necessity for him to become fully himself by his own effort; rather, it secures that cooperation, or synergy, between the divine will and human choice which makes possible the progress "from glory to glory" and the assimilation of man to the divine dignity for which he was created.

The understanding of man as an "open being," naturally possessing in himself a divine "spark" and dynamically oriented toward further progress in God, has direct implications for the theory of knowledge and particularly for the theory of the knowledge of God. Western Scholasticism has assumed that this knowledge is based upon revealed premisses Scripture or church magisterium which serve as a basis for development by the human mind in conformity with the principles of Aristotelian logic. This concept of theology, which presupposes the autonomy of the human mind in defining Christian truths on the basis of Revelation, was the initial issue in the controversy between Barlaam the Calabrian and Gregory Palamas in the fourteenth century. According to Barlaam, the natural human mind could never reach divine truth itself, but only draw conclusions from revealed premisses. In cases when revealed premisses specifically affirmed a given proposition, a logical intellectual process could lead to "apodictic" conclusions, i.e., to intellectually evident truths. If a theological affirmation could not be based on revealed premisses, however, it could not be considered as "demonstrated" but only as "dialectically possible." To refute these views, Palamas developed an experiential concept of our knowledge of God, based upon the notion that God is not known through a purely intellectual process, but that man, when he is in communion with God (i.e., restored to his natural state) can, and even must, enjoy a direct knowledge and experience of his creator. This direct knowledge is possible because man, since he is not an autonomous being, but an image of God "open upward," possesses the natural property of transcending himself and of reaching the divine. This property is not simply intellectual; it implies purification of the whole being, ascetical detachment, and ethical progress: "It is impossible to possess God in oneself," writes Palamas, "or to experience God in purity, or be united with the unmixed light, unless one purify oneself through virtue, unless one get out, or rather above, oneself." 7

Obviously, this Palamite understanding of knowledge coincides with Gregory of Nyssa's concepts of "the sense of the heart" or the "eyes of the soul,"⁸ and with Maximus' identification of the knowledge of God with "deification." For the entire patristic and Byzantine tradition, knowledge of God implies "participation" in God, i.e., not only intellectual knowledge, but a state of the entire human being, transformed by grace, and freely cooperating with it by the efforts of both will and mind. In the monastic tradition of Macarius, reflected, for example, in the writings of Symeon the New Theologian, this idea of "participation" is inseparable from the idea of freedom and of consciousness. A true Christian knows God through a free and conscious experience; this is precisely the friendship with God which was man's state before the Fall the state in which God wanted man to live and which was restored in Jesus Christ.

2. Man and the World

The "image and likeness" of God in man implies, not only an openness of man toward God, but also a function and task of man in the whole of creation.

Against Origen, the Fathers unanimously affirmed that man is a unity of soul and body. On this point, the Biblical view decidedly overcame Platonic spiritualism; by the same token, the visible world and its history were recognized as worthy of salvation and redemption. If, in the Origenistic system, the diversity of visible phenomena was only a consequence of the Fall and of the bodily nature of man an "engrossed" and defective mode of the soul's existence, the only true and eternal reality being spiritual and divine the Biblical and Christian concept understood the universe in its entirety as "very good"; and this concept applied first of all to man.

According to Maximus the Confessor, body and soul are complementary and cannot exist separately. 9 If primarily directed against the Origenistic idea of the pre-existence of souls, this affirmation raises the issue of the soul's survival after death. This survival is not denied, of course, but neither is it understood as a "liberation" from the body, in a Platonic sense. The separation of body and soul at death is as contrary to "nature" as death itself, and the ultimate and eternal survival of the soul is possible only if the whole man is raised from death at the resurrection. Yet the soul's immortality is not only directed toward the resurrection of the whole man; it is also conditioned by the soul's relationship to God. The spiritual literature of the Byzantine East frequently speaks of the "death of the soul" as a consequence of rebellion against God, i.e., of sin. "After the transgression of our ancestors in Paradise," writes Gregory Palamas, ". . . sin came into life. We ourselves are dead and, before the death of the body, we suffer the death of the soul; that is to say, the separation of the soul from God."¹⁰

Obviously, the dual nature of man is not simply a static juxtaposition of two heterogeneous elements, a mortal body and an immortal soul: it reflects a dynamic function of man between God and creation.

Describing the anthropology of Maximus, Lars Thunberg is fully justified when he writes: "Maximus seems to stress the independence of the elements [i.e., soul and body], not primarily in order to maintain the immortality of the soul in spite of its relationship to the body, but in order to underline the creative will of God as the only constitutive factor for both, as well as for their unity."¹¹ We are here back to the point made at the beginning of this section: man is truly man because he is the image of God, and the divine factor in man concerns not only his spiritual aspect as Origen and Evagrius maintained but the whole of man, soul and body.

This last point is the reason why a majority of Byzantine theologians describe man in terms of a trichotomist scheme: spirit (or mind), soul, body. Their trichotomism is very directly connected with the notion of participation in God as the basis of anthropology.

We have seen that this theocentrism appears in Irenaeus' use of Pauline trichotomism: Spirit, soul, body.¹² Under Origenistic influence, the Fathers of the fourth century, followed by the later Byzantine authors, prefer to speak of mind (nous), soul, and body. The desire to avoid ambiguity concerning the identity of the "spirit" and to affirm the created character of the human "spirit" may also have contributed to this evolution. But, even then, Origenistic and Evagrian terminology was unsatisfactory, because the concept of the nous was connected with the myth of eternal pre-existence, original Fall, and disincarnate restoration. Although it reflected satisfactorily the theocentric aspect of patristic anthropology, this terminology failed to emphasize the function of man in the visible world. Thus, in Maximus the Confessor, the human mind, though certainly understood as the element par excellence connecting man with God, is also seen as a created function of man's created psychosomatic unity.

The nous, therefore, is not so much a "part" of man as (1) the ability which man possesses to transcend himself in order to participate in God; (2) the unity of man's composite nature when it faces his ultimate destiny in God and in the world; (3) the freedom of man, which can either fully develop if it finds God or become defective if it submits itself to the body. "The spirit (nous) in human nature corresponds most nearly to the person," writes Vladimir Lossky.¹³ The judgment of Lars Thunberg on Maximus is valid for the entire Byzantine tradition: "Maximus is able to express his conviction that there is a personal aspect in man's life, which goes, as it were, beyond his nature, and represents his inner unity, as well as his relationship to God."¹⁴ This concept of the person or hypostasis, irreducible to nature or to any part of it, is a central notion in both theology and anthropology, as we shall see later in connection with the doctrine of the Trinity.

As image of God, man is lord of creation and "microcosm." This second concept, which was widely used in Platonism and Stoicism, was adopted by the Cappadocian Fathers and given a Christian dimension: man is a "microcosm" because (1) he unites, in his hypostatic existence, the intelligible and sensible aspects of creation; (2) he is given by God the task and function to make this unity ever more perfect, especially after the Fall, when forces of disintegration and division are also actively at work in creation. On this point, and especially in Maximus the Confessor, we find another aspect of the polarity of image-likeness: God's gift to man is also a task and a challenge.

Maximus, in a famous passage of Ambigua 41,15 lists five polarities which are to be overcome by man: God and creation, the intelligible and the sensible, heaven and earth, paradise and world, man and woman. The polarities have been sharpened by sin and rendered insuperable by human capabilities alone. Only the man Jesus, because He is also God, was able to overcome them. He is the new Adam, and in Him, creation again finds communion with the creator and harmony within itself.

The central role of man in the cosmos is also reflected better perhaps than in any system of concepts in the Byzantine liturgy with its emphasis on the union of heaven and earth, its sacramental realism, its rites of blessing food, nature, and human life, as well as in the affirmation that, by nature, man is closer to God than are the angels themselves. The idea originates in Hebrews 1:14, and is developed by Gregory Palamas in the context of an Incarnational theology: "The Word became flesh to honor the flesh, even this mortal flesh; therefore, the proud spirits should not consider themselves, and should not be considered, worthy of greater honors than man, nor should they deify themselves on account of their incorporality and their apparent immortality." 16

Among creatures, there is no greater glory than to be the lord of all creation: man is given this glory if he preserves in himself the image of God. i.e., if he partakes in the life and glory of the creator Himself.

3. Original Sin

In order to understand many major theological problems which arose between East and West, both before and after the schism, the extraordinary impact upon Western thought of Augustine's polemics against Pelagius and Julian of Eclanum must be fully taken into account. In the Byzantine world, where Augustinian thought exercised practically no influence, the significance of the sin of Adam and of its consequences for mankind was understood along quite different lines.

We have seen that in the East man's relationship with God was understood as a communion of the human person with that which is above nature. "Nature," therefore, designates that which is, in virtue of creation, distinct from God. But nature can and must be transcended; this is the privilege and the function of the free mind, made "according to God's image."

Now, in Greek patristic thought, only this free, personal mind can commit sin and incur the concomitant "guilt" a point made particularly clear by Maximus the Confessor in his distinction between "natural will" and "gnomic will." Human nature, as God's creature, always exercises its dynamic properties (which together constitute the "natural will" a created dynamism) in accordance with the divine will which created it. But when the human person, or hypostasis, by rebelling against both God and nature misuses its freedom, it can distort the "natural will" and thus corrupt nature itself. It is able to do so because it possesses freedom, or "gnomic will," which is capable of orienting man toward the good and of "imitating God" ("God alone is good by nature," writes Maximus, "and only God's imitator is good by his gnome");¹⁷ it is also capable of sin, because "our salvation depends on our will."¹⁸ But sin is always a personal act, never an act of nature.¹⁹ Patriarch Photius even goes so far as to say, referring to Western doctrines, that the belief in a "sin of nature" is a heresy.²⁰

From these basic ideas about the personal character of sin, it is evident that the rebellion of Adam and Eve against God could be conceived only as their personal sin; there would be no place, then, in such an anthropology for the concept of inherited guilt, or for a "sin of nature," although it admits that human nature incurs the consequences of Adam's sin.

The Greek patristic understanding of man never denies the unity of mankind or replaces it with a radical individualism. The Pauline doctrine of the two Adams ("As in Adam all men die, so also in Christ shall all he brought to life" [1 Co 15:22]), as well as the Platonic concept of the ideal man, leads Gregory of Nyssa to understand Genesis 1:27 "God created man in His own image" to refer to the creation of mankind as a whole.²¹ It is obvious, therefore, that the sin of Adam must also be related to all men, just as salvation brought by Christ is salvation for all mankind; but neither original sin nor salvation can be realized in an individual's life without involving his personal and free responsibility.

The scriptural text which played a decisive role in the polemics between Augustine and the Pelagians is found in Romans 5:12, where Paul, speaking of Adam, writes: "As sin came into the world through one man, and through sin, death, so death spread to all men because all men have sinned [eph ho pantes hemarton]." In this passage there is a major issue of translation. The last four Greek words were translated in Latin as in quo omnes peccaverunt ("in whom [i.e., in Adam] all men have sinned"), and this translation was used in the West to justify the doctrine of guilt inherited from Adam and spread to his descendants. But such a meaning cannot be drawn from the original Greek the text read, of course, by the Byzantines. The form eph ho a contraction of epi with the relative pronoun ho can be translated as "because," a meaning accepted by most modern scholars of all confessional backgrounds.²² Such a translation renders Paul's thought to mean that death, which was "the wages of sin" (Rm 6:23) for Adam, is also the punishment applied to those who, like him, sin. It presupposes a cosmic significance of the sin of Adam, but does not say that his descendants are "guilty" as he was, unless they also sin as he sinned.

A number of Byzantine authors, including Photius, understood the eph ho to mean "because" and saw nothing in the Pauline text beyond a moral similarity between Adam and other sinners, death being the normal retribution for sin. But there is also the consensus of the majority of Eastern Fathers, who interpret Romans 5:12 in close connection with 1 Corinthians 15:22 between Adam and his descendants there is a solidarity in death just as there is a solidarity in life between the risen Lord and the baptized.

This interpretation comes, obviously, from the literal, grammatical meaning of Romans 5:12. Eph ho, if it means "because," is a neuter pronoun; but it can also be masculine, referring to the immediately preceding substantive thanatos ("death"). The sentence then may have a meaning which seems improbable to a reader trained in Augustine, but which is indeed the meaning which most Greek Fathers accepted: "As sin came into the world through one man and death through sin, so death spread to all men; and because of death, all men have sinned. . . ."

Mortality, or "corruption," or simply death (understood in a personalized sense), has indeed been viewed, since Christian antiquity, as a cosmic disease which holds humanity under its sway, both spiritually and physically, and is controlled by the one who is "the murderer from the beginning"

(Jn 8:44). It is this death which makes sin inevitable, and in this sense "corrupts" nature.

For Cyril of Alexandria, humanity, after the sin of Adam, "fell sick of corruption." 23 Cyril's opponents, the theologians of the School of Antioch, agreed with him on the consequence of Adam's sin. For Theodore of Mopsuestia, "by becoming mortal, we acquired greater urge to sin." The necessity of satisfying the needs of the body—food, drink, and other bodily needs—are absent in immortal beings, but among mortals they lead to "passions," for they present unavoidable means of temporary survival.²⁴ Theodoret of Cyrus repeats almost literally the arguments of Theodore in his own commentary on Romans; elsewhere, he argues against the sinfulness of marriage by affirming that transmission of mortal life is not sinful in itself, in spite of Psalm 51:7 ("my mother conceived me in sin"). This verse, according to Theodoret, refers not to the sexual act but to the general sinful condition of mortal humanity: "Having become mortal, [Adam and Eve] conceived mortal children, and mortal beings are necessarily subject to passions and fears, to pleasures and sorrows, to anger and hatred."²⁵

There is indeed a consensus in Greek patristic and Byzantine traditions in identifying the inheritance of the Fall as an inheritance essentially of mortality rather than of sinfulness, sinfulness being merely a consequence of mortality. The idea appears in Chrysostom, who specifically denies the imputation of sin to the descendants of Adam;²⁶ in the eleventh-century commentator Theophylact of Ohrida;²⁷ and in later Byzantine authors, particularly Gregory Palamas.²⁸ The always-more-sophisticated Maximus the Confessor, when he speaks of the consequences of the sin of Adam, identifies them mainly with the mind's submission to the flesh and finds in sexual procreation the most obvious expression of man's acquiescence in animal instincts; but as we have seen, sin remains, for Maximus, a personal act, and inherited guilt is impossible.²⁹ For him, as for the others, "the wrong choice made by Adam brought in passion, corruption, and mortality,"³⁰ but not inherited guilt.

The contrast with Western tradition on this point is brought into sharp focus when Eastern authors discuss the meaning of baptism.

Augustine's arguments in favor of infant baptism were taken from the text of the creeds (baptism for "the remission of sins") and from his understanding of Romans 5:12. Children are born sinful, not because they have sinned personally, but because they have sinned "in Adam"; their baptism is therefore also a baptism "for the remission of sins." At the same time, an Eastern contemporary of Augustine's, Theodoret of Cyrus, flatly denies that the creedal formula "for the remission of sins" is applicable to infant baptism. For Theodoret, in fact, the "remission of sins" is only a side effect of baptism, fully real in cases of adult baptism, which was the norm, of course, in the early Church and which indeed "remits sins." But the principal meaning of baptism is wider and more positive: "If the only meaning of baptism were the remission of sins," writes Theodoret, "why would we baptize the newborn children who have not yet tasted of sin? But the mystery [of baptism] is not limited to this; it is a promise of greater and more perfect gifts. In it are the promises of future delights; it is a type of the future resurrection, a communion with the master's passion, a participation in His resurrection, a mantle of salvation, a tunic of gladness, a garment of light, or, rather, it is light itself." 31

Thus, the Church baptizes children, not to "remit" their yet nonexistent sins, but in order to give them a new and immortal life, which their mortal parents are unable to communicate to them. The opposition between the two Adams is seen in terms not of guilt and forgiveness but of death and life. "The first man was from the earth, a man of dust; the second man is from heaven; as was the man of dust, so are those who are of the dust, and as is the man of heaven, so are those who are of heaven" (1 Co 15:47-48). Baptism is the paschal mystery, the "passage." All its ancient forms, and especially the Byzantine, include a renunciation of Satan, a triple immersion as type of death and resurrection, and the positive gift of new life through anointing and Eucharistic communion.

In this perspective, death and mortality are viewed, not so much as retribution for sin (although they are also a just retribution for personal sins), as means through which the fundamentally unjust "tyranny" of the devil is exercised over mankind after Adam's sin. From this, baptism is a liberation, because it gives access to the new immortal life brought into the world by Christ's Resurrection. The Resurrection delivers men from the fear of death, and, therefore, also from the necessity of struggling for existence. Only in the light of the risen Lord does the Sermon on the Mount acquire its full realism: "Do not be anxious about your life, what you shall eat or what you shall drink, nor about your body, what you shall put on. Is not life more than food, and the body more than clothing?" (Mt 6:25).

Communion in the risen body of Christ; participation in divine life; sanctification through the energy of God, which penetrates true humanity and restores it to its "natural" state, rather than justification, or remission of inherited guiltthese are at the center of Byzantine understanding of the Christian Gospel.

4. The New Eve

As early as Justin and Irenaeus, primitive Christian tradition established a parallel between Genesis 2 and the Lucan account of the Annunciation, and the contrast between two virgins, Eve and Mary, to symbolize two possible uses of created freedom by man: in the first, a surrender to the devil's offer of false deification, in the second, humble acceptance of the will of God.

Although it was superseded after the Council of Ephesus by the veneration of Mary as Mother of God or Theotokos, the concept of the New Eve who, on behalf of all fallen humanity, was able to accept the coming of the new "dispensation" is present in the patristic tradition throughout the Byzantine period. Proclus, Patriarch of Constantinople (434-446), frequently used the idea in his homilies. The Virgin Mary is viewed as the goal of Old Testament history, which began with the children of Eve: "Among the children of Adam, God chose the admirable Seth," writes Palamas, "and so the election, which had in view, by divine foreknowledge, her who should become the Mother of God, had its origin in the children of Adam themselves, filled up in the successive generations, descended as far as the King and Prophet David. . . . When it came to the time when this election should find its fulfillment, Joachim and Anna, of the house and country of David, were chosen by God. . . . It was to them that God now promised and gave the child who would be the Mother of God." 32

The election of the Virgin Mary is, therefore, the culminating point of Israel's progress toward reconciliation with God, but God's final response to this progress and the beginning of new life comes with the Incarnation of the Word. Salvation needed "a new root," writes Palamas in the same homily, "for no one, except God, is without sin; no one can give life; no one can remit sins."³³ This "new root" is God the Word made flesh; the Virgin Mary is His "temple."

Byzantine homiletic and hymnographical texts often praise the Virgin as "fully prepared," "cleansed," and "sanctified." But these texts are to be understood in the context of the doctrine of original sin which prevailed in the East: the inheritance from Adam is mortality, not guilt, and there was never any doubt among Byzantine theologians that Mary was indeed a mortal being.

The preoccupation of Western theologians to find in Byzantium ancient authorities for the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of Mary has often used these passages out of context. And, indeed, Sophronius of Jerusalem (638) praises Mary: "Many saints appeared before thee, but none was as filled with grace as thou. . . . No one has been purified in advance as thou hast been. . . ."34 Andrew of Crete (740) is even more specific, preaching on the Feast of the Virgin's Nativity: "When the Mother of Him who is beauty itself is born, [human] nature recovers in her person its ancient privileges, and is fashioned according to a perfect model, truly worthy of God. . . . In a word, the transfiguration of our nature begins today. . . ."35 This theme, which appears in the liturgical hymns of the Feast of September 8, is further developed by Nicholas Cabasilas in the fourteenth century: "Earth she is, because she is from earth; but she is a new earth, since she derives in no way from her ancestors and has not inherited the old leaven. She is . . . a new dough and has originated a new race." 36

Quotations can easily be multiplied, and they give clear indications that the Mariological piety of the Byzantines would probably have led them to accept the definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of Mary as it was defined in 1854, if only they had shared the Western doctrine of original sin. But it should be remembered especially in the context of the poetical, emotional, or rhetorical exaggerations characteristic of Byzantine liturgical Mariology that such concepts as "purity" and "holiness" could easily be visualized even in the framework of pre-Christian humanity, which was considered as mortal, but not necessarily "guilty." In the case of Mary, her response to the angel and her status as the "new Eve" gave her a special relation to the "new race" born of her. Yet, never does one read, in Byzantine authors, any statement which would imply that she had received a special grace of immortality. Only such a statement would clearly imply that her humanity did not share the common lot of the descendants of Adam.

The only Byzantine author who definitely understood and accepted both the Western concept of original sin and the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception is Gennadios Scholarios (ca. 1472): "The grace of God delivered her completely," Gennadios writes, "just as if she had been conceived virginally [sic]. . . . Thence, because she was completely liberated from the ancestral guilt and punishment a privilege which she is the only one of the human race to have received her soul is altogether inaccessible to the clouds of [impure] thoughts, and she became, in body and soul, a divine sanctuary." 37 Interesting in the mouth of a convinced Thomist, who abandons on this point the negative attitude of St. Thomas himself, Scholarius' statement reflects the characteristically Western concept of "guilt," and anticipates later, similar utterances by Orthodox theologians, who will begin to think in the categories of Western Scholasticism.

In order to maintain a fully balanced view of Byzantine Mariology, it is necessary to keep in mind the essentially Christological framework of the veneration of the Theotokos in Byzantium (a point which will be stressed in the next chapter). Yet the absence of any formal doctrinal definition on Mariology as such allowed the freedom of poets and orators, as well as the reservation of strict exegetes. They always had available in hundreds of copies the writings of the greatest of Byzantine patristic authorities, John Chrysostom, who found it possible to ascribe to Mary not only "original sin," but also "agitation," "trouble," and, even, "love of honor."³⁸

No one, of course, would have dared to accuse the great Chrysostom of impiety. So the Byzantine Church, wisely preserving a scale of theological values which always gave precedence to the basic fundamental truths of the Gospel, abstained from enforcing any dogmatic formulation concerning Mary, except that she was truly and really the Theotokos, "Mother of God." No doubt, this striking title, made necessary by the logic of Cyrillian Christology, justified her daily liturgical acclamation as "more honorable than the Cherubim, and more glorious beyond compare than the Seraphim."

What greater honor could be rendered to a human being? What clearer basis could be found for a Christian theocentric anthropology?

Notes

1. Maximus the Confessor, De Char., III, 25; PG 90:1024^{BC}.
2. Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., 5, 6, 1.
3. Gregory of Nazianzus, Carm.; PG 37:452.
4. Gregory of Nyssa, De opif. hom. 5; PG 44:137^C.
5. Jean Daniélou, Platonisme et théologie mystique (Paris: Aubier, 1944), p. 54.
6. Gregory Palamas, Triads, I, 1, 9; ed. J. Meyendorff (Louvain, 1959), p. 27.
7. Ibid.; ed. Meyendorff, p. 203.
8. See Daniélou, Platonisme et théologie mystique, pp. 240-241.
9. Maximus the Confessor, Amb. 7; PG 91:1109^{CD}.
10. Gregory Palamas, Hom. 11; PG 151:125^A; see other references in J. Meyendorff, A Study of Gregory Palamas (London: Faith Press, 1964), pp. 122-124.
11. Thunberg, Microcosm and Mediator, p. 103.

12. Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., 5, 6, 1.
13. Vladimir Lossky, The Mystical Theology, p. 201.
14. Thunberg, Microcosm and Mediator, p. 119.
15. Maximus the Confessor, Amb., 41; PG 91:1305_b.
16. Gregory Palamas, Hom. 16; PG 157:204_A.
17. De Char., IV, 90; PG 90:1069_C.
18. Maximus the Confessor, Liber Asceticus; PG 90:953_B.
19. Maximus the Confessor, Expos. or. dom.; PG 90:905_A; on this, see J. Meyendorff, Christ, pp. 112-113.
20. Photius, Library, 177; ed. R. Henry (Paris: Belles Lettres, 1960), 2:177.
21. Gregory of Nyssa, De opif. hom. 16; PG 44:185_B.
22. See Joseph A. Fitzmeyer, S.J., in The Jerome Biblical Commentary (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1968) 53:56-57 (II, pp. 307-308): "The meaning of the phrase eph' ho is much disputed. The least convincing interpretations treat it as a strict rel[ative] phrase: (1) 'in whom,' an interpretation based on the [Vulgate] translation, 'in quo,' and commonly used in the Western Church since Ambrosiaster. This interpretation was unknown to the G[ree]k Fathers before Theophylact. But if Paul had meant this, he could have written en ho (see 1 Cor 15:22). . . . (4) 'Since, inasmuch as, because,' . . . This interpretation, commonly used by G[ree]k patristic writers, is based on 2 Cor 5:4; Phil 3:12; 4:10, where eph' ho is normally translated 'because.' . . . It would thus ascribe to all men an individual responsibility for death. . . . all men sinned: . . . The verb should not be translated, 'have sinned collectively' or 'have sinned in Adam,' because these are additions to the text. Here hemarton refers to personal, actual sins of men, as Pauline usage elsewhere suggests . . .

and as the G[ree]k Fathers generally understood it. . . . This clause, then, expresses a secondaryquasi-parentheticalrole the actual sins of men play in their condemnation to 'death.' However, a notion of 'Original Sin' is already contained in the first part of the verse, as the reason why 'death' has spread to all men. If this were not true, the rest of the paragraph would make little sense. A universal causality of Adam's sin is presupposed in 5:15a, 16a, 17a, 18a, 19a. It would be false, then, to the whole thrust of the paragraph to interpret 5:12 so as to imply that man's condition before Christ's coming was due wholly to his own personal sins."

23. Cyril of Alexandria, In Rom.; PG 74:789_B.
24. Theodore of Mopsuestia, In Rom.; PG 66:801_B.
25. Theodoret of Cyrus, In Rom.; PG 80; 1245_A.
26. John Chrysostom, In Rom. hom. 10; PG 60:474-475.
27. Theophylact of Ohrida, Exp. in Rom.; PG 124:404_C.
28. See J. Meyendorff, Gregory Palamas, pp. 121-126.
29. See Epifanovich, Prepodobnyi Maksim Ispovednik i Vizantiiskoe bogoslovie, p. 65n5.
30. Maximus the Confessor, Quaest. ad Thal., PG 90:408_{BC}.
31. Theodoret of Cyrus, Haeret. fabul. compendium, 5:18; PG 83:512.
32. Gregory Palamas, Hom. in Present., 6-7; ed. Oikonomos (Athens, 1861), pp. 126-127; trans. in EChurchQ 10 (1954-1955), No. 8, 381-382.
33. Ibid., 2; p. 122.
34. Sophronius of Jerusalem, Oratio, II, 25; PG 87:3248_A.
35. Andrew of Crete, Hom. I in Nativ. B. Mariae; PG 97:812_A.
36. Nicholas Cabasilas, Hom. in Dorm., 4; PG 19:498.
37. Gennadios Scholarios, Oeuvres complètes de Georges Scholarios, edd. J. Petit and M. Jugie (Paris, 1928), II, 501.

38. John Chrysostom, Hom. 44 in Matt.; PG 57:464; Hom. 21 in Jn 2; PG 59:131.

12

Jesus Christ

Byzantine Christology has always been dominated by the categories of thought and the terminology of the great controversies of the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries about the person and identity of Jesus Christ. As we have shown in Part I, these controversies involved conceptual problems, as well as the theological basis of life. In the mind of Eastern Christians, the entire content of the Christian faith depends upon the way in which the question "Who is Jesus Christ?" is answered.

The five ecumenical councils which issued specific definitions on the relationship between the divine and the human natures in Christ have at times been viewed as a pendulant development: from the emphasis on the divinity of Christ, at Ephesus (431); to the reaffirmation of His full humanity, at Chalcedon (451); then back to His divinity, with the acceptance of Cyril's idea of Theopaschism, at Constantinople (553); followed by a new awareness of His human "energy" or "will," again at Constantinople (680), and of His human quality of describability in the anti-iconoclastic definition of Nicaea II (787). Still, the opinion is often expressed in Western theological literature that Byzantine Christology is crypto-Monophysite, and offered as an explanation for the lack of concern among Eastern Christians for man in his secular or social creativity. We hope that the following discussion will shed some light on these frequently recurring issues.

1. God and Man

To affirm that God became man, and that His humanity possesses all the characteristics proper to human nature, implies that the Incarnation is a cosmic event. Man was created as the master of the cosmos and called by the creator to draw all creation to God. His failure to do so was a cosmic catastrophe, which could be repaired only by the creator Himself.

Moreover, the fact of the Incarnation implies that the bond between God and man, which has been expressed in the Biblical concept of "image and likeness," is unbreakable, The restoration of creation is a "new creation," but it does not establish a new pattern, so far as man is concerned; it reinstates man in his original divine glory among creatures and in his original responsibility for the world, It reaffirms that man is truly man when he participates in the life of God; that he is not autonomous, either in relation to God, or in relation to the world; that true human life can never be "secular." In Jesus Christ, God and man are one; in Him, therefore, God becomes accessible not by superseding or eliminating the humanum, but by realizing and manifesting humanity in its purest and most authentic form.

The Incarnation of the Logos was very consistently considered by Byzantine theologians as having a cosmic significance. The cosmic dimension of the Christ-event is expressed particularly well in Byzantine hymnology: "Every creature made by Thee offers Thee thanks: the Angels offer Thee a hymn; the heavens, a star; the Magi, gifts; the shepherds, their wonder; the earth, its cave; the wilderness, the manger; and we offer Thee a Virgin Mother." ¹ The connection between creation and the Incarnation is constantly emphasized in the hymns: "Man fell from the divine and better life; though made in the image of God, through transgression he became wholly subject to corruption and decay. But now the wise Creator fashions him anew; for He has been glorified."² Similarly, the hymnology of Good Friday stresses the involvement of creation as a whole in the death of Christ: "The sun beholding Thee upon the Cross covered itself with gloom; the earth trembled for fear. . . ."³

Thus, poetic images reflect the parallelism between Genesis 1:2 and John 1. The coming of Christ is the Incarnation of the Logos "through whom" all things were made: it is a new creation, but the creator is the same. Against the Gnostics, who professed a dualism distinguishing the God of the Old Testament from the Father of Jesus, patristic tradition affirmed their absolute identity and, therefore, the essential "goodness" of the original creation.

The Christ-event is a cosmic event both because Christ is the Logos and, therefore, in God the agent of creation and because He is man, since man is a "microcosm." Man's sin plunges creation into death and decay, but man's restoration in Christ is a restoration of the cosmos to its original beauty. Here again, Byzantine hymnology is the best witness:

David foreseeing in spirit the sojourn with men of the Only-begotten Son in the flesh, called the creation to rejoice with him, and prophetically lifted up his voice to cry: "Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in Thy name" [Ps 88:13]. For having gone up, O Christ, with Thy disciples into Mount Tabor, Thou wast transfigured, and hast made the nature that had grown dark in Adam to shine again as lightning. . . .4

The glorification of man, which is also the glorification of the whole of creation, should, of course, be understood eschatologically. In the person of Christ, in the sacramental reality of His Body, and in the life of the saints, the transfiguration of the entire cosmos is anticipated; but its advent in strength is still to come. This glorification, however, is indeed already a living experience available to all Christians, especially in the liturgy. This experience alone can give a goal and a meaning to human history.

The cosmic dimension of the Incarnation is implied in the Chalcedonian definition of 451, to which Byzantine theology remains faithful: Christ is "of one substance with us in His humanity, 'like unto us in all things save sin.'" He is God and man for "the distinction of natures is in no way abolished because of the union; rather, the characteristic properties of each nature are preserved." The last sentence of the definition obviously covers the creative, inventive, controlling functions of man in the cosmos. The idea is developed in the theology of Maximus the Confessor, when he argues, against the Monothelites, for the existence in Christ of a human "will," or "energy," stressing that without it authentic humanity is inconceivable. If Christ's manhood is identical with ours in all things except sin (and unless one classifies as "sin" every human "motion," "creativity," or "dynamism"), one must admit that Christ, who is man in His body, in His soul, and in His mind, was indeed acting with all these functions of true humanity. As Maximus fully understood, Christ's human energy or will was not superseded by His divine will, but accepted conformity with it. "The two natural wills [of Christ] are not contrary to each other, . . . but the human will follows [the divine]." 5 This conformity of the humanum with the divinum in Christ is, therefore, not a diminution of humanity, but its restoration: "Christ restores nature to conformity with itself. . . . Becoming man, He keeps His free will in impassibility and peace with nature."⁶ "Participation" in God as we have shown is the very nature of man, not its abolition. This is the key to Eastern Christian understanding of the God-man relationship.

In Christ, the union of the two natures is hypostatic: they "concur into one person [prosopon] and one hypostasis," according to the Fathers of Chalcedon. The controversies which arose from the Chalcedonian formula led to further definitions of the meaning of the term hypostasis. While Chalcedon had insisted that Christ was indeed one in His personal identity, it did not clearly specify that the term hypostasis, used to designate this identity, also designated the hypostasis of the pre-existing Logos. The anti-Chalcedonian opposition in the East so built its entire argument around this point that Byzantine Christology of the age of Justinian committed itself very strongly to excluding that interpretation of Chalcedon which would have considered the "prosopon, or hypostasis," mentioned in the definition as simply the "prosopon of union" of the old Antiochian School i.e., the new synthetic reality resulting from the union of the two natures. It affirmed, on the contrary, following Cyril of Alexandria, that Christ's unique hypostasis is the pre-existing hypostasis of the Logos; that is, that the term is used in Christology with exactly the same meaning as in the Trinitarian theology of the Cappadocian Fathers: one of the three eternal hypostases of the Trinity "took flesh," while remaining essentially the same in its divinity. The hypostasis of Christ, therefore, pre-existed in its divinity, but it acquired humanity by the Virgin Mary.

This fundamental position has two important implications. (a) There is no absolute symmetry between divinity and humanity in Christ because the unique hypostasis is only divine and because the human will follows the divine. It is precisely a "symmetrical" Christology which was rejected as Nestorian in Ephesus (431). This "assymetry" of Orthodox Christology reflects an idea which Athanasius and Cyril of Alexandria stressed so strongly: only God can save, while humanity can only cooperate with the saving acts and will of God. However, as we emphasized earlier, in the patristic concept of man, "theocentricity" is a natural character of humanity; thus assymetry does not prevent the fact that Christ was fully and "actively" man.

(b) The human nature of Christ is not personalized into a separate human hypostasis, which means that the concept of hypostasis is not an expression of natural existence, either in God or in man, but it designates personal existence. Post-Chalcedonian Christology postulates that Christ was fully man and also that He was a human individual, but it rejects the Nestorian view that He was a human hypostasis, or person. A fully human individual life was en-hypostasized in the hypostasis of the Logos, without losing any of its human characteristics. The theory, associated with the name of Apollinaris of Laodicea, and according to which the Logos, in Jesus, had taken the place of the human soul, was systematically rejected by Byzantine theologians since it implied that the humanity of Christ was not complete. Cyril's celebrated formula wrongly attributed to Athanasius and, in fact, uttered by Apollinaris "one nature incarnate of God the Word" was accepted only in a Chalcedonian context. Divine nature and human nature could never merge, or be confused, or become complementary to each other, but, in Christ, they were united in the single, divine hypostasis of the Logos: the divine model matched the human image.

The fact that the notion of hypostasis is irreducible to the concepts of "particular nature," or to the notion of "individuality," is crucially important not only in Christology but also in Trinitarian theology. Hypostasis is the personal, "acting" source of natural life; but it is not "nature," or life itself. In the hypostasis, the two natures of Christ accomplish a union without confusion. They retain their natural characteristics; but, because they share a common hypostatic life, there is a "communication of idioms," or perichoresis, which, for example, enables some of Christ's human actions/words or gestures to carry consequences which only God could have provoked. The clay made out of His spittle, for example, restores sight to the blind man.

Christ is one [writes John of Damascus]. Therefore the glory which naturally comes from the divinity has become common [to both natures] thanks to the identity of hypostasis; and, through the flesh, humility has also become common [to both natures] . . . , [but] it is the divinity which communicates its privileges to the body, remaining itself outside the passions of the flesh. 7

The hypostatic union implies also that the Logos made humanity His own in its totality; thus the Second Person of the Trinity was indeed the subject, or agent, of the human experiences, or acts, of Jesus. The controversy between Cyril of Alexandria and Nestorius concerning the term Theotokos, applied to the Virgin Mary, concerned essentially this very problem. Was there, in Jesus, a human person whose mother could have been Mary? Cyril's answer emphatically negative was, in fact, a Christological option of great importance. In Christ, there was only one Son, the Son of God, and Mary could not have been the Mother of anyone else. She was, therefore, indeed the "Mother of God." Exactly the same problem arose in connection with the death of Christ: impassibility and immortality were indeed characteristics of the divine nature. How, then, asked the theologians of Antioch, could the Son of God die? Obviously, the "subject" of Christ's death was only His humanity. Against this point of view, and following Cyril, the Fifth Council (553) affirms: "If anyone does not confess that our Lord Jesus Christ who was crucified in the flesh is true God and the Lord of Glory and one of the Holy Trinity, let him be anathema."⁸ This conciliar text, which paraphrases 1 Corinthians 2:8 ("If they had understood, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory"), inspired the hymn "The Only-begotten Son," attributed to Emperor Justinian and sung at every Byzantine Eucharistic liturgy: "One of the Holy Trinity, you were crucified for us."

"Theopaschism" the acceptance of formulae which affirm that the "Son of God died in the flesh" illustrates how distinct the concepts of "hypostasis" and "nature" or "essence" really are. The distinction is stressed by one of the main Chalcedonian theologians of the age of Justinian, Leontius of Jerusalem: "The Logos," writes Leontius, "is said to have suffered according to the hypostasis, for within His hypostasis He assumed a passible [human] essence besides His own impassible essence, and what can be asserted of the [human] essence can be asserted of the hypostasis."⁹ What this implies is that the characteristics of the divine essence—impassibility, immutability, etc.—are not absolutely binding upon the per- sonal, or hypostatic, existence of God. Later we shall see the importance of this fact for the patristic and Byzantine understanding of God. Meanwhile, on the level of soteriology, the affirmation that the Son of God indeed "died in the flesh" reflects, better than any other Christological formula, the boundlessness of God's love for man, the reality of the "appropriation" by the Logos of fallen and mortal humanity i.e., the very mystery of salvation.

An often-recurring criticism of Byzantine Christology, as it was defined by the Fifth Council, is that it, in fact, had betrayed Chalcedon by assuring the posthumous triumph of the one-sided views of Alexandrian Christology. Assumed by the divine hypostasis of the Logos, the humanity of Christ, according to these critics, would have been deprived of an authentically human character. "In Alexandrian Christology," writes Marcel Richard, "there will never be any place for a true psychology of Christ, for a real cult of the Savior's humanity, even if the assumption by the Word of a human soul is expressively recognized." ¹⁰ And Charles Moeller also maintains: "The tendency of the East to see Christ more and more as God (a tendency which is so marked in its liturgy) betrays a certain exclusivism which will increase after the schism."¹¹ This "neo-Chalcedonism" of the Byzantines is thus opposed to true Chalcedonian Christology and branded as a crypto-Monophysitism; it consists essentially in an understanding of the hypostatic union which would so modify the human properties of Jesus that He would no longer be fully man.¹²

It is undoubtedly true that Byzantine theology and spirituality are very conscious of the uniqueness of the personality of Jesus and are reluctant to investigate His human "psychology." A balanced judgment on this subject, however, can be attained only if one keeps in mind, not only the doctrine of the hypostatic union, but also the prevailing Eastern view of what "natural" man is. For, in Jesus, the new Adam, "natural" humanity has been restored. As we have seen, "natural" man was considered as participating in the glory of God. Such a man, undoubtedly, would no longer be fully subject to the laws of "fallen" psychology. These laws, however, were not simply denied in Jesus, but seen in the light of soteriology.

The full dimension of the problem was never directly discussed by Byzantine theologians, but there are indications which can help us to understand their position: (a) their interpretation of such passages as Luke 2:52 ("He progressed in age and wisdom"); (b) their attitude toward the heresy of Aphthartodocetism; and (c) the stand of the Orthodox defenders of the images against the iconoclasts.

(a) The idea of "progress in wisdom" implies a degree of ignorance in Jesus, which is confirmed by other well-known passages of the Gospels (Mk 13:32, for example). Byzantine thought on this subject may often have been confused by the Evagrian idea that "essential knowledge" is the very characteristic of humanity before the Fall. Evagrius also thought that Jesus was precisely a created "intellect" which has preserved this original "knowledge." The search for gnosis was indeed conceived, in the Evagrian spiritual tradition, which remained alive in the Christian East, as the very content of spiritual life. This may have contributed to the fact that a majority of Byzantine authors deny any "ignorance" in Jesus Himself. John of Damascus, for example, can write:

One must know that the Word assumed the ignorant and subjected nature, [but,] thanks to the identity of the hypostasis and the indissoluble union, the Lord's soul was enriched with the knowledge of things to come and other divine signs; similarly, the flesh of human beings is not by nature life-giving, while the Lord's flesh, without ceasing to be mortal by nature, became life-giving, thanks to its hypostatic union with the Word. 13

This text certainly represents a clear case of a representative Byzantine author's affirming that the hypostatic union in virtue of the "communication of idioms" modifies the character of human nature. But this modification is clearly seen in the framework of a dynamic and soteriological Christology; the humanity of Christ is "paschal," in the sense that in it man passes from death to life, from ignorance to knowledge, and from sin to righteousness. However, in many less-justifiable cases, the ignorance of Jesus, as described in the Gospel texts, is simply interpreted as a pedagogical device or "appearance" on the part of Christ to show His "condescension." This obviously unsatisfactory solution is rejected by other authors who affirm Christ's real, human ignorance. "Most Fathers admitted," writes the anonymous author of the De sectis, "that Christ was ignorant of certain things; since He is in all things consubstantial with us, and since we ourselves are ignorant of certain things, it is clear that Christ also suffered ignorance. Scripture says about Christ: 'He progressed in age and wisdom' [Lk 2:52]; this means that 'He was learning what He did not previously know."¹⁴ Obviously, Byzantine theologians are authentically concerned about recognizing in Christ our fallen humanity, but their minds are less clear about the moment when, in Jesus, this humanity became the transfigured, perfect, and "natural" humanity of the New Man.

(b) The heresy of the Aphthartodocetae, whose leader was the sixth-century theologian Julian of Halicarnassus, conceived Christ's humanity as incorruptible, and they were accused of a docetic understanding of the Incarnation. As R. Draguet has shown, the issue was not so much the connection between hypostatic union and corruptibility, but the very nature of man. Is man naturally corruptible (as he is naturally ignorant), or did corruptibility come with sin? The Aphthartodocetae denied that man by nature was corruptible. Since Christ is the New Adam and the truly "natural" man, His humanity was indeed incorruptible. In rejecting Aphthartodocetism, the Orthodox affirmed (1) that the inheritance of mortality from Adam was not an inheritance of guilt, and (2) that the Logos voluntarily assumed, not an abstract ideal manhood, but our fallen humanity, with all the consequences of sin, including corruptibility. Opposition to Aphthartodocetism certainly contributed to preserving a clearer notion of Christ's real and full human nature.

(c) Iconoclasm was certainly another way of denying that Christ is man in a concrete and individual manner. Patriarch Nicephorus, one of the leading Orthodox polemicists, called it Agraptodocetism because iconoclasts considered Jesus as "undescribable." ¹⁵ In order to justify the possibility of painting an image of Christ, John of Damascus, and even more explicitly Theodore the Studite, insisted upon His individual human characteristics: "An indescribable Christ," writes Theodore, "would also be an incorporeal Christ; but Isaiah [8:3] describes this as a male being, and only the forms of the body can make man and woman distinct from one another."¹⁶ Nicephorus, in order to defend the use of images, stresses very forcibly the human limitations of Jesus, His experience of tiredness, hunger, thirst:¹⁷ "He acted, desired, was ignorant, and suffered as man."¹⁸ This means that He was man like all of us, and can be represented on an image.

As interpreted by the Orthodox theologians of the eighth and ninth centuries who struggled against iconoclasm, the icon of Christ becomes a confession of faith in the Incarnation:

The Inconceivable is conceived in the womb of a Virgin [writes Theodore the Studite]; the Unmeasurable becomes three cubits high, the Unqualifiable acquires a quality; the Undefinable stands up, sits down, and lies down; He who is everywhere is put into a crib; He who is above time gradually reaches the age of twelve; He who is formless appears with the shape of a man, and the Incorporeal enters into a body. . . . Therefore, He is describable and indescribable.¹⁹

For Theodore the icon of Christ is the best possible illustration of what is meant by the hypostatic union. What appears on the image is the very hypostasis of God the Word in the flesh. In the Byzantine tradition the inscription around the halo surrounding the head of Jesus says "The One who is," the equivalent of the sacred name YHWE , the name of God, whose person is revealed, but whose essence is inaccessible. It is neither God's indescribable divinity nor His human nature alone which is represented on an icon, but the person of God the Son who took flesh: "Every portrait," writes Theodore, "is the portrait of an hypostasis, and not of a nature."²⁰

To paint an image of the divine essence or of God before His incarnation is obviously impossible; just as it is impossible to represent human nature as such, other than symbolically. Thus, symbolic images of Old Testament theophanies are not yet "icons" in a true sense. But the icon of Christ is different. With bodily eyes, the hypostasis of the Logos could be seen in the flesh, although its divine essence remained hidden; it is this mystery of the Incarnation which makes possible the sacred icons and requires their veneration.

The defense of images forced Byzantine thought to reaffirm the full concrete humanity of Christ. If an additional doctrinal stand against Monophysitism was necessary, it was taken by the Byzantine Church in the eighth and ninth centuries. But it is important to recognize that this stand was made neither at the expense of the doctrine of the hypostatic union nor at that of the Cyrillian understanding of the hypostatic identity of the incarnate Logos, but in the light of the former Christological formulations. The victory over iconoclasm was a reaffirmation of Chalcedonian and post-Chalcedonian Christology.

2. Redemption and Deification

The Chalcedonian definition proclaimed that Christ is consubstantial, not only with His Father, but also "with us." Though fully man, Christ does not possess a human hypostasis, for the hypostasis of His two natures is the divine hypostasis of the Logos. Each human individual, fully "consubstantial" with his fellow men, is, nonetheless, radically distinct from them in his unique, unrepeatable, and unassimilable personality or hypostasis: no man can fully be in another man. But Jesus' hypostasis has a fundamental affinity with all human personalities: that of being their model. For indeed all men are created according to the image of God, i.e., according to the image of the Logos. When the Logos became incarnate, the divine stamp matched all its imprints: God assumed humanity in a way which did not exclude any human hypostasis, but which opened to all of them the possibility of restoring their unity in Himself. He became, indeed, the "new Adam," in whom every man finds his own nature realized perfectly and fully, without the limitations which would have been inevitable if Jesus were only a human personality.

It is this concept of Christ which Maximus the Confessor had in mind when he re-emphasized the old Pauline image of "recapitulation" in reference to the incarnate Logos, 21 and saw in Him the victory over the disintegrating separations in humanity. As man, Christ "accomplishes in all truth the true human destiny that He Himself had predetermined as God, and from which man had turned: He unites man to God."²² Thus Chalcedonian and post-Chalcedonian Christology would be meaningless speculation were it not oriented toward the notion of redemption. "The whole history of christological dogma was determined by this basic idea: the Incarnation of the Word, as Salvation." 23

Byzantine theology did not produce any significant elaboration of the Pauline doctrine of justification expressed in Romans and Galatians. The Greek patristic commentaries on such passages as Galatians 3:13 ("Christ redeemed us from the curse of the Law, having become a curse for us") generally interpret the idea of redemption by substitution in the wider context of victory over death and of sanctification. They never develop the idea in the direction of an Anselmian theory of "satisfaction." The voluntary assumption of human mortality by the Logos was an act of God's "condescension" by which He united to Himself the whole of humanity; for, as Gregory of Nazianzus wrote, "what is not assumed is not healed, and what is united to God is saved";²⁴ therefore, "we needed a God made flesh and put to death in order that we could live again."²⁵

The death of "One of the Holy Trinity in the flesh" was a voluntary act, a voluntary assumption by God of the entire dimension of human tragedy. "There is nothing in Him by compulsion or necessity; everything is free: willingly He was hungry, willingly thirsty, willingly He was frightened, and willingly He died."²⁶ But and this is the essential difference between the Orthodox and the Aphthartodocetae: this divine freedom of the hypostasis of the Logos did not limit the reality of His human condition: the Lord assumed a mortal humanity at the very moment of the Incarnation, at which time the free divine decision to die had already been made. "He takes a body, a body which is not different from ours," writes Athanasius; "He takes from us a nature similar to ours and, since we all are subject to corruption and death, He delivers His body to death for US."²⁷

The idea that the cross was the purpose of the Incarnation itself is vividly suggested by the Byzantine liturgical texts of the Nativity. The hymnology of the pre-feast (December 20 to 24) is structured according to that of Holy Week, and the humility of Bethlehem is viewed as leading toward Golgotha: "The kings, first fruits of the Gentiles, bring Thee gifts. . . . By myrrh they point to Thy death. . . ." "Born now in the flesh, Thou shalt in the flesh undergo burial and death, and Thou shalt rise again on the third day."²⁸

The question whether the Incarnation would have taken place, had there not been a Fall, never stood at the center of attention in Byzantium: Byzantine theologians envisaged rather the concrete fact of human mortality: a cosmic tragedy in which God through the Incarnation undertook to become personally rather, hypostatically involved. The major, and, apparently, the only, exception to this general view is given by Maximus the Confessor, for whom the Incarnation and "recapitulation" of all things in Christ is the true "goal" and "aim" of creation; the Incarnation, therefore, was foreseen and foreordained independently of man's tragic misuse of his own freedom. 29 This view fits in exactly with Maximus' idea of created "nature" as a dynamic process oriented toward an eschatological goal Christ the incarnate Logos. As creator, the Logos stands as the "beginning" of creation, and as incarnate, He is also its "end" when all things will exist not only "through Him," but "in Him." In order to be "in Christ," creation had to be assumed by God, made "His own"; the Incarnation, therefore, is a precondition of the final glorification of man independent of man's sinfulness and corruption.

Given the fallen state of man, the redemptive death of Christ makes this final restoration possible. But the death of Christ is truly redemptive and "life-giving" precisely because it is the death of the Son of God in the flesh (i.e., in virtue of the hypostatic union). In the East, the cross is envisaged not so much as the punishment of the just one, which "satisfies" a transcendent Justice requiring a retribution for man's sins. As Georges Florovsky rightly puts it: "the death of the Cross was effective, not as a death of an Innocent One, but as the death of the Incarnate Lord."³⁰ The point was not to satisfy a legal requirement, but to vanquish the frightful cosmic reality of death, which held humanity under its usurped control and pushed it into the vicious circle of sin and corruption. And, as Athanasius of Alexandria has shown in his polemics against Arianism, God alone is able to vanquish death, because He "alone has immortality" (1 Tm 6:16). Just as original sin did not consist in an inherited guilt, so redemption was not primarily a justification, but a victory over death. Byzantine liturgy, following Gregory of Nyssa, uses the image of the devil swallowing a hook, hidden by the body of Emmanuel; the same idea is found in a pseudo-Chrysostomic sermon, read during the liturgy of the paschal night: "Hell received a body, and encountered God; it received mortal dust, and met Heaven face to face."

Summarizing this patristic concept of death and resurrection, in the light of the Christological statements of the fifth and sixth centuries, John of Damascus writes:

Although Christ died as man, and His holy soul was separated from His most pure body, His divinity remained with both the soul and the body, and continued inseparable from either. Thus the one hypostasis was not divided into two hypostases, for from the beginning both body and soul existed in the hypostasis of the Word. Although at the hour of death body and soul were separated from each other, yet each of them was preserved, having the one hypostasis of the Word. Therefore, the one hypostasis of the Word was an hypostasis as of the Word; so also of the body and of the soul. For neither the body nor the soul ever had any proper hypostasis other than that of the Word. The hypostasis, then, of the Word is ever one, and there were never two hypostases of the Word. Accordingly, the hypostasis of Christ is ever one. And though the soul is separated from the body in space, yet they remain hypostatically united through the Word.³¹

The triduum of Easterthe three days when Christ's humanity suffered the common fate of man, yet remained mysteriously en-hypostasized in the one divine hypostasis of the Logosis graphically expressed in the traditional Byzantine iconography of the Resurrection: Christ trampling down the gates of Sheol and lifting Adam and Eve back to life. Better than any conceptual language, and better also than the image of any particular event or aspect of the mysterysuch as the empty tomb, or even the crucifixion itselfthis icon points to the dynamic, soteriological dimension of Christ's death: God's intrusion into the domain usurped by the devil and the breaking up of his control over humanity. The same mystery of hypostatic unity, which remained unbroken in death itself, is expressed in the Byzantine liturgy of Holy Week; on Good Friday, at vespers, at the very moment when Christ gave up the spirit, the first hymns of the Resurrection are beginning to resound: "Myrrh is fitting for the dead, but Christ has shown Himself free from corruption." The hidden, yet decisive, triumph over death permeates the liturgical celebration of Holy Saturday: "Though the temple of Thy body was destroyed in the hour of the passion, yet even then one was the hypostasis of Thy Divinity and Thy flesh." 32 One discovers in these texts the ultimate, soteriological reason why Cyril's theopaschite formula became a criterion of orthodoxy in sixth-century Byzantine theology: death was vanquished precisely because God Himself had tasted of it hypostatically in the humanity which He had assumed. This is the paschal message of Christianity.

In connection with our discussion of the Greek patristic view of original sin as inherited mortality, we mentioned the concomitant understanding of the Resurrection as the foundation of Christian ethics and spirituality. For the Resurrection of Christ means indeed that death has ceased to be the controlling element of man's existence and that, therefore, man is also free from slavery to sin. Death certainly remains as a physical phenomenon, but it does not dominate man as an unavoidable and ultimate fate: "As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive" (1 Co 15:22). And Athanasius writes: "Henceforth we are dissolved for a time only, according to our bodies' mortal nature, in order the better to receive resurrection; like seeds cast into the earth, we do not perish, but sown in the earth we shall rise again, since death has been brought to nought by the grace of the Savior."³³ And Chrysostom: "It is true, we still die as before, but we do not remain in death; and this is not to die. The power and the very reality of death are just this, that a dead man has no possibility of returning to life. But if after death he is to be quickened and, moreover, to be given a better life, then this is no longer death, but a falling asleep."³⁴ Since death has ceased to be the only possible end of existence, man is free from fear, and sin, based on the instinct of self-preservation, is no longer unavoidable. The vicious circle was broken on Easter Sunday and is broken each time "the death of Christ is announced and His resurrection is confessed."

But what does "being in Christ" mean concretely? The last quotation from the Byzantine Eucharistic canon of St. Basil suggests the answer: through baptism, chrismation, and the Eucharist, man freely becomes a member of the risen Body of Christ.

This element of freedom and even of "consciousness" is essential to the doctrine of salvation as understood by the Byzantine patristic, sacramental, and liturgical tradition. On the one hand, there are emphatic affirmations of the universality of redemption. Gregory of Nyssa, for example, assures us that

As the principle of death took its rise in one person and passed on in succession through the whole of the human nature, so the principle of the Resurrection extends from one person to the whole of humanity. . . . This is the mystery of God's plan with regard to His death and His resurrection from the dead, 35 and his thoughts on the universality of redemption and "recapitulation" are echoed by Maximus the Confessor. On the other hand, the new life in Christ implies personal and free commitment. On the last day the Resurrection will indeed be universal, but blessedness will be given only to those who longed for it. Nicholas Cabasilas tells us that baptismal "resurrection of nature" is a free gift from God, given even to children who do not express consent; but "the Kingdom, the contemplation of God, and common life with Christ belong to free will."³⁶

Byzantine theologians seldom devote much explicit attention to speculation about the exact fate of souls after death. The fact that the Logos assumed human nature as such implied the universal validity of redemption, but not the apokatastasis, or universal salvation, a doctrine which in 553 was formally condemned as Origenistic. Freedom must remain an inalienable element of every man, and no one is to be forced into the Kingdom of God against his own free choice; the apokatastasis had to be rejected precisely because it presupposes an ultimate limitation of human freedomthe freedom to remain outside of God.

But by rejecting God, human freedom, in fact, destroys itself. Outside of God, man ceases to be authentically and fully human. He is enslaved to the devil through death. This idea, which is central to Maximian thought and which made him profess so strongly the existence of a human, created will in Christ, serves as the basis of the Byzantine understanding of the destiny of man: participation in God, or "deification" (theosis), as the goal of human existence.

En-hypostasized in the Logos, Christ's humanity, in virtue of the "communication of idioms," is penetrated with divine "energy." It is, therefore, a deified humanity, which, however, does not in any way lose its human characteristics. Quite to the contrary. These characteristics become even more real and authentic by contact with the divine model according to which they were created. In this deified humanity of Christ's, man is called to participate, and to share in its deification. This is the meaning of sacramental life and the basis of Christian spirituality. The Christian is called not to an "imitation" of Jesus a purely extrinsic and moral act but, as Nicholas Cabasilas puts it, to "life in Christ" through baptism, chrismation, and the Eucharist.

Deification is described by Maximus as a participation of the "whole man" in the "whole God":

In the same way in which the soul and the body are united, God should become accessible for participation by the soul and, through the soul's intermediary, by the body, in order that the soul might receive an unchanging character, and the body, immortality; and finally that the whole man should become God, deified by the grace of God-become-man, becoming whole man, soul and body, by nature, and becoming whole God, soul and body, by grace. 37

"Thus for Maximus the doctrinal basis of man's deification is clearly to be found in hypostatic unity between the divine and the human nature in Christ."³⁸ The man Jesus is God hypostatically, and, therefore, in Him there is a "communication"

(perichoresis circumincessio) of the "energies" divine and human. This "communication" also reaches those who are "in Christ." But they, of course, are human hypostases, and are united to God not hypostatically but only "by grace" or "by energy." "A man who becomes obedient to God in all things hears God saying: 'I said: you are gods' [Jn 10:34]; he then is God and is called 'God' not by nature or by relation but by [divine] decree and grace."³⁹ It is not through his own activity or "energy" that man can be deified this would be Pelagianism but by divine "energy," to which his human activity is "obedient"; between the two there is a "synergy," of which the relation of the two energies in Christ is the ontological basis. But there is no confusion of natures, just as there cannot be any participation in divine essence by man. This is the theology of deification which we will also find in Gregory Palamas: "God in His completeness deifies those who are worthy of this, by uniting Himself with them, not hypostatically that belonged to Christ alone nor essentially, but through a small part of the 'uncreated energies and the uncreated divinity . . . while yet being entirely present in each."⁴⁰ Actually, the Byzantine Council of 1351, which confirmed the theology of Palamas, defined it as a "development" of the decrees of the Sixth Ecumenical Council (680) on the two wills or "energies" of Christ.⁴¹

In "deification," man achieves the supreme goal for which he was created. This goal, already realized in Christ by a unilateral action of God's love, represents both the meaning of human history and a judgment over man. It is open to man's response and free effort.

3. The Theotokos

The only doctrinal definition on Mary to which the Byzantine Church was formally committed is the decree of the Council of Ephesus which called her the Theotokos, or "Mother of God." Obviously Christological, and not Mariological, the decree nevertheless corresponds to the Mariological theme of the "New Eve," which has appeared in Christian theological literature since the second century and which testifies, in the light of the Eastern view on the Adamic inheritance, to a concept of human freedom more optimistic than that which prevailed in the West.

But it is the theology of Cyril of Alexandria, affirming the personal, hypostatic identity of Jesus with the pre-existent Logos, as it was endorsed in Ephesus, which served as the Christological basis for the tremendous development of piety centered on the person of Mary after the fifth century. God became our Savior by becoming man; but this "humanization" of God came about through Mary, who is thus inseparable from the person and work of her Son. Since in Jesus there is no human hypostasis, and since a mother can be mother only of "someone," not of something, Mary is indeed the mother of the incarnate Logos, the "Mother of God." And since the deification of man takes place "in Christ," she is also in a sense just as real as man's participation "in Christ" the mother of the whole body of the Church.

This closeness of Mary with Christ led to an increasing popularity, in the East, of those apocryphal traditions which reported her bodily glorification after her death. These traditions found a place in the hymnographical poetry of the Feast of the Dormition (Koimesis, August 15), but were never the object of theological speculation or doctrinal definition. The tradition of Mary's bodily "assumption" was treated by poets and preachers as an eschatological sign, a follow-up of the resurrection of Christ, an anticipation of the general resurrection. The texts speak very explicitly of the Virgin's natural death, excluding any possible connection with a doctrine of Immaculate Conception, which would attribute immortality to her and which would be totally incomprehensible in the light of the Eastern view of original sin as inherited mortality. 42 Thus, the boundless expressions of Marian piety and devotion in the Byzantine liturgy are nothing other than an illustration of the doctrine of hypostatic union in Christ of divinity and humanity. In a sense, they represent a legitimate and organic way of placing the somewhat abstract concepts of fifth- and sixth-century Chris-tology on the level of the simple faithful.

Notes

1. Dec. 24, Vespers; The Festal Menaion, trans. Mother Mary and K. Ware (London: Faber, 1969), p. 254.
2. Dec. 25, Matins; Ibid., p. 269.
3. Holy and Great Friday, Vespers.
4. Aug. 6, Transfiguration, Vespers; Festal Menaion, pp. 476-477.
5. Council of Constantinople, 680; Denz. 291.
6. Maximus the Confessor, Expos. orat. domin.; PG 90:877_D.
7. John of Damascus. De fide orth., III, 15; PG 94:1057_{BC}.
8. Denz. 222; Anathema 10 of Council of 553.
9. Leontius of Jerusalem, Adv. Nest., VIII, 9; PG 86:1768_A.
10. Marcel Richard, "St. Athanase et la psychologie du Christ selon les Ariens," Mel Sci Rel 4 (1947), 54.
11. Charles Moeller, "Le chalcédonisme et le néo-chalcédonisme en Orient de 451 à la fin du VI^e siècle," in Grillmeier-Bacht, I, 717.
12. See ibid., pp. 715-716.
13. John of Damascus, De fide orth., III, 21; PG 94:1084_B-1085_A.
14. Anonymous, De sectis; PG 86:1264_A.
15. Patriarch Nicephorus, Antirrh., I; PG 100:268_A.
16. Theodore the Studite, Antirrh., III; PG 99:409_C.
17. Nicephorus, Antirrh., I; PG 100:272_B.
18. Ibid.; PG 100:328_{BD}.

19. Theodore the Studite, Antirrh. III; PG 99:396_B.
20. Ibid., III; PG 99:405_A.
21. See especially Maximus the Confessor, Amb.; PG 90:1308_D, 1312_A.
22. J. Meyendorff, Christ, p. 108.
23. Georges Florovsky, "The Lamb of God," Scottish Journal of Theology (March 1961), 16.
24. Gregory of Nazianzus, Ep. 101 ad Cledonium; PG 37:181_C-184_A.
25. Gregory of Nazianzus, Hom. 45; PG 36:661_C.
26. John of Damascus, De fide orth., IV, 1; PG 94:1101_A.
27. Athanasius, De incarn., 8; PG 25:109_C.
28. Dec. 24, Compline, Canon, odes 5 and 6; Festal Mention, pp. 206-207.
29. Maximus the Confessor, Ad Thal., 60; PG 90:621_{AC}.
30. Florovsky, "The Lamb of God," p. 24.
31. John of Damascus, De fide orth., III, 27; PG 94:1097_{AB}.
32. Holy Saturday, Matins, Canon, ode 6.
33. Athanasius, De incarn., 21; PG 25:129_D.
34. John Chrysostom, In Haebr., hom. 17:2; PG 63:129.
35. Gregory of Nyssa, Catechetical Oration, 16; ed. J. H. Srawley (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1956), pp. 71-72.
36. Nicholas Cabasilas, The Life in Christ, II; PG 150:541_C.
37. Maximus the Confessor, Amb., PG 91:1088_C.
38. Thunberg, Microcosm and Mediator, p. 457.

39. Maximus the Confessor, „Amb.“; PG 91:1237_{AB}.
40. Gregory Palamas, Against Akindynos, V, 26; edd. A. Kontogiannes and V. Phanourgakes, in P. Khrestov, Gregoriou tou Palama Syggrammata III (Thessaloniki, 1970), p. 371.
41. Tome of 1351; PG 151:722_B.

42. I do not imply here that the Western doctrine of the Immaculate Conception necessarily implies Mary's immortality, although some Roman Catholic theologians have suggested this implication (for example, M. Jugie, l'Immaculée Conception dans l'Ecriture sainte et dans la Tradition orientale, Bibliotheca Immaculatae Conceptionis, 3 [Rome, 1952]).

13

The Holy Spirit

The early Christian understanding of creation and of man's ultimate destiny is inseparable from pneumatology; but the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in the New Testament and in the early Fathers cannot easily be reduced to a system of concepts. The fourth-century discussions on the divinity of the Spirit remained in a soteriological, existential context. Since the action of the Spirit gives life "in Christ," He cannot be a creature; He is indeed consubstantial with the Father and the Son. This argument was used both by Athanasius in his Letters to Serapion and by Basil in his famous treatise On the Holy Spirit. These two patristic writings remained, throughout the Byzantine period, the standard authorities in pneumatology. Except in the controversy around the Filioque debate about the nature of God rather than about the Spirit specifically there was little conceptual development of pneumatology in the Byzantine Middle Ages. This does not mean, however, that the experience of the Spirit was not emphasized with greater strength than in the West, especially in hymnology, in sacramental theology, and in spiritual literature.

"As he who grasps one end of a chain pulls along with it the other end to himself, so he who draws the Spirit draws both the Son and the Father along with It," Basil writes.¹ This passage, quite representative of Cappadocian thought, implies first that all major acts of God are Trinitarian acts, and secondly that the particular role of the Spirit is to make the "first contact," which is then followed existentially, but not chronologically by a revelation of the Son and, through Him, of the Father. The personal being of the Spirit remains mysteriously hidden, even if He is active at every great step of divine activity: creation, redemption, ultimate fulfillment. His function is not to reveal Himself, but to reveal the Son "through whom all things were made" and who is also personally known in His humanity as Jesus Christ. "It is impossible to give a precise definition of the hypostasis of the Holy Spirit and we must simply resist errors concerning Him which come from various sides."² The personal existence of the Holy Spirit thus remains a mystery. It is a "kenotic" existence whose fulfillment consists in manifesting the kingship of the Logos in creation and in salvation history.

1. The Spirit in Creation

For the Cappadocian Fathers, the Trinitarian interpretation of all the acts of God implies the participation of the Spirit in the act of creation. When Genesis mentions "the Spirit of God moving upon the face of the waters" (Gn 1:2), patristic tradition interprets the passage in the sense of a primeval maintenance of all things by the Spirit, which made possible the subsequent appearance of a created logical order through the Word of God. No chronological sequence is implied here, of course; and the action of the Spirit is part of the continuous creative action of God in the world: "The principle of all things is one," writes Basil, "which creates through the Son and perfects in the Spirit." ³

Basil identifies this function of "perfecting" creation as "sanctification," and implies that not only man, but nature as a whole, is perfectly itself only when it is in communion with God and when it is "filled" with the Spirit. The "secular" is always imperfect, or rather it exists only as a fallen and defective state of creation. This is particularly true of man, whose nature consists precisely in his being "theocentric." He received this "theocentricity," which the Greek Fathers always understood as a real "participation" in the life of God, when he was created and when God "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life" (Gn 2:7). This "breath" of God's life, identified with the Holy Spirit on the basis of the Septuagint version, is what made man to be "God's image." "A being taken from the earth," writes Cyril of Alexandria, "could not be seen as an image of the Most High, if he had not received this [breath]." ⁴ Thus the "perfecting" action of the Spirit does not belong to the category of the "miraculous," but forms a part of the original and natural plan of God. It assumes, inspires, and vivifies everything which is still fundamentally good and beautiful, in spite of the Fall, and maintains in creation the first fruits of the eschatological transfiguration. In this sense, the Spirit is the very content of the Kingdom of God. Gregory of Nyssa reports the ancient variant for the text of the Lord's prayer, "Thy Kingdom come," in Luke 11:2, as "May Thy Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us."⁵ And the Byzantine liturgical tradition maintains the same tradition when it starts every single office with an eschatological invocation of the Spirit, addressing Him as "Heavenly King."

The liturgical offices of Pentecost, though centered mainly on the role of the Spirit in redemption and salvation, also glorify the Spirit as "the One who rules all things, who is Lord of all, and who preserves creation from falling apart."⁶ Popular Byzantine customs associated with Pentecost suggest that the outpouring of the Spirit is indeed an anticipation of cosmic transfiguration; the traditional decoration of churches with greens and flowers on that day reflects the experience of new creation. The same idea dominates the "Great Blessing of Water," celebrated with great solemnity on the Feast of the Epiphany (January 6). Water, the primeval cosmic element, is sanctified "by the power, effectual operation ["energy"], and descent of the Holy Spirit" (Great Litany of the Day). Since, after the Fall, the cosmic elements are controlled by the "prince of this world," the action of the Spirit must have a purifying function: "Thou didst hallow the streams of Jordan," says the priest, "in that Thou didst send down from heaven Thy Holy Spirit, and didst crush the heads of serpents which lurked there."

The full significance of this rite of exorcism becomes evident when one recalls that, in Biblical categories, water is a source of life for the entire cosmos, over which man is called to rule. Only through the Fall did nature become subject to Satan. But the Spirit liberates man from dependence upon nature. Instead of being a source of demonic power, nature receives "the grace of redemption, the blessing of Jordan," and becomes a "fountain of immortality, a gift of sanctification, a remission of sins, a healing of infirmities, a destruction of demons." 7 Instead of dominating man, nature becomes his servant, since he is the image of God. The original paradisaic relationship between God, man, and the cosmos is proclaimed again: the descent of the Spirit anticipates the ultimate fulfillment when God will be "all in all."

This anticipation, however, is not a magical operation occurring in the material universe. The universe does not change in its empirical existence. The change is seen only by the eyes of faith; i.e., because man has received in his heart the Spirit which cries: "Abba, Father" (Ga 4:6), he is able to experience, in the mystery of faith, the paradisaic reality of nature serving him and to recognize that this experience is not a subjective fancy, but one which reveals the ultimate truth about nature and creation as a whole. By the power of the Spirit, the true and natural relationship is restored between God, man, and creation.

2. The Spirit and Man's Redemption

In the "economy" of salvation, the Son and the Spirit are inseparable: "When the Word dwelt upon the holy Virgin Mary," Athanasius writes, "the Spirit, together with the Word, entered her; in the Spirit, the Word fashioned a body for Himself, making it in conformity with Himself, in His will to bring all creation to the Father through Himself."⁸ The main argument, in favor of the consubstantiality of the Spirit with the Son and the Father, used by Athanasius, by Cyril of Alexandria, and by the Cappadocian Fathers, is the unity of the creative and redemptive action of God, which is always Trinitarian: "The Father does all things by the Word in the Holy Spirit." 9

But the essential difference between the action of the Logos and that of the Spirit is that the Logos, and not the Spirit, became man, and thus could be directly seen as the concrete person and hypostasis of Jesus Christ, while the personal existence of the Holy Spirit remained covered by divine incognoscibility. The Spirit, in His action, reveals not Himself but the Son; when He indwells in Mary, the Word is being conceived; when He reposes on the Son at the baptism in Jordan, He reveals the Father's good will toward the Son. This is the Biblical and theological basis of the very current notion, found in the Fathers, and in the liturgical texts, of the Spirit as image of the Son.¹⁰ It is impossible to see the Spirit, but in Him one sees the Son, while the Son Himself is the image of the Father. In the context of a dynamic and soteriological thought, the static Hellenic concept of image reflects a living relationship between the divine persons, into which, through the incarnation of the Son, mankind is introduced.

We have already seen that, in Greek patristic and Byzantine thought, salvation is understood essentially in terms of participation in and communion with the deified humanity of the incarnate Logos, the New Adam. When the Fathers call the Spirit the "image of the Son," they imply that He is the main agent which makes this communion a reality. The Son has given us "the first fruits of the Spirit," writes Athanasius, "so that we may be transformed into sons of God, according to the image of the Son of God."¹¹ Thus, if it is through the Spirit that the Logos became man, it is also only through the Spirit that true life reaches all men. "What is the effect and the result of the sufferings and works and teaching of Christ?" asks Nicholas Cabasilas. "Considered in relation to ourselves, it is nothing other than the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the Church."¹²

The Spirit transforms the Christian community into the "Body of Christ." In Byzantine hymns for the day of Pentecost, the Spirit is sometimes called the "glory of Christ" granted to the disciples after the Ascension,¹³ and at each Eucharist, the congregation after communion chants: "We have seen the true light; we have received the heavenly Spirit; we have found the true faith; we worship the undivided Trinity, for it has saved us." Pentecost, the birthday of the Church, is the moment when the true meaning of Christ's cross and Resurrection becomes manifest, when a new mankind enters back into divine fellowship, when a new knowledge is granted to "fishermen." This is the main theme of the feast of Pentecost in the Byzantine tradition, and, curiously, it matches the awareness of many modern students of Christian origins that full understanding of Christ's teaching is indeed a "post-Resurrection" experience of the early Church: "The Spirit, through His appearance in tongues of fire, firmly plants the memory of those man-saving words, which Christ told the Apostles, having received them from the Father." 14 But the "knowledge" or "memory" granted by the Spirit is not an intellectual function; it implies an "illumination" of human life as a whole. The theme of "light," which, through Origen and Gregory of Nyssa, permitted the association of the Biblical theophanies with Greek Neoplatonic mysticism, also permeates the liturgical hymnography of Pentecost. "The Father is light, the Word is light, and the Holy Spirit is light, which was sent to the Apostles as tongues of fire, and through which the whole world is illumined and venerates the Holy Trinity" (solemn hymn, called exaposteilarion). For indeed, the Holy Spirit is the "glory" of Christ, which not only transfigures the body of the historical Jesus, as was the case at the Transfiguration, but glorifies as well His wider "Body," i.e., all those who believe in Him. In fact, a comparison of the Byzantine liturgical texts of Pentecost with those appointed for the Feast of the Transfiguration (August 6) and it is always important to remember that, for the Byzantines, the liturgy was the highest expression of their faith and Christian experiences shows that the miracle of Pentecost was considered as an expanded form of the mystery of Tabor. On Mount Tabor the divine light was shown to a restricted circle of disciples, but at Pentecost Christ "by sending the Spirit, has shone forth as the light of the world,"¹⁵ because the Spirit "enlightens the disciples and has initiated them into the heavenly mysteries."¹⁶

Examples can be easily multiplied, which show that the Byzantine theological tradition is constantly aware that in the "economy" of creation and salvation the Son and the Spirit are accomplishing one single divine act without, however, being subordinated to one another in their hypostatic or personal existence. The "head" of the new, redeemed humanity is, of course, Christ, but the Spirit is not only Christ's agent; He is, in the words of John of Damascus (which are paraphrased in the hymns of Pentecost), "Spirit of God, direct, ruling; the fountain of wisdom, life and holiness; God existing and addressed along with the Father and Son; uncreated, full, creative, all-ruling, all-effecting, all-powerful, of infinite power, Lord of all creation and not subject to any; deifying, not deified; filling, not filled; shared in, not sharing in; sanctifying, not sanctified."¹⁷

This personal "independence" of the Spirit is connected, as Vladimir Lossky points out, with the whole mystery of redemption, which is both a unification (or "recapitulation") of mankind in the one divine-human hypostasis of Christ, the new Adam, and a mysterious personal encounter between each man and God. The unification of human nature is a free divine gift, but the personal encounter depends upon human freedom: "Christ becomes the sole image appropriate to the common nature of humanity. The Holy Spirit grants to each person created in the image of God the possibility of fulfilling the likeness in the common nature. The one lends His hypostasis to the nature, the other gives His divinity to the persons."¹⁸ There is, of course, one divinity and one divine action, or "energy," leading mankind to the one eschatological goal of deification; but the personal, hypostatic functions of the Son and of the Spirit are not identical. Divine grace and divine life are a single reality, but God is Trinity, and not an impersonal essence into which humanity would be called to merge. Thus, here, as we have seen above, Byzantine Christian tradition requires the distinction in God, between the One unapproachable Essence, the three hypostases, and the grace, or energy, through which God enters into communion with creatures.

The mystery of Pentecost is not an incarnation of the Spirit, but the bestowing of these gifts. The Spirit does not reveal His Person, as the Son does in Jesus, and does not en-hypostasize human nature as a whole; He communicates His uncreated grace to each human person, to each member of the Body of Christ. New humanity is realized in the hypostasis of the Son incarnate, but it receives only the gifts of the Spirit. The distinction between the Person of the Spirit and His gifts will receive great emphasis in Byzantine theology in connection with the theological controversies of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Gregory of Cyprus and Gregory Palamas will insist, in different contexts, that at Pentecost the Apostles received the eternal gifts or "energies" of the Spirit, but that there was no new hypostatic union between the Spirit and humanity. 19

Thus, the theology of the Holy Spirit implies a crucial polarity, which concerns the nature of the Christian faith itself. Pentecost saw the birth of the Church community, which will acquire structures, and will presuppose continuity and authority and was an outpouring of spiritual gifts, liberating man from servitude, giving him freedom and personal experience of God. Byzantine Christianity will remain aware of an unavoidable tension between these two aspects of faith: faith as doctrinal continuity and authority, and faith as the personal experience of saints. It will generally understand that an exaggerated emphasis on one aspect or the other destroys the very meaning of the Christian Gospel. The Spirit gives a structure to the community of the Church and authenticates the ministries which possess the authority to preserve the structure, to lead, and to teach; but the same Spirit also maintains in the Church prophetic functions and reveals the whole truth to each member of Christ's body, if only he is able and worthy to "receive" it. The life of the Church, because it is created by the Spirit, cannot be reduced to either the "institution" or the "event," to either authority or freedom. It is a "new" community created by the Spirit in Christ, where true freedom is recovered in the spiritual communion of the Body of Christ.

3. The Spirit and the Church

In Byzantine liturgical language, the term koinonia ("communion") is the specific expression designating the presence of the Holy Spirit in the Eucharistic community, and one of the key notions in Basil's treatise on the Holy Spirit. 20 This observation is important inasmuch as it emphasizes that the "communion" of the Father, the Son, and the Spirit, as divine Trinity, the "communion of the Holy Spirit" which introduces man into divine life, and the "communion" or "community" which is then created between men in Christ, not only are designated with the same term, but, ultimately, represent the same spiritual experience and reality. The Church is not simply a society of human beings, associated with each other by common beliefs and goals; it is a koinonia in God and with God. And if God Himself were not a Trinitarian koinonia, if He were not three Persons, the Church could never be an association of persons, irreducible to each other in their personal identity. Participation in divine life would be nothing more than a Neoplatonic or Buddhist integration into an impersonal "One."

The very specific "oneness" realized in the Eucharistic koinonia, is, par excellence, a gift of the Spirit.

One of the recurring themes in the Byzantine hymnography of Pentecost is a parallel drawn between the "confusion" of Babel and the "union" and "symphony" effected by the descent of the Spirit in tongues of fire: "When the Most High came down and confused the tongues, He divided the nations; but when He distributed the tongues of fire, He called all to unity. Therefore, with one voice, we glorify the all-holy Spirit."21 The Spirit does not suppress the pluralism and variety of creation; nor, more particularly, does He exclude the truly personal experience of God, accessible to each man; He overcomes division, contradiction, and corruption. He Himself is the "symphony" of creation, which will be fully realized in the eschatological fulfillment. The Church's function is to render this fulfillment accessible by anticipation through its role of "sanctification," effected by the Spirit.

"Creation is sanctified," Basil writes, "and the Spirit is the Sanctifier. In the same manner, the angels, the archangels and all the supercelestial powers receive their sanctity from the Spirit. But the Spirit Himself possesses sanctity by nature. He does not receive it by grace, but essentially; hence, He is distinctively called Holy. Thus He is holy by nature, as the Father and the Son are holy by nature."²² The mysterious, but overwhelming, role of the Spirit in the "economy" of salvation cannot be expressed fully other than by this suggestive tautology: the Holy Spirit "sanctifies," i.e., He creates a koinonia of man with God, and, hence, of men between themselves as a "community of saints." It is best expressed in the "anaphora of St. Basil," celebrated ten times each year in the Byzantine Church, at the most solemn moment of the epiclesis:

We pray Thee and call upon Thee, O Holy of Holies, that, by the favor of Thy goodness, Thy Holy Spirit may come upon us and upon the gifts now offered, to bless, to hallow, and to show this bread to be the precious Body of our Lord and God and Savior Jesus Christ, and this cup to be the precious Blood of our Lord and God and Savior Jesus Christ, shed for the life of the world, and [that the Spirit may] unite all of us to one another who become partakers of the one Bread and Cup in the communion [koinonia] of the Holy Spirit.

Each one individually having been baptized "in the death of Christ" and having received the "seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit" in the sacrament of chrismation, the faithful participate together in the mystery of the Eucharist. The existence of their koinonia is both a condition of the Eucharistic miracle the Spirit is being invoked not only on the "gifts" but "upon us and upon the gifts" and its consequence: the Spirit sanctifies the gifts so that the koinonia may become an always-renewed reality.

The role of the Spirit in transforming a community of sinners into the "Church of God" is distinct, but not essentially different, from His role in creation; for the "new Adam," being a "new creation," is also an anticipation of the universal transfiguration of the world, which is the ultimate intent and goal of God's creative activity. Byzantine liturgy and theology are always aware of the fact that "by the Holy Spirit, every living thing receives life," ²³ and that, therefore, as the new temple of the Spirit, the Church is invested with a divine mission to the world. It does not receive the Spirit for its own sake, but in order to accomplish God's purpose in human history and in the whole cosmos. The parallelism as well as the difference between the "first" and the "new" creation is well expressed by Nicholas Cabasilas: "[God] does not create anew out of the same matter which He created in the beginning. Then He made use of the dust of the earth; today He calls upon His own body. He restores life to us, not by forming anew a vital principle which He formerly maintained in the natural order, but by shedding His blood in the hearts of communicants so that He may cause His own life to spring in them. Of old He breathed a breath of life; now He imparts to us His own Spirit."²⁴

"New creation" implies mission to the world; hence the Church is always "apostolic," i.e., not only founded on the faith of those who saw the risen Lord, but assuming their function of "being sent" to announce and establish the Kingdom of God. And this mission receives its authenticity from the Spirit. The Byzantine hymns for Pentecost glorify Christ "who has made the fishermen most wise by sending down upon them the Holy Spirit, and through them did draw the world into His net."²⁵

The Spirit has bestowed upon the Church its "apostolicity," since the day of Pentecost; and only through the Spirit can the Church preserve consistency and continuity with the original Christian Gospel. The various ministries, created by the Spirit in the Christian koinonia, and more particularly that of the episcopate, are meant to maintain and structure this continuity, thus assuring the purity and effectiveness of the Church's mission in the world.

4. The Spirit and Man's Freedom

We have seen in Chapter 11 that man was not understood, in the Greek patristic tradition, as an autonomous being; participation in divine life was seen as an integral part of his nature. But since man is created free, it is obvious that there cannot be, as in Western theology, any opposition between "grace" and freedom. Quite to the contrary. Man can be authentically free only "in God," when, through the Holy Spirit, he has been liberated from the determinism of created and fallen existence and has received the power to share in God's lordship over creation.

This approach to freedom has crucial implications for man's attitude toward the Church, as well as for his social and personal ethics. On the one hand, it presupposes that nowhere, except in the sacramental community of the Church, is it possible to achieve the truly liberating divine life. On the other hand, the whole approach to man's salvation remains based on a personal, responsible, and free experience of God. This paradox, irreducible to a rational scheme, corresponds to an essential element of pneumatology: the Spirit simultaneously guarantees the continuity and authenticity of the Church's sacramental institutions and bestows upon each human person a possibility of free divine experience and, therefore, a full responsibility for both personal salvation and corporate continuity of the Church in the divine truth. Between the corporate and the sacramental on the one hand, and the personal, on the other, there is, therefore, a necessary tension in the spiritual life of the Christian and in his ethical behavior. The Kingdom to come is already realized in the sacraments, but each individual Christian is called to grow into it, by exercising his own efforts and by using his own God-given freedom with the cooperation of the Spirit.

In the Byzantine tradition, there has never been any strong tendency to build systems of Christian ethics, and the Church has never been viewed as the source of authoritative and detailed statements on Christian behavior. Church authority was certainly often called upon to solve concrete cases, and its decisions were seen as authoritative criteria for future judgments; but the creative mainstream of Byzantine spirituality was a call to "perfection" and to "holiness," and not a propositional system of ethics. It is the mystical, eschatological, and, therefore, maximalistic character of this call to holiness which gives it its essential difference from the legalism of medieval Roman Catholicism, the puritanical moralism of other Western trends, and the relativism of modern "situation ethics." Whenever they searched for models of Christian behavior, Byzantine Christians looked rather at saints and "athletes of the faith," especially the monks. Monastic literature is the source par excellence for our own understanding of Byzantine spirituality, and it is dominated by a "quest" of the Spirit.

Especially associated with the tradition of Macarius, this quest is particularly evident in the flowery hymns of Symeon the New Theologian, addressed to the Holy Spirit:

I give thanks to Thee for this, that Thou, divine Being above all things, makest Thyself a single spirit with me without confusion, without change and that Thou didst become all in all for me, ineffable nourishment, freely distributed, which falls from the lips of my soul, which flows abundantly from the source of my heart; the resplendent vesture which covers me and protects me and which destroys the demons; the purification which washes from me every stain through these holy and perpetual tears which Thy presence accords to those whom Thou visitest. I give thanks to Thee for Thy being which was revealed to me as the day without twilight, as the sun which does not set. O Thou who hast no place where Thou hidest Thyself, for Thou dost never shun us, never hast Thou disdained anyone; it is we, on the contrary, who hide ourselves, not wishing to go toward Thee. 26

The conscious and personal experience of the Holy Spirit is, therefore, the supreme goal of Christian life in the Byzantine tradition, an experience which presupposes constant growth and ascent. This experience is not opposed to an essentially Christocentric understanding of the Gospel, for it itself is possible only "in Christ," i.e., through communion in the deified humanity of Jesus; nor is it contradictory to practical ethical requirements, for it remains impossible unless these requirements are fulfilled. But, obviously, such experience reflects a basically personalistic understanding of Christianity. To a degree larger than in the West, then, the Byzantine Church will see in the saint or in the mystic the guardian of the faith, and will trust him more than any permanent institution; and it will not develop legal or canonical guarantees for an independent Christian action in the world, hoping rather that, if they are needed, prophets will arise to preserve the identity of the Gospel; this hope will indeed be fulfilled in the irreducible non-conformity of monastic personalities and communities throughout Byzantine history.

Obviously, however, Byzantine Christianity will also be faced with temptations inherent in its personalistic outlook. Spiritualistic and dualistic sects will often prosper in the Byzantine, and post-Byzantine, world, side by side with Orthodox spirituality. Between the fourth and the fourteenth centuries, various forms of Messalianism²⁷the Pelagianism of the East²⁷will promote an anti-social, non-sacramental, and dualistic interpretation of the monastic ideal. They will be followed by the Russian Strigol'niki and other sects. Their influence, under the form of an exaggerated anti-institutionalism, will always be felt inside the canonical boundaries of the Orthodox Church itself.

The Church, of course, has never admitted that spiritualistic individualism and "enthusiasm" be erected as an ecclesiological system, but maintained its sacramental structure and canonical discipline. Conscious of the fact that in the Kingdom of God there are no laws other than those of the Spirit, it has also remembered that the Kingdom, already accessible as a true and direct experience, has not yet come in strength, and remains hidden under the sacramental veils. In the present aion, structures, laws, canons, and institutions are unavoidable, as means toward a fuller realization of the Kingdom. In practice, the Byzantine world recognized that the Christian empire had a legitimate role to play in codifying practical Christian ethics and in supervising their application. The standard code of Christian behavior was the Nomocanon, a collection of Church rules and of state laws concerning religion. Even there, however, the basic personalism of Byzantine Christianity was preserved in the fact that a person, not an institution, was invested with direct responsibilities in the Christian world: the Christian emperor, "elect of God." Historically, the perpetuation of the empire in the East played a role in preventing the Byzantine Church from assuming the direct role of ruling society politically, and thus keeping more strictly to its function as a signpost of the Kingdom to come. A Kingdom fundamentally different from all political systems of this age.

Whatever the obvious ambiguity and the hypocrisy which, at times, was evident in the Byzantine state, it thus served as an historical framework for a tradition which maintained the eschatological character of Christianity. In general, whether in the lands of Islam, or in modern secular societies of Eastern Europe, the Orthodox settled for a ghetto life: the closed liturgical community, with its experience of the heavenly, served both as a refuge and as a school. It demonstrated a remarkable capacity for survival and also, as for example in nineteenth- and twentieth-century Russia, for influencing intellectual development. Its emphasis on the free experience of the Spirit, as the liberating goal of human life, may be even better appreciated among those who today are looking for alternatives to the over-institutionalized ecclesiasticism of Western Christianity.

Notes

1. Letter 38, 4; PG 32:332_C; trans. R. J. Deferrari (London: Heinemann, 1961), p. 211.
2. Cat. 16, 11; PG 33:932_C.
3. De Spir. S., 16, 38; PG 32:136_B.
4. In Joh. XI, 10; PG 74:541_C.

5. See R. Leaney, "The Lucan text of the Lord's Prayer (in Gregory of Nyssa)," Novum Testamentum 1 (1956), 103-111.
6. Apodeipnon, canon, ode 5.
7. Great Blessing of Water.
8. Ad Serap. 1, 31; PG 26:605_A.
9. Ibid., 1, 28; PG 26:596_A.
10. See for example Basil, De Spirit. S., 9, 23, PG 32:109_B.
11. On the Incarnation and Against the Arians, 8; PG 26:997_A.
12. A Commentary on the Divine Liturgy, 37, 3, SC 4 bis, p. 229; trans. J. M. Hussey and P. A. McNulty (London: SPCK, 1960), p. 90.
13. Kathisma, after the Polyeleon.
14. Canon 2, ode 8.
15. Canon 1, ode 1.
16. Kathisma 1.
17. De fide orth. I, 8; PG 94:821_{BC}.
18. Lossky, Mystical Theology, pp. 166-167.
19. Cf. J. Meyendorff, Gregory Palamas, pp. 14-15, 231.
20. Boris Bobrinskoy, "Liturgie et ecclésiologie trinitaire de St. Basile," Etudes patristiques: le traité sur le Saint-Esprit de Saint Basile, Foi et Constitution, 1969, pp. 89-90; also in Verbum Caro, 23, No. 88.
21. Kontakion of Pentecost.
22. Letter 159, 2; PG 32:621_{AB}; ed. Deferrari, p. 396.

23. Sunday Matins, Antiphon, tone 4.

24. On the Life in Christ, IV; PG 150:617_B.

25. Troparion.

26. PG 120:509_{BC}.

27. I. Hausherr, "L'erreur fondamentale et la logique du messalianisme," OCP 1 (1955), 328-360.

14

The Triune God

"When I say God, I mean Father, Son, and Holy Spirit," writes Gregory of Nazianzus. 1 Far from being a form of abstract speculation, the doctrine of the Trinity was always, for the Greek patristic tradition, a matter of religious experience: liturgical, mystical, and, often, poetical:

No sooner do I conceive of the one than I am illumined by the splendor of the three; no sooner do I distinguish them than I am carried back to the one. When I think of any one of the three, I think of Him as the whole, and my eyes are filled, and the greater part of what I am thinking escapes me.²

The basis of this Trinitarian theology, which was formulated by the Cappadocian Fathers in the fourth century at the conclusion of the Arian controversies, and which remained standard throughout the Byzantine period, is found in soteriology: the Fathers were actually preoccupied, not with speculation, but with man's salvation. The Nicaean doctrine of con-substantiality meant "the confession of the fullness of divinity in Christ and implied that the Incarnation was essential to the redemptive act of Christ"; and maintained, similarly, that if "the Spirit is not fully God, He is unable to bestow sanctification."³ In itself, the Cappadocian doctrine of the Trinity remains totally meaningless unless one remember that its goal is to maintain the Christological and pneumatological presuppositions developed in the last two chapters: the incarnate Logos and the Holy Spirit are met and experienced first as divine agents of salvation, and only then are they also discovered to be essentially one God. It is well known that, during the theological debates of the fourth century, the Cappadocian Fathers were accused of tritheism, so that Gregory of Nyssa was even obliged to issue his famous apologetic treatise proving that "there are not three gods."⁴ It remains debatable, however, whether he succeeded in proving his point philosophically. The doctrine of the three hypostases, adopted by the Cappadocian Fathers to designate the three divine Persons, had definite Plotinian and Origenistic associations, which normally implied substantial differentiation. The Fathers, however, remained faithful to the terminology they had adopted, in spite of all difficulties and criticism both from the "old Nicaeans" faithful to Athanasius and from the theologians of the Latin West because they saw no other means of preserving the Biblical experience of salvation in the fully identifiable and distinct persons of Christ and the Spirit, an experience which could never enter the categories of philosophical essentialism.

The Latin West adopted a different approach to Trinitarian theology, and the contrast has been well expressed by Théodore de Régnon: "Latin philosophy considers the nature in itself first and proceeds to the agent; Greek philosophy considers the agent first and passes through it to find the nature. The Latins think of personality as a mode of nature; the Greeks think of nature as the content of the person." 5 Practically speaking, the difference of emphasis means that in both the lex orandi and the lex credendi of Byzantine Christianity, the Trinity remained a primary and concrete experience; the unity of God's nature was an article of faith, coupled always with an insistence on the absolute unknowability of the divine essence. In the West, however, especially since the time of Augustine, the unity of the divine being served as the starting point of Trinitarian theology. Obviously, as long as the two schools of thought remained open to dialogue and mutual understanding, they could have developed in a complementary way. Unfortunately, the bitter polemics on the Filioque issue led to a stiffening of positions and became one of the major causes of the schism. The modern crisis of deism, the increasing difficulty faced by modern theologians in explaining and justifying the being of God as a philosophically definable entity, may prove helpful, not only in solving the medieval controversy between East and West, but also in the revival of a more authentic Trinitarianism. "It would seem that in our time," writes Théodore de Régnon, "the dogma of the divine unity had, as it were, absorbed the dogma of the Trinity of which one only speaks as a memory."⁶ But the "dogma of the divine unity" is being challenged by that of the "death of God"; hence, there is a return to an existential and experiential approach to the doctrine of God, seen in the context of salvation history: "Without our experience of Father, Son, and Spirit in salvation history," writes Karl Rahner, "we would ultimately be unable to conceive at all of their subsisting distinctly as the one God."⁷

These modern concerns meet directly the consistent position of Byzantine theology.

1. Unity and Trinity

The Cappadocian Fathers adopted the formulation which would remain the criterion of Orthodox Trinitarian theology in the East: God is one essence in three hypostases. This Cappadocian settlement, given the circumstances of the fourth century, never pretended to be anything more than the best possible description of the divine mystery, not the solution of a philosophical process, similar to the Plotinian "Trinity of hypostases." The Fathers always affirmed that we cannot know what God is, only that He is, because He has revealed Himself in salvation history as Father, Son, and Spirit. God is Trinity, "and this fact can be deduced from no principle nor explained by any sufficient reason for there are neither principles nor causes anterior to the Trinity." 8

Why then are this description and this terminology preferable to others? Mainly because all the options then available seemed inadequate from the start. The formula "one essence, three prosopa," for example, was not able to exclude a modalistic Trinity, since the term prosopon, although commonly used to designate "person," could also mean "mask" or "appearance." The Cappadocian Fathers, meanwhile, wanted to affirm simultaneously that God is one object and three objects, that both His unity and His trinity are full realities. "When I speak of God," writes Gregory of Nazianzus, "you must be illumined at once by one flash of light and by three. Three in properties, in hypostases or Persons, if any prefer so to call them, for we will not quarrel about names so long as the syllables amount to the same meaning; but one in respect of the ousia, that is, the Godhead."9

There is no claim here for philosophical consistency, although an effort is made to use current philosophical terms. The ultimate meaning of the terms, however, is clearly different from their meaning in Greek philosophy, and their inadequacy is frankly recognized.

This is particularly true of hypostasis, a term crucial in Trinitarian theology, and in Christology. Neither in Aristotelianism nor in Neoplatonism was the term intended to designate a person in the Christian (and modern) sense, an agent, "possessing" his own nature and "acting" accordingly, a unique subject, whose absolute identity can in no way be duplicated. Against the "old Nicaeans," the Cappadocian Fathers wanted to emphasize that the Nicaean homoousion ("consubstantial") does not identify the Son with the Father on the personal level, but only on the level of the ousia. "Neither is the Son Father, for the Father is one, but He is what the Father is; nor is the Spirit Son because He is of God, for the Only-begotten is one, but He is what the Son is."¹⁰ Thus, in God, the "what" is one, but the three hypostases are personal identities, irreducible to each other in their personal being. They "possess divinity"¹¹ and divinity is "in them."¹²

One recognizes the hypostatic character [of the Spirit] in that He is revealed after the Son and with the Son, and in that He receives His subsistence from the Father. And the Son, in Himself and with Himself revealing the Spirit, who proceeds from the Father, shines alone with the unbegotten light and has nothing in common with the Father and the Spirit in the identity of His particularities, but is revealed alone in the characters proper to His hypostasis. And the Father possesses the particular hypostatic character of being the Father and of being independent from all causality. . . . 13

The same personalistic emphasis appears in the Greek Fathers' insistence on the "monarchy" of the Father. Contrary to the concept which prevailed in the post-Augustinian West and in Latin Scholasticism, Greek theology attributes the origin of hypostatic "subsistence" to the hypostasis of the Father not to the common essence. The Father is the "cause" (aitia) and the "principle" (arche) of the divine nature, which is in the Son and in the Spirit. What is even more striking is the fact that this "monarchy" of the Father is constantly used by the Cappadocian Fathers against those who accuse them of "tritheism": "God is one," writes Basil, "because the Father is one."¹⁴ And the same thought is found in Gregory of Nazianzus: "God is the common nature of the three, but the Father is their union [henosis]."¹⁵ Pseudo-Dionysius also speaks of the Father as the "source of Divinity,"¹⁶ and John of Damascus in his Exact Exposition of the Orthodox Faith also affirms the essential dependence of the Son and the Spirit upon the Person of the Father:

Whatsoever the Son has from the Father, the Spirit also has, including His very being. And if the Father does not exist, then neither does the Son and the Spirit; and if the Father does not have something, then neither has the Son or the Spirit. Furthermore, because of the Father, that is, because of the fact that the Father is, the Son and the Spirit are; and because of the Father, the Son and the Spirit have everything that they have.¹⁷

By accepting Nicaea, the Cappadocian Fathers eliminated the ontological subordinationism of Origen and Arius, but they preserved indeed, together with their understanding of hypostatic life, a Biblical and Orthodox subordinationism, maintaining the personal identity of the Father as the ultimate origin of all divine being and action: "The three [are] one God when contemplated together; each [is] God because [they are] consubstantial; the three [are] one God because of the monarchy [of the Father]."18 Developing his well-known doctrine of the divine image in man, Gregory of Nyssa defines one aspect of human personal existence which is clearly different from that of God: each human person possesses the power of reproducing himself, while, in God, there is only "one and the same Person of the Father from whom the Son is born and the Spirit proceeds."19 Thus, the human race is in a constant process of fragmentation, and can recover its unity only through adoption by the Father in Christ. i.e., by becoming children of the one single hypostasis which generates without fragmenting, or multiplying. The origin of unity in the Trinity, the Father restores the unity of creation by adopting humanity in His Son, the New Adam, in whom humanity is "recapitulated" through the activity of the Spirit.

Not an abstract intellectual speculation, the doctrine of the Trinity stands at the very center of Byzantine religious experience: the immanent Trinity manifests itself as the "economic" Trinity, i.e., the saving revelation of God in history. This is made particularly clear in the liturgy, especially in the Eucharistic canon. As a solemn prayer to the Father by the adopted human community, united in the incarnate Son and invoking the Spirit, the Eucharist is indeed the sacrament of divine unity being bestowed upon men. The same Trinitarian reality is expressed in innumerable hymns, scattered throughout the Byzantine liturgical cycles. Here is a solemn hymn of Pentecost, attributed to the emperor-poet Leo ^{vi} (886-912), and constituting a variation on the famous Trisagion:

Come, O peoples, let us venerate the tri-hypostatic Deity,

The Son in the Father, with the Holy Spirit.

For before time the Father generated a Son, sharing His eternity and His Throne;

And the Holy Spirit was in the Father, glorified together with the Son.

One Power, One Essence, One Deity, whom we all venerate and say:

Holy God, who created all things through the Son, with the cooperation of the Holy Spirit;

Holy Mighty, through whom we knew the Father and the Holy Spirit dwelt in the world;

Holy Immortal, the Spirit Comforter, who proceeds from the Father and abides in the Son,

Holy Trinity, glory to Thee. 20

In the classical Latin Trinitarian doctrine, "Father, Son, and Spirit are only 'relatively' distinct."²¹ Whatever the interpretation given to the idea of "relation" implied in this statement, it is clear that Western thought recognized the ontological primacy of essential unity over personal diversity in God; that is, that God is essentially one, except in the divine Persons, who are defined in terms of relations. In Byzantine thought, however, to use an expression from Maximus the Confessor "God is identically monad and triad,"²² and there is probably a tendency in both worship and philosophical formulations (as distinct from doctrinal statements) to give a certain preeminence to the personal diversity over essential unity. A reference to the Nicæan "consubstantial" was the Byzantine response to the accusation of "tritheism."

This reference, however, could not be decisive in itself, simply because Greek patristic thought, and particularly that of the Cappadocians, always presupposed the starting point of apophatic theology: that God's being and, consequently, the ultimate meaning of hypostatic relations were understood to be totally above comprehension, definition, or argument. The very notion of God's being both Unity and Trinity was a revelation illustrating this incomprehensibility; for no reality, accessible to the mind, could be both "one" and "three." As Vladimir Lossky puts it: "the Incomprehensible reveals Himself in the very fact of His being incomprehensible, for His incomprehensibility is rooted in the fact that God is not only Nature but also Three Persons." 23

The knowledge of God is therefore possible only inasmuch as He reveals Himself, inasmuch as the immanent Trinity manifests itself in the "economy" of salvation, inasmuch as the transcendent acts on the immanent level. It is in the fundamental oneness of these "acts" or "energies" of God that the Greek Fathers, particularly Basil and Gregory of Nyssa, discover the decisive and existential sign of the unity of God's essence. Basil's well-known argument in favor of the divinity of the Spirit is that He has the same "energy" as the Father and the Son. Similarly, Gregory of Nyssa proves the essential unity of Father, Son, and Spirit from the unity of their operation.²⁴ This argument also fits into the context of the Cappadocians' polemics against Eunomius, who affirmed the possibility of knowing God's essence; no knowledge concerning God, they asserted, was possible, except from His "energies." The "economic" Trinity, revealed in God's action in the world, is, therefore, the only possible basis for affirming that God is indeed, paradoxically and incomprehensibly, a transcendent and immanent Trinity. Gregory of Nyssa's doctrine of the "energies" is well described by G. L. Prestige:

In men . . . , in spite of the solidarity of the whole race, each individual acts separately, so that it is proper to regard them as many. This is not so . . . with God. The Father never acts independently of the Son, nor the Son of the Spirit. Divine action . . . always begins from the Father, proceeds through the Son, and is completed in the Holy Spirit; there is no such thing as a separate individual operation of any Person; the energy invariably passes through the three, though the effect is not three actions but one.²⁵

In fact, the Aristotelian principle according to which each "nature" (physis) has an "energy" (energeia) i.e., an existentially perceivable manifestation provides the terminological background for the patristic concept of "energy." (We find this terminology used, as well, in Christology, where Maximus the Confessor, for example, will maintain that the two natures of Christ presuppose two "energies" or wills.) However, significantly, the Aristotelian dyad, nature-energy, was not considered sufficient in itself when applied to God, because in God's nature, the decisive acting factor is hypostatic; hence, divine "energy" is not only unique but tri-hypostatic, since the "energy" reflects the common life of the three Persons. The personal aspects of the divine subsistence do not disappear in the one "energy," and it is indeed the Trinitarian life of God which is communicated and participated in in the "energy": through the "energy," therefore, the divine hypostases appear in their co-inherence (perichoresis): 26 "I am in the Father and the Father in me" (Jn 14:11). Human persons, though also one in nature and substance, act disjointly and often in conflict with each other; in God, however, the perichoresis expresses the perfect love, and therefore, the perfect unity of "energy," of the three hypostases, without, however, any mingling or coalescence. The "energy," because it is always Trinitarian, is always an expression and a communication of love: "As the Father has loved me, so I have loved you: abide in my love" (Jn 15:9).

It is probably in the context of the doctrine of the perichoresis that one should understand a unique passage in Palamas, where he seems inspired by the Augustinian "psychological" image of the Trinity.²⁷ Palamas writes: "This Spirit of the Word from on high is like the mysterious love of the Father toward the Word mysteriously begotten; it is that possessed by the Word, the beloved Son, toward the Father who begat Him; this the Son does insofar as He comes from the Father conjointly with this love, and this love rests naturally upon him."²⁸ Since the whole approach to the Trinity in Palamas is different from Augustine's, it is certainly the result of the personalistic interpretation, which can be given to the "psychological" image being used here to suggest the Trinitarian mystery: love unites the three divine hypostases, and pours out, through their common divine "energy" or "action," upon those worthy to receive it.

2. Hypostasis, Essence, and Energy

The distinction a real distinction between divine "essence" and divine "energy" is made unavoidable in the context of the doctrine of "deification," which implies a "participation" of created man in the uncreated life of God, whose essence remains transcendent and totally unparticipable. All these aspects of the doctrine of God will, in fact, be faced simultaneously during the controversies between Gregory Palamas and his adversaries in the fourteenth century. His conclusion, necessarily, is that "three elements belong to God: essence, energy, and the triad of the divine hypostases."²⁹

This triple distinction is rendered inescapable, as soon as one rejects the Augustinian option of Trinitarianism in favor of the Cappadocian. For, indeed, if the Persons are only relations internal to the essence, the revelation of God, if any, is a revelation either of the "essence" or of "analogous" created symbols; the "energies," then, are either the "essence" of God or created signs, and there is no real distinction in God. But if, on the contrary, the Persons are distinct from the essence, which is common to them but transcendent and inaccessible to man, and if in Christ man meets God "face to face," so that there is a real "participation" in divine existence, this participated divine existence can only be a free gift from God, which safeguards the inaccessible character of the essence and the transcendence of God. This God-giving-Himself is the divine "energy"; a living and personal God is indeed an acting God.

We have seen that the doctrine of the "energies" in the Byzantine tradition is central both to the understanding of creation and to Christology. Refusing to reduce the being of God to the philosophical concept of simple "essence," Byzantine thought affirms the full and distinct reality of the Triune hypostatic life of God ad intra, as well as His "multiplication" as creator ad extra. These two "multiplicities" do not, however, coincide. The terminology which the doctrine of energies received, in its relation to the three hypostases, was stabilized in the Palamite synthesis of the fourteenth century:

The proper appellations of the divine hypostases are common to the energies; whereas appellations common to the hypostases are particular to each of the divine energies. Thus life is a common appellation of the Father, the Son and the Spirit, but foreknowledge is not called life, nor is simplicity, nor unchangeableness, nor any other energy. Thus each of the realities which we have enumerated belongs at the same time to the Father, the Son, and the Spirit; but they only belong to one energy, and not to all; each reality in fact has only one signification. Inversely, Father is the proper appellation of one sole hypostasis, but it is manifest in all the energies. . . . And the same is true of the appellations Son and Spirit. . . . Thus since God in His wholeness is wholly incarnate, He has unchangeably united to the whole of me . . . the divine nature and all its power and energy in one of the divine hypostases. Thus, also, through each of His energies one shares in the whole of God . . . the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. . . . 30

The triple distinctionessence, hypostasis, energyis not a division of God's being; it reflects the mysterious life of the "One-who-is"transcendent, tri-personal, and present to His creation.

The Palamite formulations of the fourteenth century were preceded by theological developments which dealt with the same triple distinction. In 1156 and 1157, two local councils held in Constantinople debated the problem whether the sacrifice of Christ, in both its historical and its Eucharistic dimensions, was offered to the Father alone, or to the Holy Trinity. Soterichos, a theologian, was condemned because he held that the acts of offering and of receiving constituted the hypostatic characteristics of the Son and the Father respectively, an opinion the councils considered to be a confusion between the "immanent" and the "economic" Trinity, or between the hypo-static characteristics and "energies." And, indeed, the Byzantine liturgies of Basil and of John Chrysostom include, at the offertory, a prayer addressed to Christ: "For it is you who offer and are offered, who receive and are yourself received." The mystery of the hypostatic life, as it is revealed in the Incarnation and in the act of redemption, is also expressed in a Byzantine Easter troparion (repeated by the priest during the offertory, at the Eucharist): "O Christ undescribable! You filled all things: bodily in the grave, in Hades with your soul as God, in Paradise with the thief; you also sat on the divine throne with the Father and the Spirit."

Therefore, even if the Father alone is the addressee of the Eucharistic prayer, the act of "receiving" the sacrifice is a Trinitarian act, as are all the divine acts ad extra.³¹ The mystery of the Incarnation, however, consists in the fact that the divine hypostasis of the Logos assumed also the role of offering, bringing humanity with itself to the throne of the Father. The Eucharistic sacrifice is precisely this offering, accomplished in the body of Christ, where human nature is penetrated with divine energy, assumed as it is by the hypostasis of the Logos.

The hypostatic, personal existence implies an "openness," which makes it possible for the incarnate Logos to "offer" and to "receive," to be man and God, and to remain, with the Father and the Spirit, the "actor" of the "energies" characterizing divine nature.

3. The Living God

"God, when He was speaking with Moses, did not say: 'I am the essence,' but 'I am who am' [Ex 3:14]. It is therefore not He-who-is who comes from the essence, but it is the essence which comes from He-who-is, for He-who-is embraces in Himself all being."³² When Palamas, in the passage just quoted, explicitly refers to the Biblical doctrine of the living God, or when he refuses to identify the being of God with the philosophical notion of essence "The essence is necessarily being, but being is not necessarily essence"³³he expresses the very content of his quarrel with Barlaam and Akindynos, but also maintains the theologia of the Cappadocian Fathers.

We have already noted that the conflict within Byzantine society which set the monks against the "humanists" involved an understanding of man's destiny based on the Bible as opposed to one based on Platonic spiritualism. A similar problem developed on the level of "theology" proper, i.e., the doctrine of God. The issue was complicated by the fact that Latin Scholasticism provided the Byzantine anti-Palamites with a truly "Greek" interpretation of the divine being, and they readily turned into Latinophrones. For indeed the real significance of the Filioque quarrel consisted in the fact that the two sides held to a different approach to God. The East refused to identify God's being with the concept of "simple essence," while the West admitted this identification on the basis of Greek philosophical presuppositions. The issue certainly could not be solved by collections of scriptural and patristic "proof texts," even if agreement was obviously possible on the canonical level (unilateral interpolation of the universal creed by the Latins) and in the terminology (procession "from both" could be admitted by the Easterns on the level of the "economy"). The controversy was really concerned, as Vladimir Lossky puts it, with the fact that by the dogma of the Filioque the God of the philosophers and savants is introduced into the place of the Living God. . . . The Unknowable Essence of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit receives positive qualifications. It becomes the subject of a Natural Theology, concerned with "God in general," who may be the God of Descartes, or the God of Leibniz, or even perhaps, to some extent, the God of Voltaire and the dechristianized Deists of the eighteenth century. 34

This conclusion may appear to some as an overstatement. It is both characteristic and refreshing, however, that precisely those modern theologians of the West who are most concerned with making Christian theology again as kerygmatic and appealing as it was in another age are suggesting a return to the pre-Augustinian concepts of God, "where the three hypostases were seen first of all in their personal, irreducible functions."³⁵ "Without our experience of Father, Son, and Spirit in salvation history, we would ultimately be unable to conceive at all of their subsisting distinctly as the one God."³⁶

Notes

1. Oratio 45, 4; PG 36:628_c.
2. Oratio 40, 41; PG 36:417_{BC}.
3. Both quotations from Georges Florovsky, Vostochnye Ottsy (Paris: YMCA Press, 1931), p. 23.
4. The treatise is addressed To Ablabius, ed. F. Mueller (Leiden, 1958), pp. 37-57.

5. Théodore de Régnon, Etudes de théologie positive sur la Sainte Trinité (Paris, 1892), I, 433. See also G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought (London: SPCK, 1952), pp. 233-241, and J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London: Black, 1958), pp. 253-279.

6. De Régnon, Etudes, I, 365.

7. Karl Rahner, The Trinity, trans. Joseph Donceel, S.J. (London: Burns & Oates, 1969), pp. 110-111.

8. Lossky, Mystical Theology, p. 47.

9. Oratio 39, 11; PG 36:345_{CD}.

10. Gregory of Nazianzus, Oratio, 31, 9; PG 36:144_A.

11. Gregory of Nazianzus, Poem. Dogm. 20,3; PG 37:414_A.

12. Gregory of Nazianzus, Oratio 31, 41; PG 36:149_A.

13. Basil, Ep. 38, 4; PG 32:329_{CD}.

14. Basil, Contra Sab., 3; PG 31:605_A.

15. Oratio 42, 15; PG 36:476_B.

16. Pseudo-Dionysius, De div. nom. 2, 7; PG 3:645_B.

17. De fide orthodoxa 1, 8; PC; 94:324_B; trans. F. H. Chase, Fathers of the Church. 37 (New York, 1958), p. 184.
18. Gregory of Nazianzus, Oratio 40, 41; PG 36:417_B.
19. Adv. Graecos; PG 45:180.
20. Pentekostarion (Athens: Phos, 1960), p. 218.
21. K. Rahner, op. cit., p. 68.
22. Capita theol. et oecon. II, 1; PG 90:1125_A.
23. Op. cit., p. 64.
24. See G. L. Prestige, op. cit., pp. 257-260.
25. Op. tit., p. 260.
26. The term was first used in Christology (see Prestige, God in Patristic Thought, pp. 291-299); it began to be applied to the hypostatic relations by pseudo-Cyril and by John of Damascus.
27. St. Augustine's De Trinitate had been translated into Greek by Maximus Planudes in the thirteenth century, and could have been known by Palamas.
28. Cap. phys. 36; PG 151:1144_D-1145_A.
29. Cap. phys. 75; PG 151:1173_B.
30. Against Akindynos, V, 27; edd. Kontogiannes and Phanourgakes, pp. 373-374.
31. On the councils of 1156 and 1157, see J. Meyendorff, Christ, pp. 152-154.
32. Gregory Palamas, Triads III, 2, 12; ed J. Meyendorff, in Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense, 31 (Louvain, 1959); Palamas is paraphrasing Gregory of Nazianzus, Oratio 45, 3; PG 36:625c.

33. Against Akindynos III, 10; edd. Kontogiannes and Phanourgakes, p. 184.

34. "The procession of the Holy Spirit in the Orthodox Triadology" in Eastern Churches Quarterly. Supplemental issue Concerning the Holy Spirit (1948), p. 46. See also the debate on the Filioque between Orthodox (Bishop Cassian, Meyendorff, Verhovskoy, and others) and Roman Catholic (Camelot, Bouyer, Henry, Dubarle, Dondaine, and others) theologians published in Russie et Chrétienté (1950), No. 3-4.

35. Cf. J. Meyendorff, Christ, p. 166.

36. K. Rahner, op. cit., p. 111.

15

Sacramental Theology: The Cycle of Life

In his book on The Life in Christ a commentary on baptism, confirmation, and communions Nicholas Cabasilas writes: "It is possible for the saints in this present world, not only to be disposed and prepared for [eternal] life [in Christ], but also even now to live and act according to it." ¹ The Kingdom of God, an anticipation of the eschatological fulfillment, is already accessible in the Body of Christ: this possibility of "being in Christ," of "participating" in divine life the "natural" state of humanity is, for the Byzantines, essentially manifested in the sacraments, or mysteria, of the Church. These sacraments are understood less as isolated acts through which a "particular" grace is bestowed upon individuals by properly appointed ministers acting with the proper intention, and more as the aspects of a unique mystery of the Church, in which God shares divine life with humanity, redeeming man from sin and death and bestowing upon him the glory of immortality.

1. Number of Sacraments

Byzantine theology ignores the Western distinction between "sacraments" and "sacramentals," and never formally committed itself to any strict limitation of the number of sacraments. In the patristic period there was no technical term to designate "sacraments" as a specific category of church acts: the term mysterion was used primarily in the wider and general sense of "mystery of salvation,"² and only in a subsidiary manner to designate the particular actions which bestow salvation. In this second sense, it was used concurrently with such terms as "rites" or "sanctifications."³ Theodore the Studite in the ninth century gives a list of six sacraments: the holy "illumination" (baptism), the "synaxis" (Eucharist), the holy chrism, ordination, monastic tonsure, and the service of burial.⁴ The doctrine of the "seven sacraments" appears for the first time every characteristically in the Profession of Faith required from Emperor Michael Paleologus by Pope Clement ^{IV} in 1267. ⁵ The Profession had been prepared, of course, by Latin theologians.

The obviously Western origin of this strict numbering of the sacraments did not prevent it from being widely accepted among Eastern Christians after the thirteenth century, even among those who fiercely rejected union with Rome. It seems that this acceptance resulted not so much from the influence of Latin theology as from the peculiarly medieval and Byzantine fascination with symbolic numbers: the number seven, in particular, evoked an association with the seven gifts of the Spirit in Isaiah 11:2-4. But among Byzantine authors who accept the "seven sacraments," we find different competing lists. The monk Job (thirteenth century), author of a dissertation on the sacraments, includes monastic tonsure in the list, as did Theodore the Studite, but combines as one sacrament penance and the anointing of the sick.⁶ Symeon of Thessalonica (fifteenth century) also admits the sacramental character of the monastic tonsure, but classifies it together with penance,⁷ considering the anointing as a separate sacrament. Meanwhile, Joasaph, Metropolitan of Ephesus, a contemporary of Symeon's, declares: "I believe that the sacraments of the Church are not seven, but more," and he gives a list of ten, which includes the consecration of a church, the funeral service, and the monastic tonsure.⁸

Obviously, the Byzantine Church never committed itself formally to any specific list; many authors accept the standard series of seven sacraments: baptism, confirmation, Eucharist, holy orders, matrimony, penance, and the anointing of the sick while others give a longer list, and still others emphasize the exclusive and prominent importance of baptism and the Eucharist, the basic Christian initiation into "new life." Thus, Gregory Palamas proclaims that "in these two [sacraments], our whole salvation is rooted, since the entire economy of the God-man is recapitulated in them."⁹ And Nicholas Cabasilas composes his famous book on The Life in Christ as a commentary on baptism, chrismation, and the Eucharist.

2. Baptism and Chrismation

In the Eastern Church, baptism and confirmation (the latter being effected through anointment with "holy chrism" blessed by the bishop) are normally celebrated together. Immediately after receiving baptism and confirmation, the child is admitted to Eucharistic communion. There is, therefore, no practical difference between admitting a child or an adult to membership in the Church; in both cases, a human being who belonged to the "old Adam" through his natural birth is introduced to "new life" by partaking of baptism, chrismation, and holy communion. Christian initiation is one single and indivisible act: "If one does not receive the chrism one is not perfectly baptized," writes Symeon of Thessalonica.¹⁰

As we have seen, the patristic doctrine of salvation is based, not on the idea of guilt inherited from Adam and from which man is relieved in Christ, but on a more existential understanding of both "fallen" and "redeemed" humanity. From the "old Adam," through his natural birth, man inherits a defective form of life bound by mortality, inevitably sinful, lacking fundamental freedom from the "prince of this world." The alternative to this "fallen" state is "life in Christ," which is true and "natural" human life, the gift of God bestowed in the mystery of the Church. "Baptism," writes Nicholas Cabasilas, "is nothing else but to be born according to Christ and to receive our very being and nature." 11

The emphasis, in both the rite of baptism and the theological commentaries of the Byzantine period, is on the positive meaning of baptism as "new birth." "The salutary day of Baptism," Cabasilas continues, "becomes a name day to Christians, because then they are formed and shaped, and our shapeless and undefined life receives shape and definition."¹² Again according to Cabasilas all the scriptural and traditional designations of baptism point to the same positive meaning: "'Birth' and 'new birth,' 're-fashioning' and 'seal,' as well as 'baptism' and 'clothing' and 'anointing,' 'gift,' 'enlightening,' and 'washing' all signify this one thing: that the rite is the beginning of existence for those who are and live in accordance with God."¹³

Considering baptism as "new birth" implies also that it is a free gift from God, and is in no sense dependent upon human choice, consent, or even consciousness: "Just as in the case of physical birth we do not even contribute willingness to all the blessings derived from baptism."¹⁴ In the East, therefore, there was never any serious doubt or controversy about the legitimacy of infant baptism. This legitimacy was based, not on the idea of a "sin" which would make even the infant guilty in the eyes of God and in need of baptism as justification, but on the fact that, at all stages of life, including infancy, man needs to be "born anew" i.e. to begin a new and eternal life in Christ. The ultimate eschatological goal of new life cannot be fully comprehended even by the "conscious adult."

Just as it is not possible to understand the power of the eyes or the grace of color without light, or for those who sleep to learn the affairs of those who stay awake while they are yet asleep, in the same way in this life it is not possible to understand the new members and their faculties which are directed solely to the life to come. . . . Yet we are members of Christ, and this is the result of baptism. The splendor and beauty of the members consists in the Head, for the members would not appear to be beautiful unless they are attached to the Head. Of these members the Head is hidden in the present life, but will be clearly apparent when they shine forth together with the Head.¹⁵

Since he is a member of the Body of Christ through baptism, man again becomes "theocentric" that is, he recovers his original destiny, which is eschatological and mysterious, because it participates in the very mystery of God. As a divine gift, whether bestowed upon an adult or an infant, baptism is the beginning of new life. As Theodoret of Cyrus writes:

If the only meaning of baptism were remission of sins, why would we baptize newborn children who have not yet tasted of sin? But the mystery of baptism is not limited to this; it is a promise of greater and more perfect gifts. In it are the promises of future delights; it is the type of the future resurrection, a communion with the master's Passion, a participation in His Resurrection, a mantle of salvation, a tunic of gladness, a garment of light, or rather it is light itself. 16

As a "beginning" and a promise of new life, baptism implies free self-determination and growth. It does not suppress human freedom, but restores it to its original and "natural" form. In the case of infant baptism, this restoration is, of course, only potential, but the sacrament always implies a call to freedom. In the Byzantine tradition, the formula of baptism is not pronounced, as in the West, in the name of the minister who performs the sacrament ("I baptize you"), but is a solemn declaration on behalf of the baptized: "The servant of God, N., is baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." "This," writes Symeon of Thessalonica, "signifies the freedom of the baptized."¹⁷ After baptism, the way toward God is a "synergy" of God's power and free human effort. It is also a liberation from the bonds of Satan the tyrant and the usurper signified by the exorcisms which precede the sacrament of baptism itself.¹⁸

The Byzantine tradition has retained the ancient Christian practice of baptism through triple immersion. Actually, immersion was sometimes considered essential to the validity of the sacrament, and some extreme anti-Latin polemicists questioned the effectiveness of Western baptism on the grounds that it was performed by sprinkling. Immersion is indeed the very sign of what baptism means: "The water destroys the one life, but shows forth the other; it drowns the old man and raises the new," writes Cabasilas.¹⁹ "Drowning" cannot be meaningfully signified other than through immersion.

To the man liberated through baptism from servitude to Satan, the Spirit bestows the faculty of "being active in spiritual energies," according to another expression of Cabasilas'.²⁰ We have already seen that Byzantine patristic theology recognized a connection between the gifts of the Spirit and human freedom; redemption of humanity implies that not only human "nature" but also each man, freely and personally, will find his place in the new creation, "recapitulated" in Christ. The gift of the Spirit in chrismation is the main sacramental sign of this particular dimension of salvation, which is, according to the liturgical norm, inseparable from baptism. Thus the "life in Christ" and "life in the Spirit" are not two separate forms of spirituality; they are complementary aspects of the same road, leading toward eschatological "deification."

Normally united with baptism in a single rite of Christian initiation, chrismation is celebrated separately only in cases of reconciliation to the Church of certain categories of heretics and schismatics, enumerated in Canon 95 of the Council in Trullo. Its significance, then, is to validate, through "the seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit" (the formula pronounced by the priest during the anointing), a Christian baptism performed in irregular circumstances*i.e.*, outside the canonical boundaries of the Church.

3. Penance

Sacramental penance*i.e.*, reconciliation to the Church after sins committed after baptism has had a parallel development in East and West. Originally a public act, required from sinners who either had been officially excommunicated or had performed acts liable to excommunication, penance, gradually and especially after the fourth century, took the form of private confession, followed by a prayer of absolution pronounced by a priest. It then identified itself almost completely with the practice of private spiritual direction, especially widespread in monastic communities.

The development of penitential practice and theology in the Byzantine world was distinct from its Western counterpart in that it never knew the influence of legalistic interpretations of salvation, such as the Anselmian doctrine of "satisfaction," and never faced a crisis comparable to the Western Reformation and Counter-Reformation, with the latter's stress on clerical authority.

Patristic and Byzantine literature on repentance is almost entirely ascetical and moral. Very few authors of ascetical treatises on repentance specifically mention sacramental absolution as a formal requirement. This silence does not imply that sacramental repentance did not exist; except in cases of formal excommunication, which had to be followed by an equally formal reconciliation, it was only encouraged, but not required. In his innumerable calls to repentance, Chrysostom frequently mentions "confession," i.e., an opening of one's conscience before a witness or "the Church"; but regular sacramental confession does not seem to be meant. In his nine sermons specifically dealing with "repentance," only once does he refer to the Church as a direct recourse: "Did you commit sin? Enter the Church and repent for your sin. . . . You are an old man, and still you commit sin? Enter [the Church], repent; for here is the physician, not the judge; here one is not investigated, one receives remission of sins." 21

A French ecclesiastical historian is probably correct when he writes: "The Byzantines seldom go to confession, at least in the secular world, for in the monasteries . . . confession is regularly practiced. But is this confession, or is it a direction of conscience of simple laymen by their spiritual fathers? Both practices exist and, in the monasteries, are indistinguishable from one another." 22

Ascetical and canonical literature frequently mentions penitential requirements periods of excommunication, prostrations, and charitable works required as retribution for sins committed and confessed; but, except in case of "mortal" sins murder, apostasy, adultery followed by formal excommunication, it is nowhere evident that a priest's absolution is necessary to seal the act of repentance. On the contrary, numerous sources describe absolutions given by non-ordained monks,²³ a practice which has survived in Eastern monasteries until our own day.

The various forms of absolution found in Byzantine euchologia and penitentials²⁴ all have the form of prayer: "In the East," writes A. Almazov, "it was always understood that absolution is expressed through prayer, and, even if a declaratory formula is being used, it implies that remission of sins is attributed to God Himself."²⁵ Declaratory formulas ("I, an unworthy priest . . . , forgive and absolve . . .") which crept into some euchologia, Greek and Slavic, are all of post-Scholastic Latin origin and were adopted within the framework of a general Latinization of the Byzantine rite.

Byzantine theologians themselves were hesitant about the exact status of penance among the mysteria of the Church, and often listed it with either monastic tonsure or anointing of the sick. By the fifteenth century, however, private confession to a priest, followed by a prayer of remission, was a generally accepted practice among laymen, with confession to lay monks existing as an alternative in monasteries. This lack of clarity in both theology and practice has a positive implication: confession and penance were interpreted primarily as a form of spiritual healing. For sin itself in Eastern Christian anthropology is primarily a disease, "passion." Without denying the Petrine privilege of the keys transmitted to all the bishops, or the apostolic power to remit sins, of which the Church is bearer, Byzantine theologians never succumbed to the temptation of reducing sin to the notion of a legal crime, which is to be sentenced, punished, or forgiven; yet they were aware that the sinner is primarily a prisoner of Satan and, as such, mortally sick. For this reason, confession and penance, at least ideally, preserved the character of liberation and healing rather than that of judgment; hence, the great variety of forms and practices, and the impossibility of confining them within static theological categories.

4. Marriage

The Byzantine theological, liturgical, and canonical tradition unanimously stresses the absolute uniqueness of Christian marriage, and bases this emphasis upon the teaching of Ephesians 5. As a sacrament, or mysterion, marriage reflects the union between Christ and the Church, between Yahweh and Israel, and as such can be only one eternal bond, which death itself does not destroy. In its sacramental nature, marriage transfigures and transcends both fleshly union and contractual legal association: human love is being projected into the eternal Kingdom of God.

Only this basic understanding of Christian marriage can explain the fact that until the tenth century no second marriage, whether of those widowed or of those divorced, was blessed in church. Referring to the custom of "crowning" the bridal pair a feature of the Byzantine rite of marriage a canon attributed to Nicephorus the Confessor (806-815) specifies: "Those who enter a second marriage are not crowned and are not admitted to receive the most pure mysteries for two years; those who enter a third marriage are excommunicated for five years."

²⁶ This text, which merely repeats the earlier prescriptions of the canons of Basil,²⁷ presupposes that second and third marriages of those widowed or divorced can be concluded as civil contracts only. Actually, since the marriage blessing was normally given at a Eucharist, where the bridal pair received communion, the required temporary excommunication excluded the Church's participation or blessing in cases when marriage was repeated.

Absolute uniqueness, as the norm of Christian marriage, is also affirmed in the fact that in Byzantine canon law it is strictly required from clergy; a man who was married twice, or was married to a widow or a divorcee, is not eligible for ordination to the diaconate or to the priesthood.²⁸ But laymen, after a period of penitence and abstention from the sacraments, are re-admitted to full communion with the Church, even after a second or third marriage; understanding and toleration is extended to them, when they cannot agree to remaining single, or would like to have a second chance to build up a true Christian marriage. Obviously, Byzantine tradition approaches the problem of remarriage after widowhood or divorce in terms of penitential discipline. Marriage, as a sacrament, implies the bestowing of God's grace; but this grace, to be effective, requires human cooperation ("synergy"). This is true of all the sacraments, but particularly of baptism, whose fruits can be dispersed through sin and then restored through repentance. In the case of marriage, which presupposes personal understanding and psychological adjustment, Byzantine tradition accepts the possibility of an initial mistake, as well as the fact that single life, in cases of death or the simple absence of the partner, is a greater evil than remarriage for those who cannot "bear" it.

The possibility of divorce remained an integral part of Byzantine civil legislation at all times. In the framework of the "symphony" between Church and state, it was never challenged, a fact which cannot be explained simply by reference to caesaropapism. The Byzantine Church never lacked saints who were ready to castigate imperial despotism, social injustice, and other evils contrary to the Gospel. John Chrysostom (398-404), Theodore the Studite (820), or Patriarch Polyeuktos (956-970) were able to challenge the power of the state without fear; none of them, however, protested against the legislation concerning divorce. Obviously, they considered it as an inevitable factor of human life in the fallen world, where man can accept grace and refuse it; where sin is inevitable, but repentance always accessible; where the Church's function is never to compromise the norms of the Gospel, but to show compassion and mercy to human weakness.

This attitude of the Byzantine Church was clearly maintained as long as the primary function of the Church (to make the Kingdom of God present in man's life) and that of the state (to manage fallen humanity by choosing the lesser evil and maintaining order through legal means) remained clearly distinct. In the question of marriage, this essential distinction disappeared (at least in practice) when Emperor Leo VI (912) published his Novella 89, formally giving the Church the legal obligation to validate all marriages, 29 Civil marriage disappeared as a legal possibility for free citizens; and soon, quite logically, Alexis I Comnenus would also make church marriage an obligation for slaves. By these imperial acts the Church theoretically gained formal control over the marriage discipline of all citizens. In fact, however, it began to be directly responsible for all the inevitable compromises, which had been solved so far by the possibility of civil marriage and divorce, and lost the possibility of applying its early penitential discipline. If the Church now gave legal authority to marriage, it had also to resolve the legal difficulties involved in this new responsibility. Indeed, it began to "grant divorces" (which were previously granted by secular courts alone) and to allow "remarriage" in church; because, without such "remarriages," second and third unions were legally invalid. It succeeded in making a fourth marriage totally illegal (Council of 920),³⁰ but had to compromise on many other counts.

It maintained, however, at least in principle, an essential distinction between the first and the following marriages: a special service was introduced for the latter, dissociated from the Eucharist and penitential in character. It was understood, therefore, that second and third marriages were not the norm, and as such were deficient sacramentally. The most striking difference between the Byzantine theology of marriage and its medieval Latin counterpart is that the Byzantines strongly emphasized the unicity of Christian marriage and the eternity of the marriage bond; they never considered that Christian marriage was a legal contract, automatically dissolved by the death of one of the partners. Remarriage of the widowed was only tolerated by them, as was the remarriage of the divorced. But this "toleration" did not mean approval. It implied repentance, and remarriage was allowed only to those men or women whose previous marriages could be considered as non-existent in practice (the various imperial codes listed the cases). Meanwhile, the Latin West became legalistically intolerant toward divorce, while admitting, without limitation, any number of remarriages after widowhood. Guided in its practice by the legal notion of contract, indissoluble as long as both parties were alive, the West seemed to ignore the idea that marriage, if it is a sacrament, has to be projected as an eternal bond into the Kingdom of God; that like all sacraments marriage requires a free response and implies the possibility of human rejection and human mistake; and that, after such a sinful rejection or human mistake, repentance always allows a new beginning. This is the theological basis for the toleration of divorce in the early Christian Church, as well as in Byzantium.

5. Healing and Death

Frequently associated with penance as a single sacrament, the office of "holy unction" did not evolve except in some areas of the Christian East after the sixteenth century into "extreme unction," a sacrament reserved for the dying. In Byzantium it involved the concelebration of several priests, usually seven, in accordance with James 5:14, a text considered to be the scriptural foundation of the sacrament. It was composed of scriptural readings and prayers of healing, the texts of which definitely exclude the possibility of giving a magic interpretation to the rite; healing is requested only in a framework of repentance and spiritual salvation, and not as an end in itself.

Whatever the outcome of the disease, the anointing symbolized divine pardon and liberation from the vicious cycle of sin, suffering, and death, in which fallen humanity is held captive. Compassionate to human suffering, assembled together to pray for its suffering member, the Church through its presbyters asks for relief, forgiveness, and eternal freedom. This is the meaning of holy unction.

The funeral service, also considered a "sacrament" by some Byzantine authors, has no different significance. Even in death the Christian remains a member of the living and resurrected Body of Christ, into which he has been incorporated through baptism and the Eucharist. Through the funeral service, the Church gathers to bear witness to this fact, visible only to the eyes of faith, but already experienced by every Christian who possesses the awesome privilege of living, by anticipation, in the future Kingdom.

Notes

1. Cabasilas, De vita in Christo, I, 3; PG 150:496_D.
2. See, for example, Chrysostom, Hom. 7, 1 in I Cor.; PG 61:55.
3. Chrysostom, Catechèses baptismales, ed. A. Wenger, Sources Chrétiennes 50 (Paris: Cerf, 1957), II, 17, p. 143.

4. Ep. II, 165; PG 99:1524_B.
5. G. M. Jugie, Theologia dogmatica Christianorum orientalium, III (Paris, 1930), p. 16.
6. Quoted by M. Jugie, ibid., pp. 17-18.
7. De sacramentis, 52; PG 155:197_A.
8. Responsa canonica, ed. A. I. Almazov (Odessa, 1903), p. 38.
9. Horn. 60, ed. S. Oikonomos (Athens, 1860), p. 250.
10. De sacramentis, 43; PG 155:188_A.
11. De vita in Christo, II, 3; PG 150:524_A.
12. Ibid., 4, 525_A.
13. Ibid., 524_C.
14. Ibid., 5, 525_D.
15. Ibid., 22:548_{BC}.
16. Haeret. fabul. compendium 5, 18; PG 83:512.
17. De sacramentis, 64; PG 155:228_D-229_B. See also Manuel of Corinth, Apology 7; PG 140:480.
18. Nicholas Cabasilas, loc. cit., 6:528_B.
19. Ibid., 9:532_B.
20. Ibid., III, 1; 569_A.
21. De penitentia, III, 1; PG 49:292.
22. J. Pargoire, L'Eglise byzantine de 527 à 847 (Paris: Lecoffre, 1932), p. 347.

23. Ibid., p. 348.

24. The earliest available manuscripts are of the tenth century. By far the best collection of penitential rites, in Greek and Slavic versions, is found in A. Almazov, Tainaia Ispoved' v pravoslavnoi vostochnoi tserkvi III (Odessa, 1894).

25. Op. cit., I, pp. 149-150.

26. Canon 2, in Syntagma Canonum IV, edd. G. Rhalles and M. Potles (Athens, 1854), p. 457. On the discipline of marriage in the Byzantine Church, see mainly J. Zhishman, Das Eherecht der orientalischen Kirche (Vienna, 1864); K. Ritzer, Le mariage dans les églises Chrétiennes du Ier au XIe siècle (Paris: Cerf, 1970), pp. 163-213; and J. Meyendorff, Marriage: An Orthodox Perspective (New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1971).

27. Particularly canons 4 and 50 in Rhalles-Potles, op. cit., pp. 102 and 203.

28. Quinisext Council, canon 3, ibid., II, pp. 312-314.

29. Les nouvelles de Leon VI, le Sage, ed. A. Daia (Paris: Belles Lettres, 1944), pp. 294-297.

30. Rhalles-Potles, op. cit., V, pp. 4-10.

16

The Eucharist

Formal conservatism was one of the predominant features of Byzantine civilization, affecting both the secular and the sacred aspects of life, and the forms of the liturgy in particular. But if the avowed intention was to preserve things as they were, if the basic structures of the Eucharistic liturgy have not been modified since the early centuries of Christianity and even today retain the forms which they acquired in the ninth century, the interpretation of words and gestures was subject to substantial change and evolution. Thus, Byzantine ritual conservatism was instrumental in preserving the original Christian lex orandi, otherwise often reinterpreted in the context of a Platonizing or moralizing symbolism, though it also allowed in due time especially with Nicholas Cabasilas and the Hesychast theologians of the fourteenth century a strong reaffirmation of the original sacramental realism in liturgical theology.

1. Symbols, Images, and Reality

Early Christianity and the patristic tradition understood the Eucharist as a mystery of true and real communion with Christ. Speaking of the Eucharist, Chrysostom insists that "Christ even now is present, even now operates";¹ and Gregory of Nyssa, in spite of the Platonizing tendencies of his thought, otherwise stands for the same view of the Eucharist as a mystery of real "participation" in the glorified Body of Christ, the seed of immortality.

By dispensation of His grace, He disseminates Himself in every believer through that flesh, whose existence comes from bread and wine, blending Himself with the bodies of believers, to secure that, by this union with the Immortal, man, too, may be a sharer in incorruption. He gives these gifts by virtue of the benediction through which He "trans-elements" [metastoeicheiosis] the natural quality of these visible things to that immortal thing.²

Participation in these sources of immortality and unity is a constant concern for every Christian:

It is good and beneficial to communicate every day [Basil writes,] and to partake of the holy body and blood of Christ. For He distinctly says, "He that eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life" [Jn 6:55]. And who doubts that to share frequently in life is the same thing as to have manifold life? I indeed communicate four times a week, on the Lord's day, on Wednesday, on Friday, and on the Sabbath, and on the other days if there is a commemoration of any saint. 3

This realistic and existential theology of the Eucharist was, as we have seen,⁴ challenged by pastoral needs in the post-Constantinian Church: large congregations in large churches caused a lessening of participation by the laity.

It may be argued that the pastoral considerations which prompted this evolution were at least partially justified; the eschatological meaning of the Eucharist implied a withdrawal from the "world," a "closed" community of committed participants. Now that in the empire of Constantine and Justinian, the Church and the world had become indistinguishable as a single society, the Eucharist had to be protected from the "crowd," which had ceased to be the "people of God." More questionable, however, was the theological rationalization of this new situation, which was endorsed by some commentators on the liturgy who began to explain the Eucharist as a system of symbols to be "contemplated"; sacramental participation was thus gradually replaced with intellectual vision. Needless to say, this new attitude was perfectly suited to the Origenistic and Evagrian understanding of religion as an ascent of the mind to God, of which liturgical action was a symbol.

Most influential in promoting this symbolic understanding of the Eucharist were the writings of pseudo-Dionysius. Reducing the Eucharistic synaxis to a moral appeal, the Areopagite calls his readers to a "higher" contemplation:

Let us leave to the imperfect these signs which, as I said, are magnificently painted in the vestibules of the sanctuaries; they will be sufficient to feed their contemplation. As far as we are concerned: let us turn back, in considering the holy synaxis, from the effects to their causes, and, thanks to the lights which Jesus will give us, we shall be able to contemplate harmoniously the intelligible realities in which are clearly reflected the blessed goodness of the models.⁵

Thus, the Eucharist is only the visible "effect" of an invisible "model"; and the celebrant "by offering Jesus Christ to our eyes, shows us in a tangible way and, as in an image, our intelligible life."⁶ Thus, for Dionysius, "the loftiest sense of the Eucharistic rites and of sacramental communion itself is in symbolizing the union of our minds with God and with Christ. . . . Dionysius never formally presents Eucharistic communion as a participation in the Body and Blood of Christ." 7

Dionysius' symbolism only superficially affected the Eucharistic rites themselves, but it became quite popular among commentators on the liturgy. Thus, the great Maximus the Confessor, whose use of the concept of "symbol" is probably more realistic than Dionysius', nevertheless systematically applies the terms "symbol" or "image" to the Eucharistic liturgy in general and to the elements of bread and wine in particular.⁸

In the eighth century, this symbolism led to a serious theological debate concerning the Eucharistthe only one Byzantium ever knew. The iconoclastic council of 754, in condemning the use of religious images, proclaimed that the only admissible "image" of Christ is the one established by Christ Himself, the Eucharistic Body and Blood.⁹ This radical and clear contention, based upon a long-standing tradition, was a real challenge to the Orthodox party; the ambiguity of the Areopagite was evidenced once more, and a clarification of symbolism made necessary.

Thus, the defenders of the images, especially Theodore the Studite and Patriarch Nicephorus, firmly rejected it. For Theodore, the Eucharist is not "type," but the very "truth"; it is the "mystery which recapitulates the whole of the [divine] dispensation."¹⁰ According to Nicephorus, it is the "flesh of God," "one and the same thing" with the Body and Blood of Christ,¹¹ who came to save the very reality of human flesh by becoming and remaining. "flesh," even after His glorification; thus, in the Eucharist, "what is the matter of the sacrament, if the flesh is not real, so that we see it being perfected by the Spirit?"¹²

As a result of the iconoclastic controversy, Byzantine "Eucharistic realism," clearly departing from Dionysian terminology, was redirected along Christological and soteriological lines; in the Eucharist, man participates in the glorified humanity of Christ, which is not the "essence of God,"¹³ but a humanity still consubstantial to man and available to him as food and drink. In his treatise Against Eusebius and Epiphanius, Patriarch Nicephorus is particularly emphatic in condemning the Origenist idea that in the Eucharist man contemplates or participates in the "essence" of God.¹⁴ For him, as also for later Byzantine theologians, the Eucharist is Christ's transfigured, life-giving, but still human, body, en-hypostasized in the Logos and penetrated with divine "energies." Characteristically, one never finds the category of "essence" (ousia) used by Byzantine theologians in a Eucharistic context. They would consider a term like "transubstantiation" (metousiosis) improper to designate the Eucharistic mystery, and generally use the concept of metabole, found in the canon of John Chrysostom, or such dynamic terms as "trans-elementation" (metastoicheiosis) or "re-ordination" (metarrhythmisis). Transubstantiation (metousiosis) appears only in the writings of the Latinophrones of the thirteenth century, and is nothing but a straight translation from the Latin. The first Orthodox author to use it is Gennadios Scholarios; 15 but, in his case as well, direct Latin influence is obvious. The Eucharist is neither a symbol to be "contemplated" from outside nor an "essence" distinct from humanity, but Jesus Himself, the risen Lord, "made known through the breaking of bread" (Lk 24:35); Byzantine theologians rarely speculated beyond this realistic and soteriological affirmation of the Eucharistic presence as that of the glorified humanity of Christ.

The rejection of the concept of the Eucharist as "image" or "symbol" is, on the other hand, very significant for the understanding of the entire Eucharistic "perception" of the Byzantines; the Eucharist for them always remained fundamentally a mystery to be received as food and drink, and not to be "seen" through physical eyes. The elements remain covered, except during the prayers of consecration and during communion; and, in contrast with Western medieval piety, were never "venerated" outside the framework of the Eucharistic liturgy itself.

The Eucharist cannot reveal anything to the sense of vision; it is only the bread of heaven. Vision is offered another channel of revelation the icons: hence, the revelatory program of the Byzantine iconostasis, with the figures of Christ and the saints exposed precisely in order to be seen and venerated. "Christ is not shown in the Holy Gifts," writes Leonid Ouspensky; "He is given. He is shown in the icons. The visible side of the reality of the Eucharist is an image which can never be replaced either by imagination or by looking at the Holy Gifts."¹⁶

As a result of the iconoclastic controversy, Byzantine Eucharistic theology retained and re-emphasized the mystery and hiddenness of this central liturgical action of the Church. But it also reaffirmed that the Eucharist was essentially a meal which could be partaken of only through eating and drinking, because God had assumed the fullness of our humanity, with all its psychic and physical functions, in order to lead it to resurrection.

Byzantine theologians had an opportunity to make the same point in connection with their anti-Latin polemics against the use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist. The discussion on the azymes, which started in the eleventh century, was generally entangled in arguments of purely symbolic nature (the Greeks maintained, for example, that the Eucharistic bread had to be leavened in order to symbolize the animated humanity of Christ, while the Latin use of azymes implied Apollinarianism, i.e., the denial that Jesus had a human soul), but the controversy also recognized that the Byzantines understood the Eucharistic bread to be necessarily consubstantial with humanity, while Latin medieval piety emphasized its "supersubstantiality," its otherworldliness. The use of ordinary bread, identical with the bread used as everyday food, was the sign of true Incarnation: "What is the daily bread [of the Lord's prayer]," asks Nicetas

Stethatos, "if it is not consubstantial with us? And the bread consubstantial with us is none other than the Body of Christ, who became con-substantial with us through the flesh of His humanity." 17

The Byzantines did not see the substance of the bread somehow changed in the Eucharistic mystery into another substance the Body of Christ but viewed this bread as the "type" of humanity: our humanity changed into the transfigured humanity of Christ.¹⁸ For this reason, Eucharistic theology played such a prominent role in the theological debates of the fourteenth century, when the basic issue was a confrontation between an autonomous concept of man and the Hesychast defense of "deification." The great Nicholas Cabasilas, though still bound to the old Dionysian symbolism, overcomes the dangers of Nominalism; clearly, for him as also for Gregory Palamas, the Eucharist is the mystery which not only "represents" the life of Christ and offers it to our "contemplation"; it is the moment and the place, in which Christ's deified humanity becomes ours.

He not merely clothed Himself in a body. He also took a soul and mind and will and everything human, so that He might be able to be united to the whole of us, penetrate through the whole of us, and resolve us into Himself, having in every respect joined His own to that which is ours. . . . For since it was not possible for us to ascend and participate in that which is His, He comes down to us and participates in that which is ours. And so precisely does He conform to the things which He assumed that, in giving those things to us which He has received from us, He gives Himself to us. Partaking of the body and blood of His humanity, we receive God Himself in our souls the Body and Blood of God, and the soul, mind, and will of God no less than His humanity.¹⁹

The last word on the Eucharist, in Byzantine theology, is thus an anthropological and soteriological understanding of the mystery. "In approaching the Eucharist, the Byzantines began not with bread qua bread, but with bread qua man."²⁰ Bread and wine are offered only because the Logos has assumed humanity, and they are being changed and deified by the operation of the Spirit because Christ's humanity has been transformed into glory through the cross and Resurrection. This is the thought of Cabasilas, as just quoted, and the meaning of the canon of John Chrysostom: "Send down Thy Holy Spirit upon us and upon these gifts, and make this bread the precious Body of Thy Christ, and that which is in this cup the precious Blood of Thy Christ, so that, for those who partake, they may be a purification of soul, a remission of sins, the communion of Thy Holy Spirit, the fullness of the Kingdom of heaven. . . ."

The sacrament of new humanity par excellence, the Eucharist, for Cabasilas "alone of the mysteries perfects the other sacraments . . . , since they cannot fulfill the initiation without it."²¹ Christians partake of it "continually," for "it is the perfect sacrament for all purposes, and there is nothing of which those who partake thereof stand in need which it does not supply in an eminent way." 22 The Eucharist is also "the much praised marriage according to which the most holy Bridegroom espouses the Church as a bride";²³ that is, the Eucharist is the very sacrament which truly transforms a human community into "the Church of God," and is, therefore, as we will see later, the ultimate criterion and basis of ecclesial structure.

2. Eucharist and Church

The ecclesiological significance of the Eucharist, though challenged by the Hellenistic world-view which tended to interpret it as a system of "symbols" visually contemplated by the individual, was always maintained by the Byzantine lex orandi and reaffirmed by those who followed the mainstream of traditional theology. In the controversy on the azymes, the implication on the Byzantine side was that the Eucharist is indeed a paschal mystery, in which our fallen humanity is transformed into the glorified humanity of the New Adam, Christ: this glorified humanity is realized in the Body of the Church.

These anthropological presuppositions of Byzantine Eucharistic theology necessarily had to include the concepts of "synergy" and of the unity of mankind.

It is against the background of the Greek patristic doctrine of "synergy" that one can really understand the significance of the Byzantine insistence on the epiclesis in the Eucharistic liturgy, another issue debated in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries by Greek and Latin theologians. The text of the epiclesis, as it appears in the canon of John Chrysostom and in other Eastern liturgies, implies that the mystery is accomplished through a prayer of the entire Church ("We ask Thee . . .") a concept which does not necessarily exclude the idea that the bishop or priest pronouncing the words of institution acts in persona Christi, as Latin theology insists, but which deprives this notion of its exclusivity by interpreting the ministerial sacerdotal "power" to perform the sacraments as a function of the entire worshipping Body of the Church.

In well-known passages of his Commentary on the Liturgy, Cabasilas, defending the epiclesis, rightly recalls that all sacraments are accomplished through prayer. Specifically, he quotes the consecration of the chrism, the prayers of ordination, of absolution, and of the anointing of the sick.²⁴ Thus, he writes, "it is the tradition of the Fathers, who received this teaching from the Apostles and from their successors, that the sacraments are rendered effective through prayer; all the sacraments, as I have said, and particularly the holy Eucharist."²⁵ This "deprecatory" form of sacramental rites does not imply, however, a doctrine of validity ex opere operantis, i.e., dependent upon the worthiness of the celebrant. "He who celebrates the sacrifice daily," Cabasilas continues, "is but the minister of the grace. He brings to it nothing of his own; he would not dare to do or say anything according to his own judgment and reason. . . . Grace works all; the priest is only a minister, and that very ministry comes to him by grace; he does not hold it on his own account." 26

The mystery of the Church, fully realized in the Eucharist, overcomes the dilemma of prayer and response, of nature and grace, of the divine as opposed to the human, because the Church, as the Body of Christ, is precisely a communion of God and man, not only where God is present and active, but where humanity becomes fully "acceptable to God," fully adequate to the original divine plan; prayer itself then becomes an act of communion, where there cannot be any question of its not being heard by God. The conflict, the "question," the separateness, and the sinfulness are still present in each individual member of the Church, but only inasmuch as he has not fully appropriated the divine presence and refuses to conform to it; the presence itself, however, is the "new testament in my Blood" (Lk 22:20), and God will not take it away. Thus, all Christians including the bishop, or the priest are individually nothing more than sinners, whose prayers are not necessarily heard, but when gathered together in the name of Christ, as the "Church of God," they are a part in the New Testament, to which God has eternally committed Himself through His Son and the Spirit.

As a divine-human communion and "synergy," the Eucharist is a prayer addressed "in Christ" to the Father, and accomplished through the descent of the Holy Spirit. The epiclesis, therefore, is the fulfillment of the Eucharistic action, just as Pentecost is the fulfillment of a divine "economy" of salvation; salvation is always a Trinitarian action. The pneumatological dimension of the Eucharist is also presupposed in the very notion of "synergy"; it is the Spirit which makes Christ present in the age between His two comings: when divine action is not imposing itself on humanity, but offering itself for acceptance by human freedom and, by communicating itself to man, making him authentically free.

At all times, Byzantine theologians understood the Eucharist as the center of a soteriological and triadological mystery, not simply as a change of bread and wine. Those who followed Dionysian symbolism approached the Eucharist in the context of a Hellenistic hierarchical cosmos, and understood it as the center of salvific action through mystical "contemplation," which still involved the whole destiny of humanity and the world. Those who held a more Biblical view of man and a more Christocentric understanding of history approached the Eucharist as the key to ecclesiology; the Church, for them, was primarily the place where God and man met in the Eucharist, and the Eucharist became the criterion of ecclesial structure and the inspiration of all Christian action and responsibility in the world. In both cases the Eucharist was understood in a cosmological and ecclesiological dimension affirmed in the formula of the Byzantine oblation: "Thine own of thine own, we offer unto Thee in behalf of all and for all."

One of the ideas which constantly appears in Byzantine "symbolic" interpretations of the Eucharist is that the temple in which the Eucharistic liturgy is celebrated is an image of the "new," transfigured cosmos. The idea is found in several early Christian writers, and reappears in Maximus the Confessor²⁷ and, later, in Symeon of Thessalonica.²⁸ Undoubtedly, it inspired the Byzantine architects who built Hagia Sophia in Constantinople, the model of all temples of the East, with the circle as its central geometrical theme. In the Neoplatonic tradition, the circle, the symbol of plenitude, is the standard image of God; God is reflected in His creatures, once they are restored to their original design: "He circumscribes their expansion in a circle and sets Himself as the pattern of the beings which He has created," writes Maximus, adding immediately that "The holy Church is an image of God, since it effects the union of the faithful, as God does."²⁹ The Church, as community and as building, is, therefore, a sign of the new age, the eschatological anticipation of the new creation, the created cosmos restored in its original wholeness. Clearly, a theologian like Maximus uses the models and categories of his age to describe the fullness of the world to come. His interpretation of the Eucharistic liturgy is "less an initiation into the mystery of the liturgy than an introduction to the mystery with the liturgy as a starting point";³⁰ but the very idea that the Eucharist is an anticipation of the eschatological fulfillment is affirmed in the canon of the Byzantine liturgy itself, which recalls the second coming of Christ as an event which has already occurred: "Remembering this saving commandment and all the things which have come to pass for us, the cross, the tomb, the Resurrection on the third day, the ascension into heaven, and the second and glorious coming, we offer unto Thee . . ."

This eschatological character of the Eucharistic mystery, strongly expressed in the liturgy, in the religious art which served as its framework, and in the theological commentaries, whatever their school of thought, explains why the Byzantines always believed that in the Eucharist the Church is fully "the Church," and that the Eucharist is the ultimate criterion and seal of all the other sacraments. Following pseudo-Dionysius, who spoke of the Eucharist as the "sacrament of sacraments,"³¹ as the "focal point" of each particular sacrament,³² Byzantine theologians affirm the absolute centrality of the Eucharist in the life of the Church: "It is the final sacrament," writes Cabasilas, "because it is not possible to proceed further and to add anything to it."³³ "The Eucharist alone of the mysteries brings perfection to the other sacraments . . . , since they cannot complete the initiation without it."³⁴ Symeon of Thessalonica applies this idea concretely to individual sacraments. Concerning marriage, for example, he writes that the bridal pair "must be ready to receive communion, so that their crowning be a worthy one and their marriage valid"; and he specifies that communion is not given to those whose marriage is defective from the point of view of Church discipline, and is, therefore, not fully the sacrament, but simply a "good fellowship." 35

Any local church where the "divine liturgy" of the Eucharist is celebrated possesses, therefore, the "marks" of the true Church of God: unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. These marks cannot belong to any human gathering; they are the eschatological signs given to a community through the Spirit of God. Inasmuch as a local church is built upon and around the Eucharist, it is not simply a "part" of the universal people of God; it is the fullness of the Kingdom which is anticipated in the Eucharist, and the Kingdom can never be "partially" one or "partially" catholic. "Partiality" belongs only to the individual appropriation of the given fullness by the members, who are limited by belonging to the "old Adam"; it does not exist in the Body of Christ, indivisible, divine, and glorious.

Liturgical discipline and Byzantine canon law try to protect this unifying and catholic character of the Eucharist. They require that on each altar no more than one Eucharist be celebrated each day; similarly, a priest, or bishop, is not allowed to celebrate twice on the same day. Whatever the practical inconveniences, these rules aim at preserving the Eucharist at least nominally as the gathering "of all together at the same place" (Ac 2:1); all should be together at the same altar, around the same bishop, at the same time, because there is only one Christ, one Church, and one Eucharist. The idea that the Eucharist is the sacrament uniting the whole Church remained alive in the East and prevented the multiplication of Masses of intention and of low Masses. The Eucharistic liturgy always remained a festal event in Byzantium, a celebration involving, at least in principle, the whole Church.

As a manifestation of the Church's unity and wholeness, the Eucharist served also as the ultimate theological norm for ecclesiastical structure: the local church where the Eucharist is celebrated was always considered to be not merely a "part" of a universal organization, but the whole Body of Christ manifested sacramentally and including the entire "communion of saints," living or departed. Such a manifestation was seen as a necessary basis for the geographical expansion of Christianity, but it was not identical with it. Theologically, the sacrament is the sign and reality of the eschatological anticipation of the Kingdom of God, and the episcopate necessary center of this reality is envisaged primarily in its sacramental function, with the other aspects of its ministry (pastorate, teaching) based on this "high priestly" function in the local community, rather than on the idea of a co-optation into a universal apostolic college. The bishop was, first of all, the image of Christ in the Eucharistic mystery. "O Lord our God," says the prayer of episcopal ordination, "who in Thy providence hast instituted for us teachers of like nature with ourselves, to maintain Thine Altar, that they may offer unto Thee sacrifice and oblation for all Thy people; do Thou, the same Lord, make this man also, who has been proclaimed a steward of the episcopal grace, to be an imitator of Thee, the true Shepherd. . . ." 36

Thus, according to pseudo-Dionysius, the "high priest" (archiereys) possesses the "first" and the "last" order of hierarchy and "fulfills every hierarchic consecration."³⁷ Symeon of Thessalonica also defines the episcopal dignity in terms of its sacramental functions; the bishop for him is the one who performs all sacramentsbaptism, chrismation, Eucharist, ordination; he is the one "through whom all ecclesiastical acts are perfected."³⁸ The Eucharist is, indeed, the ultimate manifestation of God in Christ; and there cannot be, therefore, any ministry higher and more decisive than that which presides over the Eucharist. The centrality of the Eucharist, the awareness that the fullness of Christ's Body abides in it and that the episcopal function is the highest in the Church will be the principal foundation of the Byzantine opposition to any theological interpretation of supra-episcopal primacies: there cannot be, according to them, any authority "by divine right" over the Eucharist and the bishop who heads the Eucharistic assembly.

The practice of the Byzantine Church was not always consistent with the inner logic of this Eucharistic ecclesiology. The historical development of the episcopal functionwhich, on the one hand, after the fourth century delegated the celebration of the Eucharist to presbyters on a permanent basis, and, on the other, became de facto a part of wider administrative structures (provinces, patriarchates)lost some of its exclusive and direct connections with the sacramental aspect of the life of the Church. But the essential theological and ecclesiological norms were reaffirmed whenever they were directly challenged, and thus remained an essential part of what, for the

Byzantines, was the tradition of the Catholic Church.³⁹

Notes

1. Hom. in II Tim. 2, 4; PG 62:612.
2. Catechetical oration, 37, ed. Strawley, p. 152.
3. Letter 93, ed. Deferrari, II, 145.
4. See Chapter 1. For a good historical review of Byzantine Eucharistic theologies and practices (with earlier bibliography), see H. J. Schulz, Die byzantinische Liturgie vom Werden ihrer Symbolgestalt (Freiburg: Lambertus-Verlag, 1964).
5. Eccl. Hier., III, 3, 14; PG 3:428_{AC}.
6. Ibid., III, 13; 444_C; see our comments on these texts in Christ, pp. 79-80.
7. R. Roques, L'univers dionysien. Structure hiérarchique du monde selon le pseudo-Denys (Paris: Aubier, 1954), pp. 267, 269.
8. See particularly Quaestiones et dubia 41; PG 90:820_A. On the liturgical theology of Maximus, see R. Bornert, Les commentaires byzantins de la divine liturgie du VIIe au

- XVe siècle*, Archives de l'Orient chrétien, 9 (Paris: Institut français d'études byzantines, 1966), pp. 82-124.
9. Mansi, XIII, 261_D-264_C.
10. Antirrh. I; PG 99:340_{AC}.
11. Antirrh. II; PG 100:336_B-337_A.
12. Contra Eusebium, ed. J. B. Pitra, Spicilegium Solesmense, I (Paris, 1852), pp. 440-442.
13. Nicephorus, ibid., p. 446.
14. Ibid., pp. 468-469.
15. De sacramentali corpore Christi, edd. L. Petit and M. Judie, I (Paris: Bonne Presse, 1928), pp. 126, 134.
16. "The Problem of the Iconostasis," St. Vladimir's Seminary Quarterly 8 (1964), No. 4, 215.
17. Dialexis et antidialogus, ed. A. Michel, Humbert und Kerullarios II (Paderborn: Quellen und Forschungen, 1930), pp. 322-323.
18. This aspect of the controversy on the azymes is brilliantly shown in J. H. Erickson, "Leavened and Unleavened: Some Theological Implications of the Schism of 1054," St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 14 (1970), No. 3, 155-176.
19. De vita in Christo, IV, 9: PG 150:592_D-593_A.
20. Erickson, op cit., p. 165.
21. De vita in Christo, IV, 4, 585_B. See also Gregory Palamas, Confession of Faith; PG 151:765, trans. A. Papadakis, "Gregory Palamas at the Council of Blachernae, 1351," Greek, Roman, and Byzantine Studies 10 (1969), 340.

22. Ibid., 11; 596_c.
23. Ibid., 10; 593.
24. Commentary on the Divine Liturgy, 29, edd. R. Bornert, J. Gouillard, and P. Perichon, Sources Chrétiennes, 4 his (Paris: Cerf, 1967), pp. 185-187; trans. Hussey and McNulty (London: SPCK, 1960), pp. 74-75.
25. Ibid., p. 190; tr. pp. 75-76.
26. Ed. cit., 46, p. 262; tr. pp. 104-105.
27. See the references in R. Bornert, op. cit., pp. 93-94.
28. De sacro templo, 131, 139, 152; PG 155:337_D, 348_C, 357_A.
29. Mystagogia, 1; PG 91:668_B.
30. R. Bornert, op. cit., p. 92.
31. Eccl. Hier., III, 1; PG 3:424_C.
32. Ibid., col. 444_D.
33. De vita in Christo, IV, 1; PG 150:581_B.
34. Ibid., IV, 4; 585_B.
35. De sacro templo, 282; PG 155:512_D-513_A.
36. Jacobus Goar, Euchologion sive Rituale Graecorum (Venice, 1730; repr. Graz: Akademische Druck- und Verlagsanstalt, 1960), p. 251; trans. Service Book of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic Church, ed. I. F. Hapgood (New York: Association Press, 1922), p. 330.
37. Hier. Eccl. V, 5; PG 3:505_A, 6:505_C, etc.
38. De sacris ordinationibus 157; PG 155:364_B.

39. De vita in Christo, IV, 8; PG 150:604_B.

17

The Church in the World

Christians were Christians only because Christianity brought to them liberation from death. If one would penetrate to the heart of Eastern Christianity one must be present on the night when the Easter liturgy is celebrated: of this liturgy all other rites are but reflections or figures. The three words of the Easter troparion the Easter hymn repeated a thousand times in tones ever more and more triumphant, repeated to the point of ecstasy and of an overflowing mystic joy "By His death He has trodden death beneath His feet" here is the great message of the Byzantine Church: the joy of Easter, the banishing of that ancient terror which beset the life of man, this it is which has won and kept the allegiance of the masses; it is this creed of triumph which has been translated into all the languages of the Orient, and yet has never lost its virtue; this is the faith which found its material expression in the icon, so that even when the originality of the artist fell short, man's shortcoming could not veil the meaning of that joyous Mystery. 1

These words of a secular historian reflect quite adequately what we have tried to suggest about Byzantine Christianity as experience. Whether he was a theologian, a monk, or an average layman, the Byzantine Christian knew that his Christian faith was not an obedient acceptance of intellectual propositions, issued by an appropriate authority, but on evidence, accessible to him personally in the liturgical and sacramental life of the Church, and also in the life of prayer and contemplation, the one being inseparable from the other. Not physical, or emotional, or intellectual, this experience is described as gnosis, or as "spiritual senses," or as inner "certainty." To affirm that it was impossible for any Christian to achieve this knowledge was considered as the greatest "heresy" by Symeon the New Theologian.

Whether one considers with Vladimir Lossky that "in a certain sense all theology is mystical,"² or whether one looks down skeptically upon Byzantine "obligatory mysticism," it is obvious that the definition of Christianity as "experience" raises the issue of its witness to the world in terms of verbal expressions, or definitions, and in terms of action, of behavior, and of practical responsibility. In the eyes of Western Christians, the Eastern Church often appears as quite other-worldly, and, indeed, the West has traditionally been much more concerned than the East with organizing human society, with defining the Christian truth in terms which could be readily understood, with giving man concrete normative formulae of behavior and conduct. To attempt a critical description of this problem in Byzantine theology is to raise one of the basic theological and anthropological issues of Christian life: the relation between the absolute divine truth and the relative faculties of perception and action possessed by created and fallen man.

1. Church and Society

The great dream of Byzantine civilization was a universal Christian society administered by the emperor and spiritually guided by the Church. This idea obviously combined Roman and Christian universalisms in one single socio-political program. It was also based upon the theological presuppositions concerning man which were developed above: 3 man, by nature, is God-entered in all aspects of his life, and he is responsible for the fate of the entire creation. As long as Christianity was persecuted, this Biblical assertion could be nothing more than an article of faith, to be realized at the end of history and anticipated in the sacraments. With the "conversion" of Constantine, however, it suddenly appeared as a concrete and reachable goal. The original enthusiasm with which the Christian Church accepted imperial protection was never corrected by any systematic reflection on the nature and role of the state or of secular societies in the life of fallen humanity. There lies the tragedy of the Byzantine system: it assumed that the state, as such, could become intrinsically Christian.

The official version of the Byzantine social ideal is expressed in the famous text of Justinian's Sixth Novella:

There are two greatest gifts which God, in his love for man, has granted from on high: the priesthood and the imperial dignity. The first serves divine things, the second directs and administers human affairs; both, however, proceed from the same origin and adorn the life of mankind. Hence, nothing should be such a source of care to the emperors as the dignity of the priests, since it is for the [imperial] welfare that they constantly implore God. For if the priesthood is in every way free from blame and possesses access to God, and if the emperors administer equitably and judiciously the state entrusted to their care, general harmony will result, and whatever is beneficial will be bestowed upon the human race.⁴

In the thought of Justinian, the "symphony" between "divine things" and "human affairs" was based upon the Incarnation, which united the divine and human natures, so that the person of Christ is the unique source of the two the civil and ecclesiastical hierarchies. The fundamental mistake of this approach was to assume that the ideal humanity which was manifested, through the Incarnation, in the person of Jesus Christ could also find an adequate manifestation in the Roman Empire. Byzantine theocratic thought was, in fact, based upon a form of "realized eschatology," as if the Kingdom of God had already appeared "in power" and as if the empire were the manifestation of this power in the world and in history. Byzantine Christian thought of course recognized the reality of evil, both personal and social, but it presumed, at least in the official philosophy of imperial legislation, that such evil could be adequately controlled by subduing the whole "inhabited earth" to the power of the one emperor and to the spiritual authority of the one Orthodox priesthood.

The providential significance of the one world-empire was exalted, not only in imperial laws, but also in ecclesiastical hymnography. A Christmas hymn, ascribed to the ninth-century nun Kassia, proclaims a direct connection between the world-empire of Rome and the "recapitulation" of humanity in Christ. Pax Romana is thus made to coincide with Pax Christiana:

When Augustus reigned alone upon earth, the many kingdoms of man came to end:

And when Thou wast made man of the pure Virgin, the many gods of idolatry were destroyed.

The cities of the world passed under one single rule;

And the nations came to believe in one sovereign Godhead.

The peoples were enrolled by the decree of Caesar;

And we, the faithful, were enrolled in the Name of the Godhead,

When Thou, our God, wast made man.

Great is Thy mercy: glory to Thee. 5

As late as 1397, when he had almost reached the nadir of political misery, the Byzantine still understood the universal empire as the necessary support of Christian universalism. Solicited by Prince Basil of Moscow on the issue whether the Russians could omit the liturgical commemoration of the emperor, while continuing to mention the patriarch, Patriarch Anthony ^{IV} replied: "It is not possible for Christians to have the Church and not to have the Empire; for Church and Empire form a great unity and community; it is not possible for them to be separated from one another."⁶

The idea of the Christian and universal empire presupposed that the emperor had obligations, both as guardian of the faith and as witness of God's mercy for man. According to the ninth-century Epanagoge, "The purpose of the emperor is to do good, and therefore he is called benefactor, and when he fails in this obligation to do good, he forsakes his imperial dignity."⁷ The system was an authentic attempt to view human life in Christ as a whole: it did not admit any dichotomy between the spiritual and the material, the sacred and the secular, the individual and the social, or the doctrinal and the ethical, but recognized a certain polarity between "divine things" essentially the sacramental communion of man with God and "human affairs." Yet between the two, there had to be a "symphony" in the framework of a single Christian "society" in which both Church and state cooperated in preserving the faith and in building a society based on charity and humaneness. 8

This wholeness of the Byzantine concept of the Christian mission in the world reflects the fundamental Chalcedonian belief in the total assumption of humanity by the Son of God in the Incarnation. The Christian faith, therefore, is understood to lead to the transfiguration and "deification" of the entire man; and, as we have seen, this "deification" is indeed accessible, as a living experience, even now, and not merely in a future kingdom. Byzantine ecclesiology and Byzantine political philosophy both assume that baptism endows man with that experience, which transforms not only the "soul" but the whole man, and makes him, already in this present life, a citizen of the Kingdom of God.

One can actually see that the main characteristic of Eastern Christianity, in its ethical and social attitudes, is to consider man as already redeemed and glorified in Christ; by contrast, Western Christendom has traditionally understood the present state of humanity in both a more realistic and a more pessimistic way: though redeemed and "justified" in the eyes of God by the sacrifice of the cross, man remains a sinner. The primary function of the Church, therefore, is to provide him with criteria of thought and a discipline of behavior, which would allow him to overcome his sinful condition and direct him to good works. On this assumption, the Church is understood primarily as an institution established in the world, serving the world and freely using the means available in the world, and appropriate for dealing with sinful humanity, particularly the concepts of law, authority, and administrative power. The contrast between the structures built by the medieval papacy and the eschatological, experiential, and "other-worldly" concepts which prevailed in the ecclesiological thinking of the Byzantine East helps us to understand the historical fate of East and West.' In the West, the Church developed as a powerful institution; in the East, it was seen primarily as a sacramental (or "mystical") organism, in charge of "divine things" and endowed with only limited institutional structures. The structures (patriarchates, metropolitanates, and other officialdom) themselves were shaped by the empire (except for the fundamental tripartite hierarchy: bishop, priest, deacon in each local church) and were not considered to be of divine origin.

This partial surrender on the "institutional" side of Christianity to the empire contributed to the preservation of a sacramental and eschatological understanding of the Church, but it was not without serious dangers. In its later history the Eastern Church experienced the fact that the state did not always deserve its confidence, and often assumed a clearly demonic face.

Throughout the Byzantine period proper, however, the Justinian "symphony" worked better than one could expect. The mystical and other-worldly character of Byzantine Christianity was largely responsible for some major characteristics of the state itself. The emperor's personal power, for example, was understood as a form of charismatic ministry: the sovereign was chosen by God, not by men; hence the absence, in Byzantium, of any legally defined process of imperial succession. Both strict legitimism and democratic election were felt to be limitations to God's freedom in selecting His appointee.

This charismatic understanding of the state obviously lacked political realism and efficiency. "Providential usurpations" were quite frequent, and political stability an exception. In political terms, the Byzantine imperial system was indeed a utopia. Conceived as a universal counterpart of a universal Church, the empire never achieved universality; understood as a reflection of the heavenly kingdom of God, it has a history of bloody revolutions, of wars, and like all medieval states of social injustice. As always and everywhere, the ideals of Christianity proved unapplicable in legal and institutional terms; they only gave hope to individual heroes of the faith and impulse to those who were striving to draw man closer to the ideal of the "life in Christ" which had become accessible to man. The Byzantines recognized this fact, at least implicitly, when they paid such great veneration to the saints, in whom they saw the divine light shining in a "world" which was theoretically Christianized, but which in fact had changed little after the establishment of Christianity. The permanent presence, in the midst of Byzantine society, of innumerable monastic communities, which at least the best among them were withdrawing from the world in order to manifest that the Kingdom was not yet there, was another reminder that there could not be any real and permanent "symphony" between God and the world, only an unstable and dynamic polarity.

This polarity was, in fact, nothing else than the opposition between the "old" and the "new" Adam in man. In terms of social ethics, it excluded clear-cut formulae and legal absolutes, and prevented the Church from being fully identified with an institution defined in terms of politics, or sociology; but, at times, it was also interpreted as a Platonic or Manichaean dualism, and it then meant total withdrawal from social responsibility. Occasionally this attitude led to a takeover by the state of the Church's mission, leaving the monks alone in their witness to the inevitable conflict and polarity between the Kingdom of God and the kingdom of Caesar.

2. The Mission of the Church

The Byzantine concept according to which the empire and the Church were allied in the leadership of a single universal Christian oikoumene implied their cooperation in the field of mission. The designation of "equal-to-the-Apostles" (isapostolos) was applied to Constantine the Great precisely because of his contribution to the conversion of the oikoumene to Christ. The emperors of Constantinople, his successors, were normally buried in the Church of the Holy Apostles. Their missionary responsibility was stressed in court ceremonial. The emperor was expected to propagate the Christian faith and to maintain Christian ethics and behavior, and to achieve these goals through both legislation and support given to the Church's missionary and charitable activities.

Outside the imperial borders, the Church-state alliance frequently led to a de facto identification, in the eyes of the non-Christians, of the political interests of the empire with the fate of Orthodox Christianity. Non-Christian rulers of Persia and Arab caliphs often persecuted Christians, not only out of religious fanaticism, but also because they suspected them of being the emperor's allies. The suspicion was actually frequently justified, especially during the lengthy holy war between Islam and Christianity, which made spiritual contacts, mutual understanding, and meaningful dialogue virtually impossible. For this reason, except in a very few cases, Byzantine Christianity was never able to make any missionary inroads among the Islamic invaders coming from the East. 9

Missionary activity was quite successful, however, among the barbarians coming from the NorthMongols, Slavs, and Caucasianswho flooded imperial territories and eventually settled as the empire's northern neighbors. It is this missionary work which actually preserved the universal character of the Orthodox Church after the lapse of the non-Greek communities of the Middle East into Monophysitism and after the great schism with the West. After the ninth century particularly, Byzantine Christianity expanded spectacularly, extending its penetration to the Caspian Sea and the Arctic Ocean.¹⁰

The Byzantine mission to the Slavs is usually associated with what is called "Cyrillo-Methodian ideology" and is characterized by the translation of both Scripture and liturgy into the vernacular language of the newly converted nations by two brothers, Constantine-Cyril and Methodius, in the ninth century. In actual fact, however, Byzantine churchmen were not always consistent with the principles adopted by the first missionaries; historical evidence shows that enforced Hellenization and cultural integration were also practiced, especially when the empire succeeded in achieving direct political control over Slavic lands. Still the fundamental theological meaning of Christian mission, as expressed by Cyril (or "Constantine the philosopher," Cyril's secular name), was never challenged in principle:

Since you have learned to hear, Slavic people,
Hear the Word, for it came from God,
The Word nourishing human souls,
The Word strengthening heart and mind. . . .

Therefore St. Paul has taught:
 "In offering my prayer to God,
 I had rather speak five words
 That all the brethren will understand
 Than ten thousand words which are incomprehensible." 11

Clearly, the author sees the proclamation of the Gospel as essential to the very nature of the Christian faith, which is a revelation of the eternal Word or Logos of God. The Word must be heard and understood; hence the necessity of a translation of Scripture and worship into the vernacular. This principle expressed by the Prologue in terms which Martin Luther would not have disavowed will remain the distinctive characteristic of Orthodox missions, at a time when the Christian West was opting for a unified but dead language Latin as the only channel for communicating the Word. Cyril and Methodius, during their mission to Moravia and their stay in Venice, had several discussions with Frankish missionaries who held the "heresy of the three languages," believing that the Gospel could be communicated only in the three languages used in Pilate's inscription on Jesus' cross: Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. By contrast, Cyril and Methodius stressed that, in the East, Slavs, as well as Armenians, Persians, Egyptians, Georgians, and Arabs, praised God in their own languages.¹²

The deliberate policy of translation implied a mission evolving into the rapid "indigenization" of the Church, which became an integral part of the various national cultures. Eventually, Byzantine Orthodox Christianity became deeply rooted in their lives, and neither foreign domination nor secular ideologies could easily uproot it. But indigenization also implied the existence of "national" churches, especially after the dismemberment of what Obolensky has called the "Byzantine Commonwealth." Modern nationalism further secularized the national self-consciousness of East European nations, damaging the sense of Christian catholicity among them.

Byzantine missionary methods and principles found their continuation in Orthodox Russia. Stephen of Perm (1340-1396), for example, is known as the apostle of the Zyrians, a Finnish tribe in northeastern Russia. Having learned Greek, Stephen translated the scriptures and the liturgy into the language of the Zyrians and became their bishop.¹³ His example was followed until the twentieth century in the missionary expansion of the Russian Orthodox Church in Asia and even on the American continent, through Alaska.

3. Eschatology

Eschatology can never really be considered a separate chapter of Christian theology, for it qualifies the character of theology as a whole. This is especially true of Byzantine Christian thought, as we have tried to show in the preceding chapters. Not only does it consider man's destiny and the destiny of all of creation as oriented toward an end; this orientation is the main characteristic of the sacramental doctrines, of its spirituality, and of its attitude toward the "world." Furthermore, following Gregory of Nyssa and Maximus the Confessor, it considers the ultimate end itself as a dynamic state of man and of the whole of creation: the goal of created existence is not, as Origen thought, a static contemplation of divine "essence," but a dynamic ascent of love, which never ends, because God's transcendent being is inexhaustible, and which, thus, always contains new things yet to be discovered (novissima) through the union of love.

The eschatological state, however, is not only a reality of the future but a present experience, accessible in Christ through the gifts of the Spirit. The Eucharistic canon of the liturgy of John Chrysostom commemorates the second coming of Christ together with events of the past: the cross, the grave, the Resurrection, and the Ascension. In the Eucharistic presence of the Lord, His forthcoming advent is already realized, and "time" is being transcended. Similarly, the entire tradition of Eastern monastic spirituality is based upon the premiss that now, in this life, Christians can experience the vision of God and the reality of "deification."

This strong emphasis on an "already realized" eschatology explains why Byzantine Christianity lacks a sense of direct responsibility for history as such. Or if it acknowledges such a responsibility, it tends to rely on such institutions as history itself may produce, particularly the Christian empire. The Christian state, and the Church as such, assume a responsibility for society as a whole, receiving guidance and inspiration from the Christian Gospel. But the dynamic "movement," which characterizes the "new humanity in Christ," and for which the Church is responsible, is not the movement of history but a mystical growth in God, known to the saints alone. The movement certainly occurs in the midst of history and may, to a degree, influence the historical process, but it does not belong to history essentially because it anticipates the end of history. It is, indeed, the "movement" of nature, and of the natural man, but natural humanityhumanity as originally conceived and created by Godpresupposes communion with God, freedom from the world, lordship over creation and over history. It must, therefore, be independent from what the world understands as history.

Existing in history, the Church expects the second coming of Christ in power as the visible triumph of God in the world and the final transfiguration of the whole of creation. Man, as center and lord of creation, will then be restored to his original stature, which has been corrupted by sin and death; this restoration will imply the "resurrection of the flesh," because man is not only a "soul," but a psychosomatic whole, necessarily incomplete without his body. Finally, the second coming will also be a judgment, because the criterion of all righteousnessChrist Himselfwill be present not "in faith" only, appealing for man's free response, but in full evidence and power.

These three essential meanings of the parousiacosmic transfiguration, resurrection, and judgment are not subjects of detailed speculation by Byzantine theologians; yet they stand at the very center of Byzantine liturgical experience.

The feast of the Transfiguration (August 6), one of the highlights of the Byzantine liturgical year, celebrates, in the "Taboric light," the eschatological anticipation of Christ's coming: "Today on Tabor in the manifestation of Thy Light, O Word, Thou unaltered Light from the Light of the unbegotten Father, we have seen the Father as Light and the Spirit as Light, guiding with light the whole of creation." ¹⁴ On Easter night, the eschatological dimension of the Resurrection is proclaimed repeatedly: "O Christ, the Passover great and most holy! O Wisdom, Word, and Power of God! Grant that we may more perfectly partake of Thee in the day which knows no night in Thy Kingdom." ¹⁵ The parousia, as judgment, appears frequently in Byzantine hymnology, particularly in the Lenten cycle. In this cycle, too, active love for one's neighbor is often emphasized by the hymnographers: "Having learned the commandments of the Lord, let us follow this polity: let us feed the hungry, let us give drink to the thirsty, let us clothe the naked, let us welcome strangers, let us visit the sick and the prisoners, so that the One who comes to judge the whole earth may tell us: come, O blessed of my Father, inherit the Kingdom which is prepared for you." ¹⁶

The only subject on which Byzantine theologians were forced into more systematic and theoretical debates on eschatology was the medieval controversy on purgatory. The Latin doctrine that divine justice requires retribution for all sins committed, and that, whenever "satisfaction" could not be offered before death, justice would be accomplished through the temporary "fire of purgatory," was included in the Profession of Faith signed by emperor Michael ^{viii} Paleologus and accepted at the Council of Lyons (1274).¹⁷ The short-lived union of Lyons did not provoke much debate on the subject in Byzantium, but the question arose again in Florence and was debated for several weeks; the final decree on union, which Mark of Ephesus refused to sign, included a long definition on purgatory.¹⁸

The debate between Greeks and Latins, in which Mark was the main Greek spokesman, showed a radical difference of perspective. While the Latins took for granted their legalistic approach to divine justice which, according to them, requires a retribution for every sinful act the Greeks interpreted sin less in terms of the acts committed than in terms of a moral and spiritual disease which was to be healed by divine forbearance and love. The Latins also emphasized the idea of an individual judgment by God of each soul, a judgment which distributes the souls into three categories: the just, the wicked, and those in a middle category who need to be "purified" by fire. The Greeks, meanwhile, without denying a particular judgment after death or agreeing on the existence of the three categories, maintained that neither the just nor the wicked will attain their final state of either bliss or condemnation before the last day. Both sides agreed that prayers for the departed are necessary and helpful, but Mark of Ephesus insisted that even the just need them; he referred, in particular, to the Eucharistic canon of Chrysostom's liturgy, which offers the "bloodless sacrifice" for "patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and every righteous spirit made perfect in faith," and even for the Virgin Mary herself. Obviously he understood the state of the blessed, not as a legal and static justification, but as a never-ending ascent, into which the entire communion of saints the Church in heaven and the Church on earth has been initiated in Christ.

19 In the communion of the Body of Christ, all members of the Church, living or dead, are interdependent and united by ties of love and mutual concern; thus, the prayers of the Church on earth and the intercession of the saints in heaven can effectively help all sinners, i.e., all men, to get closer to God. This communion of saints, however, is still in expectation of the ultimate fulfillment of the parousia and of the general resurrection, when a decisive, though mysterious, landmark will be reached for each individual destiny.

The Florentine debate on purgatory seems to have been largely improvised on the spot, and both sides used arguments from Scripture and tradition which do not always sound convincing. Still, the difference in the fundamental attitude toward salvation in Christ is easily discernible. Legalism, which applied to individual human destiny the Anselmian doctrine of "satisfaction," is the ratio theologica of the Latin doctrine on purgatory. For Mark of Ephesus, however, salvation is communion and "deification." On his way to God, the Christian does not stand alone; he is a member of Christ's Body. He can achieve this communion even now, before his death as well as afterward, and, in any case, he needs the prayer of the whole Body, at least until the end of time when Christ will be "all in all." Of course, such an understanding of salvation through communion excludes any legalistic view of the Church's pastoral and sacramental powers over either the living or the dead (the East will never have a doctrine of "indulgences"), or any precise description of the state of the departed souls before the general resurrection.

Except for the negative act of rejecting the Latin doctrine of purgatory implied in the canonization of Mark of Ephesus and in later doctrinal statements of Orthodox theologians, the Orthodox Church never entered the road of seeking exact doctrinal statements on the "beyond." A variety of popular beliefs, often sanctioned in hagiographic literature, exists in practice, but the Church itself, and especially its liturgy, limits itself to a fundamentally Christocentric eschatology: "You have died, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ who is our life appears, then you also will appear with him in glory" (Col 3:3-4). Until that ultimate "appearance," the Body of Christ, held together with the bond of the Spirit, includes both the living and the dead, as symbolized on the paten during the liturgy, where particles of bread, commemorating those who repose in Christ and those who are still parts of the visible Christian community on earth, are all united in a single Eucharistic communion. For indeed, death, through the Resurrection, has lost its power over those who are "in Him." It cannot separate them either from God or from each other. This communion in Christ, indestructible by death, makes possible and necessary the continuous intercession of all the members of the Body for each other. Prayer for the departed, as well as intercession by the departed saints for the living, express a single and indivisible "communion of saints."

The ultimate fulfillment of humanity's destiny will consist, however, in a last judgment. The condemnation of Origenism by the Fifth Council (553) implies the very explicit rejection of the doctrine of apocatastasis, i.e., the idea that the whole of creation and all of humanity will ultimately be "restored" to their original state of bliss. Obviously, the basic reason why apocatastasis was deemed incompatible with the Christian understanding of man's ultimate destiny is that it implies a radical curtailment of human freedom. If Maximus the Confessor is right in defining freedom, or self-determination, as the very sign of the image of God in man, 20 it is obvious that this freedom is ultimate and that man cannot be forced into a union with God, even in virtue of such philosophical necessity as God's "goodness." At the ultimate confrontation with the Logos, on the last day, man will still have the option of rejecting Him and thus will go to "hell."

Man's freedom is not destroyed even by physical death; thus, there is the possibility of continuous change and mutual intercession. But it is precisely this freedom which implies responsibility and, therefore, the ultimate test of the last judgment, when alone in the entire cosmic system, which will then experience its final transfiguration man will still have the privilege of facing the eternal consequence of either his "yes" or his "no" to God.

Notes

1. Henri Gregoire, Byzantium: An Introduction to East Roman Civilization, edd. N. H. Baynes and H. St. L. B. Moss (London: Oxford University Press, 1948), pp. 134-145.
2. Mystical Theology, p. 7.
3. See Chapter 11.
4. Novella VI, Corpus juris civilis, ed. Rudolfus Schoell (Berlin, 1928), III, 35-36. The basic study on the subject is Francis Dvornik, Early Christian and Byzantine Political Philosophy: Origins and Background (Washington: Dumbarton Oaks Studies [IX], 1966), in two volumes and containing exhaustive bibliography. See also J. Meyendorff, "Justinian, the Empire, and the Church," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 22 (1968), 45-60.
5. The Festal Menaion, p. 254.

6. Acta patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, edd. F. Miklosich and I. Müller (Vienna, 1862), pp. 188-192.
7. Title 2, Jus graeco-romanum, ed. Zepos (Athens, 1931), II, 241.
8. On this last aspect of Byzantine ideology, see D. J. Constantelos, Byzantine Philanthropy and Social Welfare (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1968).
9. See J. Meyendorff, "Byzantine Views of Islam," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 18 (1964), 115-132; and A. Khoury, Les théologiens byzantins et l'Islam (Louvain: Nauwelaerts, 1969).
10. For the history of these missions and their cultural consequences, see Francis Dvornik, Byzantine Missions Among the Slavs (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1970); and D. Obolensky, The Byzantine Commonwealth: Eastern Europe, 500-1453 (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1971).
11. Trans. by Roman Jakobson in "St. Constantine's Prologue to the Gospel," St. Vladimir's Seminary Quarterly 7 (1963), No. 1, 17-18.
12. Vita Constantini 16, 7-8 in Constantinus et Methodius Thessalonicensis. Fontes, Radovi Staroslovenskog Instituta 4 (1960), 131.
13. On Stephen, see particularly George Fedotov, The Russian Religious Mind (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1966), II, 230-245.
14. Exaposteilarion, The Festal Mention, p. 495.
15. Paschal canon, ode 9, Pentekostarion; this troparion is also used as a post-communion prayer in the Eucharistic liturgy.
16. Meat-fare Sunday, vespers, Lite, Triodion.

17. Enchiridion Symbolorum, ed. H. Denziger, No. 464.

18. Ibid., No. 693.

19. See the two treatises of Mark on purgatory in L. Petit, "Documents relatifs au Concile de Florence. I: La question du Purgatoire à Ferrare," Patrologia Orientalis 15 (1920), No. 1, 39-60, 108-151. A Russian translation of these texts is given in Amvrosy, Sviatoy Mark Efessky i Florentiiskaia Unia (Jordanville, New York, 1963), 58-73, 118-150. J. Gill, The Council of Florence (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1959), pp. 119-125, offers a brief account of the controversy.

20. "Since man was created according to the image of the blessed and supra-essential deity, and since, on the other hand, the divine nature is free, it is obvious that man is free by nature, being the image of the deity" (Disp. cum Pyrrho; PG 91:304c).

CONCLUSION ANTINOMIES

To attempt a description of Byzantine theology, using simultaneously the historical and the systematic methods, implies the obvious risk of provoking the dissatisfaction of both historians and systematic theologians. To the present author, however, the risk was worth taking because he fundamentally agrees with a recent statement by Jaroslav Pelikan about Christian doctrine: "Tradition without history has homogenized all the stages of development into one statically defined truth; history without tradition has produced a historicism that relativizes the development of Christian doctrine in such a way as to make the distinction between authentic growth and cancerous aberration seem completely arbitrary." 1

In the case of Byzantine theology, Pelikan's methodological statement is particularly relevant, because of the internal characteristics of the Eastern Christian experience itself. Ever concerned with the truth and in principle excluding any relativism, Byzantine thought has avoided both conceptual rationalism and authoritarianism, which have always been components of "traditionalism" in the West. In its very conservatism, Byzantine theology relies on internal and experiential criteria, which, like life itself, imply change, but also fidelity to the past. Neither change nor conservatism, however, is an end in itself. A tradition which is reduced to the preservation of concepts and formulae excludes the progress of life and is insensible to the Christian virtue of hope: in their paschal hymns, and at each Eucharistic liturgy, the Byzantines never stopped hoping for "a more perfect communion" with God in the Kingdom to come. But this very progress for them was possible only if one would avoid the pitfalls of "novelties," inconsistent with the "apostolic" foundations of the faith, given once and for all in Scripture and the original kerygma of the eyewitnesses of Jesus.

Byzantine theology was neither systematically anti-conceptual nor anti-hierarchical. The conversion of Greek intellectuals to Christianity meant, after Origen, that philosophical concepts and the arguments of logic would be extensively used in expressing and developing Christian truths. Yet the sacramental understanding of the church implied the hierarchical structure, a continuity in the teaching office, and, finally, conciliar authority. Neither concepts nor hierarchy, however, were conceived as sources of the Christian experience itself, but only as means to safeguard it, to channel it in accordance with the original rule of faith, and to express it in such a way as to give it life and relevance in the changing and developing processes of history.

In order to preserve its identity, Byzantine theological thought had to experience several major crises: the recurring temptation of adopting the Hellenistic world-view of Origenism; the conflict with the Roman papacy on the nature of Church authority; the doctrinal controversy over the "energies" of God in the fourteenth century, and several others. Inevitably, the controversies led to formal attitudes and definitions, partly determined by polemics. A certain "freezing" of concepts and formulae was the inevitable result. However, even in their formal definitions, Byzantine theologians have generally succeeded in preserving a sense of inadequacy between the formulae and the content of the faith: the most obvious and positive truths of Christian experience were thus expressed in antinomies, i.e., in propositions which, in formal logic, are mutually exclusive without being irrational.

Thus, the Byzantine concerns on the doctrine of God, derived from the polemics of the Cappadocian Fathers against Eunomius and crystallized in fourteenth-century Palamism, affirms in God a real distinction between the Persons and the common "essence," just as it maintains that the same God is both transcendent (in the "essence") and immanent (in the "energies"). Similarly, while essentially unchangeable, God is affirmed as becoming the creator of the world in time through His "energy"; but since "energy" is uncreated, i.e., is Godchangeability is seen as a real attribute of the divine. The philosophical antinomies required in this theology reflect a personalistic and dynamic understanding of God, a positive experience of the God of the Bible, inexpressible in Greek philosophical terms.

On the level of anthropology one finds equally antinomic concepts in Byzantine Christian thought. Man, while certainly a creature and, as such, external to God, is defined, in his very nature, as being fully himself only when he is in communion with God. This communion is not a static contemplation of God's "essence" (as Origen thought), but an eternal progress into the inexhaustible riches of divine life. This is precisely the reason why the doctrine of theosis i.e., the process through which, in Christ, man recovers his original relation to God and grows into God "from glory to glory" is the central theme of Byzantine theology and of the Eastern Christian experience itself. Here again static concepts like "human nature" (i.e., that which is properly human) and "divine grace" (that which comes from God) can be used only antinomically: grace is seen as a part of nature itself.

Also, if one understands the ultimate destiny of man, and therefore also his "salvation," in terms of theosis, or "deification," rather than as a justification from sin and guilt, the Church will necessarily be viewed primarily as a communion of free sons of God and only secondarily as an institution endowed with authority to govern and to judge. Again, it is impossible to define Byzantine ecclesiology without at least a partial recourse to antinomy, particularly in describing the relation between the "institution" and the "event," between the "Levite" and the "prophet," between the "hierarchy" and the "saint." In the absence of any legal or infallible criterion of authority, with frequently reiterated statements that authority is not a source of truth but is itself dependent upon the faith of those who are called to exercise it, it was inevitable that the monastic community, as well as individual spiritual personalities, would occasionally compete with bishops and councils as spokesmen of the authentic tradition and as witnesses to the truth. In fact, this polarity was an integral part of the Church's life and did not necessarily lead to conflict: it only reflected the mystery of human freedom which was seen as the very gift of the Holy Spirit, bestowed upon every Christian at his baptism and making him a fully responsible member of Christ's Body. However, even then, the sacramental understanding of ecclesiology served as a guarantee against individualism and arbitrariness: responsibility could only be understood in this ecclesial and sacramental framework, which, in turn, was impossible without an identifiable ministry of bishops and priests.

These are the basic intuitions which determined the social and individual ethics of the Byzantine Christians. Actually, one can hardly find, in the entire religious literature of Byzantium, any systematic treatment of Christian ethics, or behavior, but rather innumerable examples of moral exegesis of Scripture, and ascetical treatises on prayer and spirituality. This implies that Byzantine ethics were eminently "theological ethics." The basic affirmation that every man, whether Christian or not, is created according to the image of God and therefore called to divine communion and "deification," was of course recognized, but no attempt was ever made to build "secular" ethics for man "in general." Byzantines were ready to find seeds of the divine Logos in the precepts of ancient philosophers or even occasionally among Moslem Arabs, but these were always understood as dynamically oriented toward the only true incarnated Logos, and were all to be fulfilled in Him.

The religious inheritance of Christian Byzantium has frequently defined itself in opposition to the West, and indeed its entire concept of God-man relationships is different from one which prevailed in post-Augustinian Latin Christianity. Contemporary man searching for a God who would be not only transcendent but also existentially experienced and immanently present in man, and the gradual discovery of man as essentially open, developing, and growing should be more receptive to the basic positions of Byzantine thought, which may then acquire an astonishingly contemporary relevance.

Note

1. Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine I. The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100-600) (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971), p. 9.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

This Bibliography, which has been substantially updated for the 1983 reprint, provides the possibility of further reading. It indicates the books and articles which were used and which contain further bibliographical information. An almost exhaustive bibliography until 1959 can be found in Hans-Georg Beck's Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich.

Not all the books and articles referred to in the notes are included here. The general books, under Chapter 1, are not repeated, although these items are obviously relevant to the subject-matter of other chapters as well.

Chapter 1

Beck, Hans-Georg. Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich. Munich: Beck, 1959.

The most comprehensive reference book on Byzantine ecclesiastical thought and institutions; bibliographically very complete, except for literature in Slavic languages.

Boulard, E. "L'eucharistie d'après le pseudo-Denys l'Aréopagite," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 58 (1957), 193-217; 59 (1958), 129-169.

Florovsky, Georges. Vizantiyskie Ottsy V-VIII vekov (The Byzantine Fathers of the Fifth to the Eighth Centuries). Paris: YMCA Press, 1933.

Full of brilliant insights.

Gouillard, Jean. "Le Synodikon de l'Orthodoxie. Edition et commentaire," Travaux et mémoires II. Paris: Centre français d'études byzantines, 1967.

A fundamental source for the history of theology in Byzantium after 843. The commentary touches on all major theological issues.

Jugie, Martin. Theologia dogmatica Christianorum orientalium ab Ecclesia Catholica dissidentium. I-V. Paris: Letouzey, 1926-1935.

Monumental survey including many direct quotations and precious bibliographical references; criticizes Byzantine authors from a narrowly scholastic approach to theological problems.

Lossky, Vladimir. The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church. London: Clarke, 1957.

Has become something of a classic for the understanding of God-man relations in the Christian East.

. Vision of God. London: Faith Press, 1963.

An historical treatment of the subject in Greek patristic thought.

Meyendorff, John. Living Tradition. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1978.

Pelikan, Jaroslav. The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine. I. The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition. II. The Spirit of Eastern Christendom (600-1700). Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971, 1974.

The most comprehensive history of ideas in the Christian East.
Very perceptive and challenging.

Chapter 2

Chesnut, Roberta C. Three Monophysite Christologies: Severus of Antioch, Philoxenus of Mabbug and Jacob of Sarug. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Elert, Werner. Der Ausgang der altkirchlichen Christologie: Eine Untersuchung über Theodor von Pharan und seine Zeit als Einführung in die alte Dogmengeschichte. Berlin: Lutherisches Verlagshaus, 1957.

Important for the understanding of Theopaschism and the so-called neo-Chalcedonian developments in the sixth century.

Grillmeier, Aloys. Christ in Christian Tradition from the Apostolic Age to Chalcedon (451). New York: Sheed & Ward, 1965.

Lebon, Joseph. Le Monophysitisme Sévérien: Étude historique, littéraire et théologique sur la résistance monophysite au concile de Chalcedoine jusqu'à la constitution de l'Eglise jacobite. Universitas Catholica Lovaniensis, Diss. II, 4. Louvain, 1909.

The basic monograph showing that the "Monophysite" Christology of Severus of Antioch was, in fact, the Christology of St. Cyril of Alexandria.

Meyendorff, John. Christ in Eastern Christian Thought. Washington: Corpus, 1969 (a translation of Le Christ dans la théologie byzantine. Paris: Cerf, 1969).

A general review of Christological concepts after the Council of Chalcedon.

Moeller, Charles. "Le Chalcédonisme et le néo-chalcédonisme en orient de 451 à la fin du ^{vi}e siècle," Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart edd. A. Grillmeier and H. Bacht. 3 vols. Würzburg: Echter, 1951-1952. I, 637-720.

An important article interpreting the mainstream of Byzantine Christology as a "Monophysite" betrayal of Chalcedon.

Oksiuk, M. "Teopaskhitskie spory" (The Controversies on Theopaschism), Kiev, Dukhovnaia Akademia, Trudy 1 (1913), 529-559.

A counterpart to Moeller's view.

Rozemond, Keetie. La Christologie de Saint Jean Damascène. Ettal: Buchkunstverlag, 1959.

A summary of Greek patristic Christology.

Chapter 3

Alexander, P. J. The Patriarch Nicephorus. Oxford, 1958.

The monograph on a major Orthodox theologian.

Anastos, Milton V. "The Argument for Iconoclasm as Presented by the Iconoclastic Council of 754," Late Classical and Medieval Studies in Honor of A. M. Friend, Jr. Princeton, 1955. Pp. 177-188.

Bryer, A., and Herrin, J., eds. Iconoclasm. Birmingham, 1976.

Updating of the issues with bibliography by several scholars.

Florovsky, Georges. "Origen, Eusebius and the Iconoclastic Controversy," Church History 19 (1950), 77-96.

Establishes the Origenistic roots of some of the iconoclastic theology.

Grabar, André L'iconoclisme byzantin: Dossier archéologique. Paris, 1957.

Important for the understanding of the cult of images, especially as it developed in the seventh century; the archaeological evidence gathered by the author provides numerous insights for the theologian.

. Christian Iconography: A Study of Its Origins. The A. W. Mellon Lectures in the Fine Arts, 1961. Bollingen Series XXXV, 10. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1980.

The monuments themselves, interpreted by a leading art historian.

John of Damascus, St. On the Divine Images. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1980.

Together with the works of St. Theodore the Studite, listed below, this is the classic patristic text in defense of the veneration of images against iconoclasm. A popular, readable translation.

Kitzinger, Ernst. "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 8 (1954), 83-150.

Meyendorff, J. Christ in Eastern Christian Thought. Washington: Corpus, 1969. Pp. 132-148, 203-207.

The link with Christology; the "describability" of God.

Ostrogorsky, George. Studien zur Geschichte des byzantinischen Bilderstreites. Breslau, 1929; repr. Amsterdam: Hakkert, 1964.

Basic historical study.

Ouspensky, Leonide. Theology of the Icon, I-II. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1978-1983.

The icons viewed in the perspective of strict Orthodoxy.

Schönborn, Christoph von. L'icône du Christ: fondements théologiques élaborés entre le Ier et le IIe Concile de Nicée (325-787). Fribourg, 1976.

Theodore the Studite, St. On the Holy Icons. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1981.

Chapter 4

Dobroklonsky, A. Prepodobny Theodor, igumen Studiisky (St. Theodore, Abbot of Studios). 2 vols. Odessa, 1913-1914.

Basic monograph on the great monastic reformer.

Dvornik, F. The Photian Schism: History and Legend. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1948.

Historical rehabilitation of Photius by a Roman Catholic scholar.

Gardner, A. Theodore of Studium, His Life and Times. London, 1905.

Gouillard, J. "L'hérésie dans l'Empire byzantin des origines au ^{xii}e siècle," Travaux et Mémoires, I (Paris, 1965), 299-324; repr. in Gouillard, J. La Vie religieuse à Byzance. London: Variorum, 1981.

Grossu, Nicholai. Prepodobnyi Theodor Studit (St. Theodore the Studite). Kiev, 1907.

Hergenröther, J. Photius, Patriarch von Konstantinopel: Sein Leben, seine Schriften und das griechische Schisma. 3 vols. Regensburg, 1867-1869; repr. Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1960.

Still the only systematic survey of Photius' theology; very critical of the Greek "schismatics."

Joannou, P. Christliche Metaphysik in Byzanz. I. Die Illuminationslehre des Michael Psellos und Joannes Italos. Studia Patristica et Byzantina, 3. Heft. Ettal, 1956.

Lemerle, P. Le premier humanisme byzantin. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1971.

A presentation of Byzantine civilization in the early medieval period.

Stephanou, P. E. Jean Italos, philosophe et humaniste. Orientalia Christiana Analecta, 134. Rome, 1949.

Uspensky, Theodor. Ocherki po istorii Vizantiiskoy obrazovannosti (Notes on the History of Byzantine Learning). St. Petersburg, 1891.

Especially important for intellectual developments in the eleventh century.

Zervos, Chr. Un philosophe néoplatonicien du XIe siècle: Michel Psellos. Paris, 1920.

Chapter 5

Chitty, Derwas J. The Desert a City: An Introduction to the Study of Egyptian and Palestinian Monasticism under the Christian Empire. Oxford, 1966; repr. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1977.

Dörries, Hermann. Symeon von Mesopotamien: Die Überlieferung der messalianischen "Makarios" Schriften. Texte u. Untersuchungen, 55, 1. Leipzig, 1941.

The most authoritative presentation of the "Messalian" theory about the writings of pseudo-Macarius.

. Die Theologie des Makarios/Symeon. Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Cöttingen, philosophisch-historische Klasse 103. Göttingen, 1978.

Guillaumont, Antoine. Les "Kephalalaia Gnostica" d'Evagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'Origénisme chez les Grecs et les Syriens. Paris: du Seuil, 1962.

The definitive study of Evagrius and his tradition.

Krivocheine, Basil. St. Symeon the New Theologian: Life, Spirituality, Doctrine. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1983. (French edition: Chevetogne, 1980.)

The most balanced and comprehensive study on the great Byzantine mystic.

Meyendorff, J. "Messalianism or Anti-Messalianism? A Fresh Look at the 'Macarian' Problem," Kyriakon: Festschrift Johannes Quasten edd. P. Granfield and J. A. Jungmann. Münster: Aschendorff, 1970. II, 585-590.

A survey of arguments against the "Messalian" theory.

. A Study of Gregory Palamas. London: Faith Press, 1962.

The original French edition (Introduction à l'étude de Grégoire Palamas. Paris: du Seuil, 1959) contains a full analysis of the published and unpublished writings of Palamas.

Minin, P. "Glavnyia napravleniia drevne-tserkovnoi mistiki" (The Main Orientations of Mysticism in the Ancient Church), Bogoslovsky Vestnik (December 1911) 823-838; (May 1913) 151-172; (June 1914) 304-326; (September 1914) 42-68.

A short but very perceptive study of the "Evagrian" and "Macarian" traditions.

Völker, W. Maximus Confessor als Meister des geistlichen Lebens. Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1965.

Maximus and the tradition of Origen and Gregory of Nyssa.

Zarin, S. Asketizm po pravoslavno-khristianskomu ucheniu (Asceticism in Orthodox Christian Teaching). St. Petersburg, 1907.

A major collection of patristic texts and their interpretation.

Chapter 6

Herman, E. "The Secular Church," Cambridge Medieval History IV, 2. Cambridge, 1967.

A survey of Byzantine ecclesiastical organization.

Kotsonis, H. Provlemata ekklesiastikes oikonomias (Problems of Ecclesiastical "Economy"). Athens, 1957.

Deals with oikonomia mainly in reference to relations with non-Orthodox Christians; the author was Archbishop of Athens from 1967 to 1973.

Nikodim Milash, Bishop of Dalmatia. Das Kirchenrecht der morgenländischen Kirche. 2nd ed. Mostar, 1905.

A classical textbook; there are translations of the Serbian original into several East European languages.

Pavlov, A. Kurs tserkovnago prava (A Course in Ecclesiastical Law). Moscow, 1902.

One of the most comprehensive reference books.

Zuzek *, I. Kormchaya Kniga: Studies on the Chief Code of the Russian Canon Law. Orientalia Christiana Analecta. Rome, 1964.

Contains much information on the history of Byzantine canon law, and a rich bibliography on the subject.

Chapter 7

Baker, Derek, ed. The Orthodox Churches and the West. Studies in Church History, 13. Oxford, 1976.

Several perceptive articles by competent scholars.

Denzler, G. "Lignes fondamentales de l'ecclésiologie dans l'empire byzantin," Concilium 67 (1971), 57-68.

Dvornik, F. The Legend of the Apostle Andrew and the Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1958.

Historical facts involving Eastern and Western ecclesiology gathered and brilliantly commented upon by a Roman Catholic historian.

. Byzantium and the Roman Primacy. New York: Fordham University Press, 1979.

A general overview opposing the Roman claim of "apostolicity" to the pragmatic approach of the Byzantines.

Haugh, Richard. Photius and the Carolingians: The Trinitarian Controversy. Belmont, Massachusetts: Nordland, 1975.

Jugie, Martin. De processione Spiritus Sancti ex fontibus revelationis et secundum Orientales dissidentes. Rome, 1936.

The Filioque issue seen from a strict Thomistic viewpoint.

Meijer, Johann. A Successful Council of Union: A Theological Analysis of the Photian Synod of 879-880. Thessaloniki, 1975.

A Roman Catholic studies the council which was once recognized as "ecumenical" in both East and West.

Meyendorff, J.; Afanassieff, N.; Schmemmann, A.; Koulomzine, N. The Primacy of Peter in the Orthodox Church. London: Faith Press, 1963.

Contains an analysis of the Byzantine tradition on the succession of Peter.

. Orthodoxy and Catholicity. New York: Sheed & Ward, 1965.

Several essays on the ecclesiological background of the schism.

Sherrard, Philip The Greek East and the Latin West. London: Oxford University Press, 1959.

Discusses the theological nature of the schism, insisting particularly on the Filioque issue.

Chapter 8

Amvrosy (Pogodin), Archimandrite. Sviatoy Mark Efessky i Florentiiskaia Unia (St. Mark of Ephesus and the Union of Florence). Jordanville, New York, 1963.

Candal, E. Nilus Cabasilas et theologia S. Thomae de processione

Spiritus Sancti. Studi e testi, 116. Vatican City, 1945.

Examines the major source book of the Greek delegation at Florence.

Gill, J. The Council of Florence. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1959.

The standard history of the council by a Roman Catholic historian.

Laurent, Venance, ed. Les "Mémoires" du grand ecclésiarque de l'église de Constantinople, Sylvestre Syropoulos sur le Concile de Florence (1438-1439). Publications de l'institut français d'études byzantines. Paris: Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1971.

First translation into a modern language of a basic source on the council of Florence. The introduction and commentary contain a mine of information on theological issues.

Lot-Borodine, Myrrha. Nicolas Cabasilas. Paris: l'Orante, 1958.

Cabasilas' theology of deification.

Mamone, K. "Markos ho Eugenikos. Bios kai ergon," Theologia 25 (1954), 377-404, 521-575.

Mercati, Giovanni. Notizie di Procoro e Demetrio Cidone, Manuele Caleca e Theodoro Meliteniota ed altri appunti per la storia della teologia e della letteratura bizantina del secolo XIV. Studi e testi, 56. Vatican City, 1931.

The Byzantine Thomists in the fourteenth century.

Möhler, L. Kardinal Bessarion als Theologe, Humanist und Staatsman. I-III. Paderborn: Schöningh, 1923-1942.

The monograph on Bessarion, with original sources.

Papadopoulos, S. G. Hellenikai metaphraseis thomistikou ergou. Philothomistai kai antithomistai en Byzantio (Greek Translations of Thomistic Writings. Thomists and Anti-Thomists in Byzantium).

Athens, 1967.

Important critical survey.

Podskalsky, Gerhard. Theologie und Philosophie in Byzanz: Der Streit um die theologische Methodik in der spätbyzantinischen Geistesgeschichte (14./15. Jh.), seine systematischen Grundlagen und seine historische Entwicklung. Munich: Beck, 1977.

A moderately antipalamite view of late-Byzantine theological developments.

Sevcenko *, I. "Intellectual Repercussions of the Council of Florence," Church History 24 (1955), 291-323.

Important for the understanding of Byzantine mentality.

Sinkewicz, Robert E. "The Doctrine of the Knowledge of God in the Early Writings of Barlaam the Calabrian," Mediaeval Studies 44 (1982), 181-242.

Turner, C. J. G. "George-Gennadius Scholarius and the Union of Florence," Journal of Theological Studies 18 (1967), 83-103.

The waverings of one of the greatest among the Greek theologians.

Völker, W. Die Sakramentsmystik des Nikolaus Kabasilas. Wiesbaden, 1977.

Chapter 9

Brightman, F. E. Liturgies Eastern and Western. I: Eastern Liturgies. Oxford, 1896.

A classic.

Dalmais, H. I. The Eastern Liturgies. New York: Hawthorn, 1960.

Useful introduction.

The Festal Menaion. Mother Mary and Kallistos Ware, trans. London: Faber & Faber, 1969.

The Byzantine hymns for the major feasts, translated; useful introduction, explaining the structure of Byzantine offices.

Grosdidier de Matons, José. Romanos le Mélode et les origines de la poésie religieuse à Byzance. Paris, 1977.

A general study on the greatest of the Byzantine liturgical poets.

. "Liturgie et hymnographie: Kontakion et canon," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 34-35 (1980-1981), 31-93.

Hapgood, I. F. Service Book of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic Church. New York: Association Press, 1922.

Contains the English text of the liturgies and sacraments.

The Lenten Triodion. Mother Mary and Kallistos Ware, trans. London: Faber & Faber, 1980.

The hymnography for the lenten season a major source for ascetical and sacramental thought.

Mateos, J. Le Typicon de la Grande Eglise. Ms. Sainte-Croix no. 40. Introduction, texte critique, traduction et notes. Orientalia Christiana Analecta, 165-166. Rome, 1962-1963.

A fundamental source for the study of the Byzantine worship.

Schmemmann, A. Introduction to Liturgical Theology. London: Faith Press, 1966.

The development of Byzantine liturgical concepts, viewed by a contemporary Orthodox theologian.

Uspensky, Nicholas. Evening Worship in the Orthodox Church. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1983.

Includes important theological insights on the vespers liturgy of the "Presanctified."

Wellesz, E. A History of Byzantine Music and Hymnography. 2nd ed. Oxford, 1961.

Basic.

Chapter 10

Balthasar, H. Urs von. Kosmische Liturgie. Das Weltbild Maximus des Bekenners. 2nd ed. Einsiedeln, 1961.

A pioneering study on Maximus; to be consulted in conjunction with Thunberg's Microcosm and Mediator (cited under Chapter 11).

Epifanovich, S. L. Prepodobnyi Maksim Ispovednik i vizantiiskoe bogoslovie (Maximus the Confessor and Byzantine Theology). Kiev, 1915.

Still the most comprehensive book on Maximus, relating his system to Byzantine theology as a whole; important for the understanding of Maximus' doctrine of the logoi.

Florovsky, Georges. "Tvar' i tvarnost'" (Creatures and Creatureliness), Pravoslavnaia Mysl' 1 (1927), 176-212.

Comprehensive study of the patristic doctrine of creation; partial translation in "The Idea of Creation in Christian Philosophy," Eastern Church Quarterly, 8 (1949).

Meyendorff, J. "Note sur l'influence dionysienne en Orient," Studia Patristica II (Papers presented to the Second International Conference on Patristic Studies. Oxford, 1955). Texte und Untersuchungen 64 (1957), 547-553.

The limited influence of the Dionysian angelology among the Byzantines.

Roques, René. L'Univers dionysien. Structure hiérarchique du monde selon le pseudo-Denys. Paris: Aubier, 1954.

The most important book on the "hierarchies."

Chapter 11

Burghardt, W. J. The Image of God in Man According to Cyril of Alexandria. Washington: Catholic University Press, 1957.

The anthropological basis for the doctrine of deification.

Gaiïth, J. La conception de la liberté chez Grégoire de Nysse. Paris: Vrin, 1953.

Very important for the grace-freedom problem.

Gross, Jules. La divinisation du chrétien d'après les pères grecs: Contribution historique à la doctrine de grâce. Paris: Gabalda, 1938.

Kiprian (Kern), Archimandrite. Antropologia sv. Grigoria Palamy (The Anthropology of St. Gregory Palamas). Paris: YMCA Press, 1950.

Contains an original review of the entire patristic tradition.

Ladner, G. B. "The Philosophical Anthropology of St. Gregory of Nyssa," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 12 (1958), 58-94.

Leys, R. L'image de Dieu chez Saint Grégoire de Nysse. Brussels and Paris, 1951.

Lossky, V. On the Image and Likeness. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1974.

A very suggestive collection of studies on patristic anthropology, soteriology, and other theological subjects.

Lot-Borodine, Myrrha. La déification de l'homme. Paris: Cerf, 1969.

Reprint of an important series of articles published in the Revue d'Histoire des Religions, 1932-1933.

Meyendorff, J. "Eph ho chez Cyrille d'Alexandrie et Theodoret," Studia Patristica IV. Texte und Untersuchungen 79 (1961), 157-161.

The crucial passage of Rm 5:12 as understood by the Greek Fathers.

Popov, I. V. "Ideia obozhenia v drevne-vostochnoi tserkvi" (The Idea of Deification in the Ancient Eastern Church), Voprosy filosofii i psikhologii 97 (1906), 165-213.

Very important article.

Romanides, J. S. To propatorikon hamartema (The Ancestral Sin).

Athens, 1957.

The contrast between the Greek and the Augustinian view on original sin.

Thunberg, Lars. Microcosm and Mediator: The Theological Anthropology of Maximus the Confessor. Lund: Gleerup, 1965.

The most recent comprehensive study on Maximus, whose anthropological views were most influential among Byzantine theologians.

Chapter 12

Draguet, René. Julien d'Halicarnasse et la controverse avec Sévère d'Antioche sur l'incorruptibilité du corps du Christ. Louvain, 1924.

The debate on Julianist "Aphthartodocetism" is important for the understanding of the anthropological dimension of Christology.

Dubarle, A. M. "L'ignorance du Christ chez S. Cyrille d'Alexandrie," Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 16 (1939).

On "ignorance by economy," a classical concept in Byzantine Christology.

Gordillo, M. Mariologia Orientalis. Orientalia Christiana Analecta, 141 (1954).

Attempt to reconcile the Eastern and Western traditions by taking Western presuppositions for granted.

Mascall, E. L. ed. The Mother of God: A Symposium. London: Dacre Press, 1949.

Important articles by V. Lossky and G. Florovsky.

Chapter 13

Afanassieff, Nicolas. Tserkov Dukha Sviatogo (The Church of the Holy Spirit). Paris: YMCA Press, 1970.

A study in ecclesiology by a modern Orthodox theologian, containing numerous insights for the understanding of Byzantine thought.

Galtier, Paul. Le Saint-Esprit en nous d'après les pères grecs. Analecta Gregoriana 37 (1946).

Useful analytical survey of patristic texts.

Krivochéine, Basile. "The Most Enthusiastic Zealot: St. Symeon the New Theologian as Abbot and Spiritual Instructor," Ostkirchliche Studien 4 (1955), 108-128.

The life in the Holy Spirit experienced by the great Byzantine mystic; one of several suggestive articles on Symeon by the editor of his writings.

Staniloae, Dumitru. Prière de Jésus et expérience du Saint Esprit. Paris: Desclée, 1981.

Chapter 14

"Concerning the Holy Spirit," Eastern Church Quarterly 7 (1948); also published separately.

A symposium on the Filioque question by Orthodox and Roman Catholic theologians.

Meyendorff, John. "The Holy Trinity in Palamite Theology," Trinitarian Theology East and West. Brookline, Massachusetts: Holy Cross Press, 1977. Pp. 25-43.

Popov, I. V. Lichnost' i uchenie blazhennago Avgustina (Personality and Doctrine of the Blessed Augustine). I. Sergiev Posad, 1917.

A very important critical analysis of Augustine by a specialist in Eastern patristic thought; the second volume never appeared. Important for the understanding of Eastern approach to the Augustinian models of thought.

Prestige, G. L. God in Patristic Thought. London: SPCK, 1952.

The best introduction in English.

Radovich, A. To Mysterion tes hagias Triados kato ton hagion

Gregorion Palaman (The Mystery of the Holy Trinity According to Saint Gregory Palamas). Thessaloniki, 1973.

Régnon, Th. de. Etudes de théologie positive sur la Sainte Trinité. Troisième série, II (Théories grecques des processions divines). Paris, 1893.

Basic work on the difference of the Greek and Augustinian models of Trinitarian thought.

Staniloae, Dumitru. Theology and the Church. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Several important studies on the Trinity by a contemporary Romanian theologian.

Chapter 15

Cabasilas, Nicholas. The Life in Christ. Trans. C. J. de Catanzaro; Intro. B. Bobrinskoy. New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1974.

First English translation of the famous De vita in Christo.

King, A. A. The Rites of Eastern Christendom. 2nd ed. Rome: Catholic Book Agency, 1947.

Raes, A. Introductio in liturgiam orientalem. Rome, 1947.

Schmemmann, A. Sacraments and Orthodoxy. New York: Herder, 1966.

Chapter 16

Bornaert, R. Les commentaires byzantins de la divine liturgie du VIIe au XVe siècle. Archives de L'Orient Chrétien 9. Paris: Institut français d'études byzantines, 1966.

Text, French translation, and commentary. Important for the evolution of liturgical symbolism.

Cabasilas, Nicholas. A Commentary on the Divine Liturgy. Tr. J. M. Hussey and

P. A. McNulty, with an introduction by R. M. French. Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1977.

The translation of the most popular late-Byzantine commentary on the Eucharistic liturgy.

Kiprian (Kern), Archimandrite. Evkharistiia (The Eucharist). Paris: YMCA Press, 1947.

Especially important for the question of the epiclesis.

Salaville, A. An Introduction in the Study of Eastern Liturgies. London: Sands, 1938.

Taft, Robert. The Great Entrance: A History of the Transit of Gifts and Other Pre-Anaphoral Rites of the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom. Orientalia Christiana Analecta, 200. Rome, 1975

A thorough study of the Byzantine liturgical tradition, with exhaustive bibliography.

. "The Liturgy of the Great Church: An Initial Synthesis of Structure and Interpretation on the Eve of Iconoclasm," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 34-35 (1980-1981), 45-75.

A critical view of the liturgical commentary by patriarch Germanus I (d. ca. 730).

Chapter 17

Alès, A. d'. "La question du purgatoire au concile de Florence en 1438," Gregorianum 3 (1922), 9-50.

Jugie, M. "La question du purgatoire au concile de Ferrare-Florence," Echos d'Orient 20 (1929), 322-332.

Meyendorff, John. The Byzantine Legacy in the Orthodox Church.

Crestwood, New York: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1982.

Michel, A. Die Kaisermacht in der Ostkirche (843-1204). Darmstadt: Gentner, 1959.

Important, but must be used together with Dvornik's Political Philosophy.

Sergii (Stragorodsky). Pravoslavnoe uchenie o spasenii (The Orthodox Doctrine of Salvation). Sergiev Posad, 1894.

An authoritative patristic study, containing numerous references to Byzantine theologians, by a subsequent patriarch of Moscow; criticizes the "legalism" of Western thought.

INDEX

The most important references are designated by boldface.

A

Akathistos hymnos, 30

Akindynos, Gregory, 77, 188

Akoimetai, 19, 118

Alaska, 218

Alexandria, school of, 7-8, 21-22, 33, 156

Alexis, patriarch, 119

Alexis ^I, Comnenos, emperor, 198

allegorism, 21-22

Almazov, A., 196

Ambrose of Milan, 60

Anastasius of Antioch, 34

Anastasius ^I, emperor, 19, 30

Andrew of Crete, 123, 147

angels, 136

Anselm of Canterbury, 106, 112, 160, 195

Anthony ^{II}, patriarch, 87

Anthony ^{IV}, patriarch, 214 anthropology, 32, 52, 76-77, 108-109, 138-50

Antioch, school of, 7-8, 22-23, 32-33, 50, 59, 145, 153-54
antinomy, 5, 224-27 aphthartodocetism, 156-57, 160
apokatastasis, 163, 222
Apollinaris, apollinarianism, 95-96, 154, 204 apophatic theology, 11-14, 59
"Apostolic canons," 80
Arethas of Caesarea, 55
Armenians, 36, 39, 42, 54, 95-96, 116, 119
Arsenius Autoreianos, patriarch; "Arsenites," 87
Athanasius of Alexandria, 3, 4, 7-8, 21, 33-34, 57, 93, 129-30, 154, 161, 162, 168, 170-71, 181
Athanasius I, patriarch, 76, 86
Augustine of Hippo, 60, 92, 106, 112, 143-45, 181, 186
Auxentios, 122
azymes, 95-96, 110, 204-205, 206
B
Balsamon, Theodore, 85-86, 117 baptism, 68, 108, 116, 134-35, 145, 192-95;
 by immersion, 95
Barlaam, the Calabrian, 9, 13, 76, 103, 105, 113, 123, 139, 188

Basel, council of, 109

Basil of Caesarea, 6, 8, 88-89, 117, 133, 163, 168, 169, 174-75, 183, 185, 188, 197, 202

Basil I, emperor, 83

Basil, prince of Moscow, 214

Basilics, 83, 85

Baumstarck, A, 118

Beck, H.-G., 92

Bessarion of Nicaea, 106, 111-14

Blastares, Matthew, 85

Bréhier, E., 23

Bryennios, Joseph, 107, 111

C

Cabasilas, Nicholas, 4, 96, 104, 107-109, 118, 147-48, 163, 171, 175, 191-94, 201, 205-208

Cabasilas, Nilus, 107, 112

caesaropapism, 5-6; see also "symphony"

Calecas, Manuel, 106

Callistos, patriarch, 86

canon of Scripture, 7-8

canons of local councils, 81

canons of ecumenical councils, 80-81

canons of the holy fathers, 81

celibacy of the priesthood, 60, 94

cenobitism, 66-67

Chalcedon, council of, 3, 10-11, 31-41, 44, 50, 59, 70, 86-87, 99, 130, 151, 153, 156, 159

chrismarion, 108, 117, 192-95

Chrysoberges, Maximus, 106

Chrysoloras, Manuel, 106

Clement of Alexandria, 59

Code of Justinian, 82-86

co-inherence, 186

communication of idioms, 39, 77, 154-55, 164

Constance, council of, 106, 109

Constantia, 43, 49

Constantine _I, emperor, 1, 43

Constantine _V, emperor, 43-44, 51

Constantine, _{VI}, emperor, 48, 55, 57

Constantine of Kerkyra, 40, 87

Constantinople, second council of (A.D. 553), 23, 25-27, 35-36, 39, 40, 59, 67, 69, 131, 151, 155-56, 222

Constantinople, third council of (A.D. 680), 151, 164

Constantinople, council of (A.D. 879-880), 92, 101

Cosmas of Maiuma, 123

Cydones, Prochoros, 77, 106

Cydones, Demetrios, 104-107

Cyprian of Carthage, 98

Cyril of Alexandria, 3, 32-36, 40, 93, 108, 130, 145, 149, 154-55, 159, 169-70

Cyril of Jerusalem, 7

Cyril and Methodius, 217-18

D

Daniélou, J., 138-39

deification (theosis), 2-4, 32-33, 35, 39, 49, 67, 68, 72, 163-64, 186-88, 205, 215, 221, 225-26; see also "koinonia" and "participation."

Diadochus of Photice, 69-70, 73

Diodore of Tarsus, 22, 32

Dionysius, Pseudo-, the Areopagite, 11, 12, 25, 27-29, 37, 44, 59, 98, 118, 119, 136, 183, 202-203, 208-10

Dionysius Exiguus, 80, 84

Dioscoros of Alexandria, 33, 100

divorce, 198-99

Draguet, R., 157

E

Ecloga, 83

ecumenical patriarch, 1, 57, 83-84, 85-88, 115 energies of God, 12-14, 28, 36-39, 59, 77, 87, 94, 103, 132-34, 153, 163-65, 173, 185-88, 203, 225

Ephesus, council of, 10, 147, 151, 154

Ephraem of Antioch, 34
Ephraem, the Syrian, 30
Epiphanius of Cyprus, 93
epiclesis, 96-97, 109, 111, 206-207 episcopate, 209-10 eschatology, 178, 202, 208, 214-16, 218-22 essence of God, 24, 77, 130, 173, 180-84, 186-88, 203, 225
Eucharist, 6, 29, 40, 44, 49-50, 68, 77, 95-97, 108, 116-18, 121, 174-75, 184, 188, 192, 201-10, 219, 222
Eugenius ^{IV}, pope, 109-12
Eulogios of Alexandria, 34, 90
Eunomios, eunomianism, 11, 185, 225
Euphemius, patriarch, 19
Eusebius of Caesarea, 43, 49
Eustratius of Nicaea, 39, 87
Euthymios, patriarch, 87
Euthymios of Sardis, 86
Eutyches, eutychianism, 33-34
Evagrius Ponticus, 25-27, 35-36, 67-68, 69-71, 74, 156-57, 202 exegesis, 21-22 experience of God, 8-10, 68-49, 73-75, 212-13
F
Filioque, 60-61, 91-94, 110, 111, 113, 168, 181, 188
Florence, council of, 94, 109-14, 220

Florovsky, G., 1, 24, 40, 128, 131, 161 freedom, 26, 139, 143, 160, 163, 173, 176-78, 222

G

Gennadios, patriarch, 34

Germanus ^I, patriarch, 45, 46

Germanus ^{III}, patriarch, 87

gnomic will, 38, 143

Gregoras, Nicephorus, 77, 107

Gregory of Cyprus, patriarch, 87, 93-94, 173

Gregory of Nazianzus, 5, 25, 37, 73, 125, 131, 160, 180, 182-83

Gregory of Nyssa, 12, 14, 25, 27, 37, 59, 72, 98, 135, 138, 140, 161, 163, 169, 172, 180, 183, 185, 201, 219

Gregory Palamas, palamism, 4, 9, 11, 13, 25, 74, 76-78, 94, 105-10, 123, 139, 141, 145, 147, 164, 173, 186-88, 192, 205

Gregory of Sinai, 76

H

Hagia Sophia, the "Great Church," 115-19, 208

Harmenopoulos, Constantine, 84-85

Harnack, A., 2, 23

heart, 68-69, 70, 108-109

Hellenism, 1-2, 20-29, 30, 43-44, 55, 61-64, 72-73, 105-106, 112-13, 225

healing, 199

Heraclius, emperor, 36, 50

"heresy of the three languages," 218

heretics and schismatics, reconciliation of, 195

hesychia, hesychasm, 71, 74, 76-77, 108-109, 201, 205

Hieria, council of, 44, 46

hymnography, 7, 21, 30, 116, 118, 122-25, 152, 160, 162, 165, 169-70, 172, 174-75, 184, 188, 214, 220

hypostasis, 24, 92, 94, 153-56, 158-59, 180-89

hypostatic union, 35, 38, 44, 48, 49, 77, 130, 153-65

I

Ignatius, patriarch, 55, 73, 87, 90

ignorance of Jesus, 49, 157

image of God in man, 48, 141-42

Immaculate Conception, 147-48, 165

Irenaeus of Lyons, 138, 141, 146

Islam, 42-43, 50-51, 104, 217

J

James, liturgy of St., 117

Jerome, 60

Joasaph of Ephesus, 192

Job, monk, 192

John ^{viii}, pope, 60, 92

John ^v, Paleologus, emperor, 103

John ^{vi}, Cantacuzenos, emperor, 103-107

John Beccos, patriarch, 87, 93

John Cassian, 67

John Chrysostom, 29, 57, 108, 118, 145, 148, 161, 162, 195, 197, 201; liturgy of, 117, 188, 203, 205-206, 219

John Climacus, 67, 70-71

John Cosmas, patriarch, 87

John II, Comnenos, emperor, 85

John of Damascus, 4, 7-8, 35, 39, 45-46, 49, 51, 57, 83, 119, 123, 124-25, 130, 155, 157, 158, 161, 172, 183

John Eirenikos, 40, 87

John, the Faster, patriarch, 81

John, the Grammarian, 34

John Italos, 55, 63-64, 72, 87-88, 131

John Maxentios, 34

John III Scholasticus, patriarch, 80, 84

Jugie, M., 92

Julian of Halicarnassus, 157

Justin, martyr, 146

Justinian I, emperor, 19, 20, 29, 33, 35, 49, 57, 59, 72, 82-84, 115, 155, 213

Justinian II, emperor, 82

K

Kassia, nun, 214

knowledge of God, 76-77, 139-40

koinonia, 174-75; see also "participation"

kontakion, 30, 122

Kormchaya Kniga, 82, 84

L

Latinophrones, 93, 106-107, 188

Lebon, J., 34

Leo _I, pope, 3, 33

Leo _{III}, emperor, 43, 45, 51

Leo _V, emperor, 46, 49

Leo _{VI}, emperor, 83, 184, 198

Leo of Ohrid, 95

Leontius of Byzantium, 36, 40

Leontius of Jerusalem, 4, 34, 155

Libri Carolini 46

liturgy (as expression of theology), 6-7, 29-30, 115-25, 155, 161

logoi of creation, 131-34

Lossky, V., 1, 27, 172, 185, 189, 212

Luther, Martin, 218

Lyons, council of, 87, 93

M

Macarius, Pseudo-, 68-71, 73-74, 140

Macedonius ^{II}, patriarch, 19, 34

Manuel ^I, Comnenos, emperor, 85

Mark of Ephesus, 109, 111-12, 220-21

marriage, 196-99

Mary, veneration of, 21, 49, 123-24, 146-49, 165

Maximus, the Confessor, 3, 4, 6, 11, 19, 25, 27, 35-39, 40, 49, 57, 67, 71-72, 93, 130-35, 138-43, 153, 159, 160, 163-64, 203, 208, 219, 222

Menaion, 121-22

Mesarites, Nicholas, 98-99

Messalianism, 69, 74, 177

metabole, 203

Methodius, patriarch, 55, 90

Metochites, Theodore, 105

Michael ^{II}, emperor, 46

Michael ^{III}, emperor, 55

Michael ^{VIII}, Paleologus, emperor, 93, 96, 192, 220

Michael of Anchialos, patriarch, 85

Michael Cerularius, patriarch, 92, 95

microcosm, 142, 152

mind (or "intellect"), 26, 43, 67, 70-71, 141-42, 143, 202 missions, 217-18

Moeller, C., 34, 156

monasticism, 6, 51, 54-58, 66-78, 118-20

Monophysitism, Monophysites, 3, 6, 19, 33-40, 42, 44, 95, 116, 119, 133, 159, 217

Monotheletism, Monoenergism, 34-39, 71, 153

N

nature, 24, 33-41, 128-30, 143, 153-59, 176, 185, 219, 225

Nemesius of Emesa, 25

"Neo-Chalcedonians," 34-35, 156

Nestorius, Nestorianism, 23, 32-37, 44, 47, 154-55

Nicaea, first council of, 10, 89, 99, 180, 183

Nicaea, second council of, 44, 46, 151

Nicephorus ⁱ, patriarch, 46-50, 51, 55, 57, 81, 90, 158, 197, 203

Nicephorus ⁱⁱ, patriarch, 87

Nicetas of Amaseia, 86

Nicholas ⁱ, pope, 55, 59, 101

Nicholas ⁱ, Mystikos, patriarch, 83, 87, 89

Nicholas ⁱⁱⁱ, patriarch, 82

Nicholas of Methone, 40

Nilus, the Calabrian, monk, 39, 88

Nomocanons, 80, 84-85, 178

Novellae, 82-83

O

Obolensky, D., 218

oikonomia, 48, 49, 57, 59, 87-90

Oktoechos, 121

Origen, Origenism, 6, 12, 19, 21-27, 35-37, 43-44, 46, 49, 59, 62-63, 71-72, 97-98, 128, 129-35, 139-41, 181, 183, 202, 219, 225

original sin, 143-49, 157-58, 165, 193

Ouspensky, L., 204

P

participation in God, 3, 77, 103, 133, 138-41, 146, 153, 169, 171-75, 186-88, 219, 225; see also "deification"

Pelikan, J., 224

penance, 195-96

pentarchy, 57, 110

Pentecostarion, 121

Peter, patriarch of Antioch, 92, 94

Peter, succession of, 97-99

Philotheos Kokkinos, patriarch, 86, 106-107, 109, 119

Philoxenus of Mabbugh, 34

Photius, patriarch, 4, 48, 55, 58-61, 83, 85, 87, 90, 92, 95, 97, 101, 105, 143, 144

Pletho, George Gemisthos, 111-13

Polyeuktos, patriarch, 198

Porphyry, Neoplatonist, 43-44 prayer of the mind, and "Jesus prayer," 66, 70-71, 74, 76

prayer for the dead, 222

Prestige, G. L., 185

Procheiron, 83

Proclus, Neoplatonist, 23

Proclus, patriarch, 147

Project Gutenberg's First Book of Adam and Eve, by Rutherford Platt

This eBook is for the use of anyone anywhere at no cost and with almost no restrictions whatsoever. You may copy it, give it away or re-use it under the terms of the Project Gutenberg License included with this eBook or online at www.gutenberg.org

Title: First Book of Adam and Eve

Author: Rutherford Platt

Release Date: January 19, 2008 [EBook #398]

[This file last updated on January 25, 2008]

Language: English

Character set encoding: ISO-8859-1

 START OF THIS PROJECT GUTENBERG EBOOK FIRST BOOK OF ADAM AND EVE ***

The First Book of Adam and Eve

by Rutherford Platt

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Prologue

Chapter I - The crystal sea, God commands Adam, expelled from Eden, to live in the Cave of Treasures.

Chapter II - Adam and Eve faint when they leave the Garden. God sends His Word to encourage them.

Chapter III - Concerning the promise of the great five and a half days.

Chapter IV - Adam mourns over the changed conditions. Adam and Eve enter the Cave of Treasures.

Chapter V - Eve makes a noble and emotional intercession, taking the blame on herself.

Chapter VI - God's reprimand to Adam and Eve in which he points out how and why they sinned.

Chapter VII - The beasts are appeased.

Chapter VIII - The "Bright Nature" of man is taken away.

Chapter IX - Water from the Tree of Life. Adam and Eve near drowning.

Chapter X - Their bodies need water after they leave the garden.

Chapter XI - A recollection of the glorious days in the Garden.

Chapter XII - How darkness came between Adam and Eve.

Chapter XIII - The fall of Adam. Why night and day were created.

Chapter XIV - The earliest prophesy of the coming of Christ.

Chapter XV - Adam and Eve grieve over the suffering of God to save them from their sins.

Chapter XVI - The first sunrise. Adam and Eve think it is a fire coming to burn them.

Chapter XVII - The Chapter of the Serpent.

Chapter XVIII - The mortal combat with the serpent.

Chapter XIX - Beasts made subject to Adam.

Chapter XX - Adam wishes to protect Eve.

Chapter XXI - Adam and Eve attempt suicide.

Chapter XXII - Adam in a gracious mood.

Chapter XXIII - Adam and Eve strengthen themselves and make the first altar ever built.

Chapter XXIV - A vivid prophecy of the life and death of Christ.

Chapter XXV - God represented as merciful and loving. The establishing of worship.

Chapter XXVI - A beautiful prophecy of eternal life and joy (v. 15). The fall of night.

Chapter XXVII - The second tempting of Adam and Eve. The devil takes on the form of a beguiling light.

Chapter XXVIII - The Devil pretends to lead Adam and Eve to the water to bathe.

Chapter XXIX - God tells Adam of the Devil's purpose. (v. 4).

Chapter XXX - Adam receives the first worldly goods.

Chapter XXXI - They make themselves more comfortable in the Cave of Treasures on the third day.

Chapter XXXII - Adam and Eve go into the water to pray.

Chapter XXXIII - Satan falsely promises the "bright light."

Chapter XXXIV - Adam recalls the creation of Eve. He eloquently appeals for food and drink.

Chapter XXXV - God's reply.

Chapter XXXVI - Figs.

Chapter XXXVII - Forty-three days of penance do not redeem one hour of sin (v. 6).

Chapter XXXVIII - "When 5500 years are fulfilled..."

Chapter XXXIX - Adam is cautious—but too late.

Chapter XL - The first Human hunger.

Chapter XLI - The first Human thirst.

Chapter XLII - A promise of the Water of Life. The third prophecy of the coming of Christ.

Chapter XLIII - The Devil attempts arson.

Chapter XLIV - The power of fire over man.

Chapter XLV - Why Satan didn't fulfil his promises. Description of hell.

Chapter XLVI - "How many times have I delivered you out of his hand . . ."

Chapter XLVII - The Devil's own Scheming.

Chapter XLVIII - Fifth apparition of Satan to Adam and Eve.

Chapter XLIX - The first prophecy of the Resurrection.

Chapter L - Adam and Eve seek to cover their nakedness.

Chapter LI - "What is his beauty that you should have followed him?"

Chapter LII - Adam and Eve sew the first shirt.

Chapter LIII - The prophecy of the Western Lands and of the great flood.

Chapter LIV - Adam and Eve go exploring.

Chapter LV - The Conflict between God and Satan.

Chapter LVI - A chapter of divine comfort.

Chapter LVII - "Therefore I fell... "

Chapter LVIII - "About sunset on the 53rd day. . ."

Chapter LIX - Eighth apparition of Satan of Satan to Adam and Eve.

Chapter LX - The Devil appears like an old man. He offers "a place of rest."

Chapter LXI - They begin to follow Satan.

Chapter LXII - Two fruit trees.

Chapter LXIII - The first joy of trees.

Chapter LXIV - Adam and Eve partake of the first earthly food.

Chapter LXV - Adam and Eve acquire digestive organs. Final hope of returning to the Garden is lost.

Chapter LXVI - Adam does his first day's work.

Chapter LXVII - "Then Satan began to lead astray Adam and Eve...."

Chapter LXVIII - How destruction and trouble is of Satan when he is the master. Adam and Eve establish the custom of worship.

Chapter LXIX - Twelfth apparition of Satan to Adam and Eve, while Adam was praying over the offering on the altar; when Satan beat him.

Chapter LXX - Thirteenth apparition of Satan, to trick Adam into marrying Eve.

Chapter LXXI - Adam is troubled by the thought of marrying Eve. Chapter

Chapter LXXII - Adam's heart is set on fire. Satan appears as beautiful maidens.

Chapter LXXIII - The marriage of Adam and Eve.

Chapter LXXIV - The birth of Cain and Luluwa. Why they received those names.

Chapter LXXV - The family revisits the Cave of Treasures. Birth of Abel and Akia.

Chapter LXXVI - Cain becomes jealous of Abel because of his sisters.

Chapter LXXVII - Cain, 15 years old, and Abel 12 years old, grow apart.

Chapter LXXVIII - Jealousy overcomes Cain. He makes trouble in the family. How the first murder was planned.

Chapter LXXIX - A wicked plan is carried to a tragic conclusion. Cain is frightened. "Am I my brother's keeper?" The seven punishments. Peace is shattered.

Prologue

The First Book of Adam and Eve details the life and times of Adam and Eve after they were expelled from the garden to the time that Cain kills his brother Abel. It tells of Adam and Eve's first dwelling—the Cave of Treasures; their trials and temptations; Satan's many apparitions to them; the birth of Cain, Abel, and their twin sisters; and Cain's love for his beautiful twin sister, Luluwa, whom Adam and Eve wished to join to Abel.

This book is considered by many scholars to be part of the "Pseudepigrapha" (soo-duh-pig-ruh-fuh). The "Pseudepigrapha" is a collection of historical biblical works that are considered to be fiction. Because of that stigma, this book was not included in the compilation of the Holy Bible. This book is a written history of what happened in the days of Adam and Eve after they were cast out of the garden. Although considered to be pseudepigraphic by some, it carries significant meaning and insight into events of that time. It is doubtful that these writings could have survived all the many centuries if there were no substance to them.

This book is simply a version of an account handed down by word of mouth, from generation to generation, linking the time that the first human life was created to the time when somebody finally decided to write it down. This particular version is the work of unknown Egyptians. The lack of historical allusion makes it difficult to precisely date the writing, however, using other pseudepigraphical works as a reference, it was probably written a few hundred years before the birth of Christ. Parts of this version are found in the Jewish Talmud, and the Islamic Koran, showing what a vital role it played in the original literature of human wisdom. The Egyptian author wrote in Arabic, but later translations were found written in Ethiopic. The present English translation was translated in the late 1800's by Dr. S. C. Malan and Dr. E. Trumpp. They translated into King James English from both the Arabic version and the Ethiopic version which was then published in The Forgotten Books of Eden in 1927 by The World Publishing Company. In 1995, the text was extracted from a copy of The Forgotten Books of Eden and converted to electronic form by Dennis Hawkins. It was then translated into more modern English by simply exchanging 'Thou' s for 'You's, 'Art's for 'Are's, and so forth. The text was then carefully re-read to ensure its integrity.

Chapter I - The crystal sea, God commands Adam, expelled from Eden, to live in the Cave of Treasures.

1 On the third day, God planted the garden in the east of the earth, on the border of the world eastward, beyond which, towards the sun-rising, one finds nothing but water, that encompasses the whole world, and reaches to the borders of heaven.

2 And to the north of the garden there is a sea of water, clear and pure to the taste, unlike anything else; so that, through the clearness thereof, one may look into the depths of the earth.

3 And when a man washes himself in it, he becomes clean of the cleanness thereof, and white of its whiteness—even if he were dark.

4 And God created that sea of his own good pleasure, for He knew what would come of the man He would make; so that after he had left the garden, on account of his transgression, men should be born in the earth. Among them are righteous ones who will die, whose souls God would raise at the last day; when all of them will return to their flesh, bathe in the water of that sea, and repent of their sins.

5 But when God made Adam go out of the garden, He did not place him on the border of it northward. This was so that he and Eve would not be able to go near to the sea of water where they could wash themselves in it, be cleansed from their sins, erase the transgression they had committed, and be no longer reminded of it in the thought of their punishment.

6 As to the southern side of the garden, God did not want Adam to live there either; because, when the wind blew from the north, it would bring him, on that southern side, the delicious smell of the trees of the garden.

7 Wherefore God did not put Adam there. This was so that he would not be able to smell the sweet smell of those trees, forget his transgression, and find consolation for what he had done by taking delight in the smell of the trees and yet not be cleansed from his transgression.

8 Again, also, because God is merciful and of great pity, and governs all things in a way that He alone knows—He made our father Adam live in the western border of the garden, because on that side the earth is very broad.

9 And God commanded him to live there in a cave in a rock—the Cave of Treasures below the garden.

Chapter II - Adam and Eve faint when they leave the Garden. God sends His Word to encourage them.

1 But when our father Adam, and Eve, went out of the garden, they walked the ground on their feet, not knowing they were walking.

2 And when they came to the opening of the gate of the garden, and saw the broad earth spread before them, covered with stones large and small, and with sand, they feared and trembled, and fell on their faces, from the fear that came over them; and they were as dead.

3 Because—whereas until this time they had been in the garden land, beautifully planted with all manner of trees—they now saw themselves, in a strange land, which they knew not, and had never seen.

4 And because, when they were in the garden they were filled with the grace of a bright nature, and they had not hearts turned toward earthly things.

5 Therefore God had pity on them; and when He saw them fallen before the gate of the garden, He sent His Word to our father, Adam and Eve, and raised them from their fallen state.

Chapter III - Concerning the promise of the great five and a half days.

1 God said to Adam, "I have ordained on this earth days and years, and you and your descendants shall live and walk in them, until the days and years are fulfilled; when I shall send the Word that created you, and against which you have transgressed, the Word that made you come out of the garden, and that raised you when you were fallen.

2 Yes, the Word that will again save you when the five and a half days are fulfilled."

3 But when Adam heard these words from God, and of the great five and a half days, he did not understand the meaning of them.

4 For Adam was thinking there would be only five and a half days for him until the end of the world.

5 And Adam cried, and prayed to God to explain it to him.

6 Then God in his mercy for Adam who was made after His own image and likeness, explained to him, that these were 5,000 and 500 years; and how One would then come and save him and his descendants.

7 But before that, God had made this covenant with our father, Adam, in the same terms, before he came out of the garden, when he was by the tree where Eve took of the fruit and gave it to him to eat.

8 Because, when our father Adam came out of the garden, he passed by that tree, and saw how God had changed the appearance of it into another form, and how it shriveled.

9 And as Adam went to it he feared, trembled and fell down; but God in His mercy lifted him up, and then made this covenant with him.

10 And again, when Adam was by the gate of the garden, and saw the cherub with a sword of flashing fire in his hand, and the cherub grew angry and frowned at him, both Adam and Eve became afraid of him, and thought he meant to put them to death. So they fell on their faces, trembled with fear.

11 But he had pity on them, and showed them mercy; and turning from them went up to heaven, and prayed to the Lord, and said;—

12 "Lord, You sent me to watch at the gate of the garden, with a sword of fire.

13 But when Your servants, Adam and Eve, saw me, they fell on their faces, and were as dead. O my Lord, what shall we do to Your servants?"

14 Then God had pity on them, and showed them mercy, and sent His Angel to keep the garden.

15 And the Word of the Lord came to Adam and Eve, and raised them up.

16 And the Lord said to Adam, "I told you that at the end of the five and a half days, I will send my Word and save you.

17 Strengthen your heart, therefore, and stay in the Cave of Treasures, of which I have before spoken to you."

18 And when Adam heard this Word from God, he was comforted with that which God had told him. For He had told him how He would save him.

Chapter IV - Adam mourns over the changed conditions. Adam and Eve enter the Cave of Treasures.

1 But Adam and Eve cried for having come out of the garden, their first home.

2 And indeed, when Adam looked at his flesh, that was altered, he cried bitterly, he and Eve, over what they had done. And they walked and went gently down into the Cave of Treasures.

3 And as they came to it, Adam cried over himself and said to Eve, "Look at this cave that is to be our prison in this world, and a place of punishment!

4 What is it compared with the garden? What is its narrowness compared with the space of the other?

5 What is this rock, by the side of those groves? What is the gloom of this cavern, compared with the light of the garden?

6 What is this overhanging ledge of rock to shelter us, compared with the mercy of the Lord that overshadowed us?

7 What is the soil of this cave compared with the garden land? This earth, strewn with stones; and that, planted with delicious fruit trees?"

8 And Adam said to Eve, "Look at your eyes, and at mine, which before beheld angels praising in heaven; and they too, without ceasing.

9 But now we do not see as we did; our eyes have become of flesh; they cannot see like they used to see before."

10 Adam said again to Eve, "What is our body today, compared to what it was in former days, when we lived in the garden?"

11 After this, Adam did not want to enter the cave, under the overhanging rock; nor would he ever want to enter it.

12 But he bowed to God's orders; and said to himself, "Unless I enter the cave, I shall again be a transgressor."

Chapter V - Eve makes a noble and emotional intercession, taking the blame on herself.

1 Then Adam and Eve entered the cave, and stood praying, in their own tongue, unknown to us, but which they knew well.

2 And as they prayed, Adam raised his eyes and saw the rock and the roof of the cave that covered him overhead. This prevented him from seeing either heaven or God's creatures. So he cried and beat his chest hard, until he dropped, and was as dead.

3 And Eve sat crying; for she believed he was dead.

4 Then she got up, spread her hands toward God, appealing to Him for mercy and pity, and said, "O God, forgive me my sin, the sin which I committed, and don't remember it against me.

5 For I alone caused Your servant to fall from the garden into this condemned land; from light into this darkness; and from the house of joy into this prison.

6 O God, look at this Your servant fallen in this manner, and bring him back to life, that he may cry and repent of his transgression which he committed through me.

7 Don't take away his soul right now; but let him live that he may stand after the measure of his repentance, and do Your will, as before his death.

8 But if You do not bring him back to life, then, O God, take away my own soul, that I be like him, and leave me not in this dungeon, one and alone; for I could not stand alone in this world, but with him only.

9 For You, O God, caused him to fall asleep, and took a bone from his side, and restored the flesh in the place of it, by Your divine power.

10 And You took me, the bone, and make me a woman, bright like him, with heart, reason, and speech; and in flesh, like to his own; and You made me after the likeness of his looks, by Your mercy and power.

11 O Lord, I and he are one, and You, O God, are our Creator, You are He who made us both in one day.

12 Therefore, O God, give him life, that he may be with me in this strange land, while we live in it on account of our transgression.

13 But if You will not give him life, then take me, even me, like him; that we both may die the same day."

14 And Eve cried bitterly, and fell on our father Adam; from her great sorrow.

Chapter VI - God's reprimand to Adam and Eve in which he points out how and why they sinned.

1 But God looked at them; for they had killed themselves through great grief.

2 But He decided to raise them and comfort them.

3 He, therefore, sent His Word to them; that they should stand and be raised immediately.

4 And the Lord said to Adam and Eve, "You transgressed of your own free will, until you came out of the garden in which I had placed you.

5 Of your own free will have you transgressed through your desire for divinity, greatness, and an exalted state, such as I have; so that I deprived you of the bright nature in which you then were, and I made you come out of the garden to this land, rough and full of trouble.

6 If only you had not transgressed My commandment and had kept My law, and had not eaten of the fruit of the tree which I told you not to come near! And there were fruit trees in the garden better than that one.

7 But the wicked Satan did not keep his faith and had no good intent towards Me, that although I had created him, he considered Me to be useless, and sought the Godhead for himself; for this I hurled him down from heaven so that he could not remain in his first estate—it was he who made the tree appear pleasant in your eyes, until you ate of it, by believing his words.

8 Thus have you transgressed My commandment, and therefore I have brought on you all these sorrows.

9 For I am God the Creator, who, when I created My creatures, did not intend to destroy them. But after they had sorely roused My anger, I punished them with grievous plagues, until they repent.

10 But, if on the contrary, they still continue hardened in their transgression, they shall be under a curse forever."

Chapter VII - The beasts are appeased.

1 When Adam and Eve heard these words from God, they cried and sobbed yet more; but they strengthened their hearts in God, because they now felt that the Lord was to them like a father and a mother; and for this very reason, they cried before Him, and sought mercy from Him.

2 Then God had pity on them, and said: "O Adam, I have made My covenant with you, and I will not turn from it; neither will I let you return to the garden, until My covenant of the great five and a half days is fulfilled."

3 Then Adam said to God, "O Lord, You created us, and made us fit to be in the garden; and before I transgressed, You made all beasts come to me, that I should name them.

4 Your grace was then on me; and I named every one according to Your mind; and you made them all subject to me.

5 But now, O Lord God, that I have transgressed Your commandment, all beasts will rise against me and will devour me, and Eve Your handmaid; and will cut off our life from the face of the earth.

6 I therefore beg you, O God, that since You have made us come out of the garden, and have made us be in a strange land, You will not let the beasts hurt us."

7 When the Lord heard these words from Adam, He had pity on him, and felt that he had truly said that the beasts of the field would rise and devour him and Eve, because He, the Lord, was angry with the two of them on account of their transgressions.

8 Then God commanded the beasts, and the birds, and all that moves on the earth, to come to Adam and to be familiar with him, and not to trouble him and Eve; nor yet any of the good and righteous among their offspring.

9 Then all the beasts paid homage to Adam, according to the commandment of God; except the serpent, against which God was angry. It did not come to Adam, with the beasts.

Chapter VIII - The "Bright Nature" of man is taken away.

1 Then Adam cried and said, "O God, when we lived in the garden, and our hearts were lifted up, we saw the angels that sang praises in heaven, but now we can't see like we used to; no, when we entered the cave, all creation became hidden from us."

2 Then God the Lord said to Adam, "When you were under subjection to Me, you had a bright nature within you, and for that reason could you see things far away. But after your transgression your bright nature was withdrawn from you; and it was not left to you to see things far away, but only near at hand; after the ability of the flesh; for it is brutish."

3 When Adam and Eve had heard these words from God, they went their way; praising and worshipping Him with a sorrowful heart.

4 And God ceased to commune with them.

Chapter IX - Water from the Tree of Life. Adam and Eve near drowning.

1 Then Adam and Eve came out of the Cave of Treasures, and went near to the garden gate, and there they stood to look at it, and cried for having come away from it.

2 And Adam and Eve went from before the gate of the garden to the southern side of it, and found there the water that watered the garden, from the root of the Tree of Life, and that split itself from there into four rivers over the earth.

3 Then they came and went near to that water, and looked at it; and saw that it was the water that came forth from under the root of the Tree of Life in the garden.

4 And Adam cried and wailed, and beat his chest, for being severed from the garden; and said to Eve:—

5 "Why have you brought on me, on yourself, and on our descendants, so many of these plagues and punishments?"

6 And Eve said to him, "What is it you have seen that has caused you to cry and to speak to me in this manner?"

7 And he said to Eve, "Do you not see this water that was with us in the garden, that watered the trees of the garden, and flowed out from there?"

8 And we, when we were in the garden, did not care about it; but since we came to this strange land, we love it, and turn it to use for our body."

9 But when Eve heard these words from him, she cried; and from the soreness of their crying, they fell into that water; and would have put an end to themselves in it, so as never again to return and behold the creation; for when they looked at the work of creation, they felt they must put an end to themselves.

Chapter X - Their bodies need water after they leave the garden.

1 Then God, merciful and gracious, looked at them thus lying in the water, and close to death, and sent an angel, who brought them out of the water, and laid them on the seashore as dead.

2 Then the angel went up to God, was welcome, and said, "O God, Your creatures have breathed their last."

3 Then God sent His Word to Adam and Eve, who raised them from their death.

4 And Adam said, after he was raised, "O God, while we were in the garden we did not require, or care for this water; but since we came to this land we cannot do without it."

5 Then God said to Adam, "While you were under My command and were a bright angel, you knew not this water.

6 But now that you have transgressed My commandment, you can not do without water, wherein to wash your body and make it grow; for it is now like that of beasts, and is in want of water."

7 When Adam and Eve heard these words from God, they cried a bitter cry; and Adam entreated God to let him return into the garden, and look at it a second time.

8 But God said to Adam, "I have made you a promise; when that promise is fulfilled, I will bring you back into the garden, you and your righteous descendants."

9 And God ceased to commune with Adam.

1 Then Adam and Eve felt themselves burning with thirst, and heat, and sorrow.

2 And Adam said to Eve, "We shall not drink of this water, even if we were to die. O Eve, when this water comes into our inner parts, it will increase our punishments and that of our descendants."

3 Both Adam and Eve then went away from the water, and drank none of it at all; but came and entered the Cave of Treasures.

4 But when in it Adam could not see Eve; he only heard the noise she made. Neither could she see Adam, but heard the noise he made.

5 Then Adam cried, in deep affliction, and beat his chest; and he got up and said to Eve, "Where are you?"

6 And she said to him, "Look, I am standing in this darkness."

7 He then said to her, "Remember the bright nature in which we lived, when we lived in the garden!

8 O Eve! Remember the glory that rested on us in the garden. O Eve! Remember the trees that overshadowed us in the garden while we moved among them.

9 O Eve! Remember that while we were in the garden, we knew neither night nor day. Think of the Tree of Life, from below which flowed the water, and that shed lustre over us! Remember, O Eve, the garden land, and the brightness thereof!

10 Think, oh think of that garden in which was no darkness, while we lived in it.

11 Whereas no sooner did we come into this Cave of Treasures than darkness surrounded us all around; until we can no longer see each other; and all the pleasure of this life has come to an end."

Chapter XII - How darkness came between Adam and Eve.

1 Then Adam beat his chest, he and Eve, and they mourned the whole night until the crack of dawn, and they sighed over the length of the night in Miyazia.

2 And Adam beat himself, and threw himself on the ground in the cave, from bitter grief, and because of the darkness, and lay there as dead.

3 But Eve heard the noise he made in falling on the ground. And she felt about for him with her hands, and found him like a corpse.

4 Then she was afraid, speechless, and remained by him.

5 But the merciful Lord looked on the death of Adam, and on Eve's silence from fear of the darkness.

6 And the Word of God came to Adam and raised him from his death, and opened Eve's mouth that she might speak.

7 Then Adam stood up in the cave and said, "O God, why has light departed from us, and darkness covered us? Why did you leave us in this long darkness? Why do you plague us like this?

8 And this darkness, O Lord, where was it before it covered us? It is because of this that we cannot see each other.

9 For so long as we were in the garden, we neither saw nor even knew what darkness is. I was not hidden from Eve, neither was she hidden from me, until now that she cannot see me; and no darkness came over us to separate us from each other.

10 But she and I were both in one bright light. I saw her and she saw me. Yet now since we came into this cave, darkness has covered us, and separated us from each other, so that I do not see her, and she does not see me.

11 O Lord, will You then plague us with this darkness?"

Chapter XIII - The fall of Adam. Why night and day were created.

1 Then when God, who is merciful and full of pity, heard Adam's voice, He said to him:—

2 "O Adam, so long as the good angel was obedient to Me, a bright light rested on him and on his hosts.

3 But when he transgressed My commandment, I deprived him of that bright nature, and he became dark.

4 And when he was in the heavens, in the realms of light, he knew nothing of darkness.

5 But he transgressed, and I made him fall from the heaven onto the earth; and it was this darkness that came over him.

6 And on you, O Adam, while in My garden and obedient to Me, did that bright light rest also.

7 But when I heard of your transgression, I deprived you of that bright light. Yet, of My mercy, I did not turn you into darkness, but I made you your body of flesh, over which I spread this skin, in order that it may bear cold and heat.

8 If I had let My wrath fall heavily on you, I should have destroyed you; and had I turned you into darkness, it would have been as if I had killed you.

9 But in My mercy, I have made you as you are; when you transgressed My commandment, O Adam, I drove you from the garden, and made you come forth into this land; and commanded you to live in this cave; and darkness covered you, as it did over him who transgressed My commandment.

10 Thus, O Adam, has this night deceived you. It is not to last forever; but is only of twelve hours; when it is over, daylight will return.

11 Sigh not, therefore, neither be moved; and say not in your heart that this darkness is long and drags on wearily; and say not in your heart that I plague you with it.

12 Strengthen your heart, and be not afraid. This darkness is not a punishment. But, O Adam, I have made the day, and have placed the sun in it to give light; in order that you and your children should do your work.

13 For I knew you would sin and transgress, and come out into this land. Yet I wouldn't force you, nor be heard over you, nor shut up; nor doom you through your fall; nor through your coming out from light into darkness; nor yet through your coming from the garden into this land.

14 For I made you of the light; and I willed to bring out children of light from you and like to you.

15 But you did not keep My commandment one day; until I had finished the creation and blessed everything in it.

16 Then, concerning the tree, I commanded you not to eat of it. Yet I knew that Satan, who deceived himself, would also deceive you.

17 So I made known to you by means of the tree, not to come near him. And I told you not to eat of the fruit thereof, nor to taste of it, nor yet to sit under it, nor to yield to it.

18 Had I not been and spoken to you, O Adam, concerning the tree, and had I left you without a commandment, and you had sinned—it would have been an offence on My part, for not having given you any order; you would turn around and blame Me for it.

19 But I commanded you, and warned you, and you fell. So that My creatures cannot blame Me; but the blame rests on them alone.

20 And, O Adam, I have made the day so that you and your descendants can work and toil in it. And I have made the night for them to rest in it from their work; and for the beasts of the field to go forth by night and look for their food.

21 But little of darkness now remains, O Adam, and daylight will soon appear."

Chapter XIV - The earliest prophesy of the coming of Christ.

1 Then Adam said to God: "O Lord, take You my soul, and let me not see this gloom any more; or remove me to some place where there is no darkness."

2 But God the Lord said to Adam, "Indeed I say to you, this darkness will pass from you, every day I have determined for you, until the fulfillment of My covenant; when I will save you and bring you back again into the garden, into the house of light you long for, in which there is no darkness*. I will bring you to it—in the kingdom of heaven."

3 Again said God to Adam, "All this misery that you have been made to take on yourself because of your transgression, will not free you from the hand of Satan, and will not save you.

4 But I will. When I shall come down from heaven, and shall become flesh of your descendants, and take on Myself the infirmity from which you suffer, then the darkness that covered you in this cave shall cover Me in the grave, when I am in the flesh of your descendants.

5 And I, who am without years, shall be subject to the reckoning of years, of times, of months, and of days, and I shall be reckoned as one of the sons of men, in order to save you."

6 And God ceased to commune with Adam.

* Reference: John 12:46

Chapter XV - Adam and Eve grieve over the suffering of God to save them from their sins.

1 Then Adam and Eve cried and sorrowed by reason of God's word to them, that they should not return to the garden until the fulfillment of the days decreed on them; but mostly because God had told them that He should suffer for their salvation.

Chapter XVI - The first sunrise. Adam and Eve think it is a fire coming to burn them.

1 After this, Adam and Eve continued to stand in the cave, praying and crying, until the morning dawned on them.

2 And when they saw the light returned to them, they retrained from fear, and strengthened their hearts.

3 Then Adam began to come out of the cave. And when he came to the mouth of it, and stood and turned his face towards the east, and saw the sunrise in glowing rays, and felt the heat thereof on his body, he was afraid of it, and thought in his heart that this flame came forth to plague him.

4 He then cried and beat his chest, then he fell on the ground on his face and made his request, saying:—

5 "O Lord, plague me not, neither consume me, nor yet take away my life from the earth."

6 For he thought the sun was God.

7 Because while he was in the garden and heard the voice of God and the sound He made in the garden, and feared Him, Adam never saw the brilliant light of the sun, neither did its flaming heat touch his body.

8 Therefore he was afraid of the sun when flaming rays of it reached him. He thought God meant to plague him therewith all the days He had decreed for him.

9 For Adam also said in his thoughts, as God did not plague us with darkness, behold, He has caused this sun to rise and to plague us with burning heat.

10 But while he was thinking like this in his heart, the Word of God came to him and said:—

11 "O Adam, get up on your feet. This sun is not God; but it has been created to give light by day, of which I spoke to you in the cave saying, 'that the dawn would come, and there would be light by day.'

12 But I am God who comforted you in the night."

13 And God ceased to commune with Adam.

Chapter XVII - The Chapter of the Serpent.

1 The Adam and Eve came out at the mouth of the cave, and went towards the garden.

2 But as they went near it, before the western gate, from which Satan came when he deceived Adam and Eve, they found the serpent that became Satan coming at the gate, and sorrowfully licking the dust, and wiggling on its breast on the ground, by reason of the curse that fell on it from God.

3 And whereas before the serpent was the most exalted of all beasts, now it was changed and become slippery, and the meanest of them all, and it crept on its breast and went on its belly.

4 And whereas it was the fairest of all beasts, it had been changed, and was become the ugliest of them all. Instead of feeding on the best food, now it turned to eat the dust. Instead of living, as before, in the best places, now it lived in the dust.

5 And, whereas it had been the most beautiful of all beasts, all of which stood dumb at its beauty, it was now abhorred of them.

6 And, again, whereas it lived in one beautiful home, to which all other animals came from elsewhere; and where it drank, they drank also of the same; now, after it had become venomous, by reason of God's curse, all beasts fled from its home, and would not drink of the water it drank; but fled from it.

Chapter XVIII - The mortal combat with the serpent.

1 When the accursed serpent saw Adam and Eve, it swelled its head, stood on its tail, and with eyes blood-red, acted like it would kill them.

2 It made straight for Eve, and ran after her; while Adam standing by, cried because he had no stick in his hand with which to hit the serpent, and did not know how to put it to death.

3 But with a heart burning for Eve, Adam approached the serpent, and held it by the tail; when it turned towards him and said to him:—

4 "O Adam, because of you and of Eve, I am slippery, and go on my belly." Then with its great strength, it threw down Adam and Eve and squeezed them, and tried to kill them.

5 But God sent an angel who threw the serpent away from them, and raised them up.

6 Then the Word of God came to the serpent, and said to it, "The first time I made you slick, and made you to go on your belly; but I did not deprive you of speech.

7 This time, however, you will be mute, and you and your race will speak no more; because, the first time My creatures were ruined because of you, and this time you tried to kill them."

8 Then the serpent was struck mute, and was no longer able to speak.

9 And a wind blew down from heaven by the command of God and carried away the serpent from Adam and Eve, and threw it on the seashore where it landed in India.

Chapter XIX - Beasts made subject to Adam.

1 But Adam and Eve cried before God. And Adam said to Him:—

2 "O Lord, when I was in the cave, I said this to you, my Lord, the beasts of the field would rise and devour me, and cut off my life from the earth."

3 Then Adam, because of what had happened to him, beat his chest and fell on the ground like a corpse. Then the Word of God came to him, who raised him, and said to him,

4 "O Adam, not one of these beasts will be able to hurt you; because I have made the beasts and other moving things come to you in the cave. I did not let the serpent come with them because it might have risen against you and made you tremble; and the fear of it should fall into your hearts.

5 For I knew that the accursed one is wicked; therefore I would not let it come near you with the other beasts.

6 But now strengthen your heart and fear not. I am with you to the end of the days I have determined on you."

Chapter XX - Adam wishes to protect Eve.

1 Then Adam cried and said, "O God, take us away to some other place, where the serpent can not come near us again, and rise against us. For fear that it might find Your handmaid Eve alone and kill her; for its eyes are hideous and evil."

2 But God said to Adam and Eve, "From now on, don't be afraid, I will not let it come near you; I have driven it away from you, from this mountain; neither will I leave in it the ability to hurt you."

3 Then Adam and Eve worshipped before God and gave Him thanks, and praised Him for having delivered them from death.

Chapter XXI - Adam and Eve attempt suicide.

1 Then Adam and Eve went in search of the garden.

2 And the heat beat like a flame on their faces; and they sweated from the heat, and cried before the Lord.

3 But the place where they cried was close to a high mountain, facing the western gate of the garden.

4 Then Adam threw himself down from the top of that mountain; his face was torn and his flesh was ripped; he lost a lot of blood and was close to death.

5 Meanwhile Eve remained standing on the mountain crying over him, thus lying.

6 And she said, "I don't wish to live after him; for all that he did to himself was through me."

7 Then she threw herself after him; and was torn and ripped by stones; and remained lying as dead.

8 But the merciful God, who looks over His creatures, looked at Adam and Eve as they lay dead, and He sent His Word to them, and raised them.

9 And said to Adam, "O Adam, all this misery which you have brought on yourself, will have no affect against My rule, neither will it alter the covenant of the 5, 500 years."

Chapter XXII - Adam in a gracious mood.

1 Then Adam said to God, "I dry up in the heat, I am faint from walking, and I don't want to be in this world. And I don't know when You will take me out of it to rest."

2 Then the Lord God said to him, "O Adam, it cannot be now, not until you have ended your days. Then shall I bring you out of this miserable land."

3 And Adam said to God, "While I was in the garden I knew neither heat, nor languor, neither moving about, nor trembling, nor fear; but now since I came to this land, all this affliction has come over me.

4 Then God said to Adam, "So long as you were keeping My commandment, My light and My grace rested on you. But when you transgressed My commandment, sorrow and misery came to you in this land."

5 And Adam cried and said, "O Lord, do not cut me off for this, neither punish me with heavy plagues, nor yet repay me according to my sin; for we, of our own will, transgressed Your commandment, and ignored Your law, and tried to become gods like you, when Satan the enemy deceived us."

6 Then God said again to Adam, "Because you have endured fear and trembling in this land, languor and suffering, treading and walking about, going on this mountain, and dying from it, I will take all this on Myself in order to save you."

Chapter XXIII - Adam and Eve strengthen themselves and make the first altar ever built.

1 Then Adam cried more and said, "O God, have mercy on me, so far as to take on yourself, that which I will do."

2 But God withdrew His Word from Adam and Eve.

3 Then Adam and Eve stood on their feet; and Adam said to Eve, "Strengthen yourself, and I also will strengthen myself." And she strengthened herself, as Adam told her.

4 Then Adam and Eve took stones and placed them in the shape of an altar; and they took leaves from the trees outside the garden, with which they wiped, from the face of the rock, the blood they had spilled.

5 But that which had dropped on the sand, they took together with the dust with which it was mingled and offered it on the altar as an offering to God.

6 Then Adam and Eve stood under the Altar and cried, thus praying to God, "Forgive us our trespass* and our sin, and look at us with Thine eye of mercy. For when we were in the garden our praises and our hymns went up before you without ceasing.

7 But when we came into this strange land, pure praise was not longer ours, nor righteous prayer, nor understanding hearts, nor sweet thoughts, nor just counsels, nor long discernment, nor upright feelings, neither is our bright nature left us. But our body is changed from the likeness in which it was at first, when we were created.

8 Yet now look at our blood which is offered on these stones, and accept it at our hands, like the praise we used to sing to you at first, when in the garden."

9 And Adam began to make more requests of God.

* ORIGINAL OF THE LORD'S PRAYER SAID TO BE USED ABOUT 150 YEARS BEFORE OUR LORD:
Our Father, Who art in Heaven, be gracious unto us, O Lord our God, hallowed be Your Name, and let the remembrance of Thee be glorified Heaven above and upon earth here below.

Let Your kingdom reign over us now and forever. The Holy Men of old said remit and forgive unto all men whatsoever they have done unto me. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil thing; for Thine is the kingdom and Thou shalt reign in glory forever and forevermore, AMEN.

Chapter XXIV - A vivid prophecy of the life and death of Christ.

1 Then the merciful God, good and lover of men, looked at Adam and Eve, and at their blood, which they had held up as an offering to Him; without an order from Him for so doing. But He wondered at them; and accepted their offerings.

2 And God sent from His presence a bright fire, that consumed their offering.

3 He smelled the sweet savor of their offering, and showed them mercy.

4 Then came the Word of God to Adam, and said to him, "O Adam, as you have shed your blood, so will I shed My own blood when I become flesh of your descendants; and as you died, O Adam, so also will I die. And as you built an altar, so also will I make for you an altar of the earth; and as you offered your blood on it, so also will I offer My blood on an altar on the earth.

5 And as you sued for forgiveness through that blood, so also will I make My blood forgiveness of sins, and erase transgressions in it.

6 And now, behold, I have accepted your offering, O Adam, but the days of the covenant in which I have bound you are not fulfilled. When they are fulfilled, then will I bring you back into the garden.

7 Now, therefore, strengthen your heart; and when sorrow comes over you, make Me an offering, and I will be favorable to you."

Chapter XXV - God represented as merciful and loving. The establishing of worship.

1 But God knew that Adam believed he should frequently kill himself and make an offering to Him of his blood.

2 Therefore He said to him, "O Adam, don't ever kill yourself like this again, by throwing yourself down from that mountain."

3 But Adam said to God, "I was thinking to put an end to myself at once, for having transgressed Your commandments, and for my having come out of the beautiful garden; and for the bright light of which You have deprived me; and for the praises which poured forth from my mouth without ceasing, and for the light that covered me.

4 Yet of Your goodness, O God, do not get rid of me altogether; but be favorable to me every time I die, and bring me to life.

5 And thereby it will be made known that You are a merciful God, who does not want anyone to perish; who loves not that one should fall; and who does not condemn any one cruelly, badly, and by whole destruction."

6 Then Adam remained silent.

7 And the Word of God came to him, and blessed him, and comforted him, and covenanted with him, that He would save him at the end of the days determined for him.

8 This, then, was the first offering Adam made to God; and so it became his custom to do.

Chapter XXVI - A beautiful prophecy of eternal life and joy (v. 15). The fall of night.

1 Then Adam took Eve, and they began to return to the Cave of Treasures where they lived. But when they got closer to it and saw it from a distance, heavy sorrow fell on Adam and Eve when they looked at it.

2 Then Adam said to Eve, "When we were on the mountain we were comforted by the Word of God that conversed with us; and the light that came from the east shown over us.

3 But now the Word of God is hidden from us; and the light that shown over us is so changed as to disappear, and let darkness and sorrow come over us.

4 And we are forced to enter this cave which is like a prison, in which darkness covers us, so that we are separated from each other; and you can not see me, neither can I see you."

5 When Adam had said these words, they cried and spread their hands before God; for they were full of sorrow.

6 And they prayed to God to bring the sun to them, to shine on them, so that darkness would not return to them, and that they wouldn't have to go under this covering of rock. And they wished to die rather than see the darkness.

7 Then God looked at Adam and Eve and at their great sorrow, and at all they had done with a fervent heart, on account of all the trouble they were in, instead of their former well-being, and on account of all the misery that came over them in a strange land.

8 Therefore God was not angry with them; nor impatient with them; but he was patient and forbearing towards them, as towards the children He had created.

9 Then came the Word of God to Adam, and said to him, "Adam, as for the sun, if I were to take it and bring it to you, days, hours, years and months would all stop, and the covenant I have made with you, would never be fulfilled.

10 But then you would be deserted and stuck in a perpetual plague, and you would never be saved.

11 Yes, rather, bear long and calm your soul while you live night and day; until the fulfillment of the days, and the time of My covenant is come.

12 Then shall I come and save you, O Adam, for I do not wish that you be afflicted.

13 And when I look at all the good things in which you lived, and why you came out of them, then would I willingly show you mercy.

14 But I cannot alter the covenant that has gone out of My mouth; otherwise I would have brought you back into the garden.

15 When, however, the covenant is fulfilled, then shall I show you and your descendants mercy, and bring you into a land of gladness, where there is neither sorrow nor suffering; but abiding joy and gladness, and light that never fails, and praises that never cease; and a beautiful garden that shall never pass away."

16 And God said again to Adam, "Be patient and enter the cave, for the darkness, of which you were afraid, shall only be twelve hours long; and when ended, light shall come up."

17 Then when Adam heard these words from God, he and Eve worshipped before Him, and their hearts were comforted. They returned into the cave after their custom, while tears flowed from their eyes, sorrow and wailing came from their hearts, and they wished their soul would leave their body.

18 And Adam and Eve stood praying until the darkness of night came over them, and Adam was hid from Eve, and she from him.

19 And they remained standing in prayer.

Chapter XXVII - The second tempting of Adam and Eve. The devil takes on the form of a beguiling light.

1 When Satan, the hater of all good, saw how they continued in prayer, and how God communed with them, and comforted them, and how He had accepted their offering—Satan made an apparition.

2 He began with transforming his hosts; in his hands was a flashing fire, and they were in a great light.

3 He then placed his throne near the mouth of the cave because he could not enter into it by reason of their prayers. And he shed light into the cave, until the cave glistened over Adam and Eve; while his hosts began to sing praises.

4 And Satan did this, in order that when Adam saw the light, he should think within himself that it was a heavenly light, and that Satan's hosts were angels; and that God had sent them to watch at the cave, and to give him light in the darkness.

5 So that when Adam came out of the cave and saw them, and Adam and Eve bowed to Satan, then he would overcome Adam thereby, and a second time humble him before God.

6 When, therefore, Adam and Eve saw the light, fancying it was real, they strengthened their hearts; yet, as they were trembling, Adam said to Eve:—

7 "Look at that great light, and at those many songs of praise, and at that host standing outside who won't come into our cave. Why don't they tell us what they want, where they are from, what the meaning of this light is, what those praises are, why they have been sent to this place, and why they won't come in?

8 If they were from God, they would come into the cave with us, and would tell us why they were sent."

9 Then Adam stood up and prayed to God with a burning heart, and said:—

10 "O Lord, is there in the world another god besides You, who created angels and filled them with light, and sent them to keep us, who would come with them?

11 But, look, we see these hosts that stand at the mouth of the cave; they are in a great light; they sing loud praises. If they are of some other god than You, tell me; and if they are sent by you, inform me of the reason for which You have sent them."

12 No sooner had Adam said this, than an angel from God appeared to him in the cave, who said to him, "O Adam, fear not. This is Satan and his hosts; he wishes to deceive you as he deceived you at first. For the first time, he was hidden in the serpent; but this time he is come to you in the likeness of an angel of light; in order that, when you worshipped him, he might enslave you, in the very presence of God."

13 Then the angel went from Adam and seized Satan at the opening of the cave, and stripped him of the pretense he had assumed, and brought him in his own hideous form to Adam and Eve; who were afraid of him when they saw him.

14 And the angel said to Adam, "This hideous form has been his ever since God made him fall from heaven. He could not have come near you in it; he therefore transformed himself into an angel of light."

15 Then the angel drove away Satan and his hosts from Adam and Eve, and said to them, "Fear not; God who created you, will strengthen you."

16 And the angel left them.

17 But Adam and Eve remained standing in the cave; no consolation came to them; they divided in their thoughts.

18 And when it was morning they prayed; and then went out to seek the garden. For their hearts were towards it, and they could get no consolation for having left it.

Chapter XXVIII - The Devil pretends to lead Adam and Eve to the water to bathe.

1 But when the crafty Satan saw them, that they were going to the garden, he gathered together his host, and came in appearance on a cloud, intent on deceiving them.

2 But when Adam and Eve saw him thus in a vision, they thought they were angels of God come to comfort them about having left the garden, or to bring them back again into it.

3 And Adam spread his hands before God, beseeching Him to make him understand what they were.

4 Then Satan, the hater of all good, said to Adam, "O Adam, I am an angel of the great God; and, behold the hosts that surround me.

5 God has sent us to take you and bring you to the border of the garden northwards; to the shore of the clear sea, and bathe you and Eve in it, and raise you to your former gladness, that you return again to the garden."

6 These words sank into the heart of Adam and Eve.

7 Yet God withheld His Word from Adam, and did not make him understand at once, but waited to see his strength; whether he would be overcome as Eve was when in the garden, or whether he would prevail.

8 Then Satan called to Adam and Eve, and said, "Behold, we go to the sea of water," and they began to go.

9 And Adam and Eve followed them at some little distance.

10 But when they came to the mountain to the north of the garden, a very high mountain, without any steps to the top of it, the Devil drew near to Adam and Eve, and made them go up to the top in reality, and not in a vision; wishing, as he did, to throw them down and kill them, and to wipe off their name from the earth; so that this earth should remain to him and his hosts alone.

Chapter XXIX - God tells Adam of the Devil's purpose. (v. 4).

1 But when the merciful God saw that Satan wished to kill Adam with his many tricks, and saw that Adam was meek and without guile, God spoke to Satan in a loud voice, and cursed him.

2 Then he and his hosts fled, and Adam and Eve remained standing on the top of the mountain, from there they saw below them the wide world, high above which they were. But they saw none of the host which time after time were by them.

3 They cried, both Adam and Eve, before God, and begged for forgiveness of Him.

4 Then came the Word from God to Adam, and said to him, "Know you and understand concerning this Satan, that he seeks to deceive you and your descendants after you."

5 And Adam cried before the Lord God, and begged and prayed to Him to give him something from the garden, as a token to him, wherein to be comforted.

6 And God considered Adam's thought, and sent the angel Michael as far as the sea that reaches India, to take from there golden rods and bring them to Adam.

7 This did God in His wisdom in order that these golden rods, being with Adam in the cave, should shine forth with light in the night around him, and put an end to his fear of the darkness.

8 Then the angel Michael went down by God's order, took golden rods, as God had commanded him, and brought them to God.

Chapter XXX - Adam receives the first worldly goods.

1 After these things, God commanded the angel Gabriel to go down to the garden, and say to the cherub who kept it, "Behold, God has commanded me to come into the garden, and to take from it sweet smelling incense, and give it to Adam."

2 Then the angel Gabriel went down by God's order to the garden, and told the cherub as God had commanded him.

3 The cherub then said, "Well." And Gabriel went in and took the incense.

4 Then God commanded his angel Raphael to go down to the garden, and speak to the cherub about some myrrh, to give to Adam.

5 And the angel Raphael went down and told the cherub as God had commanded him, and the cherub said, "Well." Then Raphael went in and took the myrrh.

6 The golden rods were from the Indian sea, where there are precious stones. The incense was from the eastern border of the garden; and the myrrh from the western border, from where bitterness came over Adam.

7 And the angels brought these things to God, by the Tree of Life, in the garden.

8 Then God said to the angels, "Dip them in the spring of water; then take them and sprinkle their water over Adam and Eve, that they be a little comforted in their sorrow, and give them to Adam and Eve.

9 And the angels did as God had commanded them, and they gave all those things to Adam and Eve on the top of the mountain on which Satan had placed them, when he sought to make an end of them.

10 And when Adam saw the golden rods, the incense and the myrrh, he was rejoiced and cried because he thought that the gold was a token of the kingdom from where he had come, that the incense was a token of the bright light which had been taken from him, and that the myrrh was a token of the sorrow in which he was.

Chapter XXXI - They make themselves more comfortable in the Cave of Treasures on the third day.

1 After these things God said to Adam, "You asked Me for something from the garden, to be comforted therewith, and I have given you these three tokens as a consolation to you; that you trust in Me and in My covenant with you.

2 For I will come and save you; and kings shall bring me when in the flesh, gold, incense and myrrh; gold as a token of My kingdom; incense as a token of My divinity; and myrrh as a token of My suffering and of My death.

3 But, O Adam, put these by you in the cave; the gold that it may shed light over you by night; the incense, that you smell its sweet savor; and the myrrh, to comfort you in your sorrow."

4 When Adam heard these words from God, he worshipped before Him. He and Eve worshipped Him and gave Him thanks, because He had dealt mercifully with them.

5 Then God commanded the three angels, Michael, Gabriel and Raphael, each to bring what he had brought, and give it to Adam. And they did so, one by one.

6 And God commanded Suriyel and Salathiel to bear up Adam and Eve, and bring them down from the top of the high mountain, and to take them to the Cave of Treasures.

7 There they laid the gold on the south side of the cave, the incense on the eastern side, and the myrrh on the western side. For the mouth of the cave was on the north side.

8 The angels then comforted Adam and Eve, and departed.

9 The gold was seventy rods*; the incense, twelve pounds; and the myrrh, three pounds.

10 These remained by Adam in the Cave of Treasures.

11 God gave these three things to Adam on the third day after he had come out of the garden, in token of the three days the Lord should remain in the heart of the earth.

12 And these three things, as they continued with Adam in the cave, gave him light by night; and by day they gave him a little relief from his sorrow.

* A rod is a unit of linear measure equivalent to 5.5 yards and also a unit of area measure equivalent to 30.25 square yards. In this case, the word rod simply means a kind of long, thin piece of gold of unspecified size and weight.

 This is the original text which appears to contain embedded editorial content: "These remained by Adam in the House of Treasures; therefore was it called 'of concealment.' But other interpreters say it was called the 'Cave of Treasures,' by reason of the bodies of righteous men that were in it.

Chapter XXXII - Adam and Eve go into the water to pray.

1 And Adam and Eve remained in the Cave of Treasures until the seventh day; they neither ate of the fruit the earth, nor drank water.

2 And when it dawned on the eighth day, Adam said to Eve, "O Eve, we prayed God to give us something from the garden, and He sent his angels who brought us what we had desired.

3 But now, get up, let us go to the sea of water we saw at first, and let us stand in it, praying that God will again be favorable to us and take us back to the garden; or give us something; or that He will give us comfort in some other land than this in which we are."

4 Then Adam and Eve came out of the cave, went and stood on the border of the sea in which they had before thrown themselves, and Adam said to Eve:—

5 Come, go down into this place, and come not out of it until the end of thirty days, when I shall come to you. And pray to God with burning heart and a sweet voice, to forgive us.

6 And I will go to another place, and go down into it, and do like you."

7 Then Eve went down into the water, as Adam had commanded her. Adam also went down into the water; and they stood praying; and besought the Lord to forgive them their offense, and to restore them to their former state.

8 And they stood like that praying, until the end of the thirty-five days.

Chapter XXXIII - Satan falsely promises the "bright light."

1 But Satan, the hater of all good, sought them in the cave, but found them not, although he searched diligently for them.

2 But he found them standing in the water praying and thought within himself, "Adam and Eve are standing like that in that water praying to God to forgive them their transgression, and to restore them to their former state, and to take them from under my hand.

3 But I will deceive them so that they shall come out of the water, and not fulfil their vow."

4 Then the hater of all good, went not to Adam, but he went to Eve, and took the form of an angel of God, praising and rejoicing, and said to her:—

5 "Peace be to you! Be glad and rejoice! God is favorable to you, and He sent me to Adam. I have brought him the glad tidings of salvation, and of his being filled with bright light as he was at first.

6 And Adam, in his joy for his restoration, has sent me to you, that you come to me, in order that I crown you with light like him.

7 And he said to me, 'Speak to Eve; if she does not come with you, tell her of the sign when we were on the top of the mountain; how God sent his angels who took us and brought us to the Cave of Treasures; and laid the gold on the southern side; incense, on the eastern side; and myrrh on the western side.' Now come to him."

8 When Eve hear these words from him, she rejoiced greatly. And thinking Satan's appearance was real, she came out of the sea.

9 He went before, and she followed him until they came to Adam. Then Satan hid himself from her, and she saw him no more.

10 She then came and stood before Adam, who was standing by the water and rejoicing in God's forgiveness.

11 And as she called to him, he turned around, found her there and cried when he saw her, and beat his chest; and from the bitterness of his grief, he sank into the water.

12 But God looked at him and at his misery, and at his being about to breathe his last. And the Word of God came from heaven, raised him out of the water, and said to him, "Go up the high bank to Eve." And when he came up to Eve he said to her, "Who told you to come here?"

13 Then she told him the discourse of the angel who had appeared to her and had given her a sign.

14 But Adam grieved, and gave her to know it was Satan. He then took her and they both returned to the cave.

15 These things happened to them the second time they went down to the water, seven days after their coming out of the garden.

16 They fasted in the water thirty-five days; altogether forty-two days since they had left the garden.

Chapter XXXIV - Adam recalls the creation of Eve. He eloquently appeals for food and drink.

1 And on the morning of the forty-third day, they came out of the cave, sorrowful and crying. Their bodies were lean, and they were parched from hunger and thirst, from fasting and praying, and from their heavy sorrow on account of their transgression.

2 And when they had come out of the cave they went up the mountain to the west of the garden.

3 There they stood and prayed and besought God to grant them forgiveness of their sins.

4 And after their prayers Adam began to beg God, saying, "O my Lord, my God, and my Creator, You commanded the four elements* to be gathered together, and they were gathered together by Thine order.

5 Then You spread Your hand and created me out of one element, that of dust of the earth; and You brought me into the garden at the third hour, on a Friday, and informed me of it in the cave.

6 Then, at first, I knew neither night nor day, for I had a bright nature; neither did the light in which I lived ever leave me to know night or day.

7 Then, again, O Lord, in that third hour in which You created me, You brought to me all beasts, and lions, and ostriches, and fowls of the air, and all things that move in the earth, which You had created at the first hour before me of the Friday.

8 And Your will was that I should name them all, one by one, with a suitable name. But You gave me understanding and knowledge, and a pure heart and a right mind from you, that I should name them after Thine own mind regarding the naming of them.

9 O God, You made them obedient to me, and ordered that not one of them break from my sway, according to Your commandment, and to the dominion which You had given me over them. But now they are all estranged from me.

10 Then it was in that third hour of Friday, in which You created me, and commanded me concerning the tree, to which I was neither to go near, nor to eat thereof; for You said to me in the garden, 'When you eat of it, of death you shall die.'

11 And if You had punished me as You said, with death, I should have died that very moment.

12 Moreover, when You commanded me regarding the tree, I was neither to approach nor to eat thereof, Eve was not with me; You had not yet created her, neither had You yet taken her out of my side; nor had she yet heard this order from you.

13 Then, at the end of the third hour of that Friday, O Lord, You caused a slumber and a sleep to come over me, and I slept, and was overwhelmed in sleep.

14 Then You drew a rib out of my side, and created it after my own likeness and image. Then I awoke; and when I saw her and knew who she was, I said, 'This is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh; from now on she shall be called woman.'

15 It was of Your good will, O God, that You brought a slumber in a sleep over me, and that You immediately brought Eve out of my side, until she was out, so that I did not see how she was made; neither could I witness, O my Lord, how awful and great are Your goodness and glory.

16 And of Your goodwill, O Lord, You made us both with bodies of a bright nature, and You made us two, one; and You gave us Your grace, and filled us with praises of the Holy Spirit; that we should be neither hungry nor thirsty, nor know what sorrow is, nor yet faintness of heart; neither suffering, fasting nor weariness.

17 But now, O God, since we transgressed Your commandment and broke Your law, You have brought us out into a strange land, and have caused suffering, and faintness, hunger and thirst to come over us.

18 Now, therefore, O God, we pray you, give us something to eat from the garden, to satisfy our hunger with it; and something wherewith to quench our thirst.

19 For, behold, many days, O God, we have tasted nothing and drunk nothing, and our flesh is dried up, and our strength is wasted, and sleep is gone from our eyes from faintness and crying.

20 Then, O God, we dare not gather anything from the fruit of trees, from fear of you. For when we transgress at first You spared us and did not make us die.

21 But now, we thought in our hearts, if we eat of the fruit of the trees, without God's order, He will destroy us this time, and will wipe us off from the face of the earth.

22 And if we drink of this water, without God's order, He will make an end of us and root us up at once.

23 Now, therefore, O God, that I am come to this place with Eve, we beg You to give us some fruit from the garden, that we may be satisfied with it.

24 For we desire the fruit that is on the earth, and all else that we lack in it."

* The medieval belief that there were only four elements—fire, earth, air, and water—was widely accepted until about 1500 AD when the current atomic theory was in its infancy.

Chapter XXXV - God's reply.

1 Then God looked again at Adam and his crying and groaning, and the Word of God came to him, and said to him:—

2 "O Adam, when you were in My garden, you knew neither eating nor drinking; neither faintness nor suffering; neither leanness of flesh, nor change; neither did sleep depart from thine eyes. But since you transgressed, and came into this strange land, all these trials are come over you."

Chapter XXXVI - Figs.

1 Then God commanded the cherub, who kept the gate of the garden with a sword of fire in his hand, to take some of the fruit of the fig-tree, and to give it to Adam.

2 The cherub obeyed the command of the Lord God, and went into the garden and brought two figs on two twigs, each fig hanging to its leaf; they were from two of the trees among which Adam and Eve hid themselves when God went to walk in the garden, and the Word of God came to Adam and Eve and said to them, "Adam, Adam, where are you?"

3 And Adam answered, "O God, here I am. When I heard the sound of You and Your voice, I hid myself, because I am naked."

4 Then the cherub took two figs and brought them to Adam and Eve. But he threw them to them from a distance; for they might not come near the cherub by reason of their flesh, that could not come near the fire.

5 At first, angels trembled at the presence of Adam and were afraid of him. But now Adam trembled before the angels and was afraid of them.

6 Then Adam came closer and took one fig, and Eve also came in turn and took the other.

7 And as they took them up in their hands, they looked at them, and knew they were from the trees among which they had hidden themselves.

Chapter XXXVII - Forty-three days of penance do not redeem one hour of sin (v. 6).

1 Then Adam said to Eve, "Do you not see these figs and their leaves, with which we covered ourselves when we were stripped of our bright nature? But now, we do not know what misery and suffering may come over us from eating them.

2 Now, therefore, O Eve, let us restrain ourselves and not eat of them, you and I; and let us ask God to give us of the fruit of the Tree of Life."

3 Thus did Adam and Eve restrain themselves, and did not eat of these figs.

4 But Adam began to pray to God and to beseech Him to give him of the fruit of the Tree of Life, saying thus: "O God, when we transgressed Your commandment at the sixth hour of Friday, we were stripped of the bright nature we had, and did not continue in the garden after our transgression, more than three hours.

5 But in the evening You made us come out of it. O God, we transgressed against You one hour, and all these trials and sorrows have come over us until this day.

6 And those days together with this the forty-third day, do not redeem that one hour in which we transgressed!

7 O God, look at us with an eye of pity, and do not avenge us according to our transgression of Your commandment, in Your presence.

8 O God, give us of the fruit of the Tree of Life, that we may eat of it, and live, and turn not to see sufferings and other trouble, in this earth; for You are God.

9 When we transgressed Your commandment, You made us come out of the garden, and sent a cherub to keep the Tree of Life, lest we should eat thereof, and live; and know nothing of faintness after we transgressed.

10 But now, O Lord, behold, we have endured all these days, and have borne sufferings. Make these forty-three days an equivalent for the one hour in which we transgressed."

Chapter XXXVIII - "When 5500 years are fulfilled..."

1 After these things the Word of God came to Adam, and said to him:—

2 "O Adam, as to the fruit on the Tree of Life that you have asked for, I will not give it to you now, but only when the 5500 years are fulfilled. At that time I will give you fruit from the Tree of Life, and you will eat, and live forever, you, and Eve, and your righteous descendants.

3 But these forty-three days cannot make amends for the hour in which you transgressed My commandment.

4 O Adam, I gave you the fruit of the fig-tree to eat in which you hid yourself. Go and eat of it, you and Eve.

5 I will not deny your request, neither will I disappoint your hope; therefore, endure until the fulfillment of the covenant I made with you."

6 And God withdrew His Word from Adam.

Chapter XXXIX - Adam is cautious—but too late.

1 Then Adam returned to Eve, and said to her, "Get up, and take a fig for yourself, and I will take another; and let us go to our cave."

2 Then Adam and Eve took each a fig and went towards the cave; the time was about the setting of the sun; and their thoughts made them long to eat of the fruit.

3 But Adam said to Eve, "I am afraid to eat of this fig. I know not what may come over me from it."

4 So Adam cried, and stood praying before God, saying, "Satisfy my hunger, without my having to eat this fig; for after I have eaten it, what will it profit me? And what shall I desire and ask of you, O God, when it is gone?"

5 And he said again, "I am afraid to eat of it; for I know not what will befall me through it."

Chapter XL - The first Human hunger.

1 Then the Word of God came to Adam, and said to him, "O Adam, why didn't you have this dread, or this fasting, or this care before now? And why didn't you have this fear before you transgressed?"

2 But when you came to live in this strange land, your animal body could not survive on earth without earthly food, to strengthen it and to restore its powers."

3 And God withdrew His Word for Adam.

Chapter XLI - The first Human thirst.

1 Then Adam took the fig, and laid it on the golden rods. Eve also took her fig, and put it on the incense.

2 And the weight of each fig was that of a water-melon; for the fruit of the garden was much larger than the fruit of this land*.

3 But Adam and Eve remained standing and fasting the whole of that night, until the morning dawned.

4 When the sun rose they were still praying, but after they had finished praying, Adam said to Eve:—

5 "O Eve, come, let us go to the border of the garden looking south; to the place from where the river flows, and is parted into four heads. There we will pray to God, and ask Him to give us some of the Water of Life to drink.

6 For God has not fed us with the Tree of Life, in order that we may not live. Therefore, we will ask him to give us some of the Water of Life, and to quench our thirst with it, rather than with a drink of water of this land."

7 When Eve heard these words from Adam, she agreed; and they both got up and came to the southern border of the garden, at the edge of the river of water a short distance from the garden.

8 And they stood and prayed before the Lord, and asked Him to look at them this once, to forgive them, and to grant them their request.

9 After this prayer from both of them, Adam began to pray with his voice before God, and said;—

10 "O Lord, when I was in the garden and saw the water that flowed from under the Tree of Life, my heart did not desire, neither did my body require to drink of it; neither did I know thirst, for I was living; and above that which I am now.

11 So that in order to live I did not require any Food of Life, neither did I drink of the Water of Life.

12 But now, O God, I am dead; my flesh is parched with thirst. Give me of the Water of Life that I may drink of it and live.

13 Of Your mercy, O God, save me from these plagues and trials, and bring me into another land different from this, if You will not let me live in Your garden."

* This is substantiated by Genesis 3:7 whereby the leaves of the fig tree were large enough that Adam and Eve could fashion garments from them.

Chapter XLII - A promise of the Water of Life. The third prophecy of the coming of Christ.

1 Then came the Word of God to Adam, and said to him:—

2 "O Adam, as to what you said, 'Bring me into a land where there is rest,' it is not another land than this, but it is the kingdom of heaven where alone there is rest.

3 But you can not make your entrance into it at present; but only after your judgment is past and fulfilled.

4 Then will I make you go up into the kingdom of heaven, you and your righteous descendants; and I will give you and them the rest you ask for at present.

5 And if you said, 'Give me of the Water of Life that I may drink and live'—it cannot be this day, but on the day that I shall descend into hell, and break the gates of brass, and bruise in pieces the kingdoms of iron.

6 Then will I in mercy save your soul and the souls of the righteous, to give them rest in My garden. And that shall be when the end of the world is come.

7 And, again, in regards to the Water of Life you seek, it will not be granted you this day; but on the day that I shall shed My blood on your head* in the land of Golgotha.

8 For My blood shall be the Water of Life to you at that time, and not to just you alone, but to all your descendants who shall believe in Me; that it be to them for rest forever."

9 The Lord said again to Adam, "O Adam, when you were in the garden, these trials did not come to you.

10 But since you transgressed My commandment, all these sufferings have come over you.

11 Now, also, does your flesh require food and drink; drink then of that water that flows by you on the face of the earth.

12 Then God withdrew His Word from Adam.

13 And Adam and Eve worshipped the Lord, and returned from the river of water to the cave. It was noon-day; and when they drew near to the cave, they saw a large fire by it.

* This phrase indicates that the bleeding will take place in an elevated position above the populace. This is believed to be a reference to the cross whereby Christ bled profusely above the people below.

 Golgotha (goal-goth-uh) was the hill outside the walls of Jerusalem where Jesus was crucified. Its exact location is not precisely known, but the Church of the Holy Sepulcher is believed to have been constructed on this hill.

 Reference: John 6:25 and 7:38

Chapter XLIII - The Devil attempts arson.

1 Then Adam and Eve were afraid, and stood still. And Adam said to Eve, "What is that fire by our cave? We have done nothing in it to cause this fire.

2 We neither have bread to bake therein, nor broth to cook there. As to this fire, we have never known anything like it, neither do we know what to call it.

3 But ever since God sent the cherub with a sword of fire that flashed and lightened in his hand, from fear of which we fell down and were like corpses, have we not seen the like.

4 But now, O Eve, behold, this is the same fire that was in the cherub's hand, which God has sent to keep the cave in which we live.

5 O Eve, it is because God is angry with us, and will drive us from it.

6 O Eve, we have again transgressed His commandment in that cave, so that He had sent this fire to burn around it, and to prevent us from going into it.

7 If this be really so, O Eve, where shall we live? And where shall we flee from before the face of the Lord? Since, in regards to the garden, He will not let us live in it, and He has deprived us of the good things thereof; but He has placed us in this cave, in which we have borne darkness, trials and hardships, until at last we have found comfort therein.

8 But now that He has brought us out into another land, who knows what may happen in it? And who knows but that the darkness of that land may be far greater than the darkness of this land?

9 Who knows what may happen in that land by day or by night? And who knows whether it will be far or near, O Eve? Where it will please God to put us, may be far from the garden, O Eve? Or where God will prevent us from beholding Him, because we have transgressed His commandment, and because we have made requests of Him at all times?

10 O Eve, if God will bring us into a strange land other than this, in which we find consolation, it must be to put our souls to death, and blot out our name from the face of the earth.

11 O Eve, if we are further alienated from the garden and from God, where shall we find Him again, and ask Him to give us gold, incense, myrrh, and some fruit of the fig-tree?

12 Where shall we find Him, to comfort us a second time? Where shall we find Him, that He may think of us, as regards the covenant He has made on our behalf?"

13 Then Adam said no more. And they kept looking, He and Eve, towards the cave, and at the fire that flared up around it.

14 But that fire was from Satan. For he had gathered trees and dry grasses, and had carried and brought them to the cave, and had set fire to them, in order to consume the cave and what was in it.

15 So that Adam and Eve should be left in sorrow, and he should cut off their trust in God, and make them deny Him.

16 But by the mercy of God he could not burn the cave, for God sent His angel around the cave to guard it from such a fire, until it went out.

17 And this fire lasted from noon-day until the break of day. That was the forty-fifth day.

Chapter XLIV - The power of fire over man.

1 Yet Adam and Eve were standing and looking at the fire, and unable to come near the cave from their dread of the fire.

2 And Satan kept on bringing trees and throwing them into the fire, until the flames of the fire rose up on high, and covered the whole cave, thinking, as he did in his own mind, to consume the cave with much fire. But the angel of the Lord was guarding it.

3 And yet he could not curse Satan, nor injure him by word, because he had no authority over him, neither did he take to doing so with words from his mouth.

4 Therefore the angel tolerated him, without saying one bad word, until the Word of God came who said to Satan, "Go away from here; once before you deceived My servants, and this time you seek to destroy them.

5 Were it not for My mercy I would have destroyed you and your hosts from off the earth. But I have had patience with you, until the end of the world."

6 Then Satan fled from before the Lord. But the fire went on burning around the cave like a coal-fire the whole day; which was the forty-sixth day Adam and Eve had spent since they came out of the garden.

7 And when Adam and Eve saw that the heat of the fire had somewhat cooled down, they began to walk towards the cave to get into it as they usually did; but they could not, by reason of the heat of the fire.

8 Then they both began crying because of the fire that separated them from the cave, and that came towards them, burning. And they were afraid.

9 Then Adam said to Eve, "See this fire of which we have a portion in us: which formerly yielded to us, but no longer does so, now that we have transgressed the limit of creation, and changed our condition, and our nature is altered. But the fire is not changed in its nature, nor altered from its creation. Therefore it now has power over us; and when we come near it, it scorches our flesh."

1 Then Adam rose and prayed to God, saying, "See, this fire has separated us from the cave in which You have commanded us to live; but now, behold, we cannot go into it."

2 Then God heard Adam, and sent him His Word, that said:—

3 "O Adam, see this fire! How different the flame and heat thereof are from the garden of delights and the good things in it!

4 When you were under My control, all creatures yielded to you; but after you have transgressed My commandment, they all rise over you."

5 God said again to him, "See, O Adam, how Satan has exalted you! He has deprived you of the Godhead, and of an exalted state like Me, and has not kept his word to you; but has, after all, become your enemy. He is the one who made this fire in which he meant to burn you and Eve.

6 Why, O Adam, has he not kept his agreement with you, not even one day; but has deprived you of the glory that was on you—when you yielded to his command?

7 Do you think, Adam, that he loved you when he made this agreement with you? Or that he loved you and wished to raise you on high?

8 But no, Adam, he did not do all that out of love to you; but he wished to make you come out of light into darkness; and from an exalted state to degradation; from glory to abasement; from joy to sorrow; and from rest to fasting and fainting."

9 God also said to Adam, "See this fire kindled by Satan around your cave; see this wonder that surrounds you; and know that it will encompass about both you and your descendants, when you obey his command; that he will plague you with fire; and that you will go down into hell after you are dead.

10 Then you will see the burning of his fire, that will be burning around you and likewise your descendants. You will not be delivered from it until My coming; just like you cannot go into your cave right now because of the great fire around it; not until My Word comes and makes a way for you on the day My covenant is fulfilled.

11 There is no way for you at present to come from this life to rest, not until My Word comes, who is My Word. Then He will make a way for you, and you shall have rest." Then God called with His Word to the fire that burned around the cave, that it split itself in half, until Adam had gone through it. Then the fire parted itself by God's order, and a way was made for Adam*.

12 And God withdrew His Word from Adam.

* Reference: Exodus 14:21,22 and Joshua 3:15-17

Chapter XLVI - "How many times have I delivered you out of his hand . . ."

1 Then Adam and Eve began again to come into the cave. And when they came to the way between the fire, Satan blew into the fire like a whirlwind, and caused the burning coal-fire to cover Adam and Eve; so that their bodies were singed; and the coal-fire scorched them*.

2 And from the burning of the fire Adam and Eve screamed, and said, "O Lord, save us! Leave us not to be consumed and plagued by this burning fire; neither require us for having transgressed Your commandment."

3 Then God looked at their bodies, on which Satan had caused fire to burn, and God sent His angel that stayed the burning fire. But the wounds remained on their bodies.

4 And God said to Adam, "See Satan's love for you, who pretended to give you the Godhead and greatness; and, behold, he burns you with fire, and seeks to destroy you from off the earth.

5 Then look at Me, O Adam; I created you, and how many times have I delivered you out of his hand? If not, wouldn't he have destroyed you?"

6 God said again to Eve, "What is that he promised you in the garden, saying, 'As soon as you eat from the tree, your eyes will be opened, and you shall become like gods, knowing good and evil.' But look! He has burnt your bodies with fire, and has made you taste the taste of fire, for the taste of the garden; and has made you see the burning of fire, and the evil of it, and the power it has over you.

7 Your eyes have seen the good he has taken from you, and in truth he has opened your eyes; and you have seen the garden in which you were with Me, and you have also seen the evil that has come over you from Satan. But as to the Godhead he cannot give it to you, neither fulfil his speech to you. No, he was bitter against you and your descendants, that will come after you."

8 And God withdrew His Word from them.

* At this time, the garments that the Lord had given them in Genesis 3:21 were burned off so that Adam and Eve were again naked. Reference chapter L whereby Adam and Eve seek garments with which to cover their nakedness..

Chapter XLVII - The Devil's own Scheming.

1 Then Adam and Eve came into the cave, yet trembling at the fire that had scorched their bodies. So Adam said to Eve:—

2 "Look, the fire has burnt our flesh in this world; but how will it be when we are dead, and Satan shall punish our souls? Is not our deliverance long and far off, unless God come, and in mercy to us fulfil His promise?"

3 Then Adam and Eve passed into the cave, blessing themselves for coming into it once more. For it was in their thoughts, that they never should enter it, when they saw the fire around it.

4 But as the sun was setting the fire was still burning and nearing Adam and Eve in the cave, so that they could not sleep in it. After the sun had set, they went out of it. This was the forty-seventh day after they came out of the garden.

5 Adam and Eve then came under the top of hill by the garden to sleep, as they were accustomed.

6 And they stood and prayed God to forgive them their sins, and then fell asleep under the summit of the mountain.

7 But Satan, the hater of all good, thought within himself: "Whereas God has promised salvation to Adam by covenant, and that He would deliver him out of all the hardships that have befallen him—but has not promised me by covenant, and will not deliver me out of my hardships; no, since He has promised him that He should make him and his descendants live in the kingdom in which I once was—I will kill Adam.

8 The earth shall be rid of him; and shall be left to me alone; so that when he is dead he may not have any descendants left to inherit the kingdom that shall remain my own realm; God will then be wanting me, and He will restore it to me and my hosts."

Chapter XLVIII - Fifth apparition of Satan to Adam and Eve.

1 After this Satan called to his hosts, all of which came to him, and said to him:—

2 "O, our lord, what will you do?"

3 He then said to them, "You know that this Adam, whom God created out of the dust, is the one who has taken our kingdom, come, let us gather together and kill him; or hurl a rock at him and at Eve, and crush them under it."

4 When Satan's hosts heard these words, they came to the part of the mountain where Adam and Eve were asleep.

5 Then Satan and his host took a huge rock, broad and even, and without blemish, thinking within himself, "If there should be a hole in the rock, when it fell on them, the hole in the rock might come over them, and so they would escape and not die."

6 He then said to his hosts, "Take up this stone, and throw it flat on them, so that it doesn't roll off them to somewhere else. And when you have hurled it, get away from there quickly."

7 And they did as he told them. But as the rock fell down from the mountain toward Adam and Eve, God commanded the rock to become a dome over them*, that did them no harm. And so it was by God's order.

8 But when the rock fell, the whole earth quaked with it, and was shaken from the size of the rock.

9 And as it quaked and shook, Adam and Eve awoke from sleep, and found themselves under a dome of rock. But they didn't know what had happened; because when they fell asleep they were under the sky, and not under a dome; and when they saw it, they were afraid.

10 Then Adam said to Eve, "Wherefore has the mountain bent itself, and the earth quaked and shaken on our account? And why has this rock spread itself over us like a tent?

11 Does God intend to plague us and to shut us up in this prison? Or will He close the earth over us?

12 He is angry with us for our having come out of the cave, without His order; and for our having done so of our own accord, without consulting Him, when we left the cave and came to this place."

13 Then Eve said, "If, indeed, the earth quaked for our sake, and this rock forms a tent over us because of our transgression, then we will be sorry, O Adam, because our punishment will be long.

14 But get up and pray to God to let us know concerning this, and what this rock is that is spread over us like a tent."

15 Then Adam stood up and prayed before the Lord, to let him know what had brought about this difficult time. And Adam stood praying like that until the morning.

* The word "dome" is used here but the text does not specifically suggest that the covering was round—only that it covered them on all sides, however a dome is the most likely shape that would have been able to withstand the impact with the ground. From verse 9 that says "when they saw it" and verse 11 that says "shut us up in this prison", we can conclude that the dome had holes in its sides that were big enough to let in light and air but were too small to allow Adam and Eve to escape. Another conclusion would be that the holes were large but too high up for Adam and Eve to reach, however the former is more likely.

 In verse 7 of the next chapter (XLIX), God tells Adam and Eve that the ground was also lowered under them—"I commanded ... the rock under you to lower itself".

Chapter XLIX - The first prophecy of the Resurrection.

1 Then the Word of God came and said:—

2 "O Adam, who counselled you, when you came out of the cave, to come to this place?"

3 And Adam said to God, "O Lord, we came to this place because of the heat of the fire, that came over us inside the cave."

4 Then the Lord God said to Adam, "O Adam, you dread the heat of fire for one night, but how will it be when you live in hell?

5 Yet, O Adam, don't be afraid, and don't believe that I have placed this dome of rock over you to plague you with it.

6 It came from Satan, who had promised you the Godhead and majesty. It is he who threw down this rock to kill you under it, and Eve with you, and thus to prevent you from living on the earth.

7 But, in mercy for you, just as that rock was falling down on you, I commanded it to form an dome over you; and the rock under you to lower itself.

8 And this sign, O Adam, will happen to Me at My coming on earth: Satan will raise the people of the Jews to put Me to death; and they will lay Me in a rock, and seal a large stone over Me, and I shall remain within that rock three days and three nights.

9 But on the third day I shall rise again, and it shall be salvation to you, O Adam, and to your descendants, to believe in Me. But, O Adam, I will not bring you from under this rock until three days and three nights have passed."

10 And God withdrew His Word from Adam.

11 But Adam and Eve lived under the rock three days and three nights, as God had told them.

12 And God did so to them because they had left their cave and had come to this same place without God's order.

13 But, after three days and three nights, God created an opening in the dome of rock and allowed them to get out from under it. Their flesh was dried up, and their eyes and hearts were troubled from crying and sorrow.

Chapter L - Adam and Eve seek to cover their nakedness.

1 Then Adam and Eve went forth and came into the Cave of Treasures, and they stood praying in it the whole of that day, until the evening.

2 And this took place at the end of the fifty days after they had left the garden.

3 But Adam and Eve rose again and prayed to God in the cave the whole of that night, and begged for mercy from Him.

4 And when the day dawned, Adam said to Eve, "Come! Let us go and do some work for our bodies."

5 So they went out of the cave, and came to the northern border of the garden, and they looked for something to cover their bodies with*. But they found nothing, and knew not how to do the work. Yet their bodies were stained, and they were speechless from cold and heat.

6 Then Adam stood and asked God to show him something with which to cover their bodies.

7 Then came the Word of God and said to him, "O Adam, take Eve and come to the seashore where you fasted before. There you will find skins of sheep that were left after lions ate the carcasses. Take them and make garments for yourselves, and clothe yourselves with them.

* Chapter XLVI, verse 1, says "Satan blew into the fire ... so that their bodies were singed". At this time, the garments that the Lord had given them in Genesis 3:21 were burned off so that Adam and Eve were again naked.

Chapter LI - "What is his beauty that you should have followed him?"

1 When Adam heard these words from God, he took Eve and went from the northern end of the garden to the south of it, by the river of water where they once fasted.

2 But as they were going on their way, and before they got there, Satan, the wicked one, had heard the Word of God communing with Adam respecting his covering.

3 It grieved him, and he hastened to the place where the sheep-skins were, with the intention of taking them and throwing them into the sea, or of burning them with fire, so that Adam and Eve would not find them.

4 But as he was about to take them, the Word of God came from heaven, and bound him by the side of those skins until Adam and Eve came near him. But as they got closer to him they were afraid of him, and of his hideous look.

5 Then came the Word of God to Adam and Eve, and said to them, "This is he who was hidden in the serpent, and who deceived you, and stripped you of the garment of light and glory in which you were.

6 This is he who promised you majesty and divinity. Where, then, is the beauty that was on him? Where is his divinity? Where is his light? Where is the glory that rested on him?

7 Now his figure is hideous; he is become abominable among angels; and he has come to be called Satan.

8 O Adam, he wished to take from you this earthly garment of sheep-skins, and to destroy it, and not let you be covered with it.

9 What, then, is his beauty that you should have followed him? And what have you gained by obeying him? See his evil works and then look at Me; at Me, your Creator, and at the good deeds I do you.

10 See, I bound him until you came and saw him and beheld his weakness, that no power is left with him."

11 And God released him from his bonds.

Chapter LII - Adam and Eve sew the first shirt.

1 After this Adam and Eve said no more, but cried before God on account of their creation, and of their bodies that required an earthly covering.

2 Then Adam said to Eve, "O Eve, this is the skin of beasts with which we shall be covered, but when we put it on, behold, we shall be wearing a token of death on our bodies. Just as the owners of these skins have died and have wasted away, so also shall we die and pass away."

3 Then Adam and Eve took the skins, and went back to the Cave of Treasures; and when in it, they stood and prayed as they were accustomed.

4 And they thought how they could make garments of those skins; for they had no skill for it.

5 Then God sent to them His angel to show them how to work it out. And the angel said to Adam, "Go forth, and bring some palm-thorns." Then Adam went out, and brought some, as the angel had commanded him.

6 Then the angel began before them to work out the skins, after the manner of one who prepares a shirt. And he took the thorns and stuck them into the skins, before their eyes.

7 Then the angel again stood up and prayed God that the thorns in those skins should be hidden, so as to be, as it were, sewn with one thread.

8 And so it was, by God's order; they became garments for Adam and Eve, and He clothed them therewith.

9 From that time the nakedness of their bodies was covered from the sight of each other's eyes.

10 And this happened at the end of the fifty-first day.

11 Then when Adam's and Eve's bodies were covered, they stood and prayed, and sought mercy of the Lord, and forgiveness, and gave Him thanks for that He had had mercy on them, and had covered their nakedness. And they ceased not from prayer the whole of that night.

12 Then when the morning dawned at the rising of the sun, they said their prayers after their custom; and then went out of the cave.

13 And Adam said to Eve, "Since we don't know what there is to the west of this cave, let us go out and see it today." Then they came forth and went toward the western border.

Chapter LIII - The prophecy of the Western Lands and of the great flood.

1 They were not very far from the cave, when Satan came towards them, and hid himself between them and the cave, under the form of two ravenous lions three days without food, that came towards Adam and Eve, as if to break them in pieces and devour them.

2 Then Adam and Eve cried, and prayed God to deliver them from their paws.

3 Then the Word of God came to them, and drove away the lions from them.

4 And God said to Adam, "O Adam, what do you seek on the western border? And why have you left of thine own accord the eastern border, in which was your living place?"

5 Now then, turn back to your cave, and remain in it, so that Satan won't deceive you or work his purpose over you.

6 For in this western border, O Adam, there will go from you a descendant, that shall replenish it; and that will defile themselves with their sins, and with their yielding to the commands of Satan, and by following his works.

7 Therefore will I bring over them the waters of a flood, and overwhelm them all. But I will deliver what is left of the righteous among them; and I will bring them to a distant land, and the land in which you live now shall remain desolate and without one inhabitant in it.

8 After God had thus spoken to them, they went back to the Cave of Treasures. But their flesh was dried up, and they were weak from fasting and praying, and from the sorrow they felt at having trespassed against God.

Chapter LIV - Adam and Eve go exploring.

1 Then Adam and Eve stood up in the cave and prayed the whole of that night until the morning dawned. And when the sun was risen they both went out of the cave; their heads were wandering from heaviness of sorrow and they didn't know where they were going.

2 And they walked in that condition to the southern border of the garden. And they began to go up that border until they came to the eastern border beyond which there was no more land.

3 And the cherub who guarded the garden was standing at the western gate, and guarding it against Adam and Eve, lest they should suddenly come into the garden. And the cherub turned around, as if to put them to death; according to the commandment God had given him.

4 When Adam and Eve came to the eastern border of the garden—thinking in their hearts that the cherub was not watching—as they were standing by the gate as if wishing to go in, suddenly came the cherub with a flashing sword of fire in his hand; and when he saw them, he went forth to kill them. For he was afraid that God would destroy him if they went into the garden without His order.

5 And the sword of the cherub seemed to shoot flames a distance away from it. But when he raised it over Adam and Eve, the flame of the sword did not flash forth.

6 Therefore the cherub thought that God was favorable to them, and was bringing them back into the garden. And the cherub stood wondering.

7 He could not go up to Heaven to determine God's order regarding their getting into the garden; he therefore continued to stand by them, unable as he was to part from them; for he was afraid that if they should enter the garden without permission, God would destroy him.

8 When Adam and Eve saw the cherub coming towards them with a flaming sword of fire in his hand, they fell on their faces from fear, and were as dead.

9 At that time the heavens and the earth shook; and another cherubim came down from heaven to the cherub who guarded the garden, and saw him amazed and silent.

10 Then, again, other angels came down close to the place where Adam and Eve were. They were divided between joy and sorrow.

11 They were glad, because they thought that God was favorable to Adam, and wished him to return to the garden; and wished to restore him to the gladness he once enjoyed.

12 But they sorrowed over Adam, because he was fallen like a dead man, he and Eve; and they said in their thoughts, "Adam has not died in this place; but God has put him to death, for his having come to this place, and wishing to get into the garden without His permission."

Chapter LV - The Conflict between God and Satan.

1 Then came the Word of God to Adam and Eve, and raised them from their dead state, saying to them, "Why did you come up here? Do you intend to go into the garden, from which I brought you out? It cannot be today; but only when the covenant I have made with you is fulfilled."

2 Then Adam, when he heard the Word of God, and the fluttering of the angels whom he did not see, but only heard the sound of them with his ears, he and Eve cried, and said to the angels:—

3 "O Spirits, who wait on God, look at me, and at my being unable to see you! For when I was in my former bright nature, then I could see you. I sang praises as you do; and my heart was far above you.

4 But now, that I have transgressed, that bright nature is gone from me, and I am come to this miserable state. And now I have come to this, that I cannot see you, and you do not serve me like you used to do. For I have become animal flesh.

5 Yet now, O angels of God, ask God with me, to restore me to that wherein I was formerly; to rescue me from this misery, and to remove from me the sentence of death He passed on me, for having trespassed against Him."

6 Then, when the angels heard these words, they all grieved over him; and cursed Satan who had misled Adam, until he came from the garden to misery; from life to death; from peace to trouble; and from gladness to a strange land.

7 Then the angels said to Adam, "You obeyed Satan, and ignored the Word of God who created you; and you believed that Satan would fulfil all he had promised you.

8 But now, O Adam, we will make known to you, what came over us through him, before his fall from heaven.

9 He gathered together his hosts, and deceived them, promising to give them a great kingdom, a divine nature; and other promises he made them.

10 His hosts believed that his word was true, so they yielded to him, and renounced the glory of God.

11 He then sent for us—according to the orders in which we were—to come under his command, and to accept his vain promise. But we would not, and we did not take his advice.

12 Then after he had fought with God, and had dealt forwardly with Him, he gathered together his hosts, and made war with us. And if it had not been for God's strength that was with us, we could not have prevailed against him to hurl him from heaven.

13 But when he fell from among us, there was great joy in heaven, because of his going down from us. For if he had remained in heaven, nothing, not even one angel would have remained in it.

14 But God in His mercy, drove him from among us to this dark earth; for he had become darkness itself and a worker of unrighteousness.

15 And he has continued, O Adam, to make war against you, until he tricked you and made you come out of the garden, to this strange land, where all these trials have come to you. And death, which God brought to him, he has also brought to you, O Adam, because you obeyed him, and trespassed against God."

16 Then all the angels rejoiced and praised God, and asked Him not to destroy Adam this time, for his having sought to enter the garden; but to bear with him until the fulfillment of the promise; and to help him in this world until he was free from Satan's hand.

Chapter LVI - A chapter of divine comfort.

1 Then came the Word of God to Adam, and said to him:—

2 "O Adam, look at that garden of joy and at this earth of toil, and behold the garden is full of angels, but look at yourself alone on this earth with Satan whom you obeyed.

3 Yet, if you had submitted, and been obedient to Me, and had kept My Word, you would be with My angels in My garden.

4 But when you transgressed and obeyed Satan, you became his guests among his angels, that are full of wickedness; and you came to this earth, that brings forth to you thorns and thistles.

5 O Adam, ask him who deceived you, to give you the divine nature he promised you, or to make you a garden as I had made for you; or to fill you with that same bright nature with which I had filled you.

6 Ask him to make you a body like the one I made you, or to give you a day of rest as I gave you; or to create within you a reasonable soul, as I created for you; or to take you from here to some other earth than this one which I gave you. But, O Adam, he will not fulfil even one of the things he told you.

7 Acknowledge, then, My favor towards you, and My mercy on you, My creature; that I have not avenged you for your transgression against Me, but in My pity for you I have promised you that at the end of the great five and a half days I will come and save you."

8 Then God said again to Adam and Eve, "Get up, go down from here, before the cherub with a sword of fire in his hand destroys you."

9 But Adam's heart was comforted by God's words to him, and he worshipped before Him.

10 And God commanded His angels to escort Adam and Eve to the cave with joy, instead of the fear that had come over them.

11 Then the angels took up Adam and Eve, and brought them down from the mountain by the garden, with songs and psalms, until they arrived at the cave. There the angels began to comfort and to strengthen them, and then departed from them towards heaven, to their Creator, who had sent them.

12 But after the angels had departed from Adam and Eve, Satan came with shamefacedness, and stood at the entrance of the cave in which were Adam and Eve. He then called to Adam, and said, "O Adam, come, let me speak to you."

13 Then Adam came out of the cave, thinking he was one of God's angels that was come to give him some good counsel.

Chapter LVII - "Therefore I fell.... "

1 But when Adam came out and saw his hideous figure, he was afraid of him, and said to him, "Who are you?"

2 Then Satan answered and said to him, "It is I, who hid myself within the serpent, and who spoke to Eve, and who enticed her until she obeyed my command. I am he who sent her, using my deceitful speech, to deceive you, until you both ate of the fruit of the tree and abandoned the command of God."

3 But when Adam heard these words from him, he said to him, "Can you make me a garden as God made for me? Or can you clothe me in the same bright nature in which God had clothed me?"

4 Where is the divine nature you promised to give me? Where is that slick speech of yours that you had with us at first, when we were in the garden?"

5 Then Satan said to Adam, "Do you think that when I have promised one something that I would actually deliver it to him or fulfil my word? Of course not. For I myself have never even thought of obtaining what I promised.

6 Therefore I fell, and I made you fall by that for which I myself fell; and with you also, whosoever accepts my counsel, falls thereby.

7 But now, O Adam, because you fell you are under my rule, and I am king over you; because you have obeyed me and have transgressed against your God. Neither will there be any deliverance from my hands until the day promised you by your God."

8 Again he said, "Because we do not know the day agreed on with you by your God, nor the hour in which you shall be delivered, for that reason we will multiply war and murder on you and your descendants after you.

9 This is our will and our good pleasure, that we may not leave one of the sons of men to inherit our orders in heaven.

10 For as to our home, O Adam, it is in burning fire; and we will not stop our evil doing, no, not one day nor one hour. And I, O Adam, shall set you on fire when you come into the cave to live there."

11 When Adam heard these words he cried and mourned, and said to Eve, "Hear what he said; that he won't fulfil any of what he told you in the garden. Did he really then become king over us?

12 But we will ask God, who created us, to deliver us out of his hands."

Chapter LVIII - "About sunset on the 53rd day. . ."

1 Then Adam and Eve spread their hands before God, praying and begging Him to drive Satan away from them so that he can't harm them or force them to deny God.

2 Then God sent to them at once, His angel, who drove away Satan from them. This happened about sunset, on the fifty-third day after they had come out of the garden.

3 Then Adam and Eve went into the cave, and stood up and turned their faces to the ground, to pray to God.

4 But before they prayed Adam said to Eve, "Look, you have seen what temptations have befallen us in this land. Come, let us get up, and ask God to forgive us the sins we have committed; and we will not come out until the end of the day next to the fortieth. And if we die in here, He will save us."

5 Then Adam and Eve got up, and joined together in entreating God.

6 They continued praying like this in the cave; neither did they come out of it, by night or by day, until their prayers went up out of their mouths, like a flame of fire.

Chapter LIX - Eighth apparition of Satan of Satan to Adam and Eve.

1 But Satan, the hater of all good, did not allow them to finish their prayers. For he called to his hosts, and they came, all of them. Then he said to them, "Since Adam and Eve, whom we deceived, have agreed together to pray to God night and day, and to beg Him to deliver them, and since they will not come out of the cave until the end of the fortieth day.

2 And since they will continue their prayers as they have both agreed to do, that He will deliver them out of our hands, and restore them to their former state, see what we shall do to them." And his hosts said to him, "Power is thine, O our lord, to do what you list."

3 Then Satan, great in wickedness, took his hosts and came into the cave, in the thirtieth night of the forty days and one; and he beat Adam and Eve, until he left them dead.

4 Then came the Word of God to Adam and Eve, who raised them from their suffering, and God said to Adam, "Be strong, and be not afraid of him who has just come to you."

5 But Adam cried and said, "Where were you, O my God, that they should punish me with such blows, and that this suffering should come over us; over me and over Eve, Your handmaiden?"

6 Then God said to him, "O Adam, see, he is lord and master of all you have, he who said, he would give you divinity. Where is this love for you? And where is the gift he promised?"

7 Did it please him just once, O Adam, to come to you, comfort you, strengthen you, rejoice with you, or send his hosts to protect you; because you have obeyed him, and have yielded to his counsel; and have followed his commandment and transgressed Mine?"

8 Then Adam cried before the Lord, and said, "O Lord because I transgressed a little, You have severely punished me in return for it, I ask You to deliver me out of his hands; or else have pity on me, and take my soul out of my body now in this strange land."

9 Then God said to Adam, "If only there had been this sighing and praying before, before you transgressed! Then would you have rest from the trouble in which you are now."

10 But God had patience with Adam, and let him and Eve remain in the cave until they had fulfilled the forty days.

11 But as to Adam and Eve, their strength and flesh withered from fasting and praying, from hunger and thirst; for they had not tasted either food or drink since they left the garden; nor were the functions of their bodies yet settled; and they had no strength left to continue in prayer from hunger, until the end of the next day to the fortieth. They were fallen down in the cave; yet what speech escaped from their mouths, was only in praises.

Chapter LX - The Devil appears like an old man. He offers "a place of rest."

1 Then on the eighty-ninth day, Satan came to the cave, clad in a garment of light, and girt about with a bright girdle.

2 In his hands was a staff of light, and he looked most awful; but his face was pleasant and his speech was sweet.

3 He thus transformed himself in order to deceive Adam and Eve, and to make them come out of the cave, before they had fulfilled the forty days.

4 For he said within himself, "Now that when they had fulfilled the forty days' fasting and praying, God would restore them to their former state; but if He did not do so, He would still be favorable to them; and even if He had not mercy on them, would He yet give them something from the garden to comfort them; as already twice before."

5 Then Satan drew near the cave in this fair appearance, and said:—

6 "O Adam, get up, stand up, you and Eve, and come along with me, to a good land; and don't be afraid. I am flesh and bones like you; and at first I was a creature that God created.

7 And it was so, that when He had created me, He placed me in a garden in the north, on the border of the world.

8 And He said to me, 'Stay here!' And I remained there according to His Word, neither did I transgress His commandment.

9 Then He made a slumber to come over me, and He brought you, O Adam, out of my side, but did not make you stay with me.

10 But God took you in His divine hand, and placed you in a garden to the eastward.

11 Then I worried about you, for that while God had taken you out of my side, He had not let you stay with me.

12 But God said to me: 'Do not worry about Adam, whom I brought out of your side; no harm will come to him.

13 For now I have brought out of his side a help-meet* for him; and I have given him joy by so doing.'"

14 Then Satan said again, "I did not know how it is you are in this cave, nor anything about this trial that has come over you—until God said to me, 'Behold, Adam has transgressed, he whom I had taken out of your side, and Eve also, whom I took out of his side; and I have driven them out of the garden; I have made them live in a land of sorrow and misery, because they transgressed against Me, and have obeyed Satan. And look, they are in suffering until this day, the eightieth.'

15 Then God said to me, 'Get up, go to them, and make them come to your place, and suffer not that Satan come near them, and afflict them. For they are now in great misery; and lie helpless from hunger.'

16 He further said to me, 'When you have taken them to yourself, give them to eat of the fruit of the Tree of Life, and give them to drink of the water of peace; and clothe them in a garment of light, and restore them to their former state of grace, and leave them not in misery, for they came from you. But grieve not over them, nor repent of that which has come over them.

17 But when I heard this, I was sorry; and my heart could not patiently bear it for your sake, O my child.

18 But, O Adam, when I heard the name of Satan, I was afraid, and I said within myself, I will not come out because he might trap me as he did my children, Adam and Eve.

19 And I said, 'O God, when I go to my children, Satan will meet me in the way, and war against me, as he did against them.'

20 Then God said to me, 'Fear not; when you find him, hit him with the staff that is in thine hand, and don't be afraid of him, for you are of old standing, and he shall not prevail against you.'

21 Then I said, 'O my Lord, I am old, and cannot go. Send Your angels to bring them.'

22 But God said to me, 'Angels, verily, are not like them; and they will not consent to come with them. But I have chosen you, because they are your offspring and are like you, and they will listen to what you say.'

23 God said further to me, 'If you don't have enough strength to walk, I will send a cloud to carry you and set you down at the entrance of their cave; then the cloud will return and leave you there.

24 And if they will come with you, I will send a cloud to carry you and them.'

25 Then He commanded a cloud, and it bear me up and brought me to you; and then went back.

26 And now, O my children, Adam and Eve, look at my old gray hair and at my feeble state, and at my coming from that distant place. Come, come with me, to a place of rest."

27 Then he began to cry and to sob before Adam and Eve, and his tears poured on the ground like water.

28 And when Adam and Eve raised their eyes and saw his beard, and heard his sweet talk, their hearts softened towards him; they obeyed him, for they believed he was true.

29 And it seemed to them that they were really his offspring, when they saw that his face was like their own; and they trusted him.

* The existence of the two words helpmeet and helpmate, meaning exactly the same thing, is a comedy of errors. God's promise to Adam, as rendered in the King James version of the Bible, was to give him an help meet for him (that is, a helper fit for him). In the 17th century the two words help and meet in this passage were mistaken for one word, applying to Eve, and thus helpmeet came to mean a wife. Then in the 18th century, in a misguided attempt to make sense of the word, the spelling helpmate was introduced. Both errors are now beyond recall, and both spellings are acceptable.

Chapter LXI - They begin to follow Satan.

1 Then he took Adam and Eve by the hand, and began to bring them out of the cave.

2 But when they had come a little ways out of it, God knew that Satan had overcome them, and had brought them out before the forty days were ended, to take them to some distant place, and to destroy them.

3 Then the Word of the Lord God again came and cursed Satan, and drove him away from them.

4 And God began to speak to Adam and Eve, saying to them, "What made you come out of the cave, to this place?"

5 Then Adam said to God, "Did you create a man before us? For when we were in the cave there suddenly came to us a friendly old man who said to us, 'I am a messenger from God to you, to bring you back to some place of rest.'

6 And we believed, O God, that he was a messenger from you; and we came out with him; and knew not where we should go with him."

7 Then God said to Adam, "See, that is the father of evil arts, who brought you and Eve out of the Garden of Delights. And now, indeed, when he saw that you and Eve both joined together in fasting and praying, and that you came not out of the cave before the end of the forty days, he wished to make your purpose vain, to break your mutual bond; to cut off all hope from you, and to drive you to some place where he might destroy you.

8 Because he couldn't do anything to you unless he showed himself in the likeness of you.

9 Therefore he came to you with a face like your own, and began to give you tokens as if they were all true.

10 But because I am merciful and am favorable to you, I did not allow him to destroy you; instead I drove him away from you.

11 Now, therefore, O Adam, take Eve, and return to your cave, and remain in it until the morning after the fortieth day. And when you come out, go towards the eastern gate of the garden."

12 Then Adam and Eve worshipped God, and praised and blessed Him for the deliverance that had come to them from Him. And they returned towards the cave. This happened in the evening of the thirty-ninth day.

13 Then Adam and Eve stood up and with a fiery passion, prayed to God, to give them strength; for they had become weak because of hunger and thirst and prayer. But they watched the whole of that night praying, until morning.

14 Then Adam said to Eve, "Get up, let us go towards the eastern gate of the garden as God told us."

15 And they said their prayers as they were accustomed to do every day; and they left the cave to go near to the eastern gate of the garden.

16 Then Adam and Eve stood up and prayed, and appealed to God to strengthen them, and to send them something to satisfy their hunger.

17 But after they finished their prayers, they were too weak to move.

18 Then came the Word of God again, and said to them, "O Adam, get up, go and bring the two figs here."

19 Then Adam and Eve got up, and went until they came near to the cave.

Chapter LXII - Two fruit trees.

1 But Satan the wicked was envious, because of the consolation God had given them.

2 So he prevented them, and went into the cave and took the two figs, and buried them outside the cave, so that Adam and Eve should not find them. He also had in his thoughts to destroy them.

3 But by God's mercy, as soon as those two figs were in the ground, God defeated Satan's counsel regarding them; and made them into two fruit trees, that overshadowed the cave. For Satan had buried them on the eastern side of it.

4 Then when the two trees were grown, and were covered with fruit, Satan grieved and mourned, and said, "It would have been better to have left those figs where they were; for now, behold, they have become two fruit trees, whereof Adam will eat all the days of his life. Whereas I had in mind, when I buried them, to destroy them entirely, and to hide them forever.

5 But God has overturned my counsel; and would not that this sacred fruit should perish; and He has made plain my intention, and has defeated the counsel I had formed against His servants."

6 Then Satan went away ashamed because he hadn't thought his plans all the way through.

Chapter LXIII - The first joy of trees.

1 But Adam and Eve, as they got closer to the cave, saw two fig trees, covered with fruit, and overshadowing the cave.

2 Then Adam said to Eve, "It seems to me that we have gone the wrong way. When did these two trees grow here? It seems to me that the enemy wishes to lead us the wrong way. Do you suppose that there is another cave besides this one in the earth?"

3 Yet, O Eve, let us go into the cave, and find in it the two figs; for this is our cave, in which we were. But if we should not find the two figs in it, then it cannot be our cave."

4 They went then into the cave, and looked into the four corners of it, but found not the two figs.

5 And Adam cried and said to Eve, "Did we go to the wrong cave, then, O Eve? It seems to me these two fig trees are the two figs that were in the cave." And Eve said, "I, for my part, do not know."

6 Then Adam stood up and prayed and said, "O God, You commanded us to come back to the cave, to take the two figs, and then to return to you.

7 But now, we have not found them. O God, have you taken them, and sown these two trees, or have we gone astray in the earth; or has the enemy deceived us? If it be real, then, O God, reveal to us the secret of these two trees and of the two figs."

8 Then came the Word of God to Adam, and said to him, "O Adam, when I sent you to fetch the figs, Satan went before you to the cave, took the figs, and buried them outside, eastward of the cave, thinking to destroy them; and not sowing them with good intent.

9 Not for his mere sake, then, have these trees grown up at once; but I had mercy on you and I commanded them to grow. And they grew to be two large trees, that you be overshadowed by their branches, and find rest; and that I made you see My power and My marvelous works.

10 And, also, to show you Satan's meanness, and his evil works, for ever since you came out of the garden, he has not ceased, no, not one day, from doing you some harm. But I have not given him power over you."

11 And God said, "From now on, O Adam, rejoice on account of the trees, you and Eve; and rest under them when you feel weary. But do not eat any of their fruit or come near them."

12 Then Adam cried, and said, "O God, will You again kill us, or will You drive us away from before Your face, and cut our life from off the face of the earth?

13 O God, I beg you, if You know that there be in these trees either death or some other evil, as at the first time, root them up from near our cave, and with them; and leave us to die of the heat, of hunger and of thirst.

14 For we know Your marvelous works, O God, that they are great, and that by Your power You can bring one thing out of another, without one's wish. For Your power can make rocks to become trees, and trees to become rocks."

Chapter LXIV - Adam and Eve partake of the first earthly food.

1 Then God looked at Adam and at his strength of mind, at his endurance of hunger and thirst, and of the heat. And He changed the two fig trees into two figs, as they were at first, and then said to Adam and to Eve, "Each of you may take one fig." And they took them, as the Lord commanded them.

2 And He said to them, "You must now go into the cave and eat the figs, and satisfy your hunger, or else you will die."

3 So, as God commanded them, they went into the cave about sunset. And Adam and Eve stood up and prayed during the setting sun.

4 Then they sat down to eat the figs; but they knew not how to eat them; for they were not accustomed to eat earthly food. They were afraid that if they ate, their stomach would be burdened and their flesh thickened, and their hearts would take to liking earthly food.

5 But while they were thus seated, God, out of pity for them, sent them His angel, so they wouldn't perish of hunger and thirst.

6 And the angel said to Adam and Eve, "God says to you that you do not have the strength that would be required to fast until death; eat, therefore, and strengthen your bodies; for you are now animal flesh and cannot subsist without food and drink."

7 Then Adam and Eve took the figs and began to eat of them. But God had put into them a mixture as of savory bread and blood.

8 Then the angel went from Adam and Eve, who ate of the figs until they had satisfied their hunger. Then they put aside what was left; but by the power of God, the figs became whole again, because God blessed them.

9 After this Adam and Eve got up, and prayed with a joyful heart and renewed strength, and praised and rejoiced abundantly the whole of that night. And this was the end of the eighty-third day.

Chapter LXV - Adam and Eve acquire digestive organs. Final hope of returning to the Garden is lost.

1 And when it was day, they got up and prayed, after their custom, and then went out of the cave.

2 But they became sick from the food they had eaten because they were not used to it, so they went about in the cave saying to each other:—

3 "What has our eating caused to happen to us, that we should be in such pain? We are in misery, we shall die! It would have been better for us to have died keeping our bodies pure than to have eaten and defiled them with food."

4 Then Adam said to Eve, "This pain did not come to us in the garden, neither did we eat such bad food there. Do you think, O Eve, that God will plague us through the food that is in us, or that our innards will come out; or that God means to kill us with this pain before He has fulfilled His promise to us?"

5 Then Adam besought the Lord and said, "O Lord, let us not perish through the food we have eaten. O Lord, don't punish us; but deal with us according to Your great mercy, and forsake us not until the day of the promise You have made us."

6 Then God looked at them, and then fitted them for eating food at once; as to this day; so that they should not perish.

7 Then Adam and Eve came back into the cave sorrowful and crying because of the alteration of their bodies. And they both knew from that hour that they were altered beings, that all hope of returning to the garden was now lost; and that they could not enter it.

8 For that now their bodies had strange functions; and all flesh that requires food and drink for its existence, cannot be in the garden.

9 Then Adam said to Eve, "Behold, our hope is now lost; and so is our trust to enter the garden. We no longer belong to the inhabitants of the garden; but from now on we are earthy and of the dust, and of the inhabitants of the earth. We shall not return to the garden, until the day in which God has promised to save us, and to bring us again into the garden, as He promised us."

10 Then they prayed to God that He would have mercy on them; after which, their mind was quieted, their hearts were broken, and their longing was cooled down; and they were like strangers on earth. That night Adam and Eve spent in the cave, where they slept heavily by reason of the food they had eaten.

Chapter LXVI - Adam does his first day's work.

1 When it was morning, the day after they had eaten food, Adam and Eve prayed in the cave, and Adam said to Eve, "Look, we asked for food of God, and He gave it. But now let us also ask Him to give us a drink of water."

2 Then they got up, and went to the bank of the stream of water, that was on the south border of the garden, in which they had before thrown themselves. And they stood on the bank, and prayed to God that

He would command them to drink of the water.

3 Then the Word of God came to Adam, and said to him, "O Adam, your body has become brutish, and requires water to drink. Take some and drink it, you and Eve, then give thanks and praise."

4 Adam and Eve then went down to the stream and drank from it, until their bodies felt refreshed. After having drunk, they praised God, and then returned to their cave, after their former custom. This happened at the end of eighty-three days.

5 Then on the eighty-fourth day, they took the two figs and hung them in the cave, together with the leaves thereof, to be to them a sign and a blessing from God. And they placed them there so that if their descendants came there, they would see the wonderful things God had done for them.

6 Then Adam and Eve again stood outside the cave, and asked God to show them some food with which they could nourish their bodies.

7 Then the Word of God came and said to him, "O Adam, go down to the westward of the cave until you come to a land of dark soil, and there you shall find food."

8 And Adam obeyed the Word of God, took Eve, and went down to a land of dark soil, and found there wheat* growing in the ear and ripe, and figs to eat; and Adam rejoiced over it.

9 Then the Word of God came again to Adam, and said to him, "Take some of this wheat and make yourselves some bread with it, to nourish your body therewith." And God gave Adam's heart wisdom, to work out the corn until it became bread.

10 Adam accomplished all that, until he grew very faint and weary. He then returned to the cave; rejoicing at what he had learned of what is done with wheat, until it is made into bread for one's use.

* In this book, the terms 'corn' and 'wheat' are used interchangeably. The reference is possibly used to indicate a type of ancient grain resembling Egyptian Corn also known as Durra. Durra is a wheat-like cereal grain frequently cultivated in dry regions such as Egypt.

Chapter LXVII - "Then Satan began to lead astray Adam and Eve...."

1 When Adam and Eve went down to the land of black mud and came near to the wheat God had showed them and saw that it was ripe and ready for reaping, they did not have a sickle to reap it with. So they readied themselves, and began to pull up the wheat by hand, until it was all done.

2 Then they heaped it into a pile; and, faint from heat and from thirst, they went under a shady tree, where the breeze fanned them to sleep.

3 But Satan saw what Adam and Eve had done. And he called his hosts, and said to them, "Since God has shown to Adam and Eve all about this wheat, wherewith to strengthen their bodies—and, look, they have come and made a big pile of it, and faint from the toil are now asleep—come, let us set fire to this heap of corn, and burn it, and let us take that bottle of water that is by them, and empty it out, so that they may find nothing to drink, and we kill them with hunger and thirst.

4 Then, when they wake up from their sleep, and seek to return to the cave, we will come to them in the way, and will lead them astray; so that they die of hunger and thirst; when they may, perhaps, deny God, and He destroy them. So shall we be rid of them."

5 Then Satan and his hosts set the wheat on fire and burned it up.

6 But from the heat of the flame Adam and Eve awoke from their sleep, and saw the wheat burning, and the bucket of water by them, poured out.

7 Then they cried and went back to the cave.

8 But as they were going up from below the mountain where they were, Satan and his hosts met them in the form of angels, praising God.

9 Then Satan said to Adam, "O Adam, why are you so pained with hunger and thirst? It seems to me that Satan has burnt up the wheat." And Adam said to him, "Yes."

10 Again Satan said to Adam, "Come back with us; we are angels of God. God sent us to you, to show you another field of corn, better than that; and beyond it is a fountain of good water, and many trees, where you shall live near it, and work the corn field to better purpose than that which Satan has consumed."

11 Adam thought that he was true, and that they were angels who talked with him; and he went back with them.

12 Then Satan began to lead astray Adam and Eve eight days, until they both fell down as if dead, from hunger, thirst, and faintness. Then he fled with his hosts, and left them.

the custom of worship.

1 Then God looked at Adam and Eve, and at what had come over them from Satan, and how he had made them perish.

2 God, therefore, sent His Word, and raised up Adam and Eve from their state of death.

3 Then, Adam, when he was raised, said, "O God, You have burnt and taken from us the corn You have given us, and You have emptied out the bucket of water. And You have sent Your angels, who have caused us to lose our way from the corn field. Will You make us perish? If this be from you, O God, then take away our souls; but punish us not."

4 Then God said to Adam, "I did not burn down the wheat, and I did not pour the water out of the bucket, and I did not send My angels to lead you astray.

5 But it is Satan, your master who did it; he to whom you have subjected yourself; my commandment being meanwhile set aside. He it is, who burnt down the corn, and poured out the water, and who has led you astray; and all the promises he has made you were just a trick, a deception, and a lie.

6 But now, O Adam, you shall acknowledge My good deeds done to you."

7 And God told His angels to take Adam and Eve, and to bear them up to the field of wheat, which they found as before, with the bucket full of water.

8 There they saw a tree, and found on it solid manna; and wondered at God's power. And the angels commanded them to eat of the manna when they were hungry.

9 And God admonished Satan with a curse, not to come again, and destroy the field of corn.

10 Then Adam and Eve took of the corn, and made of it an offering, and took it and offered it up on the mountain, the place where they had offered up their first offering of blood.

11 And they offered this offering again on the altar they had built at first. And they stood up and prayed, and besought the Lord saying, "Thus, O God, when we were in the garden, our praises went up to you, like this offering; and our innocence went up to you like incense. But now, O God, accept this offering from us, and don't turn us away, deprived of Your mercy."

12 Then God said to Adam and Eve, "Since you have made this offering and have offered it to Me, I shall make it My flesh, when I come down on earth to save you; and I shall cause it to be offered continually on an altar, for forgiveness and for mercy, for those who partake of it duly."

13 And God sent a bright fire over the offering of Adam and Eve, and filled it with brightness, grace, and light; and the Holy Ghost came down on that offering.

14 Then God commanded an angel to take fire tongs, like a spoon, and with it to take an offering and bring it to Adam and Eve. And the angel did so, as God had commanded him, and offered it to them.

15 And the souls of Adam and Eve were brightened, and their hearts were filled with joy and gladness and with the praises of God.

16 And God said to Adam, "This shall be to you a custom, to do so, when affliction and sorrow come over you. But your deliverance and your entrance in to the garden, shall not be until the days are fulfilled as agreed between you and Me; were it not so, I would, of My mercy and pity for you, bring you back to My garden and to My favor for the sake of the offering you have just made to My name."

17 Adam rejoiced at these words which he heard from God; and he and Eve worshipped before the altar, to which they bowed, and then went back to the Cave of Treasures.

18 And this took place at the end of the twelfth day after the eightieth day, from the time Adam and Eve came out of the garden.

19 And they stood up the whole night praying until morning; and then went out of the cave.

20 Then Adam said to Eve, with joy of heart, because of the offering they had made to God, and that had been accepted of Him, "Let us do this three times every week, on the fourth day Wednesday, on the preparation day Friday, and on the Sabbath Sunday, all the days of our life."

21 And as they agreed to these words between themselves, God was pleased with their thoughts, and with the resolution they had each taken with the other.

22 After this, came the Word of God to Adam, and said, "O Adam, you have determined beforehand the days in which sufferings shall come over Me, when I am made flesh; for they are the fourth Wednesday, and the preparation day Friday.

23 But as to the first day, I created in it all things, and I raised the heavens. And, again, through My rising again on this day, will I create joy, and raise them on high, who believe in Me; O Adam, offer this offering, all the days of your life."

24 Then God withdrew His Word from Adam.

25 But Adam continued to offer this offering thus, every week three times, until the end of seven weeks. And on the first day, which is the fiftieth, Adam made an offering as he was accustomed, and he and Eve took it and came to the altar before God, as He had taught them.

Chapter LXIX - Twelfth apparition of Satan to Adam and Eve, while Adam was praying over the offering on the altar; when Satan beat him.

1 Then Satan, the hater of all good, envious of Adam and of his offering through which he found favor with God, hastened and took a sharp stone from among the sharp iron stones; appeared in the form of a man, and went and stood by Adam and Eve.

2 Adam was then offering on the altar, and had begun to pray, with his hands spread before God.

3 Then Satan hastened with the sharp iron stone he had with him, and with it pierced Adam on the right side, from which flowed blood and water, then Adam fell on the altar like a corpse. And Satan fled.

4 Then Eve came, and took Adam and placed him below the altar. And there she stayed, crying over him; while a stream of blood flowed from Adam's side over his offering.

5 But God looked at the death of Adam. He then sent His Word, and raised him up and said to him, "Fulfil your offering, for indeed, Adam, it is worth much, and there is no shortcoming in it."

6 God said further to Adam, "Thus will it also happen to Me, on the earth, when I shall be pierced and blood and water shall flow from My side and run over My body, which is the true offering; and which shall be offered on the altar as a perfect offering."

7 Then God commanded Adam to finish his offering, and when he had ended it he worshipped before God, and praised Him for the signs He had showed him.

8 And God healed Adam in one day, which is the end of the seven weeks; and that is the fiftieth day.

9 Then Adam and Eve returned from the mountain, and went into the Cave of Treasures, as they were used to do. This completed for Adam and Eve, one hundred and forty days since their coming out of the garden.

10 Then they both stood up that night and prayed to God. And when it was morning, they went out, and went down westward of the cave, to the place where their corn was, and there rested under the shadow of a tree, as they were accustomed.

11 But when there a multitude of beasts came all around them. It was Satan's doing, in his wickedness; in order to wage war against Adam through marriage.

Chapter LXX - Thirteenth apparition of Satan, to trick Adam into marrying Eve.

1 After this Satan, the hater of all good, took the form of an angel, and with him two others, so that they looked like the three angels who had brought to Adam gold, incense, and myrrh.

2 They passed before Adam and Eve while they were under the tree, and greeted Adam and Eve with fair words that were full of deceit.

3 But when Adam and Eve saw their pleasant expression, and heard their sweet speech, Adam rose, welcomed them, and brought them to Eve, and they remained all together; Adam's heart the while, being glad because he thought concerning them, that they were the same angels, who had brought him gold, incense, and myrrh.

4 Because, when they came to Adam the first time, there came over him from them, peace and joy, through their bringing him good tokens; so Adam thought that they had come a second time to give him other tokens for him to rejoice therewith. For he did not know it was Satan; therefore he received them with joy and consorted with them.

5 Then Satan, the tallest of them, said, "Rejoice, O Adam, and be glad. Look, God has sent us to you to tell you something."

6 And Adam said, "What is it?" Then Satan answered, "It is a simple thing, yet it is the Word of God, will you accept it from us and do it? But if you will not accept it, we will return to God, and tell Him that you would not receive His Word."

7 And Satan said again to Adam, "Don't be afraid and don't tremble; don't you know us?"

8 But Adam said, "I do not know you."

9 Then Satan said to him, "I am the angel that brought you gold, and took it to the cave; this other angel is the one that brought you incense; and that third angel, is the one who brought you myrrh when you were on top of the mountain, and who carried you to the cave.

10 But as to the other angels our fellows, who bare you to the cave, God has not sent them with us this time; for He said to us, 'You will be enough'."

11 So when Adam heard these words he believed them, and said to these angels, "Speak the Word of God, that I may receive it."

12 And Satan said to him, "Swear, and promise me that you will receive it."

13 Then Adam said, "I do not know how to swear and promise."

14 And Satan said to him, "Hold out your hand, and put it inside my hand."

15 Then Adam held out his hand, and put it into Satan's hand; when Satan said to him, "Say, now—So true as God is living, rational, and speaking, who raised the stars in heaven, and established the dry ground on the waters, and has created me out of the four elements*, and out of the dust of the earth—I will not break my promise, nor renounce my word."

16 And Adam swore thus.

17 Then Satan said to him, "Look, it is now some time since you came out of the garden, and you know neither wickedness nor evil. But now God says to you, to take Eve who came out of your side, and to marry her so that she will bear you children, to comfort you, and to drive from you trouble and sorrow; now this thing is not difficult, neither is there any scandal in it to you.

* See the previous footnote in chapter XXXIV regarding the 'four elements'.

Chapter LXXI - Adam is troubled by the thought of marrying Eve.

1 But when Adam heard these words from Satan, he sorrowed much, because of his oath and of his promise, and said, "Shall I commit adultery with my flesh and my bones, and shall I sin against myself, for God to destroy me, and to blot me out from off the face of the earth?"

2 Since, when at first, I ate of the tree, He drove me out of the garden into this strange land, and deprived me of my bright nature, and brought death over me. If, then, I should do this, He will cut off my life from the earth, and He will cast me into hell, and will plague me there a long time.

3 But God never spoke the words that you have said; and you are not God's angels, and you weren't sent from Him. But you are devils that have come to me under the false appearance of angels. Away from me; you cursed of God!"

4 Then those devils fled from before Adam. And he and Eve got up, and returned to the Cave of Treasures, and went into it.

5 Then Adam said to Eve, "If you saw what I did, don't tell anyone; for I sinned against God in swearing by His great name, and I have placed my hand another time into that of Satan." Eve, then, held her peace, as Adam told her.

6 Then Adam got up, and spread his hands before God, beseeching and entreating Him with tears, to forgive him what he had done. And Adam remained thus standing and praying forty days and forty nights. He neither ate nor drank until he dropped down on the ground from hunger and thirst.

7 Then God sent His Word to Adam, who raised him up from where he lay, and said to him, "O Adam, why have you sworn by My name, and why have you made agreement with Satan another time?"

8 But Adam cried, and said, "O God, forgive me, for I did this unwittingly; believing they were God's angels."

9 And God forgave Adam, saying to him, "Beware of Satan."

10 And He withdrew His Word from Adam.

11 Then Adam's heart was comforted; and he took Eve, and they went out of the cave, to prepare some food for their bodies.

12 But from that day Adam struggled in his mind about his marrying Eve; afraid that if he was to do it, God would be angry with him.

13 Then Adam and Eve went to the river of water, and sat on the bank, as people do when they enjoy themselves.

14 But Satan was jealous of them; and planned to destroy them.

Chapter LXXII - Adam's heart is set on fire. Satan appears as beautiful maidens.

1 Then Satan, and ten from his hosts, transformed themselves into maidens, unlike any others in the whole world for grace.

2 They came up out of the river in presence of Adam and Eve, and they said among themselves, "Come, we will look at the faces of Adam and Eve, who are of the men on earth. How beautiful they are, and how different is their look from our own faces." Then they came to Adam and Eve, and greeted them; and stood wondering at them.

3 Adam and Eve looked at them also, and wondered at their beauty, and said, "Is there, then, under us, another world, with such beautiful creatures as these in it?"

4 And those maidens said to Adam and Eve, "Yes, indeed, we are an abundant creation."

5 Then Adam said to them, "But how do you multiply?"

6 And they answered him, "We have husbands who have married us, and we bear them children, who grow up, and who in their turn marry and are married, and also bear children; and thus we increase. And if so be, O Adam, you will not believe us, we will show you our husbands and our children."

7 Then they shouted over the river as if to call their husbands and their children, who came up from the river, men and children; and every man came to his wife, his children being with him.

8 But when Adam and Eve saw them, they stood dumb, and wondered at them.

9 Then they said to Adam and Eve, "See all our husbands and our children? You should marry Eve, as we have married our husbands, so that you will have children as we have." This was a device of Satan to deceive Adam.

10 Satan also thought within himself, "God at first commanded Adam concerning the fruit of the tree, saying to him, 'Eat not of it; else of death you shall die.' But Adam ate of it, and yet God did not kill him; He only decreed on him death, and plagues and trials, until the day he shall come out of his body.

11 Now, then, if I deceive him to do this thing, and to marry Eve without God's permission, God will kill him then."

12 Therefore Satan worked this apparition before Adam and Eve; because he sought to kill him, and to make him disappear from off the face of the earth.

13 Meanwhile the fire of sin came over Adam, and he thought of committing sin. But he restrained himself, fearing that if he followed this advice of Satan, God would put him to death.

14 Then Adam and Eve got up, and prayed to God, while Satan and his hosts went down into the river, in presence of Adam and Eve; to let them see that they were going back to their own world.

15 Then Adam and Eve went back to the Cave of Treasures, as they usually did; about evening time.

16 And they both got up and prayed to God that night. Adam remained standing in prayer, yet not knowing how to pray, by reason of the thoughts in his heart regarding his marrying Eve; and he continued so until morning.

17 And when light came up, Adam said to Eve, "Get up, let us go below the mountain, where they brought us gold, and let us ask the Lord concerning this matter."

18 Then Eve said, "What is that matter, O Adam?"

19 And he answered her, "That I may request the Lord to inform me about marrying you; for I will not do it without His permission or else He will make us perish, you and me. For those devils have set my heart on fire, with thoughts of what they showed us, in their sinful apparitions.

20 Then Eve said to Adam, "Why need we go below the mountain? Let us rather stand up and pray in our cave to God, to let us know whether this counsel is good or not."

21 Then Adam rose up in prayer and said, "O God, you know that we transgressed against you, and from the moment we transgressed, we were stripped of our bright nature; and our body became brutish, requiring food and drink; and with animal desires.

22 Command us, O God, not to give way to them without Your permission, for fear that You will turn us into nothing. Because if you do not give us permission, we shall be overpowered, and follow that advice of Satan; and You will again make us perish.

23 If not, then take our souls from us; let us be rid of this animal lust. And if You give us no order respecting this thing, then sever Eve from me, and me from her; and place us each far away from the other.

24 Then again, O God, if You separate us from each other, the devils will deceive us with their apparitions that resemble us, and destroy our hearts, and defile our thoughts towards each other. Yet if it is not each of us towards the other, it will, at all events, be through their appearance when the devils come to us in our likeness." Here Adam ended his prayer.

Chapter LXXIII - The marriage of Adam and Eve.

1 Then God considered the words of Adam that they were true, and that he could long await His order, respecting the counsel of Satan.

2 And God approved Adam in what he had thought concerning this, and in the prayer he had offered in His presence; and the Word of God came to Adam and said to him, "O Adam, if only you had had this caution at first, before you came out of the garden into this land!"

3 After that, God sent His angel who had brought gold, and the angel who had brought incense, and the angel who had brought myrrh to Adam, that they should inform him respecting his marriage to Eve.

4 Then those angels said to Adam, "Take the gold and give it to Eve as a wedding gift, and promise to marry her; then give her some incense and myrrh as a present; and be you, you and she, one flesh."

5 Adam obeyed the angels, and took the gold and put it into Eve's bosom in her garment; and promised to marry her with his hand.

6 Then the angels commanded Adam and Eve to get up and pray forty days and forty nights; when that was done, then Adam was to have sexual intercourse with his wife; for then this would be an act pure and undefiled; so that he would have children who would multiply, and replenish the face of the earth.

7 Then both Adam and Eve received the words of the angels; and the angels departed from them.

8 Then Adam and Eve began to fast and pray, until the end of the forty days; and then they had sexual intercourse, as the angels had told them. And from the time Adam left the garden until he wedded Eve, were two hundred and twenty-three days, that is seven months and thirteen days.

9 Thus was Satan's war with Adam defeated.

Chapter LXXIV - The birth of Cain and Luluwa. Why they received those names.

1 And they lived on the earth working in order to keep their bodies in good health; and they continued so until the nine months of Eve's pregnancy were over, and the time drew near when she must give birth.

2 Then she said to Adam, "The signs placed in this cave since we left the garden indicate that this is a pure place and we will be praying in it again some time. It is not appropriate then, that I should give birth in it. Let us instead go to the sheltering rock cave that was formed by the command of God when Satan threw a big rock down on us in an attempt to kill us with it.

3 Adam then took Eve to that cave. When the time came for her to give birth, she strained a lot. Adam felt sorry, and he was very worried about her because she was close to death and the words of God to her were being fulfilled: "In suffering shall you bear a child, and in sorrow shall you bring forth a child."

4 But when Adam saw the distress in which Eve was, he got up and prayed to God, and said, "O Lord, look at me with the eye of Your mercy, and bring her out of her distress."

5 And God looked at His maid-servant Eve, and delivered her, and she gave birth to her first-born son, and with him a daughter.

6 The Adam rejoiced at Eve's deliverance, and also over the children she had borne him. And Adam ministered to Eve in the cave, until the end of eight days; when they named the son Cain, and the daughter Luluwa.

7 The meaning of Cain is "hater," because he hated his sister in their mother's womb; before they came out of it. Therefore Adam named him Cain.

8 But Luluwa means "beautiful," because she was more beautiful than her mother.

9 Then Adam and Eve waited until Cain and his sister were forty days old, when Adam said to Eve, "We will make an offering and offer it up in behalf of the children."

10 And Eve said, "We will make one offering for the first-born son and then later we shall make one for the daughter."

Chapter LXXV - The family revisits the Cave of Treasures. Birth of Abel and Akia.

1 Then Adam prepared an offering, and he and Eve offered it up for their children, and brought it to the altar they had built at first.

2 And Adam offered up the offering, and asked God to accept his offering.

3 Then God accepted Adam's offering, and sent a light from heaven that shown on the offering. Adam and his son drew near to the offering, but Eve and the daughter did not approach it.

4 Adam and his son were joyful as they came down from on the altar. Adam and Eve waited until the daughter was eighty days old, then Adam prepared an offering and took it to Eve and to the children. They went to the altar, where Adam offered it up, as he was accustomed, asking the Lord to accept his offering.

5 And the Lord accepted the offering of Adam and Eve. Then Adam, Eve, and the children, drew near together, and came down from the mountain, rejoicing.

6 But they returned not to the cave in which they were born; but came to the Cave of Treasures, in order that the children should go around in it, and be blessed with the tokens brought from the garden.

7 But after they had been blessed with these tokens, they went back to the cave in which they were born.

8 However, before Eve had offered up the offering, Adam had taken her, and had gone with her to the river of water, in which they threw themselves at first; and there they washed themselves. Adam washed his body and Eve hers also clean, after the suffering and distress that had come over them.

9 But Adam and Eve, after washing themselves in the river of water, returned every night to the Cave of Treasures, where they prayed and were blessed; and then went back to their cave, where their children were born.

10 Adam and Eve did this until the children had been weaned. After they were weaned, Adam made an offering for the souls of his children in addition to the three times every week he made an offering for them.

11 When the children were weaned, Eve again conceived, and when her pregnancy came to term, she gave birth to another son and daughter. They named the son Abel and the daughter Aklia.

12 Then at the end of forty days, Adam made an offering for the son, and at the end of eighty days he made another offering for the daughter, and treated them, as he had previously treated Cain and his sister Luluwa.

13 He brought them to the Cave of Treasures, where they received a blessing, and then returned to the cave where they were born. After these children were born, Eve stopped having children.

Chapter LXXVI - Cain becomes jealous of Abel because of his sisters.

1 And the children began to grow stronger and taller; but Cain was hard-hearted, and ruled over his younger brother.

2 Often when his father made an offering, Cain would remain behind and not go with them, to offer up.

3 But, as to Abel, he had a meek heart, and was obedient to his father and mother. He frequently moved them to make an offering, because he loved it. He prayed and fasted a lot.

4 Then came this sign to Abel. As he was coming into the Cave of Treasures, and saw the golden rods, the incense and the myrrh, he asked his parents, Adam and Eve, to tell him about them and asked, "Where did you get these from?"

5 Then Adam told him all that had befallen them. And Abel felt deeply about what his father told him.

6 Furthermore his father, Adam, told him of the works of God, and of the garden. After hearing that, Abel remained behind after his father left and stayed the whole of that night in the Cave of Treasures.

7 And that night, while he was praying, Satan appeared to him under the figure of a man, who said to him, "You have frequently moved your father into making offerings, fasting and praying, therefore I will kill you, and make you perish from this world."

8 But as for Abel, he prayed to God, and drove away Satan from him; and did not believe the words of the devil. Then when it was day, an angel of God appeared to him, who said to him, "Do not cut short either fasting, prayer, or offering up an offering to your God. For, look, the Lord had accepted your prayer. Be not afraid of the figure which appeared to you in the night, and who cursed you to death." And the angel departed from him.

9 Then when it was day, Abel came to Adam and Eve, and told them of the vision he had seen. When they heard it, they grieved much over it, but said nothing to him about it; they only comforted him.

10 But as to the hard-hearted Cain, Satan came to him by night, showed himself and said to him, "Since Adam and Eve love your brother Abel so much more than they love you, they wish to join him in marriage to your beautiful sister because they love him. However, they wish to join you in marriage to his ugly sister, because they hate you.

11 Now before they do that, I am telling you that you should kill your brother. That way your sister will be left for you, and his sister will be cast away."

12 And Satan departed from him. But the devil remained behind in Cain's heart, and frequently aspired to kill his brother.

Chapter LXXVII - Cain, 15 years old, and Abel 12 years old, grow apart.

1 But when Adam saw that the older brother hated the younger, he endeavored to soften their hearts, and said to Cain, "O my son, take of the fruits of your sowing and make an offering to God, so that He might forgive you for your wickedness and sin."

2 He said also to Abel, "Take some of your sowing and make an offering and bring it to God, so that He might forgive you for your wickedness and sin."

3 Then Abel obeyed his father's voice, took some of his sowing, and made a good offering, and said to his father, Adam, "Come with me and show me how to offer it up."

4 And they went, Adam and Eve with him, and they showed him how to offer up his gift on the altar. Then after that, they stood up and prayed that God would accept Abel's offering.

5 Then God looked at Abel and accepted his offering. And God was more pleased with Abel than with his offering, because of his good heart and pure body. There was no trace of guile in him.

6 Then they came down from the altar, and went to the cave in which they lived. But Abel, by reason of his joy at having made his offering, repeated it three times a week, after the example of his father Adam.

7 But as to Cain, he did not want to make an offering, but after his father became very angry, he offered up a gift once. He took the smallest of his sheep for an offering and when he offered it up, his eyes were on the lamb.

8 Therefore God did not accept his offering, because his heart was full of murderous thoughts.

9 And they all thus lived together in the cave in which Eve had brought forth, until Cain was fifteen years old, and Abel twelve years old.

Chapter LXXVIII - Jealousy overcomes Cain. He makes trouble in the family. How the first murder was planned.

1 Then Adam said to Eve, "Behold the children are grown up; we must think of finding wives for them."

2 Then Eve answered, "How can we do it?"

3 Then Adam said to her, "We will join Abel's sister in marriage to Cain, and Cain's sister to Abel.

4 The said Eve to Adam, "I do not like Cain because he is hard-hearted; but let them stay with us until we offer up to the Lord in their behalf."

5 And Adam said no more.

6 Meanwhile Satan came to Cain in the figure of a man of the field, and said to him, "Behold Adam and Eve have taken counsel together about the marriage of you two; and they have agreed to marry Abel's sister to you, and your sister to him.

7 But if it was not that I love you, I would not have told you this thing. Yet if you will take my advice, and obey me, I will bring to you on your wedding day beautiful robes, gold and silver in plenty, and my relations will attend you."

8 Then Cain said with joy, "Where are your relations?"

9 And Satan answered, "My relations are in a garden in the north, where I once meant to bring your father Adam; but he would not accept my offer.

10 But you, if you will receive my words and if you will come to me after your wedding, you shall rest from the misery in which you are; and you shall rest and be better off than your father Adam."

11 At these words of Satan Cain opened his ears, and leaned towards his speech.

12 And he did not remain in the field, but he went to Eve, his mother, and beat her, and cursed her, and said to her, "Why are you planning to take my sister to wed her to my brother? Am I dead?"

13 His mother, however, quieted him, and sent him to the field where he had been.

14 Then when Adam came, she told him of what Cain had done.

15 But Adam grieved and held his peace, and said not a word.

16 Then on the next morning Adam said to Cain his son, "Take of your sheep, young and good, and offer them up to your God; and I will speak to your brother, to make to his God an offering of corn."

17 They both obeyed their father Adam, and they took their offerings, and offered them up on the mountain by the altar.

18 But Cain behaved haughtily towards his brother, and shoved him from the altar, and would not let him offer up his gift on the altar; but he offered his own on it, with a proud heart, full of guile, and fraud.

19 But as for Abel, he set up stones that were near at hand, and on that, he offered up his gift with a heart humble and free from guile.

20 Cain was then standing by the altar on which he had offered up his gift; and he cried to God to accept his offering; but God did not accept it from him; neither did a divine fire come down to consume his offering.

21 But he remained standing over against the altar, out of humor and meanness, looking towards his brother Abel, to see if God would accept his offering or not.

22 And Abel prayed to God to accept his offering. Then a divine fire came down and consumed his offering. And God smelled the sweet savor of his offering; because Abel loved Him and rejoice in Him.

23 And because God was well pleased with him, He sent him an angel of light in the figure of a man who had partaken of his offering, because He had smelled the sweet savor of his offering, and they comforted Abel and strengthened his heart.

24 But Cain was looking on all that took place at his brother's offering, and was angry because of it.

25 Then he opened his mouth and blasphemed God, because He had not accepted his offering.

26 But God said to cain, "Why do you look sad? Be righteous, that I may accept your offering. Not against Me have you murmured, but against yourself.

27 And God said this to Cain in rebuke, and because He abhorred him and his offering.

28 And Cain came down from the altar, his color changed and with a sad face, and came to his father and mother and told them all that had befallen him. And Adam grieved much because God had not accepted Cain's offering.

29 But Abel came down rejoicing, and with a gladsome heart, and told his father and mother how God had accepted his offering. And they rejoiced at it and kissed his face.

30 And Abel said to his father, "Because Cain shoved me from the altar, and would not allow me to offer my gift on it, I made an altar for myself and offered my gift on it."

31 But when Adam heard this he was very sorry, because it was the altar he had built at first, and on which he had offered his own gifts.

32 As to Cain, he was so resentful and so angry that he went into the field, where Satan came to him and said to him, "Since your brother Abel has taken refuge with your father Adam, because you shoved him from the altar, they have kissed his face, and they rejoice over him, far more than over you."

33 When Cain heard these words of Satan, he was filled with rage; and he let no one know. But he was laying wait to kill his brother, until he brought him into the cave, and then said to him:—

34 "O brother, the country is so beautiful, and there are such beautiful and pleasurable trees in it, and charming to look at! But brother, you have never been one day in the field to take your pleasure in that place.

35 Today, O, my brother, I very much wish you would come with me into the field, to enjoy yourself and to bless our fields and our flocks, for you are righteous, and I love you much, O my brother! But you have alienated yourself from me."

36 Then Abel consented to go with his brother Cain into the field.

37 But before going out, Cain said to Abel, "Wait for me, until I fetch a staff, because of wild beasts."

38 Then Abel stood waiting in his innocence. But Cain, the forward, fetched a staff and went out.

39 And they began, Cain and his brother Abel, to walk in the way; Cain talking to him, and comforting him, to make him forget everything.

Chapter LXXIX - A wicked plan is carried to a tragic conclusion. Cain is frightened. "Am I my brother's keeper?" The seven punishments. Peace is shattered.

1 And so they went on, until they came to a lonely place, where there were no sheep; then Abel said to Cain, "Behold, my brother, we are tired from walking; for we see none of the trees, nor of the fruits, nor of the flourishing green plants, nor of the sheep, nor any one of the things of which you told me. Where are those sheep of thine you told me to bless?"

2 Then Cain said to him, "Come on, and you shall see many beautiful things very soon, but go before me, until I catch up to you."

3 Then went Abel forward, but Cain remained behind him.

4 And Abel was walking in his innocence, without guile; not believing his brother would kill him.

5 Then Cain, when he came up to him, comforted him with his talk, walking a little behind him; then he ran up to him and beat him with the staff, blow after blow, until he was stunned.

6 But when Abel fell down on the ground, seeing that his brother meant to kill him, he said to Cain, "O, my brother, have pity on me. By the breasts we have sucked, don't hit me! By the womb that bore us and that brought us into the world, don't beat me to death with that staff! If you will kill me, take one of these large stones and kill me outright."

7 Then Cain, the hard-hearted, and cruel murderer, took a large stone, and beat his brother's head with it, until his brains oozed out, and he wallowed in his blood, before him.

8 And Cain repented not of what he had done.

9 But the earth, when the blood of righteous Abel fell on it, trembled, as it drank his blood, and would have destroyed Cain because of it.

10 And the blood of Abel cried mysteriously to God, to avenge him of his murderer.

11 Then Cain began at once to dig the ground wherein to lay his brother; for he was trembling from the fear that came over him, when he saw the earth tremble on his account.

12 He then cast his brother into the pit he made, and covered him with dust. But the ground would not receive him; but it threw him up at once.

13 Again Cain dug the ground and hid his brother in it; but again the ground threw him up on itself; until three times the ground thus threw up on itself the body of Abel.

14 The muddy ground threw him up the first time, because he was not the first creation; and it threw him up the second time and would not receive him, because he was righteous and good, and was killed without a cause; and the ground threw him up the third time and would not receive him, that there might remain before his brother a witness against him.

15 And so the earth mocked Cain, until the Word of God, came to him concerning his brother.

16 Then was God angry, and much displeased at Abel's death; and He thundered from heaven, and lightnings went before Him, and the Word of the Lord God came from heaven to Cain, and said to him, "Where is Abel your brother?"

17 Then Cain answered with a proud heart and a gruff voice, "How, O God? Am I my brother's keeper?"

18 Then God said to Cain, "Cursed be the earth that has drunk the blood of Abel your brother; and as for you, you will always be trembling and shaking; and this will be a mark on you so that whoever finds you, will kill you."

19 But Cain cried because God had said those words to him; and Cain said to Him, "O God, whosoever finds me shall kill me, and I shall be blotted out from the face of the earth."

20 Then God said to Cain, "Whoever finds you will not kill you;" because before this, God had been saying to Cain, "I shall put seven punishments on anyone that kills Cain." For as to the word of God to Cain, "Where is your brother?" God said it in mercy for him, to try and make him repent.

21 For if Cain had repented at that time, and had said, "O God, forgive me my sin, and the murder of my brother," God would then have forgiven him his sin.

22 And as to God saying to Cain, "Cursed be the ground that has drunk the blood of your brother." That also, was God's mercy on Cain. For God did not curse him, but He cursed the ground; although it was not the ground that had killed Abel, and committed a wicked sin.

23 For it was fitting that the curse should fall on the murderer; yet in mercy did God so manage His thoughts as that no one should know it, and turn away from Cain.

24 And He said to him, "Where is your brother?" To which he answered and said, "I know not." Then the Creator said to him, "Be trembling and quaking."

25 Then Cain trembled and became terrified; and through this sign did God make him an example before all the creation, as the murderer of his brother. Also did God bring trembling and terror over him, that he might see the peace in which he was at first, and see also the trembling and terror he endured at the last; so that he might humble himself before God, and repent of his sin, and seek the peace that he enjoyed at first.

26 And in the word of God that said, "I will put seven punishments on anyone who kills Cain," God was not seeking to kill Cain with the sword, but He sought to make him die of fasting, and praying and crying by hard rule, until the time that he was delivered from his sin.

27 And the seven punishments are the seven generations during which God awaited Cain for the murder of his brother.

28 But as to Cain, ever since he had killed his brother, he could find no rest in any place; but went back to Adam and Eve, trembling, terrified, and defiled with blood. . . .

End of Project Gutenberg's First Book of Adam and Eve, by Rutherford Platt

 END OF THIS PROJECT GUTENBERG EBOOK FIRST BOOK OF ADAM AND EVE ***

 This file should be named 398-h.htm or 398-h.zip *****

This and all associated files of various formats will be found in:

<https://www.gutenberg.org/3/9/398/>

Updated editions will replace the previous one--the old editions will be renamed.

Creating the works from public domain print editions means that no one owns a United States copyright in these works, so the Foundation (and you!) can copy and distribute it in the United States without permission and without paying copyright royalties. Special rules, set forth in the General Terms of Use part of this license, apply to copying and distributing Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works to protect the PROJECT GUTENBERG-tm concept and trademark. Project Gutenberg is a registered trademark, and may not be used if you charge for the eBooks, unless you receive specific permission. If you do not charge anything for copies of this eBook, complying with the rules is very easy. You may use this eBook for nearly any purpose such as creation of derivative works, reports, performances and research. They may be modified and printed and given away--you may do practically ANYTHING with public domain eBooks. Redistribution is subject to the trademark license, especially commercial redistribution.

 START: FULL LICENSE ***

THE FULL PROJECT GUTENBERG LICENSE

PLEASE READ THIS BEFORE YOU DISTRIBUTE OR USE THIS WORK

To protect the Project Gutenberg-tm mission of promoting the free distribution of electronic works, by using or distributing this work (or any other work associated in any way with the phrase "Project Gutenberg"), you agree to comply with all the terms of the Full Project Gutenberg-tm License (available with this file or online at <https://gutenberg.org/license>).

Section 1. General Terms of Use and Redistributing Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works

1.A. By reading or using any part of this Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work, you indicate that you have read, understand, agree to and accept all the terms of this license and intellectual property (trademark/copyright) agreement. If you do not agree to abide by all the terms of this agreement, you must cease using and return or destroy all copies of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works in your possession. If you paid a fee for obtaining a copy of or access to a Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work and you do not agree to be bound by the terms of this agreement, you may obtain a refund from the person or entity to whom you paid the fee as set forth in paragraph 1.E.8.

1.B. "Project Gutenberg" is a registered trademark. It may only be used on or associated in any way with an electronic work by people who agree to be bound by the terms of this agreement. There are a few things that you can do with most Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works even without complying with the full terms of this agreement. See paragraph 1.C below. There are a lot of things you can do with Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works if you follow the terms of this agreement and help preserve free future access to Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works. See paragraph 1.E below.

1.C. The Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation ("the Foundation" or PGLAF), owns a compilation copyright in the collection of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works. Nearly all the individual works in the collection are in the public domain in the United States. If an individual work is in the public domain in the United States and you are located in the United States, we do not claim a right to prevent you from copying, distributing, performing, displaying or creating derivative works based on the work as long as all references to Project Gutenberg are removed. Of course, we hope that you will support the Project Gutenberg-tm mission of promoting free access to electronic works by freely sharing Project Gutenberg-tm works in compliance with the terms of this agreement for keeping the Project Gutenberg-tm name associated with the work. You can easily comply with the terms of this agreement by keeping this work in the same format with its attached full Project Gutenberg-tm License when you share it without charge with others.

1.D. The copyright laws of the place where you are located also govern what you can do with this work. Copyright laws in most countries are in a constant state of change. If you are outside the United States, check the laws of your country in addition to the terms of this agreement before downloading, copying, displaying, performing, distributing or creating derivative works based on this work or any other Project Gutenberg-tm work. The Foundation makes no representations concerning the copyright status of any work in any country outside the United States.

1.E. Unless you have removed all references to Project Gutenberg:

1.E.1. The following sentence, with active links to, or other immediate access to, the full Project Gutenberg-tm License must appear prominently whenever any copy of a Project Gutenberg-tm work (any work on which the phrase "Project Gutenberg" appears, or with which the phrase "Project Gutenberg" is associated) is accessed, displayed, performed, viewed, copied or distributed:

This eBook is for the use of anyone anywhere at no cost and with almost no restrictions whatsoever. You may copy it, give it away or re-use it under the terms of the Project Gutenberg License included with this eBook or online at www.gutenberg.org

1.E.2. If an individual Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work is derived from the public domain (does not contain a notice indicating that it is posted with permission of the copyright holder), the work can be copied and distributed to anyone in the United States without paying any fees or charges. If you are redistributing or providing access to a work with the phrase "Project Gutenberg" associated with or appearing on the work, you must comply either with the requirements of paragraphs 1.E.1 through 1.E.7 or obtain permission for the use of the work and the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark as set forth in paragraphs 1.E.8 or 1.E.9.

1.E.3. If an individual Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work is posted with the permission of the copyright holder, your use and distribution must comply with both paragraphs 1.E.1 through 1.E.7 and any additional terms imposed by the copyright holder. Additional terms will be linked to the Project Gutenberg-tm License for all works posted with the permission of the copyright holder found at the beginning of this work.

1.E.4. Do not unlink or detach or remove the full Project Gutenberg-tm License terms from this work, or any files containing a part of this work or any other work associated with Project Gutenberg-tm.

1.E.5. Do not copy, display, perform, distribute or redistribute this electronic work, or any part of this electronic work, without prominently displaying the sentence set forth in paragraph 1.E.1 with active links or immediate access to the full terms of the Project Gutenberg-tm License.

1.E.6. You may convert to and distribute this work in any binary, compressed, marked up, nonproprietary or proprietary form, including any word processing or hypertext form. However, if you provide access to or distribute copies of a Project Gutenberg-tm work in a format other than "Plain Vanilla ASCII" or other format used in the official version posted on the official Project Gutenberg-tm web site (www.gutenberg.org), you must, at no additional cost, fee or expense to the user, provide a copy, a means of exporting a copy, or a means of obtaining a copy upon request, of the work in its original "Plain Vanilla ASCII" or other form. Any alternate format must include the full Project Gutenberg-tm License as specified in paragraph 1.E.1.

1.E.7. Do not charge a fee for access to, viewing, displaying, performing, copying or distributing any Project Gutenberg-tm works unless you comply with paragraph 1.E.8 or 1.E.9.

1.E.8. You may charge a reasonable fee for copies of or providing access to or distributing Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works provided that

- You pay a royalty fee of 20% of the gross profits you derive from the use of Project Gutenberg-tm works calculated using the method you already use to calculate your applicable taxes. The fee is owed to the owner of the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark, but he has agreed to donate royalties under this paragraph to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation. Royalty payments must be paid within 60 days following each date on which you prepare (or are legally required to prepare) your periodic tax returns. Royalty payments should be clearly marked as such and sent to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation at the address specified in Section 4, "Information about donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation."

- You provide a full refund of any money paid by a user who notifies you in writing (or by e-mail) within 30 days of receipt that s/he does not agree to the terms of the full Project Gutenberg-tm License. You must require such a user to return or destroy all copies of the works possessed in a physical medium and discontinue all use of and all access to other copies of Project Gutenberg-tm works.
- You provide, in accordance with paragraph 1.F.3, a full refund of any money paid for a work or a replacement copy, if a defect in the electronic work is discovered and reported to you within 90 days of receipt of the work.
- You comply with all other terms of this agreement for free distribution of Project Gutenberg-tm works.

1.E.9. If you wish to charge a fee or distribute a Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work or group of works on different terms than are set forth in this agreement, you must obtain permission in writing from both the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation and Michael Hart, the owner of the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark. Contact the Foundation as set forth in Section 3 below.

1.F.

1.F.1. Project Gutenberg volunteers and employees expend considerable effort to identify, do copyright research on, transcribe and proofread public domain works in creating the Project Gutenberg-tm collection. Despite these efforts, Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works, and the medium on which they may be stored, may contain

"Defects," such as, but not limited to, incomplete, inaccurate or corrupt data, transcription errors, a copyright or other intellectual property infringement, a defective or damaged disk or other medium, a computer virus, or computer codes that damage or cannot be read by your equipment.

1.F.2. LIMITED WARRANTY, DISCLAIMER OF DAMAGES - Except for the "Right of Replacement or Refund" described in paragraph 1.F.3, the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation, the owner of the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark, and any other party distributing a Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work under this agreement, disclaim all liability to you for damages, costs and expenses, including legal fees. YOU AGREE THAT YOU HAVE NO REMEDIES FOR NEGLIGENCE, STRICT LIABILITY, BREACH OF WARRANTY OR BREACH OF CONTRACT EXCEPT THOSE PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPH F3. YOU AGREE THAT THE FOUNDATION, THE TRADEMARK OWNER, AND ANY DISTRIBUTOR UNDER THIS AGREEMENT WILL NOT BE LIABLE TO YOU FOR ACTUAL, DIRECT, INDIRECT, CONSEQUENTIAL, PUNITIVE OR INCIDENTAL DAMAGES EVEN IF YOU GIVE NOTICE OF THE POSSIBILITY OF SUCH DAMAGE.

1.F.3. LIMITED RIGHT OF REPLACEMENT OR REFUND - If you discover a defect in this electronic work within 90 days of receiving it, you can receive a refund of the money (if any) you paid for it by sending a written explanation to the person you received the work from. If you received the work on a physical medium, you must return the medium with your written explanation. The person or entity that provided you with the defective work may elect to provide a replacement copy in lieu of a refund. If you received the work electronically, the person or entity providing it to you may choose to give you a second opportunity to receive the work electronically in lieu of a refund. If the second copy is also defective, you may demand a refund in writing without further opportunities to fix the problem.

1.F.4. Except for the limited right of replacement or refund set forth in paragraph 1.F.3, this work is provided to you 'AS-IS' WITH NO OTHER WARRANTIES OF ANY KIND, EXPRESS OR IMPLIED, INCLUDING BUT NOT LIMITED TO WARRANTIES OF MERCHANTABILITY OR FITNESS FOR ANY PURPOSE.

1.F.5. Some states do not allow disclaimers of certain implied warranties or the exclusion or limitation of certain types of damages. If any disclaimer or limitation set forth in this agreement violates the law of the state applicable to this agreement, the agreement shall be interpreted to make the maximum disclaimer or limitation permitted by the applicable state law. The invalidity or unenforceability of any provision of this agreement shall not void the remaining provisions.

1.F.6. INDEMNITY - You agree to indemnify and hold the Foundation, the trademark owner, any agent or employee of the Foundation, anyone providing copies of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works in accordance with this agreement, and any volunteers associated with the production, promotion and distribution of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works, harmless from all liability, costs and expenses, including legal fees, that arise directly or indirectly from any of the following which you do or cause to occur: (a) distribution of this or any Project Gutenberg-tm work, (b) alteration, modification, or additions or deletions to any Project Gutenberg-tm work, and (c) any Defect you cause.

Section 2. Information about the Mission of Project Gutenberg-tm

Project Gutenberg-tm is synonymous with the free distribution of electronic works in formats readable by the widest variety of computers including obsolete, old, middle-aged and new computers. It exists because of the efforts of hundreds of volunteers and donations from people in all walks of life.

Volunteers and financial support to provide volunteers with the assistance they need, is critical to reaching Project Gutenberg-tm's goals and ensuring that the Project Gutenberg-tm collection will remain freely available for generations to come. In 2001, the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation was created to provide a secure and permanent future for Project Gutenberg-tm and future generations.

To learn more about the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation and how your efforts and donations can help, see Sections 3 and 4 and the Foundation web page at <https://www.pglaf.org>.

Section 3. Information about the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation

The Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation is a non profit 501(c)(3) educational corporation organized under the laws of the state of Mississippi and granted tax exempt status by the Internal Revenue Service. The Foundation's EIN or federal tax identification number is 64-6221541. Its 501(c)(3) letter is posted at <https://pglaf.org/fundraising>. Contributions to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation are tax deductible to the full extent permitted by U.S. federal laws and your state's laws.

The Foundation's principal office is located at 4557 Melan Dr. S. Fairbanks, AK, 99712., but its volunteers and employees are scattered throughout numerous locations. Its business office is located at 809 North 1500 West, Salt Lake City, UT 84116, (801) 596-1887, email business@pglaf.org. Email contact links and up to date contact information can be found at the Foundation's web site and official page at <https://pglaf.org>

For additional contact information:

Dr. Gregory B. Newby
Chief Executive and Director
gbnewby@pglaf.org

Section 4. Information about Donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation

Project Gutenberg-tm depends upon and cannot survive without wide spread public support and donations to carry out its mission of increasing the number of public domain and licensed works that can be freely distributed in machine readable form accessible by the widest array of equipment including outdated equipment. Many small donations ($1 to $5,000) are particularly important to maintaining tax exempt status with the IRS.

The Foundation is committed to complying with the laws regulating charities and charitable donations in all 50 states of the United States. Compliance requirements are not uniform and it takes a considerable effort, much paperwork and many fees to meet and keep up with these requirements. We do not solicit donations in locations where we have not received written confirmation of compliance. To SEND DONATIONS or determine the status of compliance for any particular state visit <https://pglaf.org>

While we cannot and do not solicit contributions from states where we have not met the solicitation requirements, we know of no prohibition against accepting unsolicited donations from donors in such states who approach us with offers to donate.

International donations are gratefully accepted, but we cannot make any statements concerning tax treatment of donations received from outside the United States. U.S. laws alone swamp our small staff.

Please check the Project Gutenberg Web pages for current donation methods and addresses. Donations are accepted in a number of other ways including including checks, online payments and credit card donations. To donate, please visit: <https://pglaf.org/donate> Section 5. General Information About Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works.

Professor Michael S. Hart was the originator of the Project Gutenberg-tm concept of a library of electronic works that could be freely shared with anyone. For thirty years, he produced and distributed Project Gutenberg-tm eBooks with only a loose network of volunteer support.

Project Gutenberg-tm eBooks are often created from several printed editions, all of which are confirmed as Public Domain in the U.S. unless a copyright notice is included. Thus, we do not necessarily keep eBooks in compliance with any particular paper edition.

Most people start at our Web site which has the main PG search facility:

<https://www.gutenberg.org>

This Web site includes information about Project Gutenberg-tm, including how to make donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation, how to help produce our new eBooks, and how to subscribe to our email newsletter to hear about new eBooks.

INVENTER LES ANGES
DE L'ANTIQUITÉ À BYZANCE :
CONCEPTION, REPRÉSENTATION, PERCEPTION

ORIENT ET MÉDITERRANÉE (UMR 8167) / MONDE BYZANTIN
COLLÈGE DE FRANCE / INSTITUT D'ÉTUDES BYZANTINES

TRAVAUX ET MÉMOIRES

– publication annuelle paraissant en un ou deux fascicules –

Fondés par Paul LEMERLE
Continués par Gilbert DAGRON
Dirigés par Constantin ZUCKERMAN

Comité de rédaction :

Jean-Claude CHEYNET, Vincent DÉROCHE,
Denis FEISSEL, Bernard FLUSIN

Comité scientifique :

Wolfram BRANDES (Francfort)	Peter SCHREINER (Cologne – Munich)
Jean-Luc FOURNET (Paris)	Werner SEIBT (Vienne)
Marlia MANGO (Oxford)	Jean-Pierre SODINI (Paris)
Brigitte MONDRAIN (Paris)

COLLÈGE DE FRANCE – CNRS
CENTRE DE RECHERCHE D'HISTOIRE
ET CIVILISATION DE BYZANCE

TRAVAUX ET MÉMOIRES
25/2

INVENTER LES ANGES
DE L'ANTIQUITÉ À BYZANCE : CONCEPTION, REPRÉSENTATION, PERCEPTION

édité par

Delphine LAURITZEN

© Association des Amis du Centre d'Histoire et Civilisation de Byzance – 2021

ISBN 978-2-916716-84-8
ISSN 0577-1471

Composition et infographie :
Artyom TER-MARKOSYAN VARDANYAN

DIVINE PRESENCE: GAZING UPON THE ANGELS IN EARLY BYZANTINE ART

Maria LIDOVA

Angels form an essential presence in Byzantine visual culture. Their images adorned liturgical spaces and monastic cells, as well as the secular environment of the imperial court. Although, by nature, bodiless creatures, they nevertheless took on material form and a recognizable likeness when depicted in Christian art. The context of their appearance was polyvalent, and their roles could vary from that of assisting figure or secondary member of a composition to central protagonist and recipient of public worship.

Divine messengers appeared in great numbers on the walls of Byzantine churches, and on minor religious objects, magical amulets, textiles, and small pilgrimage tokens. Surviving examples point to the abundance of angelic representations which would have surrounded the Christian believer from very early on. Already in the third–fourth century, angels were active participants in biblical scenes, although initially deprived of their distinguishing wings.¹ Around the year 400, depictions of angels acquired a set of characteristics that would continue to define their representation for centuries to come. Scholars agree that the sixth century and, most-likely, the reign of Justinian I (527–565) was the period in which the cult of angels took on unprecedented importance, and numerous churches were built in their honor—that of archangel Michael in particular—all over the empire.²

1. G. BEREFELT, A Study in the Winged Angel. The Origin of a Motif, Stockholm 1968; M. BUS-SAGLI, Gli angeli e i venti: considerazioni sul simbolismo aereo delle ali angeliche, AM 5/2, 1991, pp. 107–26; T. MARTIN, The Development of Winged Angels in Early Christian Art, ETF (art.) 14, 2001, pp. 11–29.

2. R. JANIN, Les sanctuaires byzantins de saint Michel, Échos d'Orient 37, 1934, pp. 28–50; V. SAXER, Jalons pour servir à l'histoire du culte de l'archange saint Michel en Orient jusqu'à l'iconoclasme, in Noscere sancta. Miscellanea in memoria di Agosto Amore OFM († 1982), I, Storia della Chiesa, Archeologia, Arte, Roma 1985, pp. 357–426; The Archangel Michael in Africa. History, Cult and Persona, ed. by I. S. Gilhus, A. Tsakos, and M. C. Wright, London – New York, NY 2019. This was in part connected to the belief in the healing powers of Saint Michael protecting the faithful at the time of the plague: J. HERRIN, Byzantium: The Surprising Life of a Medieval Empire, Princeton, NJ 2007, pp. 16–17.

Inventer les anges de l'Antiquité à Byzance: conception, représentation, perception.
éd. par D. LAURITZEN (Travaux et mémoires 25/2), Paris 2021.

A number of important studies, detailed encyclopedia entries and general overviews have examined the figure of the angel in Byzantium.³ The work of Glenn Peers offers an exemplary inquiry into the world of Byzantine angelic representations, yet, as this volume demonstrates, the topic remains open to debate and continues to offer various intriguing new angles and potential lines of inquiry.⁴ In the present contribution, I intend to discuss a series of visual contexts in which angels appeared, focusing primary on the pre-iconoclastic period and on certain typological roles assigned to heavenly beings in Byzantine material culture at a time when these roles were still being elaborated.

I. ANGELS AS HEAVENLY GUARDIANS IN EARLY BYZANTINE ART

In early Byzantine art, angels are most commonly depicted in pairs standing at the side of a holy figure or a sacred object. This particular iconographic pattern seems to derive not so much from literary sources, which define the appearance of angelic figures in the vast majority of visual contexts, but from the development of the angelic artistic and iconographic tradition in its own right. Flanking figures were quite common in Roman art, particularly in connection with imperial representations. Soldier guards or personifications would often be portrayed at the sides of a ruler or a high-ranking official. When depicted flanking an object or a figure, the significance of angels was restricted to that of companion and/or accompanying guardian, whilst simultaneously granting greater importance to the visual motif represented at the centre and indicating its holiness or sacred nature.⁵ The angels could also serve as mediators between the figure placed amongst them and the rest of the characters represented in the composition.

Within a great diversity of visual contexts in which angels perform the role of guardians it is possible to differentiate across two distinct axes: the visual motif alongside which they appear and the rendering of their figures. Most commonly, angels would be represented flanking Christ or the Virgin Mary. In the sixth-century church of San Michele in Africisco in Ravenna, the apse was occupied by a mosaic decoration depicting Christ as a youthful

3. To cite just a few: G. STUHLFAUTH, Die Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst, Freiburg 1897; J. DANIELOU, The Angels and Their Mission According to the Fathers of the Church, transl. by D. Heimann, New York, NY 1957; M. BUSSAGLI, Storia degli angeli. Racconto di immagini e di idee, Milano 1995; C. PROVERBIO, La figura dell'angelo nella civiltà paleocristiana, Todi 2007; Angels. The Concept of Celestial Beings: Origins, Development and Reception, ed. by F. V. Reiterer, T. Nicklas, and K. Schöpflin, Berlin – New York, NY 2007; O. AFINOGENOVA, Кульм архангела Михаила в Византийской империи (The Cult of Archangel Michael in the Byzantine Empire), Moskva 2008; E. JASTRZEBOWSKA, New Testament Angels in Early Christian Art: Origin and Sources, Światowit 8/49, 2009–2010, pp. 153–64; E. MUEHLBERGER, Angels in Late Ancient Christianity, New York, NY 2013. See also n. 4.

4. G. PEERS, Subtle Bodies. Representing Angels in Byzantium, Berkeley, CA – Los Angeles, CA – London 2001.

5. STUHLFAUTH, Die Engel, pp. 203–33 (quoted n. 3).

Fig. 1 – Apse decoration, San Michele in Africisco in Ravenna, mosaic, Museum für Spätantike und Byzantinische Kunst / Bode Museum inv. 6642, 19th-c. reconstruction of a 6th-c. decoration – photograph by © Maria Lidova.

beardless man standing between two archangels—Gabriel and Michael—equal in size and dressed in white garments (fig. 1).⁶ The mosaic, exhibited at the Bode Museum in Berlin, is basically a nineteenth-century reconstruction but it is generally accepted that it faithfully reproduces the iconography and the original design of the late antique decoration.⁷ Above the apse is another representation of Jesus, this time as a mature man with a beard depicted solemnly seated on a jewelled throne and holding a codex. Two winged guardians were represented standing at the sides of the throne while seven more angels holding trumpets appeared approaching Christ from both sides: three from the right and four from the left. Apart from images of Christ, who is depicted twice along the main axis of the apse and as many as eleven angelic representations, only two other figures were part of this

6. A. EFFENBERGER, Das Mosaik aus der Kirche San Michele in Africisco zu Ravenna: Ein Kunstwerk in der frühchristlich-byzantinischen Sammlung der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin, Berlin 1989; San Michele in Africisco e l'età giustiniana a Ravenna, a cura di C. Spadoni e L. Kniffitz, Milano 2007; D. DELIYANNIS, Ravenna in Late Antiquity, Cambridge 2010, pp. 250–4.

7. I. ANDREESCU-TREADGOLD, The Wall Mosaics of San Michele in Africisco, Ravenna, Rediscovered, CCARB 37, 1990, pp. 13–57; I. ANDREESCU-TREADGOLD, I mosaici parietali antichi e quelli otto-centeschi di S. Michele in Africisco: l'analisi filologica, in San Michele in Africisco (quoted n. 6), pp. 113–49.

decoration—the holy healers SS. Cosmas and Damian, who were originally placed on each side of the apsidal niche. The programme of the Ravenna church is quite outstanding in the particular importance it grants to the representations of angels. The heavenly beings playing the trumpets were usually interpreted as a reference to the seven angels described in the Book of Revelation 8:2 and thus allude to the day of the Second coming and Last Judgement, most likely as an eschatological response to the devastation and multiple deaths caused by the sixth-century plague.⁸ The commissioning of the programme may have been intended as a sign of gratitude for salvation on the part of the donors whose names were mentioned in the dedicatory inscription.

Although, as we will see, the garments or attitudes of angels could vary, the primary role of the retinue and heavenly guardians would remain unchanged over the centuries. Once placed at the sides of the Virgin with Child, angels would highlight the importance of Marian figure on the one hand and, on the other, would interact with the image of Baby Jesus so as to underline his heavenly, otherworldly, divine nature.⁹ In earlier scholarship it has been argued that the very appearance and significance of angelic figures in Christian art was primarily connected to theological issues and the need to substantiate the divine nature of Christ.¹⁰ The famous fifth-century mosaic decoration of Santa Maria Maggiore church in Rome, traditionally believed to have been connected to the theological discussions of the Ephesus council (431) with regard to the natures of Christ and the role of Mary, could help to substantiate this idea. The decoration of the Esquiline church offers one of the most detailed late antique Christological cycles.¹¹ A narrative focusing on the Infancy of Christ unfolds across a number of horizontal friezes which, together, frame the arch above the altar. The scenes which feature Mary and the Infant Christ alongside the main characters all include four winged attendants, whose white garments serve to highlight them amongst the bright multicoloured ‘palette’ of the mosaics.¹² The celestial nature of

8. C. RIZZARDI, I mosaici parietali di Ravenna di età giustiniana e la coeva pittura occidentale e orientale, in San Michele in Africisco (quoted n. 6), p. 83–97; D. DELIYANNIS, Ravenna, pp. 252–4 (quoted n. 6).

9. F. RADEMACHER, Die Regina Angelorum in der Kunst des frühen Mittelalters, Düsseldorf 1972; J. BARCLAY LLOYD, Mary, Queen of the Angels: Byzantine and Roman Images of the Virgin and Child Enthroned with Attendant Angels, Melbourne Art Journal 5, 2001, pp. 5–24; M. LIDOVA, The Heavenly Guard of the Mother of God: Mary between the Angels in Early Byzantine Art, in The Early Middle Ages (Bible and Women 6.1), ed. by J. Herrin and F. R. Consolino, Atlanta, GA 2020, pp. 121–66.

10. J. A. MARTIGNY, Dictionnaire des antiquités chrétiennes, Paris 1865, p. 41: “...l’Église [...] adopta l’usage de représenter Notre-Seigneur assisté de deux anges, pour marquer sa foi à la divinité et à la consubstantialité du Verbe.”

11. B. BRENNK, Die frühchristlichen Mosaiken in S. Maria Maggiore zu Rom, Wiesbaden 1975; V. SAXER, Sainte-Marie-Majeure: une basilique de Rome dans l’histoire de la ville et de son église (V^e-XIII^e siècle), Rome 2001; L’orizzonte tardoantico e le nuove immagini: 312–468. Corpus della Pittura Medievale a Roma, I, a cura di M. Andaloro, Roma 2006, pp. 306–46; G. STEIGERWALD, Die frühchristlichen Mosaiken des Triumphbogens von S. Maria Maggiore in Rom, Regensburg 2016.

12. PROVERBIO, La figura dell’angelo (quoted n. 3), pp. 71–3; LIDOVA, Heavenly Guard (quoted n. 9), pp. 124–8; pp. 142–5.

Fig. 2 – The Presentation to the Temple and Encounter with Aphrodisius (?), mosaics, Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome, 5th c. – photograph by © Maria Lidova.

the heavenly beings is revealed through the presence of wings and halos, while the red and orange tesserae used for their faces and hands most probably reflect the wide-spread conception that the nature of angels is that of the ‘devouring fire’ (fig. 2).

While certain angelic representations in the Infancy cycle of Santa Maria Maggiore—such as the descending Gabriel in the scene of the Annunciation and the angel instructing Joseph in a dream—derive from the texts, the appearance of other winged attendants is the result of artistic elaboration. This modification transforms a standard narrative plot into sacred history, indicating the continual presence of divine assistance alongside the protagonists of the holy story. Furthermore, pairs of angels positioned at the sides serve to stress the regal and authoritative nature of the Incarnate Logos and of his mother, who is depicted wearing princely robes.¹³

This tradition continues in the famous representation of Mary seated on the throne and flanked by four angels in Sant’Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna (early 6th c.) (fig. 3),¹⁴ the white garments of the angels correlate with the attire of the Baby Jesus who is seated on Mary’s lap. The significance of this similarity within the Arian milieu that commissioned this part of decoration is open to debate, but this kind of visual link between Christ and heavenly guards seems to be intentional and worth emphasizing.

13. M. LIDOVA, The Imperial Theotokos: Revealing the Concept of Early Christian Imagery in Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome, Convivium II/2, 2015, pp. 60–81.

14. E. PENNI IACCO, La basilica di S. Apollinare Nuovo di Ravenna attraverso i secoli, Bologna 2004; DELIYANNIS, Ravenna (quoted n. 6), pp. 146–74.

Fig. 3 – The Mother of God flanked by four angels, mosaic, Sant'Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna, early 6th-c.
– photograph by © Maria Lidova.

The visual formula of the Virgin Mary flanked by angels would become central to Byzantine art and, beginning from the early Byzantine period, would define the decoration of the apse in the vast majority of churches (fig. 4).¹⁵ Situated above the altar, the heavenly beings would inevitably be integrated into a complex set of liturgical associations and would form a parallel to the priests and deacons officiating in the sanctuary, emphasizing the sacred nature of the sacraments and mysteries taking place in the church. This interpretation was enhanced and rendered almost explicit in those cases when angels were represented swinging censers in the direction of Mary and Child on the throne. The late antique representations of angels with censers mainly survive in Egypt, with the chapel XXVIII in Bawit and the northern lateral apse in the decoration of the Red monastery church offering good examples of this imagery (fig. 5).¹⁶ However, later Byzantine sanctuary decorations

15. B. BRENNK, The Apse, the Image and the Icon. An Historical Perspective of the Apse as a Space for Images, Wiesbaden 2010; M. LIDOVA, Virgin Mary and the Adoration of the Magi: From Iconic Space to Icon in Space, in Icons of Space: Advances in Hierotopy, ed. by J. Bogdanović, London 2021, pp. 214–38. For the monuments in Cappadocia: C. JOLIVET-LÉVY, Les églises byzantines de Cappadoce. Le programme iconographique de l'abside et de ses abords, Paris 1991, pp. 343–4.

16. C. IHM Die Programme der christlichen Apsismalerei vom 4. Jahrhundert bis zur Mitte des 8. Jahrhunderts, Wiesbaden [1960] repr. 1992, p. 61; 203; E. BOLMAN, Monastic Visions. Wall Paintings in

Fig. 4 – The Virgin Mary and two archangels, apse decoration, mosaic, Panaghia Angeloktisti, Kiti, Cyprus, late 6th - early 7th c. – photograph by © Ekaterina Smit.

Fig. 5 – The Virgin Mary and two officiating angels, Bawit, chapel XXVIII, watercolour reproduction of the mural by Jean Clédet – ill. taken from ROCHARD, Le culte des archanges (quoted n. 40), p. 128.

could also include officiating angels with liturgical attributes, perhaps indicating that a much greater geographical dissemination of this iconography had already begun to take place in the pre-iconoclastic period.

It is noteworthy that angels-deacons are almost always depicted at the sides of the Mother of God or a representation of an altar in the scenes depicting the heavenly liturgy, but there are no examples of officiating angels flanking the figure of Christ in early Byzantine art. The censers point to the angelic performance of liturgical actions and allow for various associations to be drawn in connection with the images of Mary and Child depicted between them. They highlight the holiness of the figures but also allude more concretely to the Virgin as the throne of God and as an altar serving as the footstool for the Divine Word. Furthermore, they bring to mind the use of incense during the liturgy which was regularly, although not exclusively, performed before the reading of the Gospels in front of the codex containing the excerpts from the Evangelion which lay on top of the altar.¹⁷ The censers in the hand of the angels could also be taken as a reference to the three natures of Christ, an interpretation offered in the Ecclesiastical History attributed to Patriarch Germanos,¹⁸ and point to a more concrete reading of the image of Mary as an altar table,¹⁹ a censer, a burning coal and a recipient of the Holy Spirit.²⁰

Another occasion when Mary is represented in the company of two winged guardians is the scene of the Ascension of Christ.²¹ In the lower part of the composition, which, by the sixth century, had already acquired its definitive and well-recognizable form, the Mother of God would appear standing with her hands raised upwards in direction of the figure of Christ ascending into Heaven. The apostles, distributed into two groups on each side of the Virgin, would be depicted reacting to the event. In this scene, Mary was regularly portrayed flanked by two angels who served to create the effect of a spatial interval, a kind of caesura, between the Virgin and the apostles. The most famous early example of this arrangement is the Ascension scene in the sixth-century Rabbula Gospels from the Laurenziana Library in Florence (Laurent. Plut. I. 56. fol. 13v)²² (fig. 6) and it is this iconographic pattern that the Monastery of St. Antony at the Red Sea, New Haven, CT 2002, pp. 141–6. I am very grateful to Hélène Rochard for sharing with me the scan of the watercolour reproduction from the chapel XXVIII in Bawit.

17. R. TAFT, The Great Entrance: A History of the Transfer of Gifts and Other Pre-Anaphoral Rites, Rome 1978, pp. 149–62.

18. Germanus I. On the Divine Liturgy, transl. by J. Meyendorff, Crestwood, NY 1984, pp. 78–81.

19. BOLMAN, Monastic Visions (quoted n. 16), p. 144.

20. M. EVANGELATOU, Krater of Nectar and Altar of the Bread of Life: The Theotokos as Provider of the Eucharist in Byzantine Culture, in The Reception of the Mother of God in Byzantium: Marian Narratives in Texts and Images, ed. by Th. Arentzen and M. B. Cunningham, Cambridge 2019, pp. 77–119, here pp. 83–5.

21. E. T. DEWALD, The Iconography of the Ascension, AJA 19/3, 1915, pp. 277–319.

22. The Rabbula Gospels: facsimile edition of the miniatures of the Syriac manuscript Plut. I.56 in the Medicean-Laurentian Library, ed. by C. Cecchelli, G. Furlani, and M. Salmi, Olten 1959; Il tetravangelo di Rabbula: Firenze, Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana, Plut. I.56. L'illustrazione del nuovo testamento nella Siria del VI secolo, a cura di M. Bernabò, Roma 2008.

Fig. 6 – Ascension of Christ, Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana, Florence, Rabbula Gospels (Laur. Plut. I. 56, fol. 13v) – Wikimedia Commons, Public domain, author: Dsmgold, file: RabulaGospelsFol13vAscension.jpg would later on predominate in Byzantine art. The Virgin herself is absent from the accounts of the Ascension but, nonetheless, appears in representations of the scene together with a selection of heavenly beings whose various roles including witnesses of Christ's glory, attendants of the Lord and men directing the attention of the apostles, were variously and most insistently emphasized in the late antique homiletic tradition.²³

Angels also appear in pairs alongside the figures of certain saints. We can often find them next to images of St. Symeon the Stylite, both the Elder and the Younger.²⁴ A late antique clay token (AN1980.47) from the Ashmolean museum offers an image based on a traditional iconography for St. Symeon the Stylite which represents him on top of a pillar flanked by two flying angels, each carrying a wreath (fig. 7).²⁵ Underneath the pillar, the scene is complemented by two further compositions: on the right, Mary and Child, perhaps part of a scene representing the Adoration of the Magi, and on the left, the Baptism. Heavenly beings with their wings spread wide emphasize the importance of St. Symeon's figure and fit in well with the characteristics of the saint in literary sources, in particular in the Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius the Scholasticus, in which the saint is proclaimed 'an angel upon earth' and 'as a man, endeavouring to realize in the flesh the existence of the

Fig. 7 – St. Symeon the Stylite (the Elder), clay pilgrim token, Ashmolean Museum AN1980.47, Oxford – photograph by © Maria Lidova.

23. See a series of contributions on late antique homiletic tradition with regard to the Ascension: N. RAMBAULT, La fête de l'Ascension à Antioche d'après l'homélie de Jean Chrysostome in Ascensionem Christi, in Preaching after Easter. Mid-Pentecost, Ascension, and Pentecost in Late Antiquity, ed. by R. W. Bishop, J. Leemans, and H. Tamas, Leiden 2016, pp. 141–57; A. DUPONT, Augustine's Homiletic Appreciation of the Feast of the Ascension, in ibid., pp. 158–84; R. W. BISHOP, The Authorship, Thematics, and Reception of an Ascension Sermon Attributed to Proclus of Constantinople (CPG 5820), in ibid., pp. 185–216, here p. 193.

24. P. NOWAKOWSKI, Cult of Saints, E01648 – <http://csla.history.ox.ac.uk>.

25. The tradition of clay tokens representing the saint on a pillar would continue on, with lead pilgrim medallions depicting a similar iconography. The earlier artefacts are usually associated with St. Symeon the Elder, while the later ones with St. Symeon the Younger: J. LAFONTAINE-DOSOGNE Itinéraires archéologiques dans la région d'Antioche. Recherches sur le monastère et sur l'iconographie de Saint Syméon Stylite le Jeune, Bruxelles 1967; D. BOERO – C. KUPER, Steps toward a Study of Symeon the Stylite the Younger and His Saint's Cult, Studies in Late Antiquity 4/4, 2020, pp. 370–407; H. HUNTER-CRAWLEY, Divinity Refracted: Extended Agency and the Cult of Symeon Stylites the Elder, in Lived Religion in the Ancient Mediterranean World: Approaching Religious Transformations from Archaeology, Berlin – Boston, MA 2020, pp. 261–86.

heavenly hosts', with whom he 'unites in praising' God.²⁶ A limestone roundel relief in the Nelson Gallery—Atkins Museum in Kansas City (no. 48.10) offers yet another example, this time in relation to St. Thecla, who is depicted standing front-on with the beasts at her feet and two figures of half-length angels on each side.²⁷

Angels play an active role in numerous hagiographical accounts, appearing at the most crucial moments and saving the saint from death or public disgrace, for example when an angel descends from heaven to help St. Agnes as an attempt is made to send her to the brothel and when the Roman saint was deprived of all her clothes.²⁸ According to the martyrdom, the angel kills the son of the Roman prefect who tries to take advantage of the situation and violate the saint. Subsequently, the heavenly protector appears in bright light and offers Agnes shining white garments, described in some accounts as 'surely made by angels'.²⁹ However, we rarely see angels depicted in connection with saints in response to a particular hagiographical account. In other words, the appearance of angels besides the saints in art was not predetermined by the possibilities of a narrative plot. It can also be argued that, in the case of saints, in contrast to representations of Mary and Christ, the role of the two angels depicted on each side shifted from that of solemn guardians and official retinue to that of testimonies of holiness.³⁰ This kind of artistic rendering was primarily inspired by homilies and hagiographic texts glorifying martyrs and saints through comparison with angels.

Finally, angels could also appear flanking an altar or an empty throne or standing at the sides of the Cross, the symbol of Salvation. A silver plate from Syria dated to the sixth-seventh century and held at the Hermitage museum (inv. no. ѿ 209) offers a beautiful example of such an arrangement (fig. 8).³¹ The presence of angels pointed to the heavenly realm and emphasized the sacredness of any object placed in between. As far as the image of the altar is concerned, representations of heavenly beings could also call to mind the Holy of Holies of the Jerusalem temple and the Ark of the Covenant, which, according to the Scriptures, was decorated with the representations of cherubim. The importance

26. Evagrius Scholasticus. Ecclesiastical History, transl. by E. Walford, London 1846, 1.13.

27. Age of Spirituality: Late Antique and Early Christian Art, Third to Seventh Century, ed. by K. Weitzmann, New York, NY 1979, pp. 574–5. <https://art.nelson-atkins.org>.

28. On St. Agnes and the hagiographical accounts of the saint most recently: C. LANÉRY, Ambroise de Milan hagiographe, Paris 2008, pp. 357–61; ID., La légende de sainte Agnès: quelques réflexions sur la genèse d'un dossier hagiographique (IV^e–VI^e s.), MEFR Moyen Âge 126/1, 2014, pp. 17–26; M. LAPIDGE, The Roman Martyrs: Introduction, Translations, and Commentary, Oxford 2017, pp. 348–62.

29. M. PIGNOT, Cult of Saints, E02475 – <http://csla.history.ox.ac.uk>.

30. The echo of this visual tradition is attested in a famous representation of St. Neophytos, portrayed in a company of two winged companions in the murals decorating the Enkleistra of St. Neophytos in Paphos: C. MANGO – E. J. W. HAWKINS, The Hermitage of St. Neophytos and Its Wall Paintings, DOP 20, 1966, pp. 119–206.

31. V. ZALESSKAYA, Памятники византийского прикладного искусства IV–VII веков (Early Byzantine Minor Artworks of the 4th–7th C.), St. Petersburg 2006, pp. 67–8.

Fig. 8 – Silver plate from Syria, The State Hermitage museum, St. Petersburg, inv. n° ω 209
– photograph by © Maria Lidova.

of this reference in Christian art is well exemplified by the mosaic decoration of Germigny-des-Prés (early 9th c.).³² In Sant'Apollinare in Classe in Ravenna, we find two angels wearing military garments at the right and left edge of the arch framing the apse, this way the celestial guards appear flanking the real altar and the sanctuary space of the sixth-century church (fig.9).³³ The tradition of placing the representations of angels in proximity to the altar must have inspired the later tendency to depict two winged creatures at the side of the doorway or near the entrance of the church which is often encountered in late Byzantine and post Byzantine church decoration.³⁴ This shift from the space of the sanctuary to the entrance may have been partially connected to changing liturgical practices. The murals of the Faras cathedral (10th c.) offer one the earliest surviving attestations of this arrangement.³⁵ Hence, the angels could serve as protectors at the entrance to the church, signalling the other-worldly dimension the beholder was expected to experience at the liturgy. While maintaining a single basic form, with two winged guardians flanking a central motif, the significance of heavenly beings could nevertheless change, evolve over time, and offer different insights in light of the particular motif in question, be it a holy figure, a sacred object or an ecclesiastical space.

32. P. MEYVAERT – A. FREEMAN, The Meaning of Theodulf's Apse Mosaic at Germigny-des-Prés, Gesta 40/2, 2001, pp. 125–39; G. V. MACKIE, Theodulf of Orléans and the Ark of the Covenant: A New Allegorical Interpretation at Germigny-des-Prés, Racar 32 (1-2), 2007, pp. 45–58; I. FOLETTI, Germigny-des-Prés, il Santo Sepolcro e la Gerusalemme celeste, Convivium 1, 2014, pp. 32–49; A.-O. POILPRÉ, Le décor intérieur de l'oratoire de Germigny-des-Prés et son iconographie, Bulletin du Centre d'études médiévales. Auxerre 11, 2019 <http://journals.openedition.org/cem/16158>.

The treatment of angelic figures could also vary depending on the minor nuances that the artists wanted to implement or highlight within their work.³⁶ The pose, the likeness and the interaction with other

Fig.9 – Archangel Michael, placed at the left edge of the apse in Sant'Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna – photograph by © Maria Lidova.

33. O. VON SIMSON, Sacred Fortress: Byzantine Art and Statecraft in Ravenna, Princeton, NJ 1987, pp. 40–62; F. W. DEICHMANN, Ravenna. Hauptstadt des spätantiken Abendlandes, Wiesbaden 1969–89, I, pp. 257–77; II/2, pp. 245–80; DELIYANNIS, Ravenna (quoted n. 6), pp. 259–74.

34. G. GEROV, Angels – Entrance Guardians, Zbornik radova Vizantoloskog instituta 46, 2009, pp. 435–42; O. V. SILINA, Archangels in Mural Painting of the Façade of the Ferapontov Convent's Cathedral. On the Problem of the Developing Pictorial Tradition, Gramota 10 (84), 2017, pp. 148–52.

35. K. MICHALOWSKI, Faras, Die Kathedrale aus dem Wüstensand, Zürich – Köln 1967; M. ŁAPTAŚ, A Sphere, an Orb or a Disc? The Object Held by the Archangels in the Faras Cathedral Wall Paintings, BMNV 38, 1997, pp. 24–42, here pp. 32–4.

36. LIDOVA, The Heavenly Guard (quoted n. 9).

elements of the composition could bear different meanings and convey slightly different messages to the viewer. The bending figures prostrating their hands and depicted as if offering the gifts produced an impression dissimilar to the front-on appearances and stiffness of angels in other contexts. Officiating angels caught as they swing the incense-burner conveyed ideas of liturgical performance, which had minor relevance for when angels were depicted alongside the throne of Christ or standing at the sides of the Virgin Mary and acting as intermediaries.

The greatest distinction lies in the choice of angelic costumes, ranging from high-ranking military attire often characterized by the presence of a chlamys or loros to traditional pallia and tunics. These seemingly minor differences in the outfit were an issue of debate for early Christian theologians,³⁷ as attested in the famous passage from the homily of Severus of Antioch (d. 538), whose views were later used or, better, misconstrued in the polemics of the Nicaea II Council in 787. In the Homily 72, believed to have been pronounced in the church of St. Michael on the occasion of the deposition of relics of holy martyrs Procopius and Phocas, Severus discusses the pagan and Christian ways and offers, as an example, the futile attempts of some painters to enhance the importance of angels by representing them in imperial robes:

But the ministering, intelligible, and heavenly spirits are not of these kinds. For they have within themselves such an intense fear that they are near to God, and they tremble at his awesome sublimity. [...] But the presumptuous hand of the painters, being a law unto itself since it condones the fictions of pagan illusions regarding idolatry, and planning everything for profit, clothes Michael and Gabriel in the manner of lords or kings with a royal robe of purple, adorns them with a crown, and places in their right hand the sign of rulership and universal authority [this refers to a sceptre or an orb]. For these reasons, and ones which are like them, those who so senselessly honour the angels depart from the church and transgress her laws: those who ordered and set in place the holy canons have placed these people under anathema.³⁸

It is worth pointing out that the particular attention of Severus to the role and figure of angels in this particular homily was most probably predetermined by the location, which was consecrated in the honour of Archangel Michael.³⁹ His rhetoric was very much inspired by the desire to draw a link between martyrs and heavenly beings, as well as to instruct the congregation in the appropriate conduct that would keep them safe from violating the laws and grant them the protection of the church. Notwithstanding the opposition against the royal treatment of angelic figures and the concrete earthly associations that it brings,

37. See also: PEERS, Subtle Bodies (quoted n. 4)

38. Sev. Ant., Homily 72, P. ALLEN and C. T. R. HAYWOOD, Severus of Antioch, London 2004, pp. 126–32.

39. PEERS, Subtle Bodies (quoted n. 4), pp. 74–8.

this type of imagery became particularly popular all over the Byzantine empire.⁴⁰ The nature of the depicted attire would also imply the use of varying attributes: the spear and labarum for the loros-bearing type and sceptres for the white classicizing garments; while the spheres or discs were used interchangeably starting from the sixth century onwards.⁴¹ To sum up, the approach to angelic figures as guardians in early Byzantine art was much more variegated and context-specific than it has generally been assumed. When represented in pairs, the role of angels was confined to as the role of significant, but still complementary motif. In contrast—as will be discussed in the next section—the angels who appeared in narrative compositions served as the conveyers of God's will and divine agents who set the story in motion.

II. ANGELS AS DIVINE AGENTS IN THE IVORY RELIEFS OF THE MURANO DIPTYCH

Byzantine art offers a wide range of images and pictorial contexts in its depictions of heavenly beings. In order to avoid overly-extensive discussion of this abundance of monuments, I have chosen to concentrate on one particular artwork that, in my view, offers an opportunity to analyse the various roles assigned to angels in Byzantine visual culture and narrative compositions. The artefact in question is an ivory relief, known as the Murano diptych, a name deriving from the attested provenance of one of the parts of the diptych, currently held at the Ravenna National Museum (inv. no. 1002).⁴²

40. C. LAMY-LASSALLE, Les archanges en costume impérial dans la peinture murale italienne, in Synthronon. Art et archéologie de la fin de l'Antiquité et du Moyen Âge, Paris 1968, pp. 189–98; C. MANGO, St. Michael and Attis, Δελτιον 12, 1984–1986, pp. 39–45; G. PEERS, Patriarchal Politics in the Paris Gregory (B.N. gr. 510), JÖB 47, 1997, pp. 51–71, here pp. 53–7; C. JOLIVET-LÉVY, Note sur la représentation des archanges en costume impérial dans l'iconographie byzantine, CArch 46, 1998, pp. 121–8; H. ROCHARD, Le culte des archanges en Égypte byzantine et au début de l'époque arabe: le témoignage des peintures de Baouît, Études Coptes 15, 2018, pp. 117–36, here pp. 124–7.

41. On the role of this attribute and its various and changing identifications: M. ŁAPTAŚ, A Sphere, an Orb or a Disc? (quoted n. 35) For loros: N. P. ŠEVČENKO, Loros, in The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, dir. by A. P. Kazhdan, II, pp. 1251–2; M. G. PARANI, Reconstructing the Reality of Images: Byzantine Material Culture and Religious Iconography, 11th–15th Centuries, Leiden 2003, pp. 18–27. For the role of loros in the representations of angels: M. ŁAPTAŚ, Byzantine Influence on Nubian Painting: The Loroi and the Gender of the Archangels, BZ 114/1, 2021, pp. 241–56.

42. One of the first authors discussing the Ravenna part of the ivory in relation to representations of angels was STUHLFAUTH, Die Engel (quoted n. 3), p. 227. On the Ravenna relief: K. WESSEL, Il dittico di Murano dalle cinque parti e la sua cerchia, CCARB 1, 1958, pp. 111–27; W. F. VOLBACH, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz [1916] 1976, no. 127, p. 87; Age of Spirituality (quoted n. 27), pp. 531–2; E. CRISTOFERI, Il restauro del « Dittico di Murano ». Studio per la ricomposizione strutturale di un avorio del Museo Nazionale di Ravenna, Kermes 12, 1991, pp. 34–9; C. RIZZARDI, Osservazioni sull'iconografia del dittico di Murano, Felix Ravenna 82, 1994, pp. 142–51; ID., Il « Dittico di Murano » conservato nel museo nazionale di Ravenna: aspetti e problematiche, in Historiam pictura refert. Miscellanea in onore di padre Alejandro Recio Véganzones, Città del Vaticano

The association of the ivory with one of the Venetian islands is based on testimony from a three-volume edition of diptychs and various religious ivory artefacts produced by Antonio Francesco Gori in the eighteenth century, in which the author indicates that the relief belonged to the collection of the Camaldolese monastery of St. Michael on Murano.⁴³

Originally, the Ravenna ivory, measuring 35.7 by 30.8 cm, served as one part of a book cover, attached, most probably, to a liturgical codex containing the Gospels (fig. 10). The relief is composed of five parts and focuses on the figure of Christ, who is depicted in the central panel seated on a throne and surrounded by four male figures. These figures consist of two bearded men, usually identified as SS. Peter and Paul, and two youths, who appear as if standing behind Christ, with their curly hair and beardless chins conveying the characteristic likeness of angels. On the same panel, beneath the figure of Christ, a separate rectangular section comprises an Old Testament scene depicting the Three Hebrews in the Furnace, whilst another biblical subject—the story of Jonah—occupies the horizontal ivory board placed at the bottom of the Ravenna relief. Both sides of the central panel are flanked by vertically-oriented rectangular plaques, each containing two scenes depicting the Miracles of Christ: the Healing of the Blind and the Possessed on the left, and the Raising of Lazarus and the Healing of the Paralytic, on the right. Jesus is represented in each scene as a young man holding a staff topped with a cross, and his healing action is indicated by the raised gesture of his right hand, with two pointing fingers.

The second side of the cover did not survive intact, but was divided into a number of separate fragments. Four of the five original ivory panels survive, and are now distributed between the Rylands library in Manchester (central panel),⁴⁴ the Louvre in Paris (bottom board),⁴⁵ the Bode Museum in Berlin (top board) and the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg (two narrative scenes once adjoining the central panel, most likely 1994, pp. 485–96. On early Byzantine ivory covers: J. LOWDEN, The Word Made Visible: The Exterior of the Early Christian Books as Visual Argument, in The Early Christian Book, Washington, DC 2007, pp. 13–47, here pp. 41–3. For Ravenna as a centre of ivory production: M. C. CARILE, Ivory Production: Commerce, Culture and Power, in Ravenna and the Traditions of Late Antique Craftsmanship, ed. by S. Cosentino, Berlin 2020, pp. 115–52.

43. A. F. GORI, Thesaurus veterum diptychorum consularium et ecclesiasticorum, tum eiusdem auctoris cum aliorum lucubrationibus inlustratus ac in tres tomos divisus, Florentiae 1759, III, tab. VIII, pp. 41–68. The evidence found in this volume was based on the Anselmo Costadoni's description of the ivory compiled in 1748.

44. D. V. AINALOV, Chast' Ravenskogo diptikha v sobranii grafa Krauforda (Part of the Ravenna Diptych in the Count Crawford Collection), Византийский временник 5/1–2, 1898, pp. 153–86; VOLBACH, Elfenbeinarbeiten (quoted n. 42), no. 127, p. 88.

45. D. V. AINALOV, Chast' Ravenskogo diptikha v sobranii grafa G.S. Stroganova (Part of the Ravenna Diptych in the collection of Count G. S. Stroganov), Византийский временник 4/1–2, 1897, pp. 128–42; VOLBACH, Elfenbeinarbeiten (quoted n. 42), no. 128, p. 88 (quoted n. 42); Ivoires médiévaux, V^e-XV^e siècle, éd. par D. Gaborit-Chopin, Paris 2003, pp. 60–2.

Fig. 10 – The panel of the so-called Murano diptych, ivory, The Ravenna National Museum, inv. n. 1002, 6th c.
– photograph by © Maria Lidova.

on the left) (fig. 11).⁴⁶ The identification of these fragments as parts of the Ravenna relief was—with the exception of the Berlin fragment—already established by the late nineteenth century thanks to the undertakings of two leading byzantinists of the time—Dmitry Ainalov and Josef Strzygowski.⁴⁷

This dismembered panel of the Murano diptych is Marian in character, since the Mother of God features as the central image of its complex programme.⁴⁸ The differentiation between the two leaves of the diptych, one focusing on Christ and the other one on the Virgin, was common in the sixth century and is encountered in two other early examples of early Byzantine ivory covers—the Bible of St. Lupicin (BNF, MS lat. 9384) and the Etchmiadzin Gospel in Matenadaran in Erevan (MS 2374).⁴⁹ The Murano diptych shares a lot of similarities with these two artefacts, but at the same time it stands out with regard to style, overall programme, and a range of iconographical details. The differences may be connected to the place of production, which, in the case of the Murano diptych, remains unknown since the reliefs and its various constituent parts are variously attributed to Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Asia Minor and, more specifically, Constantinople.⁵⁰

While the central image of the Marian sides of the Paris and Erevan covers consists of a representation of the Virgin flanked by two angels, the Murano diptych places the figure of the Mother of God within a narrative composition—the scene of the Adoration of the Magi. On each side of Mary appears a male figure, offering gift with outstretched hands, 46. J. STRZYGOWSKI, Zwei weitere Stücke der Marientafel zum Diptychon von Murano, BZ 8, 1899, pp. 678–81; A. V. BANK, Byzantine Art in Soviet Collections, Leningrad 1966, I, pp. 129–30; V. N. ZALESSKAYA, Памятники византийского прикладного искусства (quoted in n. 31), p. 147.

47. M. LIDOVA, The Murano Diptych. A Late Nineteenth-Century Quest for Early Byzantine Ivory Cover, in Actual Problems of History and Theory of Art 11, 2021, forthcoming.

48. On Marian imagery in ivory: A. CUTLER, The Mother of God in Ivory, in Mother of God: Representations of the Virgin in Byzantine Art, ed. by M. Vassilaki, Milan 2000, pp. 167–75. Although it is hard to agree with Cutler's opinion that in ivories, such as that of St. Lupicin, Mother of God "is a pendant to her son rather than the object of single-minded devotion," p. 167.

49. J. STRZYGOWSKI, Das Etchmiadzin-Evangeliar. Beiträge zur Geschichte der armenischen, raven-natischen und syro-ägyptischen Kunst, Wien 1891; LOWDEN, The Word Made Visible (quoted n. 42), pp. 38–41; Th. F. MATHEWS, The Early Armenian Iconographic Program of the Ejmiacin Gospel (Erevan, Matenadaran Ms 2374, Olim 229), in East of Byzantium: Syria and Armenia in the Formative Period, ed. by N. G. Garsoïan, Th. F. Matthews, and R. W. Thomson, Washington, DC 1982, pp. 199–215; V. NERSESSIAN, Treasures from the Ark. 1700 Years of Armenian Christian Art, Los Angeles, CA 2001, pp. 157–8. On St. Lupicin Gospel, with detailed bibliography: <https://archivesetmanuscrs.bnf.fr>, Évangiles dits de Saint-Lupicin.

50. J.-P. Caillet argues in favor of the idea that all surviving five-part ivories belong to the middle of the sixth century and must have been produced in Constantinople: J.-P. CAILLET, Remarques sur l'iconographie Christo-Mariale des grands diptyques d'ivoire du VI^e siècle. Incidences éventuelles quant à leur datation et origine, in Spätantike und byzantinische Elfenbeinbildwerke im Diskurs, hrsg. von G. Bühl, A. Cutler und A. Effenberger, Wiesbaden 2008, pp. 17–29. However, this proposition requires further investigation and holistic analysis of the available material evidence.

Fig. 11 – Reconstruction of the Marian panel of the so-called Murano Gospel book cover, ivory, 6th c.
 = The Rylands library in Manchester, the Louvre Museum in Paris, the Bode Museum in Berlin, the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg – photographs and assemblage by © Maria Lidova.

which are covered with a cloth. On the right, behind the left shoulder of the Mother of God, it is possible to see the third Magus awaiting his turn. His figure is counterbalanced on the other side by a winged angel assisting one of the Magi in his offering. In the lower part of this panel are the events leading up to the Adoration, with a Nativity scene depicting Mary, who is lying on a mattress, Joseph, who is standing beside her, and the Baby Jesus, who appears wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a crib made of bricks. The ox and the ass direct their gazes towards the Infant while, in front of the crib, the midwife Salomé stretches out her withered right hand with remorse for her doubts regarding Mary's virginity, just before she is about to receive a miraculous cure.⁵¹

The other narrative scenes on this side of the ivory cover all represent some kind of temporal flash back, depicting the series of events leading up to the Nativity and the Adoration which appear in the central panel. On the board which now is in the Louvre, and was once to be found at the bottom of the relief, three different scenes were combined together reading from left to right: the Annunciation, the Ordeal of the Bitter Water, and the Flight to Egypt. Two further compositions, which were once to be found on a vertical panel flanking the central element, are quite unique in nature, since they offer one of the earliest artistic examples of the apocryphal narrative focusing on St. Anna, the mother of Mary.⁵² Here again the chronological principle is reversed, with the subject of the lower scene preceding the one appearing above. In the first composition, a servant belonging to St. Anna addresses her mistress, offering her a headband and saying that 'the great day of the Lord is near' and that it is no longer the right time to mourn.⁵³ In the scene which was once placed above it, Anna is represented seated at the feet of a laurel tree addressing the Lord and pointing to the birds singing in the branches in a manner which corresponds to her words that 'even the birds of the heaven are fruitful before Lord.'⁵⁴ On the right, a winged messenger appears to St. Anna, announcing that she will soon become a mother. Two further scenes which once formed part of this extensive narrative have been lost, together with the side panel, but it can be tentatively suggested that these would have featured either Joachim or Mary as a child, complementing the existing selection of scenes taken from the apocrypha.

51. G. J. M. VAN LOON, The Virgin and the Midwife Salomé, ECA 3, 2006, pp. 81–104; M. M. MAT-TISON, Responsible Midwifery or Reckless Disbelief? Revisiting Salomé's Examination of Mary in "The Protevangelium Jacobi", in Mary, the Apostle, and the Last Judgment. Apocryphal Representations from Late Antiquity to the Middle Ages, ed. by S. Kuzmová and A.-B. Znorovsky, Budapest 2020, pp. 3–22.

52. Unfortunately, the imagery of the Murano diptych was not included in the selection of visual sources in relation to the figures of St. Anna collected in the recent monograph by Eirini Panou, but this offers a very rich and important discussion of the saint's cult and imagery: E. Panou, The Cult of St Anna in Byzantium, London 2018.

53. J. K. ELLIOT, The Apocryphal New Testament: A collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation, Oxford, 1994, pp. 57–8.

54. Ibid., p. 58.

Both parts of the Murano cover were topped by a horizontal ivory board occupied entirely by angelic figures. The central motif, depicting a pair of flying winged figures holding a wreath with a cross, was a common choice for the sixth-century ivory covers and is also encountered in the St. Lupicin Bible and the Etchmiadzin Gospel.⁵⁵ Although the overall visual rendering is very similar in the case of all three ivories, minor but significant differences can be observed within what seems to be the same iconographic scheme. In the Paris cover, the angels are represented holding codices in their hands covered with pieces of ornamented cloth—a potential reference to the book that the ivory reliefs were decorating, among other things. The codices are entirely missing in the Etchmiadzin Gospel cover and the angels are represented with their arms spread open to grasp the upper and lower edges of the wreath containing the image of the cross. At the edges of the scene, however, we find two minor allegorical representations, embodying the Sun and the Moon in the form of half-length figures. This brings an additional heavenly dimension to the representation of angels and serves to evoke the idea of time and the perpetual interchanging of day and night. In the case of the Murano ivory, the angels closely resemble the positioning and gestures of the bodiless figures on the Etchmiadzin Gospel, but the planetary symbols are missing.

The triumphant nature of this representation, showing the two angels holding a wreath, was clearly inspired by Roman iconography of the flying Victories (Nikae). This image was particularly popular in late antiquity, appearing in ivories, on sarcophagi and textiles and, most importantly, in church decoration.⁵⁶ Here, the image of flying angels would often take its place above the altar, clearly alluding to heavenly hierarchies and visually glorifying the symbol of the cross at the summit of the arch encompassing the sanctuary. The most significant surviving visual testimony for this kind of arrangement is to be found in the sixth-century mosaics of St. Catherine's monastery at Sinai.⁵⁷ The glorious character of the scene, and the dynamic rendering of the flying figures which serves to convey a sense of motion and of the flow of the air, emphasize the curve of the arch and draw a distinctive borderline between different parts of the apse decoration. It can be argued that the ivories follow a similar principle, placing the flying messengers at the top and thus establishing a sense of hierarchy within the distribution of scenes which, on the panel kept in Ravenna, appear to descend progressively downwards from the heavenly realm, beginning with depictions of angelic figures, before moving on to an atemporal image of Christ as ruler, an image which is complemented by the earthly history of the Gospel narratives, before concluding with the representations of scriptural events located at the bottom. Furthermore, the angels

55. For the discussion of this motif: STRZYGOWSKI, Das Etschmiadzin-Evangeliar (quoted n. 48), pp. 33–5.

56. See the discussion of this imagery in D. Lauritzen's paper in this volume.

57. H. G. FORSYTH – K. WEITZMANN, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Church and Fortress of Justinian, Ann Arbor, MI 1965.

holding a wreath were placed directly on the central axis so that this symbol of victory appears above the image of Christ enthroned and above the Baby Jesus seated on the lap of the Virgin, thus enhancing the idea of the glorification on the part of divine forces.

The upper boards of the Murano diptychs are distinguished by the fact that each includes not just two but four angelic representations. In addition to the pair elevating the cross within a wreath, we find figures of angels wearing military garments and holding spheres and long staffs in the form of a long pole with a cross.⁵⁸ Placed at the edges, they appear as heavenly guards, in stiff frontal poses with wings held open behind their backs. Despite the tiny dimensions of the figures, the carver paid special attention to the military costumes which consist of a long chlamys falling down from the right shoulder, a girdle, and boots. The way in which these angels are rendered differs significantly from the elegant, classicizing, contrapposto poses of the flying celestial beings represented in between them, indicating the ability of the artists to draw a clear distinction between different types of angels. The conceptions and ideas that would have determined the use and reading of these representations in the sixth century often elude the attention of scholars, but their significance is clearly evident in works such as the Ravenna diptych and calls for a more nuanced differentiation between angelic representations in early Byzantine art.

In the narrative cycle dedicated to the miracles of Christ the angels are missing and each scene is composed of just two figures. However, both Old Testament scenes include the representation of an angel (fig. 12). The appearance of the divine messenger alongside the three Babylonian youths who were condemned to death because of their refusal to worship the statue of a false god is quite common in late antique art and follows the biblical text, according to which “the angel of the Lord went down unto with Azarias and his companions into the furnace: and he drove the flame of fire out...and made the midst of the furnace like the blowing of a wind bringing dew” (Dan. 3:49-50).⁵⁹ Late antique examples characterized by the iconography similar to the one found on the Murano ivory include the famous Sinai icon (7th c.?) and the carved stone relief in the Coptic Museum in Cairo (inv. no. 6495, dated to the 6th-7th c.).⁶⁰ They all attest to an early Byzantine visual tradition in which the representation of the celestial intervener acquired distinctive Christological features,⁶¹ manifested in the presence of the cross atop a staff with the help of which the angel is depicted extinguishing the fire.

58. Ainalov believed that they must represent four archangels: Michael, Gabriel, Rafael and Uriel.

59. C. CARLETTI, I tre giovani ebrei di Babilonia nell'arte cristiana antica, Brescia 1975.

60. M. RASSART-DEBERGH, Les trois hébreux dans la fournaise en Égypte et en Nubie chrétiennes, RSO 58, 1984 (1987), pp. 141-51; Coptic Art in the Coptic Museum, Cat. no. 16; K. CORRIGAN, The Three Hebrews in the Fiery Furnace. An Early Byzantine Icon at Mt. Sinai, in Anathēmata eortika. Studies in Honor of Thomas F. Mathews, ed. by J. D. Alchermes, H. C. Evans, and Th. K. Thomas, Mainz 2009, pp. 93-103.

61. For general discussion on Christology of angels: D. D. HANNAH, Michael and Christ: Michael Traditions and Angel Christology in Early Christianity, Tübingen 1999.

Fig. 12 – The Healing of the Possessed, the Three Hebrews in the Fiery Furnace, Jonah under the Gourd plant, ivory, fragment of the so-called Murano diptych in Ravenna (fig. 10) – photograph by © Maria Lidova.

The lower panel of the Ravenna relief ‘narrates’ the story of Jonah divided into two separate scenes.⁶² On the right of the panel, Jonah is depicted being thrown away from the boat and into the sea where the sea monster is awaiting ready to swallow him up. The monster appears again on the left, as if tamed by Jonah, who is lying on top of the monster and under the gourd plant which has sprung up to shelter him from the sun. Right at the centre, between two scenes, one defined by a marine landscape, the other alluding to rural context, a winged messenger is represented addressing Jonah. Any mention of an angel is absent from the Book of Jonah and, as a rule, the figure of the angel is omitted in representations of Jonah under the gourd in early Christian art. However, there are several exceptions which follow the same iconographic pattern as that found on the 62. On iconography of Jonah in early Christian Art: B. NARKLISS, The Sign of Jonah, Gesta 18/1, 1979, pp. 63–76, on angels p. 68; S. J. DAVIS, Jonah in Early Christian Art: Allegorical Exegesis and the Roman Funerary Context, Australian Religion Studies Review 13/1, 2000, pp. 72–83.

Murano ivory.⁶³ In these, the angel takes the place of the Lord of Israel, addressing Jonah in an attempt to explain the mercy granted to the citizens of Nineveh. The pose of the heavenly messenger on the Ravenna relief and the gesture of the raised right hand, not to mention the likeness, echo the figure of Christ in the scenes of the Miracles. Both subjects—the Three Youths in the Furnace and the story of Jonah—have been read and interpreted by early Christian writers as prefiguring the coming of Christ, his death on the Cross and his resurrection. Thus, within the narrative unfolding in the ivory, angels act not only as the conveyers of the divine will in accordance with the biblical text, but also serve as counterpart representations of Christ himself, linking the realities of the Old and New Testament into a single narrative and bringing all the events together as a continuous realization of the divine plan.

In the narrative compositions of the Marian side of the Murano diptych the figure of an angel takes up the role of the divine messenger announcing the Lord's will to Mary and St. Anna, and that of celestial companion assisting the magi approaching Mary in the central panel whilst also guiding the ass that carries the Virgin Mary in the representation of the Flight into Egypt. The visual similarity offers the possibility to draw a parallel between St. Anna receiving the news of her forthcoming pregnancy and the depiction of the Virgin Mary, since both are represented in a sitting position as they are addressed by angels who are approaching them from the right. The presence of the divine messenger is justified in both instances by the Gospel narratives and apocryphal texts. More peculiar is the situation with other compositions. Depictions of the angel who leads the ass and guides the Holy Family on their journey to Egypt or who appears at the moment of Adoration does not rely on a specific textual evidence, but more on inferences surrounding the active participation of angels in the Nativity events and the journey to Egypt. In a similar manner to the presence of angels as accompanying guardians alongside the Mother of God or Christ, the integration of divine agents in the scene of the Adoration of the Magi or the Flight to Egypt was the result of artistic elaboration and modification of existing visual patterns in order to convey the sacred nature of the events and the presence of divine assistance at every stage of the sacred history.

The overall programme of the Murano ivory diptych originally consisted of 16 compositions, of which 14 survive and include as many as 15 angelic representations, ranging from narrative compositions based on biblical and apocryphal accounts to scenes in which the presence of bodiless beings is justified in its own right and evokes the heavenly realm or the celestial protection. The density of the angelic presence distinguishes the Murano diptych from other surviving ivory covers of the time. However, a comparison with an ivory recently purchased by the Cluny Museum in Paris (inv. Cl. 23898), although known to the researchers as the Trebizond ivory for a long time, can supply further evidence.⁶⁴ The panel in question most probably represents a central piece from a dismembered five-part diptych and its iconography and style bear comparison to the imagery of the Ravenna relief. Christ is represented enthroned surrounded by two angels and two apostles. In the small scene below his feet, however, two approaching angels carrying gifts are depicted adoring the figure of a cross. The Cluny ivory serves as an additional testimony to the existence of ivory covers similar to the so-called Murano diptych and to the significant role that angels could play in the carved decoration of these artworks. Taking into account that the narrative cycle of the Murano diptych reproduces detailed pictorial monumental programmes on a smaller scale, it becomes an important testimony to the role that angels played in church decoration of the time.

63. For example, the 6th-century pyxis at the Hermitage Museum: K. SANDIN, Salvation, Correctness, and Healing: Aspects of the Reception of a Sixth-Century Jonah Pyxis in St. Petersburg, Studies in Iconography 17, 1998, pp. 67–93, on presence of angels in this scene and other examples—here pp. 77–8; p. 80; ZALESSKAYA, Памятники византийского прикладного искусства (quoted n. 31), p. 148.

Even a selective analysis of the surviving imagery allows to suggest that the population of scenes depicting the events of the Old and New Testament with angelic presence was one of the distinguishing features of Early Christian art: on the one hand, celestial beings took the place previously assigned to various allegorical figures and secondary members of the composition, on the other, the integration of winged, bodiless, supernatural beings into a visual narrative of earthly events was quite unprecedented and daring on the part of late antique artists.

Very few narrative cycles survive from the fifth-sixth century, many more are known thanks to textual evidence.⁶⁵ The sequences of images which appear on ivory reliefs of the Gospel book covers such as the Murano diptych provide further evidence for the detailed narrative cycles that once formed part of the visual experience and everyday life of a late antique viewer. In a similar manner to the mosaics of Santa Maria Maggiore, some of these decorations must have included a great number of angelic representations. As these representations migrated from one scene to another and from one part of the building to another, they would have filled the church with an angelic presence. It is this exaltation of celestial beings and their prominence in an ecclesiastical environment that must have sparked a resistance on the part of early theologians,⁶⁶ such as Severus of Antioch, especially when it was not justified by practical reasons or need to follow a concrete gospel account.

64. VOLBACH, Elfenbeinarbeiten (quoted n. 41), p. 90. <https://www.musee-moyenage.fr>, Plaque d'ivoire dit de Trébizonde.

65. The bishop of Gaza Chorikios wrote a detailed description of the sixth-century decoration that he saw on the walls of the St. Sergius church in Gaza. Neither the church nor its murals and mosaics have survived, but they are known exclusively via this written record. F.-M. ABEL, Gaza au VI^e siècle d'après le rhéteur Chorikios, Revue biblique 40/1, 1931, pp. 5–31; G. DOWNEY, Gaza in the Sixth Century, Norman, OK 1963, pp. 127–9; C. MANGO, The Art of the Byzantine Empire, 312-1453: Sources and Documents, Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1972, pp. 60–8.

66. Canon 35 of the fourth-century Council of Laodicea outlawed angelolatry, see R. H. CLINE, Ancient Angels: Conceptualizing Angeloi in the Roman Empire, Leiden 2011, ch. 6.

On the walls of churches, angels acted as messengers of the divine will and as guardians flanking Jesus and the Mother of God, they also acted as divine agents whose role was not restricted simply to conveyance of the story and revealing its hidden meaning, but could also engage the beholder standing in the church. Angels take the role of intermediaries which is not limited to the two-dimensional realm, since their gestures and actions also served to address the viewer and to engage the worshiper. By directing the gaze of the apostles in the Ascension, or by assisting the magi approaching Mary and Christ in the Epiphany, angels conveyed a message to the beholder. In a similar manner, angels highlight a symbol, an object or a figure to be venerated when appearing at its sides. They also bring together the realities of the Old and New Testament into an uninterrupted sequence, marking both with the same heavenly presence. We can see, then, that angels played an additional subtle and seldom acknowledged function in art—that of role-models unobtrusively shaping the perception and appropriate conduct of the worshipper.⁶⁷ This becomes particularly relevant if we consider the importance of becoming like angels within early Christian culture.⁶⁸ We can see this on a number of different levels: from the personal, often monastic,⁶⁹ path to salvation in which the individual hoped to approach the immaterial state of heavenly beings through fasting, prayer and denial of the flesh to allusions to the presence of angels alongside the congregation at the liturgy,⁷⁰ where human and celestial mystically interact in their joint worship of God. The latter aspect, in particular, adds new meaning to the role of angelic representations in a church and offers additional insights with regard to visual strategies that aimed to cross the boundaries between the divine and earthly dimensions in Christian art.

Maria Lidova

Moscow, Russian Academy of Sciences

67. Similar, although not identical, to the function of the ‘pathetic figures of framing’ introduced by Louis Marin: L. MARIN, On Representation, transl. by C. Porter, Stanford 2001, p. 358. For the application of Marin’s theory to Byzantine artworks: G. PEERS, Sacred Shock: Framing Visual Experience in Byzantium, University Park, PA 2004.

68. See for example the discussion concerning ‘the equality with angels’ and ‘human-angelic collaboration’ in E. KLEIN, Augustine’s Theology of Angels, Cambridge 2018, pp. 72–109.

69. ROCHARD, Le culte des archanges (quoted n. 40), pp. 127–31. See also the paper by Marie-Emanuelle Torres in this volume.

70. In addition to already cited bibliography: E. PETERSON, The Angels and the Liturgy, transl. by R. Walls, New York, NY 1964. Originally published as Das Buch von den Engeln: Stellung und Bedeutung der heiligen Engel im Kultus, Leipzig 1935. See also the paper by Eirini Afentoulidou in this volume.

RÉSUMÉS – ABSTRACTS

Komait ABDALLAH, L'iconographie des anges en Syrie à l'époque byzantine p. 521

The archaeological work in Syria has revealed evidence about the existence of angel's cult in Late Antiquity, well attested by the texts of the Syriac church fathers. The majority are epigraphic documents. Less known than epigraphy, iconography also testify the spread of this cult. The image of the angels is found on buildings, especially in churches, and on devotional objects. These iconographic documents confirm widespread use of the images of the angels in Syria in the Byzantine era and the relations with the propagation of their cult in the region at that time.

Eirini AFENTOULIDOU, Ministering spirits, guardians, intercessors: the discourse of angels in Byzantine liturgical texts p. 631

This chapter focuses on Christian ritual texts encountered in the liturgical books of the Byzantine Church, notably priestly prayers, and hymns. These texts bear witness to different angelologies. Angels are not equally present in all these texts and whenever they are present, their function varies. In priestly prayers, angels appear as ministering spirits at the throne of God and they protect human beings at God's command, according to the angelology codified by church authorities. Some prayers for protection in lay spaces go a step further in asking for protection through guardian angels, appropriating elements from non-liturgical traditions. From the 7th-8th centuries onwards hymns dedicated to the angels, notably Michael and Gabriel, proliferate. In these, angels become more and more humanised, and their veneration resembles the cult of saints.

Stéphanie ANTHONIOZ, Mutations angéliques ? p. 3

Written in the 2nd century BCE, the book of Daniel testifies to an unprecedented angelic interest (Dn 9:2Salamyeh; 10:5-6.13.21), confirmed by Qumran manuscripts, the Gospels and the apocryphal literature as a whole. Though angels are little known in the Hebrew Bible, they become the object of new theological speculations. The question of the birth of an angelology is not new, but it is not easy to write its history. It is clearly concentrated between the period of the closure of the Torah/Pentateuch, in the Persian-Achaemenid period, and the first centuries of the Christian era. This birth seems to be related to some particular traditions and not all texts reflect this new interest. In order to shed light on these developments, we first consider the etymology and semantics of the root *l'k. We then study the angel mal'āk among other mediating entities of the divine. This will allow us to propose an in-depth examination of the biblical angels, before questioning the historical and theological conditions of these evolutions.

Inventer les anges de l'Antiquité à Byzance : conception, représentation, perception.
éd. par D. LAURITZEN (Travaux et mémoires 25/2), Paris 2021.

Luc BRISSON, Les anges chez Proclus

p. 173

In his Elements of Theology, Proclus (5th c.) situates angels, along with demons and heroes, at a specific level of the hierarchy of his metaphysical system, seemingly adopting a tripartition derived from the Chaldean Oracles. In so doing, he remains faithful to the project of the Neoplatonic School of Athens, which aimed at demonstrating the agreement between the scientific theology of Plato, as set forth in the second part of the Parmenides, and the Orphic Rhapsodies and the Chaldean Oracles. We are thus in a context in which philosophy has become theology: a scientific theology opposed to Christianity, and derived from the allegorical interpretation of the central myth of the Phaedrus and the Myth of Er in Book X of the Republic.

Béatrice CASEAU, Jean-Claude CHEYNET, La place des anges dans l'iconographie des sceaux

p. 307

This chapter focuses on Byzantine seals and analyses the presence of angels, comparing their iconography with other types of artistic representations. Angels appear on imperial seals of the late 6th century. They replace Victories, winged figures close to angels in iconography. They are also found in biblical scenes, such as the Annunciation, the baptism of Christ, the Crucifixion, the Women at the Tomb, the Ascension and the Dormition. These scenes are rare on mediaeval seals, except for the Annunciation. After the period of Iconoclasm, Archangel Michael is quite frequently depicted on seals, because he is perceived as an effective protector, his shrines are popular and have been developing since the High Middle Ages. The archangel is often chosen by sigillants who bear his first name. He does not seem to be particularly chosen by eunuchs.

François CASSINGENA-TRÉVEDY, Les messagers du haut silence : l'angélogie d'Ephrem de Nisibe (Hymnes sur la Foi) : entre fonction liturgique et apophatisme exemplaire

p. 617

Ephraem de Nisibis, a Syriac writer in the middle of the 4th century, employs a rich angelology throughout his hymns. In his collection of "Hymns on the Faith", he attacks the rationalist posture of Arian theology by relying on scriptural examples and the referring to the model of the silent and reverent angels. They therefore appear as models of the apophatic theology that he promotes. They are also actors in a celestial liturgy of which earth is a reflection, according to the concept widely shared by the Syro-Antiochian liturgical tradition.

Paolo CESARETTI, Basema HAMARNEH, Visualising angels in the Life of Andrew, the Holy Fool (BHG 115z). Its sources and parallels

p. 695

This chapter examines the various ways in which angels are sketched in the Life of Andrew salos (BHG 115z). The composition of the hagiographic narrative concerning this fictional Holy Fool, whose life is set in an artificial 5th century Constantinopolitan context, is dated to the 10th century. It is characterized, in general, by alternating episodes with a strong visual impact, long conceptual—even abstract—digressions, and more specifically, by the ascendancy and authority of its protagonist, Andrew, on angels. This aspect is relevant when the text is compared to its 7th century model, the Life of Symeon salos (BHG 1677) by Leontios of Neapolis, and in parallel to the Life of Basil the Younger (BHG 264), one more fictional saint whose life is a product of 10th century Constantinopolitan hagiography. These texts, despite differences in authorship and settings, address various patterns of the reception of angels, especially seen from the perspective of human interaction with God, and the strive towards a proper Christian life and behaviour. The life of Andrew delineates the effective power of angels in the struggle against demons, and in fending off evil spirits. However, the stories and episodes in which angels are outlined seem to respond to a specific instructive intent, and touch upon a wide range of eschatological concerns in which angels appear to be utterly decisive.

Jean-Charles COULON, Le développement de la légende de Hārūt et Mārūt et des origines de la magie dans les premiers siècles de l'islam

p. 891

Hārūt and Mārūt are two angels ambiguously mentioned in a single verse of the Qurʾān. While angels are supposed to be created of light, inhabiting the heavens and totally subservient to the divine order, Hārūt and Mārūt are notably accused of teaching magic and the art of separating spouses in Babylon. This verse thus poses a number of problems, which have been reflected in an abundant exegesis that has attempted both to identify these angels and to develop their story in order to answer the theological questions they raise, including the question of the angels' sinfulness or their relationship to human beings. One account includes two angels who descended to earth and were seduced by Venus, who caused them to commit sins, for which they were punished in Babylon. Studies have been made of the possible ancient sources of these two angels in the Qurʾān (Indian, Zoroastrian, Hebrew, etc.), but the aim of this chapter is to trace the development of the exegesis of these verses in the early centuries of Islam, to see how the story was formed and how exegetes tried to reconcile this verse with the rest of the Qurʾān and its theological issues.

Korshi DOSOO, Ministers of fire and spirit: knowing angels in the Coptic magical papyri

p. 403

The Christianisation of Egypt, completed by the fifth century, produced a shift in the conception of the superhuman world found in magical texts, with the traditional Greek and Egyptian gods being almost entirely replaced by divine beings of the Christian religion—the Trinity, the saints, and, above all, the angels. This discussion surveys the role of angels in Christian magical texts written in Coptic, dating to between the fourth and twelfth centuries, focusing on two aspects—their role as agents of the divine will, which may be experienced positively or negatively by human beings; and the ways in which these (normally) unseen beings make their presence felt through their effects upon the material world. Beginning with a survey of the role of angels in older Graeco-Egyptian and Jewish magic, we then turn to the key roles of angels in Coptic magical texts—the gathering angel, the angelic name, the helping angel, and the dangerous angel.

Philippe FAURE, Le rayonnement angélique de Byzance en Occident (x^e-xiii^e siècle) p. 809

This study attempts to identify the modalities of the Byzantine influence on Western medieval art from the 10th to the 13th century in the field of the representation of angels, through the analysis of some major iconographic themes and motives. The main artistic centres concerned (Italy, Sicily, Catalonia) show that the Byzantine representation of angels is closely linked to the visionary, glorious and theophanic dimension of Christianity, which is expressed in particular in the conceptions of the kingdom of God and the heavenly court. The spread of this inspiration is so powerful that it can be found in works painted in Germany, France, and even Great Britain. The treatment of themes such as the angels beside Christ or the Virgin, the heavenly Jerusalem, the celestial hierarchy and the Last Judgement bear witness to this inspiration, but also to a work of appropriation and adaptation. The figures of the archangels are particularly significant in this process: as prince of heaven, Michael appears to be associated with the dramaturgy, eschatology and liturgical celebration. Gabriel, on the other hand, benefited from the promotion of the founding scene of the Annunciation. The creative process led to the integration of Byzantine models in the active form of quotation and the invention of new works. The orientation of Western piety in the 13th century, which tended to focus on the humanity and the Passion of Christ, was accompanied by a gradual retreat from Byzantine inspiration. However, the hieratic nature of the angelic figures tended to be maintained, within the framework of another pole of devotion, the representations of the Virgin in majesty, inseparable from her angelic escort.

Ryan HAECKER, Origen's speculative angelology p. 95

Origen of Alexandria (fl. AD 184-253/4) should be acknowledged as the founder of a Christian science of angels, or angelology. In 'On First Principles' (1.5-8), he introduces angels as the first created 'rational beings' who, in contemplating the divine Logos, freely choose to direct their will as holy angels in service to or as wicked demons in antagonism against the love of God. The angels and demons thereafter guide the movements of all spirits, substances, and signs in the created world. Origen's angelology has been regarded as an early Christian alternative to Middle Platonic daemonologies. After Karl Barth, his angelology has often been dispensed from Christian theology. However, as Jean Daniélou has observed, Origen departs from the principles of Platonic daemonology in affirming that angelic mediacy must pass away like the light of the stars before the Logos of Christ. He had assimilated the relative mediacy of the angels to the absolute mediation of Christ. And in assimilating angelic to Christic mediacy, Origen also assimilates the reason with which the world is moved to the divine Logos of Christ in God as Trinity. Origen's angelology can thus be read before and after Barth to recommend a new speculative angelology.

Magdalena ŁAPTAŚ, The apotropaic function of the archangels in Nubian art p. 479

People in the Nile Valley lived in the constant fear of monsters, demons and other misfortunes threatening them. Therefore, they had to turn to God for protection. God however was far in the Heavens, while his angelic messengers were closer, moving between celestial and earthly spaces. To ensure their protection, their images and names were placed wherever the exposure to the evil forces was the greatest. An attribution of these protective functions is not always clear from the way the archangels were depicted in art. The figures are shown frontally, frequently freestanding. For the most part, it is the context or accompanying inscriptions that allow an image to be identified as an archangel in its apotropaic function. Therefore, for this chapter, three groups have been chosen connected with the protection of buildings and their interiors; protection of the bodies of living Nubians and finally with deceased. Writing this paper, the author was aware that the subject is so rich that the presented material and its interpretations are only an introduction to further research, which will be gradually undertaken.

Delphine LAURITZEN, Des Amours et des anges dans l'art de l'Antiquité tardive p. 207

Angels are usually depicted anthropomorphically. We argue here that this appearance was drawn from Eros/Cupid, the god of love in Ancient Classical mythology. The paper compares and contrasts five main features: wings, age, genre, clothing, and number. Both cupids and angels are intermediaries. Two horizontal figures flying on each side of a central medallion is a favourite theme of Roman sarcophagi. In a funerary context, it symbolizes the transition from life to death. Transposed to angels, the motive encompasses a broader meaning. Angels (angeloi) are messengers who cross both ways between the divine and the human level. Moreover, angels never supplant cupids in Late Antique art. One may think that they served different purposes: decorative vs religious. The reality appears more nuanced. The meaning of cupids and angels' images is therefore reconsidered on the ground of their common, protective function.

Frederick LAURITZEN, Psellos' angels between Homer, Proclus, and Dionysius
(Phil. Min. 1.42 Duffy) p. 739

Psellos' essay on Homer's Iliad 4.1-4 offers one an insight into his angelology. He interprets Homer's gods as being God's angels. He achieves this identification by combining his reading of Plato's Cratylus with the Gospel of John. Moreover, he associates the angels with imperial courtiers. The analysis is the result of his reading of Proclus and specifically his commentary on the Timaeus of Plato. His analysis also appears to be in tune with the recent treaty of hierarchy written by Nicetas Stethatos. Thus, Psellos interprets the essay, not as an allegory, but as a transposition (μεταπόιησις) of myth into truth.

Maria LIDOVA, Divine Presence: gazing upon the angels in Early Byzantine art p. 241

This chapter focuses on the selection of roles played by angels in early Byzantine visual culture. In church decorations, the winged beings regularly appeared in pairs as guardians, assuming the likeness of courtiers or military officials. It is argued that within related depictions which show two winged guardians flanking a central motif, the significance of heavenly beings could vary depending on what was placed at the centre, be it a holy figure, a sacred object, or even an ecclesiastical space. Angels could also be depicted in narrative compositions representing the events of the Old and New Testaments. In these compositions, they often performed the role of divine agents enabling the realization of God's will. The chapter analyses the significance of angelic representations in visual rendering of the scriptural and apocryphal events using the rich and detailed programme of the so-called Murano ivory diptych (6th c.) as an example.

Jean-Pierre MAHÉ, Anges d'Arménie : gloire divine, liturgie, hiérarchie p. 847

In the Armenian tradition, angels are the emissaries of divine glory, that is to say, not mere envoys, but the living substance of the radiance of the divinity. Angels and glory are closely associated in the liturgy and in the decoration of the vessels, instruments and fabrics of the celebration. By representing the wonder of the angels before the Eucharist, this mystagogy stages the salutary effect of the Incarnation, the restoration of the first glory of Adam, created in the image of God. According to the Areopagite, the nine degrees of the angelic orders are the heavenly archetype of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. At the end of the seventh century, the Armenian Church structured itself accordingly to justify its autocephaly.

Marc MALEVEZ, The angels in Late Egyptian Antiquity: a study mainly based on two travelogues p. 341

After an introduction to the monastic spiritual approach described by Evagrius Ponticus, we evoke the travelogues in general, then more specifically The Mission of Paphnutius / Life of Onnophrius, of which we will present the various manuscripts and fragments of the Nile tradition known to this day, before we turn to the second travelogue analysed in this chapter, the Story of Pambo / Life of Cyrus, less famous and whose Coptic and Ethiopian versions we have studied to date. This will allow us to question the angelic nature, before focusing on the functions of angels in the world of Coptic desert monks, through our two texts. The conclusion is followed by quotations from the studied manuscripts not mentioned in the body of the chapter.

Jérôme MOREAU, Les anges, λόγοι de Dieu dans l'exégèse de Philon d'Alexandrie p. 43

Philo of Alexandria presents the angels (angeloi) as logoi. While he carefully dismisses the word daimon for the superstition it carries, he still refers to a Platonic demonology, where the angels are intermediary beings, messengers to and from God, but only insofar as it is confirmed by an exegesis of Scripture. Indeed, as always in his works, his conceptions lie only on the (little) information about angels he can find in the Pentateuch. His system allows him to claim that perfect human souls may also be qualified as angels, as they truly act as intermediaries between God and human beings, and that the Logos in itself, as well as God's Pneuma, are angeloi. However, Philo's intellectual angelology does not allow him to fully explain texts in which the angels are told to appear sensibly to someone, despite their purely intellectual nature: he is compelled to avoid this problem rather than addressing it directly.

Cécile MORRISON, Les anges sur la monnaie byzantine : de l'omniprésence à la personnalisation p. 293

The image of the angel on coins replaces that of the Victory starting from the solidi of Justin I in 522. Its assimilation to the Eternal Victory of Rome gave it the wings that would become its characteristic feature. It also completed the slow Christianisation of this element derived from Hellenistic and Imperial coinage. In the 5th century numerous Christian attributes (labarum, globus cruciger, cross) were added and later disappeared completely at the beginning of the 6th century. From the 11th century onwards, the predominant image is that of the Archangel Michael, the patron saint of the military aristocracy. The archangel remains associated with the ideal of power and illustrates the protection granted to the emperor by the Pantocrator of whom he is, after the angels, another winged envoy. The late numismatics of the Thessaloniki workshop made the wings, attached to an effigy of the sovereign or alone, an imperial attribute, symbol of power and legitimacy.

François PACHA-MIRAN, Images des anges dans l'enluminure syriaque de l'Antiquité tardive

p. 267

Images of angels rarely appear in Late Antique Syriac manuscripts. Only two witnesses dating back to the 6th century contain such representations: Florence, Biblioteca Laurenziana, Cod. Plut. I 56, and Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, ms. syr. 33. Yet, the evidence of Syriac angels turns out to be essential to a better understanding of the formation and diffusion of iconographic patterns that marked Medieval art, such as the Annunciation and the Resurrection. These two manuscripts firstly attest the existence of a common visual language, shared among the Eastern Christian communities. The angels simultaneously adopt a role of messengers, witnesses, and heralds, that originates both in Christian literature and Classical art. The images also allow us to examine the different methods of layout and illustration used by Syriac artists, and the close relationships that linked the miniatures to the biblical texts. The presence of inscriptions on and around the miniatures reveals an astonishing concern for the creation of an ‘iconographic soundspace’. Through a careful depiction of the dialogues, the angels thereby embody the pronounced sensitivity of Syriac Christianity toward the written word and the dialogue. Between the lines, they finally evoke the vocal performance of hymns and canticles, sung during the main liturgical celebrations.

Ilaria L.E. RAMELLI, Conceptualities of angels in Imperial and Late Antiquity: nature and bodies of angels, degrees of corporeality, and comparative angelologies / daemonologies in “Pagan” and Christian Platonism

p. 115

The chapter studies the ways in which angels were conceptualised in Imperial and Late Antiquity, their nature or essence (for Origen, the same as that of all rational creatures), and their bodies. The reflection on their corporeality or incorporeality will be framed within the theories of degrees of corporeality in both “pagan” and Christian Platonism and within the relativity of notions such as “corporeal/incorporeal” and “material/immaterial.” Attention will be paid to the genderlessness of angels, contrasted with the apparent descriptions of Satan as a male creature. Finally, a brief comparative study will be offered of d(a)emonologies in “pagan” and Christian Platonism. This will point out, among other interesting elements, the partial overlap of angels and good δαίμονες.

Denis J.-J. ROBICHAUD, The Star of the Magi or the afterlife of Chaldean angels in Iamblichus, Proclus, Psellos, Pletho, and Ficino p. 763

This chapter studies how angelic epiphanies are understood in the exegetical tradition on the Chaldean Oracles in the writings of the Syrian Iamblichus, the Greek Proclus, two Byzantines, Michael Psellos and Georgius Gemistus Pletho, and the Florentine Marsilio Ficino. Working backwards from Ficino, the culmination of this philosophical approach to the Chaldean Oracles, it reconstructs this tradition through Ficino's sources for his sermon the De stella magorum and his eighteen-volume Platonic Theology. Examining new manuscript evidence, it demonstrates how this tradition of Chaldean epiphanies is central to Ficino's understanding of the Star of the Magi in the Gospel of Matthew and the angelic apparition to the shepherds in the Gospel of Luke, as well as the philosophical considerations on angels in Ficino's Platonic Theology.

Hélène ROCHARD, Le trône divin et les quatre Vivants dans la peinture égyptienne (VI^e-XIII^e siècle) p. 435

The depiction of Christ surrounded by the four living creatures is a widespread image of medieval art and a well-studied theme of Christian iconography. This type known as Maiestas Domini and principally based on the John's vision of the throne of God in Heaven and the vision of the Old Testament prophet Ezekiel is one way to visualize the divine. Christ in Majesty occurs in various forms in the Early Byzantine world and Egyptian examples provide several variants among which are the oldest remains of Christian art. In most early Egyptian wall paintings, the throne of Christ is carried by four beasts and four wheels. This chapter focuses on the allegorical interpretation of the divine throne and the living creatures in Late Antique and Medieval Egypt.

Artur RODZIEWICZ, Heft Sur – the Seven Angels of the Yezidi tradition and Harran p. 943

The chapter, based mainly on field research conducted by the author in Iraq, Turkey, and Georgia, is devoted to the Yezidi cult of the Seven Angels and their leader, called the Peacock Angel. Following an introduction to the Yezidi religion, it focuses on the relationship between the Yezidi concept of God's essence (sur) and the Seven Angels, who, like the seven Yezidi saints and the seven planets, are its manifestations and objects of religious worship. Apart from an attempt to answer the question which of the heavenly bodies the Peacock Angel is connected with and to which angel it corresponds to in other religious traditions, another object representing him, the sanjak, is discussed. The search for the origins of the Yezidi cult points to several other religions which also refer to the seven angels, and concludes with the Harranian 'Sabians', whose beliefs were a mixture of elements of Platonism and local traditions. The preserved accounts about them allow the conclusion that, after the destruction of their temples, when the last representatives of the Sabians migrated to the area of Mardin and Mosul, they could have joined the religious community that was forming there between the 12th and 14th centuries and which became known as Yezidis.

Anna SALSANO, The archangel Michael in Coptic homilies

p. 383

On the basis of the roles of the archangels Michael and Raphael in Coptic tradition and specifically fifteen Coptic homilies on the archangel Michael, one can say that he has different functions including devil's antagonist, intercessor, avenger, healer, rescuer, guardian, messenger, guide, encourager, archistrategus, tamer of beasts, Christ's fellow and psychopomp. Some roles show a specialization towards a particular aspect, others are more diversified. This chapter will analyse these roles and the related epithets applied to the archangel Michael. It will also include the comparison of these homilies with other types of literary texts such as hagiographic and apocryphal sources.

Georges SIDÉRIS, Quelques remarques sur les anges eunuques dans le Récit sur la construction de Sainte-Sophie

p. 721

Through an analysis of the presence of eunuch angels and eunuchs in the Narrative on the Construction of Hagia Sophia and the sources used by the anonymous author, the chapter proposes to date the writing of the Narrative during the reign of Leo VI the Wise (886-912), in the circles close to the emperor. It also argues that the work was perhaps written by an imperial eunuch. Concerning the eunuch angels, the author was inspired in particular by the Life of John the Chaplain composed by Leontios of Neapolis in the 7th century and known at the time in Byzantium. For the eunuchs he consulted sources dating from the reigns of Justinian I and Justin II, from which he drew an onomastic reserve. He was able to consult these sources in the Palace library. The aim of the Narrative is to exalt Leo VI, the new Justinian, to assert his authority over Hagia Sophia and the Imperial Church, to promote and legitimise the court eunuchs through the angels, their role with the Emperor and in the imperial ceremonial, as well as their presence in Constantinople, the city of eunuchs. The Narrative is presented as a historical and patriographic text, composed according to the technique of ekphrasis, the art of description, but it is in fact a work of propaganda.

Michel TARDIEU, Les anges du bouddhisme

p. 921

The god-kings of Buddhist mythology are recognisable by the name of angels, given to them in the non-Christianised epilogues of the Arabic versions of the History of Barlaam and Jehoshaphat. There are four of them, installed at the cardinal points as guardians of the universe, they intervene in dreams and transport their protégés in the air. What environment favoured the passage of the god-kings from the polytheistic Indian world to a monotheistic system or systems? The transfer cannot depend on Byzantine Greek writing, since it derives from Arabic via Georgian. Nor can it come from Qur'anic angelology, since the narrative, transmitted by the Ismaili and Shi'a Imamite compilations, is only superficially Islamised. The study compares the representations of the infant oracle with the biographical episodes of the Buddhist legend, as attested by the Barlaamian literature, by Rashid al-Din and in the Chinese Manichean iconography preserved in Japan. It follows from the comparison that the transfer of the god-kings into angels took place through contact with the Eastern Manichaeans.

Sipana TCHAKERIAN, Anges de pierre en Géorgie et en Arménie tardo-antiques : le témoignage des monuments crucifères à stèle quadrilatérale

p. 547

In Late Antique Armenia and Iberia, the cult of the Cross was materialized through an original type of carved architecture: the cross-bearing monument with a four-sided stela. This paper investigates the role of the angels in the decorative program of these monuments and in the experience of the faithful praying before them. After evoking the depictions of angels represented on diverse media throughout the region, the various types of angels identified on monumental crosses (angels, archangels, seraphim, cherubim) and their iconography are analysed. It appears that the angel contributes to the primary function of these peculiar monuments, namely the exaltation of the Cross of Christ. Moreover, the study of the angels' iconographical formulas and their display on the monument provides noteworthy information for a better understanding of these structures, especially when it comes to the hierarchization of their decorative program and to their functions as objects of prayer and sacred space. These monuments take advantage of their morphology, both vertical and polygonal, to offer the faithful a dual dynamic space, both circular and ascending. Through its plural presence, the angel accompanied the ritual apprehension of these monumental crosses.

Marie-Emmanuelle TORRES, « Chanter comme les anges ». Discours et pratiques d'une sensorialité « isangelique » dans les monastères cénobitiques (IX^e-XV^e siècle)

p. 665

From the 8th–9th century onwards, the Stoudios monastery required the coenobite monk to “live like the angels.” In this way, the monk could win divine favour for the Empire and for the founders. In fact, the imitation of the angels through chanting occupies most of the monk's life, providing him with a reason for being, an ascetic practice and an effective spiritual exercise. This chanting wins divine favour, contributes to the sanctification of the monk and allows him to approach the angelic model. This support in asceticism makes the isangelic transformation possible. To be effective, this chanting must be carried out without error, and each founder acts as a “vocal coach.” He chooses the songs, the places, the voices... but also the state of mind, the sensations, the emotions, the body attitude that are appropriate. This definition of the singer's body and voice is directly inspired by the common perception of angels. All these musical indications shed light on the way the angels' senses and body are understood. These typika thus show how to make an anthropomorphic angel.

Antonis TSAKALOS, Χιλιάδες ἀρχαγγέλων καὶ μυριάδες ἀγγέλων.
Angels in the painted decoration of Karanlık kilise, Cappadocia

p. 577

In the katholikon of the Cappadocian monastery of Karanlık kilise, the abundance of angelic portraits is in perfect accordance with the topos of the “angelic life” in monastic practice—the moral perfection monks and ascetics seek to achieve. Our analysis underlines the diversity of the archangels' functions as healers, protectors, guardians, and intercessors during life and at the moment of death, as well as intermediaries between the faithful and God. Two major themes are highlighted in the sophisticated iconographic programme: the reality of the Incarnation of the Logos and Christ's dual nature, in combination with the idea of defending the Orthodox faith against heretics or other religious apostates (which is unsurprising for the border region of Cappadocia during the agitated period of the second half of the 11th c.). The innovative arrangements in Karanlık kilise's painted decoration are so numerous that they should not be considered as simple confusion or random coincidence. The dynamic network of interactions among the images constitutes an important indication of the seven donors' interventions in shaping the architectural setting and the layout of this exceptional iconographic programme, connected with certain liturgical practices.

Alexandros TSAKOS, Invoking graphically archangels: the case study of the Archangel Michael in Christian Nubia

p. 461

The role of intermediate beings in the belief system of African Christianity cannot be overestimated. In the Sudanese Nile Valley, three Christian kingdoms thrived during the period that is termed "Medieval" or "Christian Nubia", and from the rich archaeological record that they have produced it appears that the most popular intermediate being was the Archangel Michael. The intermediation of Michael was manifested in his culturally conditioned appearances to humans, according to theological norms or by expressions of art and language. All manifestations of this archangel—as of all angels—were a message, either from God to the humans or from the humans to God. The study offers a qualitative presentation of the forms that these messages take, with a focus on the letter-shaped ones, and especially monograms and cryptograms. These are perceived as "grapho-linguistic techniques" which knowledgeable individuals use on the basis of a set of skills that has been termed "graphicacy". In some cases, the message is the archangel himself. New interpretations for understanding Nubian Christianity—as well as related Oriental Christianities—open up by investigating this possibility.

Françoise VINEL, Les anges, proches de Dieu, proches des hommes : jalons d'une réflexion, du livre de Tobit à la littérature chrétienne des premiers siècles

p. 69

The Old Testament's Book of Tobit was probably written during the 2nd century BCE. The short tale facilitates a comprehensive understanding of the angelic nature and qualities in the Biblical and Christian tradition. In the context of the development of Jewish angelology, Raphael's role with Tobit and his family reveals an angelic invisible people who are both close to God and close to the believer people who need some help. In Early Christian literature, especially in Origen's De oratione, the idea of guardian angels is formed. An important aspect of these celestial beings is their eschatological and liturgical missions. According to biblical images, the angelic army inhabits the whole universe and is ready to fight against evil's powers, as well as never stops praising God and inviting human beings to join its prayer. If we keep also in mind the legacy of the Greek daimones, there is some evidence that, from Origen to Augustine, the angelic Christian doctrine takes consistency, before Dionysius' developments and synthesis.

Marilena VLAD, Dionysius' concept of Hierarchy

p. 189

The chapter concerns both Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite and Proclus, specifically the idea of a structured reality. Dionysius' Celestial Hierarchy, even if influenced by Proclus' perspective, transforms the understanding the structure of the reality, namely as a hierarchy, or sacred governing of the reality. There is a double act of revelation at work between the hierarchy and the divine principle or thearchy, so that the role of the angelic hierarchy can only be understood inside this reciprocal manifestation. The difference between Dionysius' celestial hierarchy and Proclus' structure of the intelligible world, reveals that the hierarchy is not the highest object of knowledge, but rather a system through which God transmits knowledge and manifests his presence throughout the reality. In Dionysius' perspective, there is no knowledge about the hierarchy, but only knowledge transmitted inside the hierarchy, so that his own interpretative activity becomes a hierarchical act.

TABLE DES MATIÈRES

Avant-propos et remerciements	VII
Introduction	IX
Liste des abréviations	XV

I. – MAÏEUTIQUE DE L'ANGE

Stéphanie ANTHONIOZ, Mutations angéliques ?	3
Jérôme MOREAU, Les anges, λόγοι de Dieu dans l'exégèse de Philon d'Alexandrie	43
Françoise VINEL, Les anges, proches de Dieu, proches des hommes : jalons d'une réflexion, du livre de Tobit à la littérature chrétienne des premiers siècles	69
Ryan HAECKER, Origen's speculative angelology	95
Ilaria L. E. RAMELLI, Conceptualities of angels in Imperial and Late Antiquity: nature and bodies of angels, degrees of corporeality, and comparative angelologies / daemonologies in "Pagan" and Christian Platonism	115
Luc BRISSON, Les anges chez Proclus	173
Marilena VLAD, Dionysius' concept of Hierarchy	189

II. – IMAGES ET USAGES

A. Dynamiques visuelles

Delphine LAURITZEN, Des Amours et des anges dans l'art de l'Antiquité tardive	207
Maria LIDOVA, Divine Presence: gazing upon the angels in Early Byzantine art	241
François PACHA MIRAN, Images des anges dans l'enluminure syriaque de l'Antiquité tardive	267
Cécile MORRISSON, Les anges sur la monnaie byzantine : de l'omniprésence à la personnalisation	293
Béatrice CASEAU et Jean-Claude CHEYNET, La place des anges dans l'iconographie des sceaux	307

B. Terre d'Égypte

Marc MALEVEZ, The angels in Late Egyptian Antiquity: a study mainly based on two travelogues	341
Anna SALSANO, The Archangel Michael in Coptic homilies	383
Korshi DOSOO, Ministers of fire and spirit: knowing angels in the Coptic magical papyri	403
Hélène ROCHARD, Le trône divin et les quatre Vivants dans la peinture égyptienne (VI ^e -XIII ^e siècle)	435

C. Lieux angéliques

Alexandros TSAKOS, Invoking graphically archangels: the case study of the Archangel Michael in Christian Nubia	461
Magdalena ŁAPTAŚ, The apotropaic function of the archangels in Nubian art	479
Komait ABDALLAH, L'iconographie des anges en Syrie à l'époque byzantine	521
Sipana TCHAKERIAN, Anges de pierre en Géorgie et en Arménie tardo-antiques : le témoignage des monuments crucifères à stèle quadrilatérale	547
Antonis TSAKALOS, Χιλιάδες ἀρχαγγέλων καὶ μυριάδες ἀγγέλων. Angels in the painted decoration of Karanlık kilise, Cappadocia	577

III. – VOIX ET VISIONS

François CASSINGENA-TREVEDY, Les messagers du haut silence. L'angélogie d'Éphrem de Nisibe (Hymnes sur la Foi) : entre fonction liturgique et apophatisme exemplaire	617
Eirini AFENTOULIDOU, Ministering spirits, guardians, intercessors: the discourse of angels in Byzantine liturgical texts	631
Marie-Emmanuelle TORRES, « Chanter comme les anges ». Discours et pratiques d'une sensorialité « isangélique » dans les monastères cénobitiques (IX ^e -XV ^e siècle)	665
Paolo CESARETTI et Basema HAMARNEH, Visualising angels in the Life of Andrew, the Holy Fool (BHG 115z). Its sources and parallels	695
Georges SIDERIS, Quelques remarques sur les anges eunuques dans le Récit sur la construction de Sainte-Sophie	721
Frederick LAURITZEN, Psellos' angels between Homer, Proclus, and Dionysius (Phil. min. 1.42 Duffy)	739

IV. – À PARTIR, AUTOUR ET AU-DELÀ DU MONDE BYZANTIN

Denis J.-J. ROBICHAUD, The Star of the Magi or the afterlife of Chaldean angels in Iamblichus, Proclus, Psellos, Pletho, and Ficino	763
Philippe FAURE, Le rayonnement angélique de Byzance en Occident (x ^e -xiii ^e siècle)	809
Jean-Pierre MAHÉ, Anges d'Arménie : gloire divine, liturgie, hiérarchie	847
Jean-Charles COULON, Le développement de la légende de Hārūt et Mārūt et des origines de la magie dans les premiers siècles de l'islam	871
Michel TARDIEU, Les anges du bouddhisme	921
Artur RODZIEWICZ, Heft Sur – the Seven Angels of the Yezidi tradition and Harran	943
Résumés – Abstracts	1031
Table des matières	1043

Subtle Bodies

THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE CLASSICAL HERITAGE

Peter Brown, General Editor

- I Art and Ceremony in Late Antiquity, by Sabine G. MacCormack
- II Synesius of Cyrene: Philosopher-Bishop, by Jay Alan Bregman
- III Theodosian Empresses: Women and Imperial Dominion in Late Antiquity, by Kenneth G. Holum
- IV John Chrysostom and the Jews: Rhetoric and Reality in the Late Fourth Century, by Robert L. Wilken
- V Biography in Late Antiquity: The Quest for the Holy Man, by Patricia Cox
- VI Pachomius: The Making of a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt, by Philip Rousseau
- VII Change in Byzantine Culture in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries, by A. P. Kazhdan and Ann Wharton Epstein
- VIII Leadership and Community in Late Antique Gaul, by Raymond Van Dam
- IX Homer the Theologian: Neoplatonist Allegorical Reading and the Growth of the Epic Tradition, by Robert Lamberton
- X Procopius and the Sixth Century, by Averil Cameron
- XI Guardians of Language: The Grammarian and Society in Late Antiquity, by Robert A. Kaster
- XII Civic Coins and Civic Politics in the Roman East, A.D. 180–275, by Kenneth Harl
- XIII Holy Women of the Syrian Orient, introduced and translated by Sebastian P. Brock and Susan Ashbrook Harvey
- XIV Gregory the Great: Perfection in Imperfection, by Carole Straw
- XV “Apex Omnium”: Religion in the “Res gestae” of Ammianus, by R. L. Rike
- XVI Dioscorus of Aphroditto: His Work and His World, by Leslie S. B. MacCoull
- XVII On Roman Time: The Codex-Calendar of 354 and the Rhythms of Urban Life in Late Antiquity, by Michele Renee Salzman
- XVIII Asceticism and Society in Crisis: John of Ephesus and The Lives of the Eastern Saints, by Susan Ashbrook Harvey

- XIX Barbarians and Politics at the Court of Arcadius, by Alan Cameron and Jacqueline Long, with a contribution by Lee Sherry
- XX Basil of Caesarea, by Philip Rousseau
- XXI In Praise of Later Roman Emperors: The "Panegyrici Latini," introduction, translation, and historical commentary by C. E. V. Nixon and Barbara Saylor Rodgers
- XXII Ambrose of Milan: Church and Court in a Christian Capital, by Neil B. McLynn
- XXIII Public Disputation, Power, and Social Order in Late Antiquity, by Richard Lim
- XXIV The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, by Virginia Burrus
- XXV Symeon the Holy Fool: Leontius's Life and the Late Antique City, by Derek Krueger
- XXVI The Shadows of Poetry: Vergil in the Mind of Augustine, by Sabine MacCormack
- XXVII Paulinus of Nola: Life, Letters, and Poems, by Dennis E. Trout
- XXVIII The Barbarian Plain: Saint Sergius between Rome and Iran, by Elizabeth Key Fowden
- XXIX The Private Orations of Themistius, translated, annotated, and introduced by Robert J. Penella
- XXX The Memory of the Eyes: Pilgrims to Living Saints in Christian Late Antiquity, by Georgia Frank
- XXXI Greek Biography and Panegyric in Late Antiquity, edited by Tomas Hägg and Philip Rousseau
- XXXII Subtle Bodies: Representing Angels in Byzantium, by Glenn Peers

BLANK PAGE

GLENN PEERS

Subtle Bodies

Representing Angels in Byzantium

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS
BERKELEY LOS ANGELES LONDON

University of California Press
Berkeley and Los Angeles, California

University of California Press, Ltd.
London, England

© 2001 by the Regents of the University of California

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Peers, Glenn.

Subtle bodies : representing angels in Byzantium /
Glenn Peers.

p. cm.—(The transformation of the classical heritage ; 32)

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-520-22405-1 (hardcover : alk. paper)

1. Iconoclasm—Byzantine Empire—History.
2. Angels—Biblical teaching. 3. Angels in art.
4. Angels in literature. 5. Byzantine empire—
Church history. 6. Orthodox Eastern Church—
Byzantine Empire—History. 7. Church history—
Middle Ages, 600–1500. I. Title. II. Series.

BR238 .P39 2001
235'.3'088219—dc21

00-055165

Manufactured in the United States of America

9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1 0

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of ANSI/NISO Z39.48-1992(R 1997)
(Permanence of Paper) . ∞

CONTENTS

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

IX

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

XI

ABBREVIATIONS

XIII

INTRODUCTION

I

ONE

ISSUES IN REPRESENTING ANGELS

13

TWO

ARGUMENTS AGAINST IMAGES OF ANGELS

61

THREE
REPRESENTING ANGELS: IMAGES AND THEORY
	89

FOUR
THE VENERATION OF ANGELS AND THEIR IMAGES
	126

FIVE APPREHENDING THE ARCHANGEL MICHAEL 157

CONCLUSION
	194

BIBLIOGRAPHY
	209

INDEX
	231

ILLUSTRATIONS

1. Icon of the Archangel Michael(?).	18
2. The Israelites at the Twelve Springs.	22
3. Sarigüzel sarcophagus.	25
4. Barberini Diptych.	27
5. Mosaic of the Seasons, detail of Personification of Spring, from Daphne near Antioch.	29
6. The Tomb of Christ, upper register—Soldiers Asleep at the Tomb; lower register—Marys and Angel at Tomb.	34
7. Philoxenia of Abraham, mosaic, S. Vitale, Ravenna.	39
8. Two winged men inscribed “ΕΞΟΥΧΙΕ” (“Powers”).	42
9. Angelic Powers, south side, Bema Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea).	44
10. Angelic Powers, north side, Bema Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea).	45
11. Icon of the Virgin and Child, flanked by Saints Theodore and George.	51
12. Archangel Gabriel, Mosaic, Bema arch, Hagia Sophia, Istanbul.	54
13. Virgin and Child, Apse Mosaic, Hagia Sophia, Istanbul.	55
14. Vision of Isaiah, The Christian Topography .	56

15. Icon of the Miracle at Chonae.	57
16. Virgin and Child, Apse Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea).	83
17. René Magritte, The Treachery of Images .	123
18. Sanctuary of the Archangel Michael at Mt. Gargano.	168
19. Icon of the Archangel Michael.	199

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Since this book began its life as a doctoral dissertation, many people should be acknowledged for its conception. Most directly, Herbert Kessler is responsible for the good in this work: he was the exacting midwife for a difficult birth. The help of friends and colleagues at the Johns Hopkins University and at the Villa Spelman was invaluable; I especially thank Ann van Dijk and Irene Kabala for their generous friendship.

The work I did at the doctoral level and since is founded on the training and support I received as an undergraduate, and I never travel far in my studies without silently expressing my gratitude to those teachers who set me on this path. I must single out especially A. Peter Booth (and the rest of the Department of Classics at Acadia University) and John E. Fisher of Wabash College as having provided me with the desire and confidence to pursue this vocation.

I must mention others more briefly but with thanks equally heartfelt: Charles Barber, Stéphane Beauroy, Anthony Bryer, Stephen Campbell, Mark Cheetham, Anthony Cutler and the other, anonymous reader, Georgia Frank, David Jordan and the staff of the Genadius Library, Dirk Krausmüller, Derek Krueger, Nancy Ševčenko, Daniel Weiss and Susan Young. To Kate Toll at the University of California Press and Peter Brown, my debt is great. My thanks, too, to the editor of Byzantion, P. Yannopoulos, and to the editor of Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies, J. Haldon, for allowing me to include here revised versions of the second half of chapter 4 and chapter 5. The University of Texas provided me with a Summer Research Assignment and funds to purchase photographs, and for this help I am grateful. Thanks to Tracy Chapman Hamilton for help with the index; my thanks to the Tommy and Sherry Jacks Fund for making this assistance possible.

Finally, my wife, Cathy, and children, Max and Willah, gave the peace of mind necessary to complete this task; their love is my strength. My parents and my grandparents gave me more than I can express here: with full knowledge of how small it is against their gifts, I dedicate this work to them.

ABBREVIATIONS

AASS	Acta Sanctorum , 71 vols., Paris, 1863–1940.
AB	Analecta Bollandiana
ArtB	Art Bulletin
B	Byzantion
BF	Byzantinische Forschungen
Blondel	Macarii Magnetis quae supersunt ex inedito codice , ed. C. Blondel, Paris, 1876.
BMGS	Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies
Bonnet	M. Bonnet, Narratio de miraculo a Michaelae Archangelo Chonis patrato , Paris, 1890.
BS	Byzantinoslavica
BZ	Byzantinische Zeitschrift .
CA	Cahiers Archéologiques .
Cameron, “The Language of Images”	Averil Cameron, “The Language of Images: The Rise of Icons and Christian Representation,” in The Church and the Arts , Studies in Church History, vol. 25, ed. D. Wood, London, 1992, 1–42.

DACL	Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie , ed. F. Cabrol and H. Leclercq, Paris, 1924–.
DChAE	Δελτίον της Χριστιανικής Ἀρχαιολογικῆς Ἑταιρείας.
DOP	Dumbarton Oaks Papers .
DTC	Dictionnaire de théologie catholique , ed. A. Vacant and E. Magenot, Paris, 1899–1950.
EEBS	Ἑταιρείας Βυζαντινῶν Σπουδῶν Ἐπετηρὶς.
Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae	Michael Psellus, Oratio in Archangelum Michaellem , in Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae , ed. E. A. Fisher, Stuttgart and Leipzig, 1994, 230–56.
GCS	Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte.
Holl	“Die Schriften des Epiphanius gegen die Bilderverehrung,” ed. K. Holl, Sitzungsberichte der Königlich Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften 35.2(1916):828–68 [= K. Holl, Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte , Tübingen, 1928; rp. Darmstadt, 1964, II:351–87].
HTR	Harvard Theological Review .
JAC	Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum .
JöB	Jahrbuch der österreichischen Byzantinistik .
JECS	Journal of Early Christian Studies .
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies .
Leanza	S. Leanza, “Una versione greca inedita dell’ Apparitio S. Michaelis in monte Gargano,” VetChr 22(1985):291–316.
Mansi	G. D. Mansi, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio , 53 vols. in 58 pts., Paris and Leipzig, 1901–1927.

MGH	Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum et Italicarum saec. VI-IX , Hannover, 1878.
OCP	Orientalia Christiana Periodica .
PG	Patrologia cursus completus, Series graeca , ed. J.-P. Migne, 161 vols. in 166 pts., Paris, 1857–1866.
Pitra	J. B. Pitra, Spicilegio Solesmense complectens sanctorum patrum scriptorumque ecclesiasticorum anecdota hactenus opera , 4 vols., Paris, 1852–1858.
PL	Patrologia cursus completus, Series latina , ed. J.-P. Migne, 221 vols. in 222 pts., Paris, 1844–1880.
PO	Patrologia Orientalis .
PTS	Patristische Texte und Studien.
RAC	Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum , Stuttgart, 1950–.
RBK	Reallexikon zur byzantinischen Kunst , Stuttgart, 1963–.
REB	Revue des études byzantines .
RivAC	Rivista d'archeologia cristiana .
RQ	Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumkunde und für Kunstgeschichte .
RSBN	Rivista de studi bizantini e neollenico .
SC	Sources Chrétiennes.
Settimane	Settimane di studi del centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo.
TM	Travaux et Mémoires .
TU	Texte und Untersuchungen.
VetChr	Vetera Christianorum .

BLANK PAGE

INTRODUCTION

On the Tension between Theology and Cult

Angel, literally “messenger,” can designate all manner of negotiation between heaven and earth and refer to any member of God’s spiritual host. Scripture is unequivocal in stating the existence of an angelic host and is full of diverse examples of the appearance of these transcendental creatures. But the difficulties of perceiving and identifying angels are signaled in scripture simply by the number of guises they assume and impressions they make. Angels appear in scriptural accounts as multiform, awful beings before whom such witnesses as Zacharias are overwhelmed and left speechless (Luke 1:20–22). They appear as clouds and fire (Ex. 13:21–22, 23:20–23), formless voices (Gen. 21:17) and, in the visions of Ezekiel (Ez. 10) and Isaiah (Is. 6), as complex and ultimately unfathomable creatures. The identity of these manifestations in scripture is often obscure; and Christian exegesis with its typological interpretation only compounded the difficulty when it discerned identities not overt in Hebrew scripture.

The scriptural definition of angelic nature as fire and wind (Ps. 104:4) established the belief in the immaterial and enigmatic qualities of angelic beings. Incorporated into the Epistle to Hebrews—“And of the angels he saith, Who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire” (1:7)—this definition became the exegetical cornerstone of Christian angelology. But although the general definition was settled by scripture, the precise nature of the proportion and blend of elemental forces was never fully explained; angelic nature was held to be beyond humanity's ken.¹

Angelology—as historians have named patristic scrutiny of angels²—is replete with uncertainties, and these uncertainties were the source of the special problems of access and familiarity in devotion.³ For Christians, many questions persisted about angels' nature, organization, duties and comprehension.⁴ Agreement among theologians about the specifics of angelic nature was not possible given the transcendence of the objects of speculation, but angels figure so large in scripture and devotion that the subject could not be avoided.

The fire and spirit composition posited a relative value for angelic nature that placed the angels somewhere between the radically different natures of humanity and God. Such theologians as Theodotus in the second century called the angels “intellectual fire, intellectual spirit,”⁵ distinct in property from material fire and light.⁶ Theodotus thought that angels did have bodies—at least they were seen as such—although these bodies, compared to ours, were without form and without corporeality.⁷ Methodius (d. ca. 311) said that the angelic

1. See the texts gathered by J. Turmel, “Histoire de l'angélologie des temps apostoliques à la fin du Ve siècle,” Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse 3(1898):411ff.

2. See, for instance, Turmel, “Histoire de l'angélologie,” 289–308, 407–34, 533–52, and also his “L'angélologie depuis le faux Denys l'Aréopagite,” Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse 4(1899):289–309, 414–34, 536–62.

3. Angelology is the subject of many studies: see, for instance, DACL I.2:2080ff., DTC I:1189ff., RAC V:53ff., RBK III:13ff., and M. Bussagli, “Angeli,” Enciclopedia dell'arte medievale (Rome, 1991–) I:629–38, idem, Storia degli angeli. Racconto di immagini e di idee (Milan, 1991), and Le ali di Dio. Messagerie e guerrieri alati tra oriente e occidente, ed. M. Bussagli and M. D'Onofrio, Milan, 2000.

4. See R. Roques, “Introduction,” in Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, La Hiérarchie Céleste, SC vol. 58, ed. G. Heil and M. de Gandillac (Paris, 1958) lxxi.

5. Preserved in the writings of Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–d. before 215). See Excerpta ex scriptis Theodoto, in Stromata Buch VII und VIII. Excerpta ex Theodoto. Eclogae propheticae. Quis dives saluetur. Fragmente, GCS vol. 17, 2d ed., ed. O. Stählin, L. Früchtel and U. Treu (Berlin, 1970) 110.

6. See, for instance, Eusebius, Praeparatio Evangelica, VII.15.15, GCS vol. 43, ed. K. Mras (Berlin, 1956) 393–94. Pseudo-Athanasius, Quaestiones ad Antiochum Ducem, V, PG 28:601C, said that the angels are as different from material creation as the sun from the stars.

7. Excerpta ex scriptis Theodoto, in Stromata Buch VII und VIII, 110–11.

nature is equally composed of air and fire, like souls.⁸ A writer later identified as Macarius the Great (ca. 300–ca. 390) said that the angels have subtle (λεπτὰ) bodies.⁹ Others stated that the angels are beings without body and without matter, but not completely so.¹⁰ Gregory of Nyssa (ca. 330–ca. 394) appears to put the angels out of all contact with matter.¹¹ And Gregory of Nazianzus (329/30–ca. 390) said that the angels can only be perceived by reason because they are composed of pure spirituality or something approaching it—he could not say for certain.¹² Complete agreement concerning the degree of participation of the angels in matter was never possible. Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite¹³ and John of Damascus (ca. 675–ca. 750)¹⁴ came down on the side of the essential spirituality of the angels.

Maintaining a distance between the angels and God on the one hand, and angels and humanity on the other, was an important consideration for theologians. In his text praising the Archangel Michael, for example, Chrysippus (ca. 405–479) was careful to establish the similarities and differences of the natures of Michael and God.¹⁵ He deduced the nature of God from Deuteronomy 4:24

8. Photius, Bibliothèque, Tome V ('Codices' 230–241), ed. R. Henry (Paris, 1967) 100.10–13.

9. Homilia, IV.ix, in Die fünfzig geistlichen Homilien des Makarios, PTS vol. 4, ed. H. Dörries, E. Klosterman and M. Kroeger (Berlin, 1964) 33–34.

10. Turmel, "Histoire de l'angélologie," 422ff.

11. Oratio catechetica magna, VI, PG 45:28AB.

12. Orationes xlv, XLV.5, PG 36:629B.

13. See R. Roques, L'univers dionysien. Structure hiérarchique du monde selon le Pseudo-Denys (Paris, 1954; rp. Paris, 1983) 154ff. On the nature of the angels Pseudo-Dionysius himself is almost completely silent. Pseudo-Dionysius took it as an assumption that the angels were essentially spiritual in nature. In the summary of Pseudo-Dionysius's work by George Pachymeres (1242–ca. 1310), angels are described as bodiless and immaterial; they are immaterial, immortal and deiform (De divinis nominibus, VI.2, PG 3:856C); and in De div. nom., IV.1, PG 3:693C he states: "It is as bodiless and immaterial that they are perceived by the intelligence; and inasmuch as they are intelligences, they perceive themselves in a manner not of this world. . . ." A defining characteristic is that the celestial hierarchy is more immaterial and more spiritual than the human (e.g., De ecclesiastica hierarchia, I.4, PG 3:376B). Roques writes (ibid., 155 n9), "C'est surtout par opposition aux caractères de notre hiérarchie humaine que ceux de la hiérarchie céleste prennent tout leur relief."

14. Expositio fidei, II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II Expositio fidei, PTS vol. 12, ed. P.B. Kotter (Berlin, 1973) 45–48.

15. A. Sigalas, "Χρυσίππου πρεσβυτέρου Ἐγκώμιον εἰς Ἀρχάγγελον Μιχαήλ," EEBS 3(1926):85–93.

(“For the Lord thy God is a consuming fire”) and Deuteronomy 9:3, as well as John 4:24 (“God is a spirit”).¹⁶ But even though Psalm 104:4 and Hebrews 1:7 indicate that the angels are also fire and spirit, Chrysippus said that one must not make the mistake of assuming that the angels are the same as God. They are decidedly not equal in nature or honor, since the creator cannot be equal to his creations. God alone is uncircumscribable, unviewable, and of purer flame.

Chrysippus was mindful to base discussion of angels on scriptural reference;¹⁷ scripture, not cult, was the proper guide.¹⁸ The same ostensible dependence on divine revelation in scripture generally characterized theologians’ descriptions of angels, as well as descriptions in miracle tales of angels’ work. Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (fl. ca. 500?), in his elaborate taxonomy of heaven in the Celestial Hierarchy, attempted to set his structure on a scriptural foundation, and yet he found that he had to rely on other sources to answer some questions. In a sense, he derived all his orders for his Celestial Hierarchy from the Bible,¹⁹ and his hierarchy differed from those of his predecessors in the systematic laws applied to the orders, their positions, actions and interactions.²⁰

Pseudo-Dionysius rigorously examined scripture for disclosures of the heavenly hierarchy so that a precise structure of angelic beings might be advanced. He divided the hierarchy into triads, the first consisting of seraphim, cherubim and thrones, the second of virtues,

16. Sigalas, “Χρυσίππου πρεσβυτέρου,” 89.

17. Sigalas, “Χρυσίππου πρεσβυτέρου,” 86.

18. A. Sigalas, Des Chrysippos von Jerusalem Enkomion auf den hl. Johannes den Täufer, Texte und Forschungen zur byzantinisch-neugriechischen Philologie, vol. 20 (Athens, 1937) III.

19. Roques, “Introduction,” lxxxi.

20. See Roques, “Introduction,” lvii ff. Pre-Dionysian attempts include the Life of Peter the Iberian, regarding a vision of John the Eunuch (see E. Honigmann, “Pierre l’Ibérien et les écrits du Pseudo-Denys l’Aréopagite,” in Mémoires de l’Académie Royale de Belgique, Classe des Lettres et des Sciences morales et politiques 47/3 (1952):18–19); Cyril of Jerusalem (ca. 315–386), Catechesis mystagogica, V.6, in Catéchèses mystagogiques, SC vol. 126, ed. A. Piédagnel (Paris, 1966) 154; John Chrysostom, Homiliae 1–67 in Genesim, IV, PG 53:44; and the Constitutiones Apostolicae (second half of the fourth century), VIII.12.8, in Didascalia et Constitutiones apostolorum, ed. F.X. Funk (Paderborn, 1905; rp. Turin, 1962) 498. And see A. Louth, Denys the Areopagite (Wilton, Conn., 1989) 35ff.

dominations and principalities, and the last of powers, archangels and angels. His is the best known and most complete attempt at describing the hierarchy, and his symbolic theology influenced at a fundamental level perception of and approaches to angelology from the sixth century on.

Pseudo-Dionysius necessarily depended to some extent on sources other than scripture for the completeness and symmetry of his hierarchy, notably the tradition of the church, Pseudo-Dionysius's own master, Hierotheus, and even his own opinion at particularly difficult junctures.²¹ At one point, for example, Pseudo-Dionysius had to resort to a divergent reading of scripture. In Pseudo-Dionysius's system, only the archangels and angels are in direct contact with humanity. The appearance of the seraphim to Isaiah is, therefore, a direct contradiction of the hierarchical scheme, and Pseudo-Dionysius had to propose a symbolic reading of Isaiah 6:6 wherein the seraphim is actually an angel appearing under symbolic form.²² Clearly, achieving knowledge of God by this method was conditional and subject to personal interpretation.

Pseudo-Dionysius insisted on the inability of human intelligence to understand divine things fully; for him, knowledge only comes through the "truly mysterious darkness of unknowing."²³ Writing about the exegetical possibilities of Isaiah 6:6, he described the necessary process of gaining knowledge of the unknowable as a personal endeavor that is necessarily incomplete.²⁴ Human knowledge of the divine derives in this process largely from personal contemplation of

21. Roques, "Introduction," lxxx ff.

22. Roques, "Introduction," lxxviii–lxxix.

23. De mystica theologia, I.3, PG 3:1001A; Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, The Complete Works, trans. C. Luibheid and P. Rorem (New York, 1987) 137.

24. De coelesti hierarchia, XIII.4, in La Hiérarchie Céleste, SC vol. 58, ed. G. Heil and M. de Gandillac (Paris, 1958) 161. Roques, "Introduction," lxxvi, commented on this passage in this way, "Il y aura donc, en matière théologique, une part d'hypothèse et d'estimation humaine. Mais, soulignons-le, la pointe de relativité s'applique ici aux divers types d'explication qui ont essayé de montrer comment le séraphim d'Isaïe pouvait être un ange, mais non point sur le fait même qu'il l'était: aux yeux de Denys et en vertu de la structure et des lois générales de la hiérarchie, c'est là une vérité absolue qui relève de l'enseignement le plus manifest et le plus sûr de l'illumination théarchique."

symbols or sensible phenomena, but contemplation does not provide final answers, only provisional knowledge.²⁵ For Pseudo-Dionysius, “signs and symbols pointed the seeker of truth on his way, not logical argument.”²⁶

In contrast to the circumspect attempts of theologians to come to terms with angelic nature and activity, popular cult attached great, if not overweening, importance to the near-omnipotence of angelic beings. To be sure, the cult of the Archangel Michael—the most popular of the “personalized” angels in the Byzantine world—did not depend upon these theological speculations for its working premise, although it did share in the fundamental difficulties of comprehension and description inherent in angelology.²⁷ The Christian cult of Michael, and of the angels, was founded on Jewish and pagan beliefs, and it burgeoned naturally out of this wide “power base.” But it also thrived because of its animistic roots. Evidence of Jewish belief in angels who have control over certain natural phenomena is found in the Book of Jubilees (ca. 140–100 B.C.E.), which describes angels, for instance, of fire, wind and darkness;²⁸ in the Book of Enoch (third century B.C.E.), angels have control over frost, snow and other phenomena.²⁹ In short, each natural phenomenon had an angel. Texts that cite Michael in this role as “nature angel” specify his special con-

25. See Roques, L'univers dionysien, 158ff.

26. Cameron, “The Language of Images,” 28.

27. L. Heiser, Die Engel im Glauben der Orthodoxie (Trier, 1976) 222, states that the liturgy is no more specific about the angels’ nature than the theologians are. In the liturgy the angels are given the general attributes of “insubstantial,” “bodiless,” “immaterial.” However, as he notes, “Nicht in theoretischen Erörterungen wird die Natur der Engel erkannt, sondern aus der heilgeschichtlichen Erfahrung ihres tätigen, hilfreichen Dienens für Gott und die Menschen” (ibid., 226). Appearances in history are the only really dependable factor in cult practice.

28. The Book of Jubilees or The Little Genesis, trans. R. H. Charles (London, 1902) 40ff. (c.II).

29. The Book of Enoch or 1 Enoch. A New English Edition, ed. M. Black (Leiden, 1985) 57 (60:17–22), 58 (61:10).

And see J. Daniélou, Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes avant Nicée. Vol. 1. Théologie du judéo-christianisme (Tournai, 1958) 140–41; W. v. Rintelen, Kultgeographische Studien in der Italia Byzantina. Untersuchungen über die Kulte des Erzengels Michael und der Madonna di Costantinopoli in Süditalien (Meisenheim am Glan, 1968) 29; W. v. Rintelen, “Kult- und Legendenwanderung von Ost nach West im frühen Mittelalter,” Saeculum 22(1971):84–85; A. L. Williams, “The Cult of the Angels at Colossae,” JTS 10(1909):415–16. The angels are cerns as water and snow.³⁰ In Egypt, Michael “took over” the role of the Nile God so that he was held responsible for the dew and the rain, and he alone was said to go through the veil to provide life.³¹ Similarly, Michael is described in terms of immanent protection unrestrained by anyone but God.

The sun riseth upon all the world through the supplication of Michael. . . . The earth beareth its fruits through the supplication of Michael. The whole world was reconciled again to God [by Michael], and he it is who delivereth everyone from the snares of the Devil. We find the intercession of Michael in the strenuous work of our hands. . . . We find the intercession of Michael in the body of the vine and of the gladness which is in the wine. . . . For the Archangel standeth by every one who crieth up to God with all his heart and helpeth him.³²

Belief in the elemental character of Michael is not restricted to the Coptic church, although Michael was especially venerated in Egypt.³³ Writing in the late ninth/early tenth century, Pantaleon also remarks on this same elemental character of the Archangel.³⁴ And in his work praising the Archangel Michael, Michael Psellus (1018–1081?) noted the benign immanence of Michael near his shrine: “Such things as the zephyr is able to do for us and breezes placed over every phenomenon and if named they can offer protection: for example, E. Legrand, Bibliothèque grecque vulgaire, 9 vols. (Paris, 1881; rp. Athens, 1974) II:xviii ff.

30. See W. Lueken, Michael. Eine Darstellung und Vergleichung der jüdischen und der morgenländisch-christlichen Tradition vom Erzengel Michael (Göttingen, 1898) 52ff., and 131ff.

31. Lueken, Michael, 131–32.

32. E. A. W. Budge, Miscellaneous Coptic Texts in the Dialect of Upper Egypt (London, 1915) 757.

33. See, on Coptic veneration, E. Amélineau, “Le christianisme chez les anciens Coptes,” Revue de l'histoire des religions 15(1887):54ff. He cites a large number of legends in Christian tradition in Egypt concerning the angels and the majority of these are about Michael; Michael's also are the most varied, “Cet archange était sans cesse en mouvement, tantôt en guerrier, tantôt en batelier, descendant sur la barque aérienne jusqu'au fond des enfers, trempant son aile dans les lacs de feu et en retirant les damnés” (ibid., 56). See further, Lueken, Michael, 70ff., and C. D. G. Müller, Die Engellehre der koptischen Kirche. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der christlichen Frömmigkeit in Ägypten (Wiesbaden, 1959) 8ff.

34. Encomium in maximum et gloriosissimum Michaelem coelestis militiae principem, PG 98:1265B–8A.

from the north refresh our bodies, these things the Archangel is able to do.”³⁵ Michael is the invisible and propitious force that alleviates heat in this region and lifts the oppression of all kinds of illnesses and sufferings. An important component of the angels’ nature is fire and likewise Michael makes himself manifest in this form, as miracle stories testify.³⁶ In Christian belief, angels command and guard their constituent parts, water, air and fire.

The early Church inherited a flourishing, and in some ways troublesome, cult of angels.³⁷ The warning in the Pauline Epistle to the Colossians about the dangers of untoward worship of the angels is an indication of such a problem.³⁸ The Christian cult of angels seems to have been heavily influenced by certain heterodox Jewish practices, as well as pagan beliefs in divine messengers.³⁹ The famous cult of Michael at Colossae, later Chonae, in western Asia Minor, grew out of this active, syncretistic belief in the angels that was common to Jews and pagans both.⁴⁰

35. Fisher 256.639–43. And see also E.A. Fisher, “Nicomedia or Galatia? Where Was Psellos’ Church of the Archangel Michael?” in Gonimos. Neoplatonic and Byzantine Studies Presented to Leendert G. Westerlink at 75, ed. J. Duffy and J. Peradotto (Buffalo, 1988) 179.

36. See chapter 5.

37. The cult of angels, and specifically of the Archangel Michael, was threatening even to the position of Christ in the church. Lueken, Michael, 133ff., exhaustively described this problem; but see also J. Barbel, Christos Angelos. Die Anschauung von Christos als Bote und Engel in der gelehrten und volkstümlichen Literatur des christlichen Altertums, Theophaneia, vol. 3 (Bonn, 1941) 230ff., Daniélou, Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes, 167ff., J. P. Rohland, Der Erzengel Michael. Arzt und Feldherr. Zwei Aspekte des vor- und frühbyzantinischen Michaelkults (Leiden, 1977) 67ff.

38. Col. 2:18, “Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into these things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshy mind.” This rather obscure prescription has been the subject of debate since the exact nature of this worship at Colossae is not known. R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres. Studien zur griechisch-ägyptischen und frühchristlichen Literatur (Leipzig, 1904) 79ff., thought this warning was directed at a cult of animistic forces.

39. For the pagan cult of angels, see A.R.R. Shepherd, “Pagan Cults of Angels in Roman Asia Minor,” Talanta 12/13(1980/81):77–101; F. Sokolowski, “Sur le culte d’angelos dans le paganisme grec et romain,” HTR 53(1960):225–29; and F. Cumont, “Les anges du paganisme,” Revue de l’histoire des religions 72(1915):159–82.

40. See Williams, “The Cult of the Angels at Colossae,” 435ff. R.L. Fox, Pagans and Christians (Harmondsworth, Middlesex, 1986) 380, 742 n18, suspected “a pagan cult of angels” at Chonae, and he notes indications of worship of angels in pagan contexts nearby. The verb ἐμβάτευσεν (“to enter into, to approach something in order to investigate it”) is used at Col. 2:18, and although this verb is also found in the context of the cult of Apollo at

Local causes for the cult at Chonae would seem equally important, however. The geography of the region was long noted as particularly fertile for gods—or angels—with awesome power over natural phenomena.⁴¹ Local causes and larger questions of improper worship combined at Colossae to create awkwardness over cult activity directed to the angels. The Epistle to the Colossians seems to have been addressed specifically to the sizable Jewish community at Colossae and in the region of Phrygia, where pagans were also in-

Claros, one need not connect its forms of worship with Colossae for that reason alone. F.R. Trombley, Hellenic Religion and Christianization c. 370–529, 2d ed., 2 vols. (Leiden, New York and Köln, 1995) I:153ff., understands a pagan cult of angels behind the worship of Michael at Chonae.

The transition of cult, pagan to Christian, is often difficult to discern and should not be taken at face value, as I have attempted to demonstrate in my “The Sosthenion near Constantinople: John Malalas and Ancient Art,” B 68(1998):110–20.

The likeliest course for Michael at Chonae is through hellenised Jews in the area. As Marcel Simon writes, “la substitution a toutes chances d’être pré-chrétienne, et d’avoir été opérée par ces juifs syncrétisants dont on entrevoit l’influence à travers les developements polémiques de l’épître aux Colossiens.” See Verus Israel. Étude sur le relation entre chrétiens et juifs dans l’empire romain (135–425) (Paris, 1948) 430–31. F.O. Francis claimed that some form of mystery cult took place at Colossae, but the evidence is slim; see “Humility and Angelic Worship in Col. 2:18,” Studia Theologica 16(1963):109–34 [= Conflict at Colossae. A Problem in the Interpretation of Early Christianity Illustrated by Selected Modern Studies, ed. F.O. Francis and W.A. Meeks (Missoula, Mont., 1973) 163–95].

41. For example, Williams, “The Cult of the Angels at Colossae,” 435, “The remarkable natural phenomena at and near Colossae must from remote ages have appealed to the human mind, and provided material to which both primitive and later religions could cling.” See, too, O. Rojdestvensky, Le culte de saint Michel et le moyen age latin (Paris, 1922) xvi; Rintelen, Kultgeographische Studien, 25; Rintelen, “Kult- und Legendenwanderung,” 85; and O.F.A. Meinardus, “St. Michael’s Miracle of Khonae and Its Geographical Setting,” Εκκλησία καὶ Θεολογία 1(1980):459–69.

R. Chandler noted in his Travels in Asia Minor: Or, an account of a tour made at the expense of the Society of Dilettanti (Dublin, 1775) 230–31, “It is an old observation, that the country about the Maeander, the soil being light and friable, and full of salts generating inflammable matter, was undermined by fire and water. Hence it abounded in hot springs, which, after passing underground from the reservoirs, appeared on the mountain, or were found bubbling up in the plain or in the mud of the river: and hence it was subject to frequent earthquakes; the nitrous vapour, compressed in the cavities, and sublimed by heat or fermentation, bursting its prison with loud explosions, agitating the atmosphere, and shaking the earth and waters with a violence as extensive as destructive; and hence, moreover, the pestilential grottoes, which had subterraneous communications with each other, derived their noisome effluvia; and serving as smaller vents to these furnaces or hollows, were regarded as apertures of hell, as passages for deadly fumes rising up from the realms of Pluto. One or more of these mountains perhaps has burned; and it may be suspected, that the surface of the country has in some places been formed from its own bowels.”

volved in angelolatry.⁴² The local cult of angels was not so easily dislodged, however, and at the Council held in 380 in nearby Laodicea it was singled out for attack:

It is not right for Christians to abandon the church of God and go away and invoke angels and hold conventicles; for these things are forbidden. If, therefore, anyone is found devoting himself to this secret idolatry, let him be anathema, because he abandoned our Lord Jesus Christ and went after idolatry.⁴³

And somewhat later Theodoret of Cyrrhus (ca. 393–ca. 466) again criticized these excesses of angelolatry:

This disease long remained in Phrygia and Pisidia. For this reason also a synod in Laodicea of Phrygia forbade by a decree the offering of prayer to angels; and even to the present time oratories of the holy Michael may be seen among them and their neighbors.⁴⁴

Wilhelm Lueken noted a scholion to this passage that makes it clear that Theodoret was referring to Michael's shrines in and around Colossae.⁴⁵ Evidently, Chonae was the long-standing center of a heterodox devotion to Michael in particular and to angels in general.

42. Williams, "The Cult of the Angels at Colossae," 436ff.; C. Mango, "Germia: A Postscript," JÖB 41(1991):297; on the number of Jews in Phrygia, Lueken, Michael, 80–81, and K. Belke and N. Mersich, Phrygien und Pisidien, Tabula Imperii Byzantini, vol. 7 (Vienna, 1990) 223, for citations.

It can be inferred that the so-called Epistle to the Colossians was directed at angelolatry in Asia Minor in general, even if the Epistle may not have been directed at the eponymous community. H. Koester, History and Literature of Early Christianity (Philadelphia, 1982) 264, denied the possibility of Paul's authorship but still thought that the Epistle was directed to the church at Colossae.

43. See P.-P. Joannou, Discipline generale antique (IVe-IXe siècles). Tome I.2. Les canons des synodes particuliers (Grottaferrata, 1962) 144–45. The translation of Canon 35 of the Council of Laodicea is from J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (London, 1879) 68. See Williams, "The Cult of the Angels at Colossae," 435; Simon, Verus Israel, 429–30; L. Robert, Hellenica. Recueil d'épigraphie de numismatique et d'antiquités grecques, vol. XI–XII (Paris, 1960) 432ff. And on the anti-Jewish tendencies of the Council of Laodicea, see Rintelen, Kultgeographische Studien, 27, and Lueken, Michael, 81.

44. De providentia orationes x, II, PG 82:613B; trans. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistles, 68.

45. Lueken, Michael, 75.

This composite portrait of devotion to angels in the Early Christian and Byzantine world, as outlined above, reveals conflicting elements. On the one hand, popular, sometimes heterodox devotion to elemental, guardian creatures clearly existed, as the troublesome and flourishing history of the devotion to Michael at Chonae demonstrates; and, on the other, there was an abundance of theological speculation that carefully avoided crossing paths with this popular devotion and instead focused on issues of nature and organization—in other words, on decorous angelology. This study, however, explores how these apparently contradictory approaches to God's invisible multitude could intersect. The possibility of idolatry, a fear of the early church that still acted on the consciences of eighth- and ninth-century Byzantines, was never distant from discussion of angels and their representations. It informed the debates over the appropriateness of representing angels, a debate that began in the early church but was not resolved until the ninth century. The course of this debate as it incriminated material images is the subject of the first three chapters of this book. The worship of angels and of their images is the subject of fourth chapter; this chapter examines theology and miracle stories, and discusses the ways in which both of these genres dealt with the danger of worship of angels and presented seemingly examples of approach instead. The fifth chapter looks at miracle stories of the Archangel Michael at Chonae to examine their verbal representation, that is, how these texts both make Michael more apprehensible to their audience and manage the difficulties of description with which artists also—in their own way—contended.

While this study deals primarily with textual evidence of attitudes towards angels and their images, it is the work of an art historian. It draws on intellectual history, which includes theology, miracle stories, poetry and sermons, and incorporates them into a history of representation. At the center of the study are the cultural conditions of seeing and understanding: an epistemology for which angels are simply the most trying and dangerous case. Transparent images of formless beings made for especially treacherous rapids, which the Byzantines attempted to stop up; this study looks at the shifting waters and dams that having images of angels necessitated.

BLANK PAGE

One

ISSUES IN REPRESENTING ANGELS

Given the difficult nature of angels and their incorrigible cult, the question arose early in Christianity: How does one make an image of an incorporeal being, and what meaning does that image have for devotion to and comprehension of that being? This question, however, formed part of a larger search for ways of attaining knowledge of God and of things divine. As Averil Cameron's insightful synthesis of different aspects of Byzantine culture demonstrates, it was this search and the distinct approaches to gaining knowledge that led directly to the crisis of Iconoclasm in the eighth and ninth centuries.¹

Iconoclasm arose in the 720s, signaled perhaps by the dramatic destruction of the image of Christ on the Chalke Gate of the imperial palace in Constantinople.² Its direct cause was likely political concerns and the personal inclination of the emperor Leo III

1. Cameron, "The Language of Images"; and also her "Byzantium and the Past in the Seventh Century: The Search for Redefinition," in The Seventh Century. Change and Continuity. Proceedings of a joint French and British Colloquium held at the Warburg Institute 8–9 July 1988, ed. J. Fontaine and J. N. Hillgarth (London, 1992) 250–76.

2. See M.-F. Auzépy, "Le destruction de l'icône du Christ de la Chalce par Léon III: Propagande ou réalité," B 60(1990):445–92, and G. Peers, "Breathless, Speechless Images: On the Chalke Gate Epigram," Hommages Margaret Head Thomson, Cahiers des études anciennes, vol. 34, ed. L. Finnet and A. P. Booth (Trois Rivières, Québec, 1998) 109–12.

(r. 716–740), but its intellectual roots are deep in the early church, in divergent approaches to created matter—primarily images—in Christian life and worship.³ Iconoclasm as imperial policy was continued and reinforced by Leo’s son, Constantine V (r. 740–775) but halted under the regency of Irene who ruled for her son Constantine VI and solely from 797 to 802. Irene convened the last ecumenical council in 787, the second held at Nicaea, which reintroduced image worship in the empire. From 815 to 843, Iconoclasm was again enforced until Michael III (r. 842–867) declared for image worship under the influence of his mother, Theodora. The effect of this prolonged period of Iconoclasm was intense debate over images and worship. This study mines that debate for the information it provides about attitudes towards representing angels.

Cameron’s study provides a framework for a more specific analysis of one aspect of the quest for knowledge of the holy, namely depictions of angels. She delineates the process by which early Byzantine society attempted to define and systematize methods of acquiring knowledge and recognizing truth. In Cameron’s view, Iconoclasm “was a manifestation of an uncertainty which people felt about their own thought world.”⁴ And indeed, the period leading up to Iconoclasm reveals two divergent approaches to gaining knowledge in Byzantine culture: symbolism and literalism in art and worship were the two poles of the debate. These conflicting views on art and worship characterize attitudes toward, and perceptions of, angels and their representations. The debate over symbolism and literalism also involved questions about the place of created things in Christian worship; intellectual devotion and material assistance were mutually exclusive for some of the theologians discussed here. Figurative art

3. On the origins of Iconoclasm under Leo III, see S. Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm during the Reign of Leo III with Particular Attention to the Oriental Sources (Louvain, 1973) and D. Stein, Der Beginn des byzantinischen Bilderstreits und seine Entwicklung bis in der 40er Jahre des 8. Jahrhunderts (Munich, 1980). On the roots of Iconoclasm, see P.C. Finney, The Invisible God. Early Christians on Art (Oxford, 1994), E. Kitzinger, “The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm,” DOP 8(1954):83–150, and Sister Charles Murray, Rebirth and Afterlife. A Study of the Transmutation of Some Pagan Imagery in Early Christian Funerary Art (Oxford, 1981).

4. Cameron, “The Language of Images,” 4.

was one alienating feature within a larger complex of material aids introduced into worship in the period being examined.

The possibility of idolatry that arose from the introduction of material aids into Christian worship was the underlying and central apprehension that united anti-image theologians. The rejection of images of angels was directly related to that fear of idolatry, but it also involved other issues of primary concern in the early church, namely the worship of angels as gods and pagan attempts to equate Christian angels with their own gods. In the late fourth and fifth centuries, canon 35 of the Council of Laodicea and the repeated warning of Theodoret of Cyrrhus aimed at increasing awareness of the problem and at extirpating the embarrassing problem from the Christian community.⁵ Macarius Magnes in the fourth century combatted the pagan attempt at a rapprochement by denying any resemblance between Christian worship of angels and pagan devotion to their gods.⁶ John of Thessalonike continued to fend off just such advances from pagan quarters into the seventh century.⁷ Evidently, the issue maintained a shame-inspiring purchase within the church. Christian practice, likely in the region of Chonae and perhaps far beyond, evidently encouraged the expression of such pagan views, and pagans could draw parallels between the two apparently irreconcilable beliefs. The shrine at Chonae was a prime site for overweening angel worship, and the stories describing the miracles of Michael were directed at cleansing a situation mortifying for church authorities; the emphasis on the blameless character at the center of the story of the miracle at Chonae was intended to counter behavior that was perhaps not normal but at least perceived to be possible within the cult of angels.⁸ A literal approach to worship, therefore, implicated other issues in the early church that are not simply theological abstractions

5. See the Introduction.

6. See chapter 2.

7. See the Conclusion, and also G. Peers, "Imagination and Angelic Epiphany," BMGS 21(1997):113–31, and D. Krausmüller, "God or Angels as Impersonators of Saints. A Belief and its Contexts in the 'Refutation' of Eustratius of Constantinople and in the Writings of Anastasius of Sinai," Gouden Hoorn 6/2(1998/9):5–16.

8. See chapter 4.

but that involved problems of Christian worship within the material, created world and before insubstantial messengers and guardians of that world.

Before such elusive creatures as angels, Christian artists encountered a representational dilemma. Yet they did not consider this problem of depicting spiritual creatures to be insurmountable, as they represented angels from the earliest period. They based their depictions on scriptural description, and, like theologians such as Chrysippus and Pseudo-Dionysius, they prudently stayed on the path scripture had established for angelic appearances. In many ways, artists avoided problems of representations and described angels straightforwardly as men, thereby ignoring the metaphysical qualities of angels altogether. Yet Christian artists did not always show angels as if they were illustrating the Bible literally. Christian artists developed an iconography of angels that commemorated angelic appearances on earth, most often using wings to indicate the symbolic quality of these appearances. In one important sense, the common iconography of the winged man is reductive: it does not describe the bodiless, immaterial nature of angels; rather, it represents God's messengers generically.

The iconography of angels is unique in Christian art in that it described the difficult flashes of epiphany of the formless angels allusively; the iconography of Christ and the saints presented their human forms, derived from corporeal lives on earth, as the iconography of the angels could not. While it is true that angels appropriated human form for some of their appearances on earth, this form was only one among many forms possible for angels. Christ and the saints had secure and comprehensible forms that persisted with a degree of stability throughout their lives on earth; in contrast, angels were unstable and, in the end, unknowable.

Christian images depended on the life that the subject led on earth for their significance in cult since they stated historical likeness and actual presence in the stead of the person represented. As Hans Belting has demonstrated, images of saints grew directly out of the Late Antique practice of honoring the dead through portraits; images became venerated like relics and were treated like vestiges that had contact with the person represented.⁹ Christ and the Virgin were, of course, difficult cases as both rose bodily into heaven; miraculous images, wondrously imprinted with Christ's face or taken from eyewitness observation such as by the Evangelist Luke, fulfilled this desire for verification of earthly being and for contact with the divine.¹⁰

Representing God—that is, the ability to represent absolute transcendence—was the central issue in the period leading to, and including, Iconoclasm, and it determined the selection and introduction of material concerning angels who are also transcendent, though not, like God, absolutely. The central defense for images of God was the incarnation; supreme divinity assumed human form, and lived, suffered and died in that form. Angels also become comprehensible, though not to this same degree, and for this reason were often a corollary for this primary question of Christian representation. But the issue of angels' images diverges immediately from any direct comparison with images of Christ. The angels were never incarnate, only give the illusion of being so—as, for instance, Raphael deluded Tobias into believing him human. Although angels are comprehensible in some fashion, they present a set of problems different from Christ's representability. Their formless nature and illusory apparitions, so well documented in scripture, apocrypha and miracle stories, define the angels' images as allusive to a spiritual reality not altogether apprehensible. Without the anchor of incarnate being that Christ's images refer to, angels' images are symbolic in a distinct way, necessarily referring to the paradox of bodilessness and immateriality made momentarily and partially known.

Angels, it appears, could not participate in the same process of representation as Christ and the saints: they did not manufacture miraculous images, they did not relinquish relics. Altogether their timeless, near-eternal selves denied historical ratification to their like-

9. H. Belting, Bild und Kult. Eine Geschichte des Bildes vor dem Zeitalter der Kunst (Munich, 1990) 42ff., 92ff.

10. On these issues, see the papers in The Holy Face and the Paradox of Representation, Villa Spelman Colloquia, vol. 6, ed. H. L. Kessler and G. Wolf (Bologna, 1998).

Figure 1. Icon of the Archangel Michael (?), Cabinet des Médailles, Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, sixth century.
Photo: Bibliothèque Nationale.

nesses. Painters of icons of angels relied on tried and true modes of representation for depicting these beings. A sixth-century Coptic panel painting of the archangel Michael (?), now in the Cabinet des Médailles, Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris (fig. 1), reveals a clear dependence on idealizing funerary portraiture of the Late Antique period: large, staring eyes give a sense of timeless abstraction; the figure faces the viewer frontally, only betraying the impression of immovability by his right hand raised in benediction; the circular nimbus is depicted in front of the rectangular frame in the upper right hand corner, lending a contrapposto effect to the hand below.¹¹ While these elements provide animation, perhaps a notion of activity benevolently directed at the worshipper, the figure itself is anonymous, undistinguished by feature or by inscription; it is so reliant on pagan idealizing portraiture in iconography and style that only the heroic quality of the figure—and not its individuality—is clear. The stumps of wings alone betray a hint of angelic identity and nature; the icon is not, then, unambiguous in its representation of qualities unique to angels.

11. See Belting, Bild und Kult, 110, fig. 47, and J. Durand in Byzance. L'art byzantin dans les collections publiques françaises (Paris, 1992) 144, no. 98.

If Christian artists sidestepped certain problems of angelic nature in frequently representing angels as men, these images of angels raised difficulties of perception and comprehension on the part of the viewer. Angels are formless, bodiless and immaterial, so a true likeness of such beings in material images is impossible. The relation between the image and model is, therefore, problematic, and definition of any relation relied on viewers' ability to discern symbolic rather than literal "likeness." Byzantine viewers did approach images of angels discriminatingly: the tension between material representation and immaterial nature is the compelling and attractive quality of their images. Indeed, this tension is the defining characteristic of angels' images and distinguishes their images from other Christian representations.

On a literal level, the iconography of the angels presents a faithful rendering of certain appearances that God's messengers had made on earth. In Christian art, angels are depicted as youths, most often winged; they are generalized in appearance to the point of anonymity, and only the Archangels are consistently named by inscription in representations. Cherubim and seraphim are often recognizable, though not always distinguishable from each other, by the many wings and eyes that scripture prescribed. Yet cherubim, seraphim and other angelic beings—that is, the thrones, principalities, powers, virtues and dominations mentioned in scripture—could also be represented by the generalized iconography of the winged youth. Clearly, the form of a man with wings not only commemorated the human aspect occasionally made manifest to humanity but also referred, more broadly, to all angelic beings.

Although a degree of anthropomorphism became a consistent iconographic element for angels, anthropomorphism itself was not predetermined. For instance, scripture advances different agencies behind the cloud of smoke and pillar of fire that led the Israelites out of the desert in Exodus. At one point (13:21–22), “the Lord went before them”; but at other points in the journey, the text specifies that the Lord’s angel guided the people (14:19, 23:20–23, 32:34, 33:2). Although Exodus is ambiguous about these manifestations’ identity, the cloud of smoke and pillar of fire were generally considered to be emanations of God, that is angels.¹² The angels in illustrations of these events in Exodus presented representational possibilities for painters. They could be depicted either in the form made manifest to the Israelites in the desert, or as men, a form revealed elsewhere in scripture.

In the case of the smoke and fire of Exodus, literal adherence to scripture characterizes the depictions of these epiphanies, and painters did not use the iconography of the winged youth to indicate the nature and ultimate identity of the agencies behind the cloud and fire. Frescoes in cubicula C and O in the fourth-century via Latina Catacomb in Rome both represent a column with a blaze on top beside Moses receiving the law; these two columns are placed on a level above a crowd standing before a building.¹³ The Christian Topography, written in the sixth century, shows a different context for representing this manifestation of God’s providence. Illuminations accompany passages from Exodus and other biblical books, collated by the author in an attempt at a Christian history prefigured by events in Hebrew Scripture. The context is primarily narrative, although Christian typology is the final concern. This particular manifestation of divinity, the column and cloud, is depicted with faithful attention to scripture and interpreted as a sign of God’s providence fulfilled with the coming of Christ.

12. See M. Barker, The Great Angel. A Study of Israel’s Second Angel (London, 1992) 32, 86. Eventually, the Archangel Michael became identified with these manifestations on account of his guardianship of Israel stated at Daniel 12:1. See, for instance, Pantaleon, Narratio, IX, PG 140:579C.

13. See W. Tronzo, The Via Latina Catacomb. Imitation and Discontinuity in Fourth-Century Roman Painting (University Park and London, 1986) 1, 59, figs. 4, 5.

Rather than depicting an angelic being or God, the illuminators chose a literal depiction of a cloud and a column with a flame atop it (fig. 2).¹⁴ Yet the depictions, like scripture, ultimately refer to enigmatic revelations of God's emanations, that is angels, as the column and cloud in the manuscripts and the frescoes allude to changeable beings, unclear identities and obscure meanings. Both examples, despite their different contexts and literal attention to text, demand an understanding on the part of the viewer that the column and cloud are symbolic of aspects of divine, multiform beings. By avoiding any attempts at visually referring to the nature of the epiphanies, the painter shifts the burden to the viewer who must supply an interpretation based on his or her knowledge of scripture. While this burden is not exclusive to viewing angels, it has a special role since their mutable nature demands special processes of interpretation.

Angels' metaphysical qualities notwithstanding, during the early centuries of Christian art, painters, mosaicists and sculptors depicted angels as men. They first devised an anthropomorphic iconography because angels are sometimes described in scriptural accounts as having made themselves manifest as men. The earliest extant representation of an anthropomorphic angel appeared in the third century in an Annunciation in the Catacomb of Priscilla in

14. See K. Weitzmann and G. Galavaris, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Illuminated Greek Manuscripts. Volume One: From the Ninth to the Eleventh Century (Princeton, 1990) 63–64, figs. 141, 142, pls. IXa, Xa; and Cosmas Indicopleustes, Topographie chrétienne, SC vols. 141, 159, 197, ed. W. Wolska-Conus (Paris, 1968–1973) I:47ff.

The column with fire and the cloud are represented in illustrations in the two eleventh-century manuscripts of this sixth-century work at Sinai (cod. 1186, fols. 73r, 73v, 74r) and Florence (Laur. Plut. IX, 28, fols. 103r, 103v, 104r). The illustrations were not invented for these two manuscripts and the eleventh-century recensions rely ultimately on the sixth-century prototype of the Christian Topography for their model. The Sinai and Florence versions more faithfully reproduce the illumination tradition of the Christian Topography than the other member of this manuscript family, the ninth-century Vaticanus graecus 699, and so these illustrations of Exodus can be safely related to a pre-Iconoclastic model.

One should properly follow the identification of the author of the Christian Topography with Constantine of Antioch rather than Cosmas Indicopleustes, as Wanda Wolska-Conus has persuasively argued. See her "Stéphanos d'Athènes et Stéphanos d'Alexandrie. Essai d'identification et de biographie," REB 47(1989):28ff.

Figure 2. The Israelites at the Twelve Springs, The Christian Topography of "Cosmas Indicopleustes," Monastery of St. Catherine, Sinai, cod. 1186, fol. 73r, eleventh century. Reproduced through the courtesy of the Michigan–Princeton–Alexandria Expedition to Mount Sinai.

Rome. The scriptural narrative (Luke 1:28–38) describes the messenger of God merely as an “angel,” and the painter chose to represent this messenger as a man wearing a tunic and standing firmly on the earth.¹⁵ This solution to the potential difficulties in representing formless beings was used frequently in the first centuries of Christian art and never disappeared from the Byzantine iconographic tradition. Indeed, it shows that describing the special qualities of angels was felt sometimes not to be possible or not to be of paramount concern. In Early Christian art, angels were most often depicted in this earthly guise, as a man either bearded or unbearded,¹⁶ and in this way artists described one comprehensible aspect out of the many that scripture ascribes to angels. However, in the fresco in the Catacomb of Priscilla, the angel is not explicitly identified by inscription or iconographic peculiarity, and the attribution of the scene as the Annunciation is ambivalent. Clearly, the image of a man did not itself indicate the distinct identity of an angel nor could it describe directly any transcendental element in the event.

For some mosaicists, painters and sculptors, the literal depiction of angels as men was restrictive since anthropomorphism could not express qualities peculiar to angels.¹⁷ But in Late Antique art iconographic means that could indicate the distinct identity and metaphysical nature of angels were available to Christian mosaicists, painters and sculptors: by the end of the fourth century, wings were standard—though not exclusive—attributes of angels. They provided the means for referring to supernatural qualities particular to angels that could not be expressed easily in visual terms: transcendence, velocity, ethereality and uncontained activity. For instance, John Chrysostom (ca. 347–407) wrote:

15. See M. Bussagli, Storia degli angeli. Racconto di immagini e di idee (Milan, 1991) 48; and P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana. Nozioni generali dalle origini alla fine del sec. VI (Rome, 1958) 258.

16. The bearded angel is found as late as the fifth century, for example, on an ivory representing the Baptism of Christ in the British Museum; see W. F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, 3d ed. (Mainz am Rhein, 1976) pl. 60 (#115).

17. G. Berefelt, A Study on the Winged Angel. The Origin of a Motif (Stockholm, 1968) 15.

What do the powers reveal to us by these wings? The exaltedness and ethereality and lightness and speed of their nature. For which reason, Gabriel descends fleet; not that the wings are part of the bodiless power, but that he descends from realms on high and returns to his abode whence he was sent.¹⁸

In Byzantine art, wings became an established and comprehensive distinguishing sign of the offices and nature of angelic beings—and, rarely, of other beings as well, Christ, for instance, or John the Baptist in his angelic guise.¹⁹ In the case of the angels, however, the oc-

18. In Isaiham dominum (Is. 6:1), homiliae 1–6, II, PG 56:137. And, also, Ad eos qui scandalizati, III, PG 52:484, “Therefore when you see the seraphim flying around that exalted and well-fitted throne, their sight walled round by the projection of their wings, hiding their feet, backs and faces, and sending forth fearfully strong cries, do not think wings and feet, and that they are winged. For these are invisible powers. But [it is] on account of the unapproachability of their images, and the incomprehensibility of sitting near an actual throne. For indeed he is incomprehensible and unapproachable to them also, and yet he too condescended.”

19. Christ represented as an angel is a rare iconography based on Isaiah 9:6, “For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given . . . and his name shall be called the Angel of the Great Counsel (Μεγάλης Βουλῆς Ἄγγελος), Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace.” Christ in this guise is depicted winged, and unbearded, but with cross-nimbus or in a mandorla, thereby differentiating him from the heavenly host proper. On this iconography, see S. Der Nersessian, “Note sur quelques images se rattachant au thème du Christ-ange,” CA 13(1962):209–16; J. Meyendorff, “Iconographie de la Sagesse divine dans la tradition byzantine,” CA 10(1959):269, and also his “Wisdom–Sophia: Contrasting Approaches to a Complex Theme,” DOP 41(1987):391–401; and D.I. Pallas, “Ο Χριστός ὡς ἡ θεία Σοφία. Ἡ Εἰκονογραφικὴ Περιπέτεια μιᾶς θεολογικῆς Ἐννοῦς,” DChAE 15(1989–1990):127ff., 137ff.

The first extant representation of the winged John the Baptist is found at the church of Sv. Ahilije in Arlije from ca. 1296 (G. Millet, La peinture du moyen âge en Yougoslavie (Serbie, Macédonie et Monténégro), 4 vols. [Paris, 1954–1969] II: pl. 87.1; and RBK III:623ff.). The iconography may very well predate this representation, as Lossky points out instances of seventh-/eighth-century commentary on the angelic nature of John the Baptist. See L. Ouspensky and W. Lossky, The Meaning of the Icons (Boston, 1952) 108. The iconography has been examined by J. Lafontaine-Dosogne, “Une icône d’Angélos au Musée de Malines et l’iconographie du St Jean-Baptiste ailé,” Bulletin de Musées Royaux d’Art et d’Histoire 48(1976):121–44, and M. Bussagli, “Il Precursore. Giovanni l’angelo, martire della luce,” Abstracta 27(1988):23–29.

Rarely, the Virgin Mary may be depicted winged also, but this is generally late and developed perhaps under the influence of the iconography of the winged Christ; see RBK III:108. Furthermore, the Angeloi family in the Palaiologan period depicted themselves with wings on coins as a kind of heraldic emblem, and also perhaps to invoke angelic protection; see T. Bertelè, L’imperatore alato nella numismatica bizantina (Rome, 1951) 45ff.

Figure 3. Sarigüzel sarcophagus, Archaeological Museum, Istanbul (#5408), late fourth century. Photo: Istanbul Archaeological Museum.

casional need to distinguish these beings iconographically from humanity, including Christ incarnate, was important for the creation of angels' iconography. Angelic beings are distinct from, and servile to, Christ, and they do not participate in human nature. Consequently, the winged, anthropomorphic form became a unique sign for the innumerable, invisible entities that mediate between heaven and earth at God's behest.

The iconographic formulae used to depict angelic beings were derived from pagan models. An important example of this derivation is the late fourth-century Sarigüzel sarcophagus in the Archaeological Museum in Istanbul (fig. 3). It shows both the dependence of Christian angels on pagan figures, in particular winged victories, and also the distinctions between the Christian and pagan beings.²⁰ On the Sarigüzel sarcophagus, two flying male angels, clad in tunic and palium, bear a wreath containing Christ's monogram ("XP"). The pagan iconography of two horizontal winged beings holding a wreath, medallion or inscribed plaque clearly motivated the disposition of the angels on the Sarigüzel sarcophagus. For instance, on a third-century sarcophagus from the via Aurelia Antica now in the Palazzo dei Conservatori, Rome, two winged female figures hover horizontally and hold a medallion between them in a manner common in pagan funerary art.²¹

20. See N. Firatli, La sculpture byzantine figurée au Musée Archéologique d'Istanbul (Paris, 1990) no. 81.

Nevertheless, individual elements used in depictions of Christian angels belie any generalizations about unmediated transmission of iconography from pagan to Christian art.²² Pagan figures, such as nikes and personifications, are invariably female; Christian angels, male. In Greek, “ho angelos” (ὁ ἄγγελος) is masculine in gender, a distinction always followed in iconography; hence the distinction in dress. The angels on the Sarigüzel sarcophagus wear tunic and pallium, while nikes wear the female peplos, and, in other cases, the chiton, occasionally with one breast exposed.²³

Gender and dress, therefore, constitute the essential identifying features for nike and angel, and the distinctions of nature and function are nowhere more evident than on monuments with both figures. The ivory leaf from the late fifth-/early sixth-century Barberini diptych (Louvre, Paris) shows a female, chiton-clad victory accompanying the emperor; in the register above, two male winged figures wearing tunic and pallium bear aloft a medallion containing the unbearded Christ (fig. 4).²⁴

The pagan iconography provided some of the meaning of the Christian iconography of victory proclaiming angels. The pagan nikes signal worldly acclaim and, in such contexts as the sarcophagus from the via Aurelia Antica, laud the achievements of the

21. See Berefelt, A Study on the Winged Angel, fig. 15.

22. For instance, O. Wulff, Altchristliche und byzantinische Kunst (Munich, 1914) 136, A. C. M. Beck, Genien und Niken als Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst (Giessen, 1936), and E. Panofsky, Tomb Sculpture. Its Changing Aspects from Ancient Egypt to Bernini, ed. H. W. Janson (London, 1964) 43–44: “Victories could become angels without changing in appearance.”

23. G. Stuhlfauth, Die Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst (Freiburg, 1897) 242ff.; K. Felis, “Die Niken und die Engel in altchristlicher Kunst,” RQ 26(1912):3–25; and see Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, 63ff. and 142ff.

24. See R. Delbrueck, Die Consulardiptychen und verwandte Denkmäler, 2 vols. (Berlin and Leipzig, 1929) I:188ff., II: pl. 48, and F. de’ Maffei, “Tradizione ed innovazione nei dittici eburnei: Giuliano, Pulcheria, Giustiniano,” Rivista degli Studi Orientali 40(1986):129ff. Pallados, writing ca. 400, implies a self-conscious, artistic coexistence for angels and nikes when he describes some painted, Christian nikes. See The Greek Anthology, ed. W. R. Paton, 5 vols. (London, 1927), V:282.

Figure 4. Barberini Diptych, Louvre, Paris, sixth century. Photo: Musée du Louvre.

deceased. In distinction, the Christian iconography attempted to demonstrate the universal claims of that faith. Winged angels demonstrate the metaphysical dimension of Christianity and, on the Sarigüzöl sarcophagus, its victory over death. The angels are the otherworldly heralds of the triumph of Christ throughout the universe and are the celestial counterparts to the saints on the end panels of that sarcophagus.

Other pagan personifications besides nikes played a role in the development of the iconography of Christian angels. A common iconographic feature to mark creatures that occupied the intermediate zone between the heavens and earth, wings were attributes of numerous personifications, such as winds, psychopompic figures, souls and astronomical symbols. Christian art assimilated this widespread motif to denote angels' immaterial and superhuman nature.²⁵ For example, set within a swirling carpet of fruits, plants and birds, four angels hold aloft a medallion containing the Lamb of God in the mosaic of the chancel vault of San Vitale (consecrated 548).²⁶ Although distinguished by gender and dress, the angels owe their disposition and activity to representations of seasons in late Roman art. For example, winged, female personifications of seasons are depicted in the Late Antique period in mosaics from Daphne, near Antioch, (fig. 5) and Halicarnassus.²⁷ These personifications of seasons, with

25. On this question of pagan winged beings generally, see the studies of Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, and "Gli angeli e i venti: considerazioni sul simbolismo aereo delle ali angeliche," Arte medievale 5(1991):107ff. Even birds may have influenced the iconography of the angels; and, in fact, bird-footed angels on a Palaiologan icon (#157) in the Byzantine Museum, Athens, show that an iconographic assimilation of birds and angels was at least possible. See M. G. Soteriou, "Ἀμὶπρόσωπος εἰκὼν τοῦ Βυζαντινοῦ Μουσείου Ἀθηνῶν ἐκ τοῦ Ἡπειροῦ," DChAE 4(1959):137, fig. 54.

26. See H. Maguire, Earth and Ocean. The Terrestrial World in Early Byzantine Art (University Park and London, 1987) 76ff.

27. W. R. Lethaby, "The Painted Book of Genesis in the British Museum," Archaeological Journal 69(1912):94, cites a mosaic of the four seasons from Halicarnassus in the British Museum that shows winged female figures wearing tunics; see R. P. Hinks, Catalogue of the Greek, Etruscan and Roman Paintings and Mosaics in the British Museum (London, 1933) 127ff. (#51 c-d). And for the fourth-century mosaic from Daphne, now in the Louvre, see A. Grabar, Early Christian Art. From the Rise of Christianity to the Death of Theodosius, trans. S. Gilbert and J. Emmons (New York, 1968) fig. 163. Seasons were also depicted as males in pagan art; on an early third-century sarcophagus (Landgrafmuseum, Cassel), and on a sarcophagus dating ca. 300–320 (Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.), the seasons are winged nude males. See, respectively, J. Godwin, Mystery Religions in the Ancient World, San Francisco, 1981, fig. 100, and G. M. A. Hanfmann, The Season Sarcophagus in Dumbarton Oaks, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1951). Seasons became a significant element in Roman imperial art in the second century, when they were depicted as young males below the female Victories in the spandrels of the triumphal arch of Trajan at Benevento (114–18); see D. Kleiner, Roman Sculpture (New Haven and London, 1992) figs. 188, 189, and Hanfmann, The Season Sarcophagus, I:171ff. Wings are found subsequently on personifications of seasons in the second century for the first time; Hanfmann, The Season Sarcophagus, I:136. And since seasons are also found on sarcophagi from the second century on, an assimilation of arms raised to hold a medallion, clearly influenced the handling of the angels in the chancel vault at San Vitale. Based on this existing iconography, the angels within this area of the church form part of the nude male figures with the winged and clothed female victories, such as is found on Trajan's arch, may well have resulted in the Late Antique examples of personifications of time found at Aphrodisias, Halicarnassus and ultimately in the Cotton Genesis.

Figure 5. Mosaic of the Seasons, detail of Personification of Spring, from Daphne near Antioch, Louvre, Paris, early fourth century. Photo: Musée du Louvre.

the mosaic program in the sanctuary, the rule of Christ over the entire earth.

The dependence of the iconography of Christian angels on pagan models is complex, and certain pagan models maintained their identities in Christian art and did not influence the angels' iconography in any simple or direct manner. For example, the late fifth-century Cotton Genesis includes representations of both personifications and angels. Dress and gender distinguish the personifications of the days in the creation pages from the angels in such narrative scenes as Abraham entertaining the three angels.²⁸ The former are female and wear garlands in their hair and high girdled chitons that leave their arms bare; the angels in the Philoxenia, on the other hand, are male and wear purple and gold chlamys with a silver tablion over a white tunic.

Yet the identity of these winged figures in the creation pages is still debated by scholars. The figures are often called angels by scholars, despite the clear iconographic distinctions the illuminator made between the figures in the creation pages and in the narrative scenes; for this reason, it is useful to examine the literature on these figures to see the reasoning behind their designation as angels. In 1959, Marie-Thérèse D'Alverny published an article in which she examined the exegetical history of angels in creation, and discerned an affinity between the commentary of Augustine (354–430) on Genesis and the representations of the winged figures in the creation pages of the Cotton Genesis.²⁹ Augustine stated that the creation of light was also the moment of creation for the angels, and so the angels are intellectual creatures, days of creation in his view, who witness and glorify the creations of God. From this exegesis, D'Alverny hypothesized that the winged figures in the Cotton Genesis illuminations,

28. See K. Weitzmann and H. L. Kessler, The Cotton Genesis. British Museum Codex Cotton Otho B. VI (Princeton, 1986) 40, 48 (creation pages), 79–80 (Abraham).

Angels are depicted as men in the scene of Jacob's Dream in the third-century fresco in the synagogue at Dura Europos; as in the Cotton Genesis, the psyches are kept distinct from the angels iconographically as they are depicted as small winged females. See K. Weitzmann and H. L. Kessler, The Frescoes of the Dura Europos Synagogue and Christian Art (Washington, D.C., 1990) 17ff., fig. 10, and 135ff., fig. 178, respectively.

29. M.-Th. D'Alverny, "Les anges et les jours," CA 9(1957):271–300.

who increase in number according to the day of creation, find a direct parallel in this unique exegesis of Genesis by Augustine.³⁰ For this reason, she called them angels.

D'Alverny made an exhaustive survey of the textual tradition of creation and angels, but neglected to specify the iconographic precedents for the winged beings in the creation pages. Furthermore, she accepted the traditional provenance of the Cotton Genesis at Alexandria, and so ran aground on the relation of Augustinian exegesis to a Greek manuscript manufactured in Egypt. Maria Marini Clarelli has offered an hypothesis that attempts to reconcile this provenance with an exegetical tradition.³¹ She proposed that the winged females are angels assimilated to the iconography of pagan psyches; psyches in this view were a fundamental influence on the development of angels' iconography. The winged figures in these illustrations of the Cotton Genesis are, for this reason, depicted wearing chitons, unlike the standard angelic dress of dalmatian and pal-lium, in order to state iconographically the connection between soul and angel.³² However, psyches have butterfly wings in pagan iconography, and the winged figures in the Cotton Genesis creation pages have small sickle-shaped wings; the iconographic parallel is not, therefore, convincing.³³

30. References in D'Alverny, "Les anges et les jours," 273ff.

31. See M.V. Marini Clarelli, "I giorni della creazione nel 'Genesi Cotton,'" OCP 50(1984):65–93; and Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, 72ff.

32. Marini Clarelli, "I giorni della creazione nel 'Genesi Cotton,'" 83ff. She attributed this assimilation to exegesis current at Alexandria in the early Christian period, particularly that of Philo (ca. 20 B.C.E.–ca. 50 C.E.) and Clement (ca. 150–ca. 215). According to the exegesis of Clement of Alexandria, the souls of the just participate in a journey of progressive refinement that leads ultimately to an essential assimilation with the seven first-created angels.

33. An apparent strength of Marini Clarelli's hypothesis is a better contextualization of the manuscript in Alexandria, but Martin Büchsel has recently examined further the Augustinian exegesis on creation with regard to the Cotton Genesis. See M. Büchsel, "Die Schöpfungsmosaiken von San Marco. Die Ikonographie der Erschaffung des Menschen in der frühchristlichen Kunst," Städte-Jahrbuch n.s. 13(1991):29–80. Büchsel discerned elements in the creation cycle in the thirteenth-century mosaic program of San Marco, Venice, which is derived from the Cotton Genesis, that are found only in the work of Augustine; this extensive examination advances further the hypothesis of a connection between the Cotton Genesis and Augustine. He also proposed a provenance for the manuscript at Rome, thus taking away an important underpinning of Marini Clarelli's argument and adding strength to the original connection made between Augustine and the Cotton Genesis by D'Alverny. However, the problem of a Greek manuscript produced at Rome but with palaeographic relations to Alexandria (as Büchsel admits) is not dissipated by Büchsel’s hypothesis that the manuscript was a gift from Leo the Great (d. 461) to a Byzantine emperor. The argument for Alexandrian origin, on palaeographic and iconographic grounds, is still the most compelling for this manuscript. See H.L. Kessler, Studies in Pictorial Narrative (London, 1994) 552.

While the manuscript was likely produced in Egypt, either at Alexandria or at Antinoë, the exegetical sources Marini Clarelli adduces have no discernible impact on the invention of the creation day pages.³⁴ Moreover, the iconographic parallels between pagan personifications of days and the winged figures in the creation pages are the most compelling. For example, a panel from a first-century (?) frieze in the north portico of the imperial Sebasteion at Aphrodisias in Asia Minor depicts a personification of Day (Ἡμέρα). The panel shows a woman clad in a high girdled chiton in a manner similar to the winged figures in the creation day pages of the Cotton Genesis.³⁵ The dress, wings and gender of these personifications show the best precedents for the winged figures in the creation day pages of the Cotton Genesis.³⁶ As the Cotton Genesis has other instances of classical borrowings, the most likely solution to the puzzle of the so-called “angels” is the simplest; pagan personifications of time were included to indicate the increase in days of creation as outlined in Genesis.³⁷

34. See Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 30–31, who contend that palaeographic, stylistic and iconographic evidence points to either of these major Egyptian centers.

35. See K. T. Erim, Aphrodisias. Ein Führer durch die antike Stadt und das Museum, trans. E. Alföldi-Rosenbaum (Istanbul, 1990) fig. 90; and also his Aphrodisias. City of Venus-Aphrodite (New York and London, 1986) fig. p. 122; and R. R. R. Smith, “Myth and Allegory in the Sebasteion,” Aphrodisias Papers. Recent Work on Architecture and Sculpture, ed. C. Rouché and K. T. Erim (Ann Arbor, 1990) 89–92. On the iconography of Day, see Lexicon iconographicum mythologiae classicae (Zurich and Munich, 1981–) III, 1:774 (#276, #282), 781 (#299).

36. See K. Weitzmann, “Observations on the Cotton Genesis Fragments,” in Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. K. Weitzmann et al. (Princeton, 1955) 127, in which he played down the possibility of the personification of day affecting the manuscript; in “The Genesis Mosaics of San Marco and the Cotton Genesis Miniatures,” in O. Demus, The Mosaics of San Marco. Part 2: The Thirteenth Century. Volume One: Text (Chicago and London, 1984) 109, Weitzmann entertained Ἡμέρα as the more likely influence.

37. On other classical borrowings in the Cotton Genesis, see Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 38ff.

The figures in the creation pages of the Cotton Genesis are plainly different from the angels in the other illustrations of the manuscript, and the differences in identities signal to the viewer that a visual gloss is being made on the creation passages. The winged figures in the creation pages allow an indication of time, thereby revealing an ability on the part of the illuminator to express certain Christian concerns through a pagan iconography. Pagan personifications of time were not direct models for the iconography of angels since figures are differentiated in function and appearance in the Cotton Genesis. The distinctions used reveal that while the iconography of angels owed some debts to pagan models as at San Vitale, Christian painters also perceived differences in these figures and maintained these differences for specific narrative ends.³⁸

Despite the clear iconographic parallels between winged pagan beings and Christian angels, some scholars have sought the origins of the winged angel in a purely Christian context independent of pagan inspiration. In support of this opinion, Georg Stuhlfauth adduced as an early example a fifth-century ivory (Castello Sforzesco, Milan), which depicts a winged man and bull, symbols of the evangelists, hovering above an unwinged angel at the tomb of Christ (fig. 6).³⁹ He also cited the apse mosaic at Sta. Pudenziana, Rome, (401–417) in which evangelist symbols hover in the sky above Christ seated amongst his disciples. These two monuments were his primary pieces of evidence for the contention that the Christian iconography of winged angels was dependent on the evangelist symbol of the winged man.⁴⁰ However, chronology makes it difficult to support an

38. Hanfmann, The Season Sarcophagus, I:195ff., believed that little evidence existed for a true iconographic lineage from seasons to angels: “At most, we might allow that the tendency to conceive natural forces as angels and daimones, coupled with the use of pagan types of personifications for the visual rendering of these concepts, led to an art in which some of the long-winged Seasons have a generic resemblance to the Christian angels.”

39. Grabar, The Golden Age of Justinian, fig. 331, and Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, pl. 60 (#III).

40. Stuhlfauth, Die Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst, 244. The tetramorph cherubim of Ezekiel and Revelation initiated typological interpretation of the Gospels and Evangelists among Christian theologians. This symbolic affiliation of tetramorph and Gospels began as early as the second century; for instance, Irenaeus (ca. 130–ca. 200) wrote: “For the cherubim have four faces, and their faces are the images of the dispensation of the Son of

Figure 6. The Tomb of Christ, upper register—Soldiers Asleep at the Tomb; lower register—Marys and Angel at Tomb. Ivory, Castello Sforzesco, Milan, fifth century. Photo: Foto Marburg/Art Resource, N.Y.

independent development of this iconography since these earliest monuments are later than the fourth-century appearance of winged angels.⁴¹

Given the fragmentary quality of the archaeological record for this period, the hypothesis of a Christian invention of the iconography of the winged angel cannot be dismissed out of hand. Furthermore, scripture does provide the material for an association of man and wings, for instance in Ezekiel (1:5–6) and Revelation (4:7–8), and early exegetical identification of tetramorph and evangelists suggests—though by no means proves—an equally early appearance in art. Scripture mentions wings and flight at Exodus 25:20, Daniel 9:21, Revelation 14:6, for instance, and descriptions elsewhere make it clear that wings were means for mobility for the cherubim and seraphim. Wings were also symbols of God's unapproachability. For instance, Isaiah's seraphim use two of their wings for flying, and the other two pairs to cover their face and feet (Is. 6:1–3). And third- and fourth-century exegesis by theologians such as Tertullian (ca. 160–ca. 240)⁴² and Chrysostom makes it clear that Christians viewed and discussed wings as symbols of the

God. The one like the lion indicates the efficacious, royal and authoritative nature. The one like the calf presents the sacerdotal and priestly nature. The manlike form depicts the incarnation, and the one like the eagle represents the visitation of the Holy Spirit." Trans. R. S. Nelson, The Iconography of the Prefaces in Byzantine Gospels (New York, 1980) 6. See also O. Wulff, Cherubim, Throne und Seraphim. Ikonographie der ersten Engelshierarchie in der christlichen Kunst (Altenburg, 1894) 8ff., 37ff.; M. de Grooth and P. van Moorsel, "The Lion, the Calf, the Man and the Eagle in Early Christian and Coptic Art," Bulletin Antiecke Beschaving 52/3 (1977/8):233–45; M. Werner, "On the Origin of Zoanthropomorphic Evangelist Symbols: The Early Christian Background," Studies in Iconography 10 (1984–1986): 1–35, and also "On the Origin of Zoanthropomorphic Evangelist Symbols: The Early Medieval and Later Coptic, Nubian, Ethiopian and Latin Evidence," ibid. 13 (1989–1990): 1–47; and D. Kinney, "The Apocalypse in Early Christian Monumental Decoration," in The Apocalypse in the Middle Ages, ed. R. K. Emerson and B. McGinn (Ithaca and London, 1992) 200–16.

41. See Kinney, "The Apocalypse in Early Christian Monumental Decoration," 208ff.

42. Apologeticum adversus gentes pro Christianis, XXII, 8, in Tertulliani Opera. Pars I. Opera Catholica, Adversus Marcionem. Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina, vol. 1, ed. E. Dekkers (Turnhout, 1954) 129: "Every spirit is winged, both angels and demons. In this way, in a moment they are everywhere: all the world is for them one place; what is taking place everywhere is as easy for them to know as to tell. It is thought that their velocity is divine, because their substance is not known."

angels' transcendental nature.⁴³ These texts reveal that Christians were able to provide their own meanings to angels' wings, and they must have encouraged the manipulation of the iconography of pagan winged beings and made such an iconography acceptable in Christian contexts. In the final analysis, the evidence for a Christian invention of the winged angels is simply too scanty and the influence of pagan iconography too manifest for pagan art to be discounted as the primary model for angels.

Although the debt that Christian iconography owed pagan models is clear, Christian painters and mosaicists were able to judge the appropriateness of depictions of winged figures and did not simply absorb an existing iconography. The addition or omission of wings in depictions of angels in Christian art likewise reveals a symbolic quality of wings and the ability of these appendages to signal terrestrial or celestial modes or sites of activity. Anthropomorphic figures, winged or unwinged, could help express orthodox dogma, as well as Christian interpretations of scripture not overt in Hebrew scripture itself.

Christian painters and mosaicists sometimes contended with the problems of apprehension and description of angels in art, and in this way paralleled the attempts of theologians who were concerned with deciphering the meanings behind the obscure appearances of angels in scripture, particularly in the Hebrew Testament. The appearance of the angels of the Lord as "men" to Abraham (Gen. 18) has an important iconographic history from this point of view. Ambiguities present in the account are difficult to reconcile; within the same chapter, the angels are described as "men," "he" and the "Lord." The Greek fathers offered various interpretations of the puzzling appearance of the angels to Abraham at Mamre: simply as three angels, Christ and two angels, or as the Trinity itself.⁴⁴

43. See also Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, 57ff.; Stuhlfauth, Die Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst, 51ff.; Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. Cabrol and H. Leclercq (Paris, 1924–) I, 2:2080ff.; and the Martyrium Bartholomaei in Acta apostolorum apocrypha, ed. C. Tischendorf (Leipzig, 1861) 257.

44. See, for instance, Justin Martyr (ca. 100–ca. 165), Dialogus cum Tryphone Judaeo, 59, J. Archimbault, ed., Justin. Dialogue avec Tryphon, 2 vols. (Paris, 1909) 276, J. Goodspeed, Die ältesten Apologeten (Göttingen, 1915; rp. New York, 1950) 164; Athanasius (ca. 296–373), Orationes contra Arianos, PG 26:352AB; and Procopius of Gaza (ca. 475–ca. 538), Commen-

Painters and mosaicists also offered various visual interpretations of the true meaning behind this Old Testament epiphany. The first extant example of a representation of the epiphany to Abraham, a fresco in the fourth-century via Latina Catacomb in Rome, simply depicts three young men approaching the seated Abraham.⁴⁵ The painter did not overtly signal the identity of the three men by iconography or inscription. The angels are unwinged, in keeping with the earthly nature of their manifestation to Abraham. The viewer can interpret the fresco literally as describing in a direct fashion the three men who appeared to Abraham; on the other hand, the viewer can infer the spiritual nature of the visitors in the fresco through knowledge of scripture.

In contrast to this literal representation of the three men of the scriptural passage, the mosaicist at Sta. Maria Maggiore, Rome, (ca. 435) offered a more complicated visual exegesis. The middle angel appears in a transparent aureole of light that overlaps and excludes the two flanking angels. By singling out one figure as more powerful and divine than his companions, the mosaicist has signified a Christological interpretation of this epiphany.⁴⁶ The appearance of the “men” to Abraham and Sarah at Mamre is also a typology of the Annunciation to the Virgin. Traditionally, the scene in the upper left-hand portion of the arch mosaic has been interpreted as an Annunciation to the Virgin; in this scene, an angel descends from the sky to announce the news to an enthroned Mary. The angels flanking the Virgin and the angel descending are all shown winged, in distinction to the angels in the Philoxenia scene who are depicted without wings. In providing wings to the angels with the Virgin, the tarii in Genesim, XVIII, PG 87/1:364AB. These various interpretations have been examined more broadly by L. Thunberg, “Early Christian Interpretations of the Three Angels in Gen. 18,” Studia Patristica 8(1966):560–70.

45. See A. Ferrua, La pittura della nuova Catacomba di via Latina, Vatican City, 1960, fig. 24.

46. See C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della Basilica S. Maria Maggiore (Turin, 1956) pl. XV, O. Perler, “Les théophanies dans les mosaïques de Sainte-Marie-Majeure à Rome,” RivAC 50(1974):281ff., B. Brenk, Die frühchristliche Mosaiken in S. Maria Maggiore zu Rom (Wiesbaden, 1975) 108ff., and also W. Loerke, “Observations on the Representation of Doxa in the Mosaics of S. Maria Maggiore, Rome, and St. Catherine’s, Sinai,” Gesta 20(1981):18ff.

mosaicist signifies the overtly spiritual nature of this Annunciation and the eternal setting of the Virgin's court. In contrast, the wingless angels before Abraham and Sarah literally signal the terrestrial quality of that epiphany; the singling out of the central angel reveals that the latent meaning of this appearance is believed to lie in its prophecy of the coming of Christ.⁴⁷

Unlike the mosaicist of the Philoxenia at Sta. Maria Maggiore, the illustrator of the Cotton Genesis chose to depict the angels in the same scene with wings.⁴⁸ The wings, not mentioned in the account, signal to the viewer the identity of Abraham's visitors; believing his visitors to be simply three strangers, Abraham has not yet apprehended that they are angels. Again unlike the case at Sta. Maria Maggiore, the illuminator did not distinguish the angels one from another, and may have wished to express the Trinitarian symbolism often given the event by Christians. Indeed, this same typological interpretation determined other aspects of the manuscript's iconographic program, such as the portrayal of Christ as Logos in the creation pages; in orthodox belief, Christ is co-eternal and consubstantial with God and the Holy Spirit, and by showing Christ at creation, the illuminator stressed this crucial aspect of Trinitarian dogma.⁴⁹

These monuments do not trace a development of an iconography that becomes increasingly settled over the first centuries of Christian art. For example, the sixth-century mosaic of the Philoxenia at San Vitale, Ravenna, also depicts the angels as young, wingless men (fig. 7). The angels are represented seated at table and they indicate the repast Abraham has gathered. Coupled in the same lunette with a depiction of the sacrifice of Isaac, and placed opposite a mosaic of the sacrifices of Abel and Melchizedek, the depiction of the three

47. See S. Spain, "The Promised Blessing: The Iconography of the Mosaics of S. Maria Maggiore," ArtB 61(1979):518–40, especially 537ff.

48. Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 79–80.

49. See Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 37, and on the Trinitarian issues of the fourth and fifth centuries and art, see C. von Schönborn, L'icône du Christ. Fondements théologiques élaborées entre le Ier et le IIer Concile de Nicée (325–787) (Fribourg, 1976) 22ff.

Figure 7. Philoxenia of Abraham, Mosaic, S. Vitale, Ravenna, ca. 540. Photo: Alinari / Art Resource, N.Y.

men from heaven forms part of a program of eucharistic typology in the sanctuary of the church.⁵⁰

As these examples show, Christian painters and mosaicists determined the appropriateness of wings to represent the epiphany made to Abraham according to the context: they often manipulated iconographic elements in order to express specific interpretations of scriptural passages.⁵¹ In the context of the apse program at San Vitale, God's universal dominion is stated; and the attendance of spiritual servants, their spirituality and distinction from human nature signaled by their wings, is a sign of the all-embracing nature of that dominion. And above the apse, the winged angels on the arch further demonstrate the cosmic acclamation of Christ's rule. While these angels derive their wings and horizontal disposition from pagan triumphal imagery, the winged angels in the chancel vault form part of the program's symbolism of the extent of Christ's mastery over the earth; their wings and unworldly appearance symbolize the ubiquity of Christ's dominion. However, the angels in the Philoxenia scene are distinct from the eternal and metaphysical nature of these angels in the chancel vault, apse and on the principal arch. In contrast, they were depicted without wings, and this distinction provides the viewer with a clue as to the temporal nature of that epiphany. Possi-

50. RBK I:18, and O. von Simson, Sacred Fortress. Byzantine Art and Statecraft in Ravenna, 2d ed. (Chicago, 1976) 25. On the question of this scene's relation to the anti-Arian beliefs of the Byzantine conquerors, see R. Sörries, Die Bilder der Orthodoxen im Kampf gegen den Arianismus. Eine Apologie der orthodoxen Christologie und Trinitätslehre gegenüber der arianischen Häresie dargestellt an den ravenattischen Mosaiken und Bildern des 6. Jahrhunderts (Bern, 1983) 161ff. And on the iconography of the Trinity, see J. Engemann, "Zu den Dreifaltigkeit darstellungen der frühchristlichen Kunst: Gab es in 4. Jahrhundert anthropomorphe Trinitätsbilder?" JAC 19(1976):157–72.

51. Similarly, in the sixth-century Vienna Genesis, as well, the illustration of the calling of Abraham depicts a winged angel descending from the sky (fol. 11r), while Jacob wrestles with a wingless angel on another folio (24r). K. Clausberg, Die Wiener Genesis. Eine Kunstwissenschaftliche Bilderbuchgeschichte (Frankfurt am Main, 1984) 13, figs. 44 and 8, respectively.

It ought to be noted that the iconography of wingless angels is found as late as the Palaiologan period, for instance, in an icon of the Virgin and Child in the Museo di San Giorgio degli Greci in Venice, in which a group of wingless angels clusters in the upper left corner. See N. V. Drandakes, "Παλαιολόγειος εἰκὼν Βρεφοκρατοῦσης τοῦ εἰς Βενετίου Ἑλληνικοῦ ναοῦ, Θεολογία 28(1957):244, figs. 1, 2 and 5.

bly as foreshadowings of the Trinity and the eucharistic sacrifice, the Philoxenia is depicted literally. The scene's latent meanings are not indicated by the iconographic attributes of the other angels' transcendental guise. The program at San Vitale demonstrates that different modes of presentation of angels can describe their changeable nature and areas of activity.

The iconography of the winged youth, used in these cases just discussed to symbolize otherworldly nature and activity, was used for other angelic beings as well. Scripture mentions other angelic creatures besides archangels and angels, and these led to the depiction of other ranks of an angelic hierarchy.⁵² Yet, because of the lack of full descriptions in scripture of the members of this hierarchy, the iconography of the winged youth was employed to represent any angelic being. The use of this symbolic iconography must have originated at an early point in the creation of a Christian iconography of angels. Methodius of Olympus (d. ca. 311) provided a precedent for extant representations in his description of an image figured with "likenesses fashioned from gold of his angels, who are the Principalities and the Powers, [which] we make in honour and faith in him."⁵³ Paralleling Methodius' description, examples of images survive in which the winged youth serves as a sign for different angelic orders. A seventh-century Constantinopolitan cameo (#119) from the collection of Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C., bears the inscription "ΕΞΟΥΧΙΕ" ("Powers"), and depicts two winged men (fig. 8).⁵⁴

52. See Colossians 1:16 and Ephesians 1:21. Scripture mentions nine orders in total: seraphim (Is. 6), cherubim (Gen. 3:24, Ex. 25:22), thrones (Col. 1:16), virtues (Eph. 1:21), dominations, principalities, powers (Eph. 1:21, Col. 1:16), archangels (1 Thess. 4:16, Jude 9), angels (Gen. 16:7, for example).

53. Preserved in the writings of John of Damascus, Orationes de imaginibus tres, III. 138, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III Contra imaginum calumniatores orationes tres, PTS vol. 17, ed. P. B. Kotter (Berlin, 1975) 200.

54. M. C. Ross, Catalogue of the Byzantine and Early Mediaeval Antiquities in the Dumbarton Oaks Collection. Volume One. Metalwork, Ceramics, Glass, Glyptics, Painting (Washington, D.C., 1962) 98–99, fig. 57. This iconography continues to be used throughout the Byzantine period. For example, among the fifteenth-century frescoes of the church of the Metropolitan at Mistra, the angelic orders are collectively described by winged men, that is, the angel type; see G. Millet, Monuments byzantins de Mistra (Paris, 1910) pl. 64.1.

Figure 8. Two winged men
inscribed "EZOTCIE" ("Powers"), Constantinopolitan cameo, Dumbarton Oaks,
Washington, D.C., seventh
century. Photo: Dumbarton
Oaks, Washington, D.C.

Faced with a lack of scriptural description—as only the existence of this rank is mentioned—the engraver fell back on this iconography of the winged man; skirting any iconographic complexity or difficulty, the winged man stands in as a generic type.

The mosaics in the bema arch of the destroyed church of the Dormition at Nicaea (Iznik) were an example of this generic iconography of the winged youth within a full-scale program. These original mosaics of the angels have been dated to the late sixth and seventh centuries.⁵⁵ Although the inscriptions state that the figures represented different orders of the angelic hierarchy, the Principalities, Virtues, Dominations and Powers, mentioned together at

55. Fernanda de' Maffei hypothesized that the angelic powers belonged to a different mosaic phase than the Virgin and Child and that they date stylistically to the late sixth century. For this dating, she sought support in the stylistic analysis of G. de Francovich, "I mosaici del bema della chiesa della Dormizione di Nicea," in Scritti di storia dell'arte in onore di Lionello Venturi, 2 vols. (Rome, 1956) I: 3–27. She conjectured that the mosaics had been covered during Iconoclasm, not erased as is generally thought, and the repair evident is not connected to the restoration of images in 843. See F. de' Maffei, "L'Unigenito consostanziale al Padre nel programma trinitario dei perduti mosaici del bema della Dormizione di Nicea e il Cristo trasfigurato del Sinai I," Storia dell'arte 45(1982):91ff., and also her Icona, pittore e arte al Concilio Niceno II (Rome, 1974) 99ff. However, the restorations apparent in the areas around the angels and the replacing of the cross in the apse likely belong to the same phase,

Colossians 1:16, the angelic beings were depicted as identical winged youths wearing the loros and carrying orbs and standards (figs. 9, 10). Scripture is the primary source for revelation of these divine beings but only the existence of the angels, the Principalities, Virtues, Dominations and Powers, are attested in scripture, not any of their individual qualities. Lacking specific scriptural description, the mosaists repeated the iconographic type, the winged youth. The angels are nominally different from one another but they share the same nature generally, and they are visually indistinguishable from one another.

Other angelic powers are also represented by an anthropomorphic figure with wings, even the cherubim and seraphim for which extensive scriptural descriptions could be drawn upon. Passages describing the Ark of the Covenant and the Solomonic Temple provide information on representations of cherubim (for example, Ex. 37:7–9, I Kings 6:23–28, Ez. 41:18–20); and the prophets' visions supplied long, if obscure, descriptions of angels. Yet anthropomorphism was used in early Byzantine art to represent these angelic beings in contradiction of scriptural accounts of these angels' appearances. For example, in the sixth-century Vienna Genesis (fol. 2v), a winged man represents the cherubim guarding the gates of paradise with a flaming sword (Gen. 3:24); this winged man diverges from Ezekiel's full description of the cherubim as a six-winged tetramorph (1:4–28, probably post 843, paid for by the otherwise unknown Naukratios, as stated in an inscription between the two angels on the south bema arch.

The precise date of the original foundation by Hyacinthos is not settled. Most scholars prefer the late seventh / early eighth century for the construction of the church and, following this, the mosaics in the apse area. See F.I. Schmit, Die Koimesis-Kirche von Nikaia, das Bauwerk und die Mosaiken (Berlin and Leipzig, 1927), U. Peschlow, "Neue Beobachtungen zur Architektur und Ausstattung der Koimesiskirche in Iznik," Istanbuler Mitteilungen 22(1972):145–87, and C. Barber, "The Koimesis Church, Nicaea: The Limits of Representation on the Eve of Iconoclasm," JöB 41(1991):43–60. However, arguments have been made, through comparisons of sculptural decoration in the church, that the foundation dates to the second half of the sixth century. See C. Barsanti, "Una nota sulle sculture del Tempio di Giacinto nella Chiesa della Dormizione (Koimesis) di Iznik-Nicea," Storia dell'arte 46(1982):210–18, and C. Mango, Byzantine Architecture (London, 1986) 90. Mango has added his voice more recently to the number of scholars who call for a date around 700. See his "Notes d'épigraphie et d'archéologie: Constantinople, Nicée," TM 12(1994):35off.

Figure 9. Angelic Powers, south side, Bema Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea), ninth century. Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

10:12).⁵⁶ And, despite Isaiah's revelation (6:1–3), the seraphim were also depicted as winged men in early representations, for example,

56. This anthropomorphic iconography never entirely disappears; see the thirteenth-century sculpted façade of the Church of Hagia Sophia, Trebizond, where an anthropomorphic cherubim guards paradise. See D. Talbot Rice et al., The Church of Hagia Sophia at Trebizond (Edinburgh, 1968) 48, pl. 17d.

Figure 10. Angelic Powers, north side, Bema Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea), ninth century. Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

on the entrance gate at the fifth-century complex at Alahan in Seleucia in southeast Asia Minor.⁵⁷

57. See Mary Gough, ed., Alahan. An Early Christian Monastery in Southeastern Turkey (Toronto, 1985) 87ff., pl. 20.

Ninth-century examples include the illustration of the appearance of the seraphim as a winged youth to Isaiah in the Vatican “Cosmas Indicopleustes” (Vat. gr. 699, fol. 72v). See

The most exalted members of the hierarchy, the cherubim and seraphim, were most often depicted in Early Christian and Byzantine art in liturgical contexts. Occasionally represented in symbolic form as winged men, despite clear and distinct descriptions in scripture for each creature, cherubim and seraphim also diverge iconographically from scriptural accounts. Christian artists and theologians often used the visions of cherubim and seraphim to express eschatological and cosmological themes. The earliest depiction of the seraphim and the tetramorph cherubim, the fifth-/sixth-century apse mosaic in the church of Hosios David, Thessalonike, conflates the visions of Ezekiel's cherubim (1:4–28, 10:12), Isaiah's seraphim (6:1–3) and the six-winged creatures of Revelation (4:2–10).⁵⁸ Christ appears in a mandorla, supported by the four creatures of Ezekiel and Revelation. The four beasts each have wings with many eyes; yet no fiery wheels are depicted, while the inscription in the scroll held by Christ quotes Isaiah 25:9.⁵⁹ Christa Ihm has called this iconography at Hosios David the liturgical maiestas.⁶⁰

Topographie chrétienne, SC vols. 141, 159, 197, ed. W. Wolska-Conus (Paris, 1968–1973) II:249. See, too, the Reliquary of the True Cross, from Limburg an-der-Lahn, dating in its last reworking to 963, on which the iconography of the four-winged cherubim and the six-winged seraphim applies respectively to the principalities and powers. See J. Rauch, "Die Limburger Staurothek," Das Münster 8(1955):201ff., especially figs. 5, 16–18, and J.M. Wilm, ibid., 234ff., and H. Wilsdorf, "Zur Staurothek vom Limburg," BF 18(1992): 197–208. de' Maffei, "L'Unigenito consustanziale," 100 n52, cites Gregory of Nyssa on the identification of thrones and powers with seraphim and cherubim (Refutatio confessionis Eunomii, PG 45:556C).

58. See C. Ihm, Die Programme der christlichen Apsismalerei vom vierten Jahrhundert bis zur Mitte des achten Jahrhunderts (Wiesbaden, 1960) 42ff. On the establishment of the Book of Revelation in the eastern Church, see G. Galavaris, The Illustrations of the Prefaces in Byzantine Gospels (Vienna, 1979) 48, especially n49. On Hosios David, see Ihm, Die Programme, 182–84, pl. XIII, 1, and T.F. Mathews, The Clash of Gods. A Reinterpretation of Early Christian Art, rev. ed. (Princeton, 1999) 115ff.

59. The fifth-/seventh-century fresco in the apse niche of Chapel XXVI, Bawît, also reveals elements of each of these three visions; although the depiction conforms generally to Ezekiel's vision, the cherubim have six wings, one face, and many eyes as in Isaiah and Revelation, rather than Ezekiel's four-winged, four-faced creatures with hands and feet. See Ihm, Die Programme, 202–203, pl. XIII, 2. And in the Monastery of Dodo, David-Garedja, Georgia, dating to the seventh/ninth century, two archangels, Michael and Gabriel, flank the enthroned Christ, while two tetramorphs hover underneath. The tetramorphs have four faces and four wings, and they are standing on fiery wheels, referring to Ezekiel, while a Trisagion inscription recalls Isaiah and the liturgy. See Ihm, Die Programme, pl. XIV, 2, and

The Trisagion, the “Holy, holy, holy” chanted by the seraphim in Isaiah (6:3) and Revelation (4:8), influenced the representations of cherubim and seraphim in artistic milieux strongly influenced by liturgical practice.⁶¹ The liturgy also encouraged a certain amount of

A. Alpag0-Novello et al., Art and Architecture in Medieval Georgia, trans. N. Holloway (Louvain-la-Neuve, 1980) 88, figs. 94, 95. And in the crucifixion in the apse of Sta. Maria Antiqua, Rome (705–707), the cherubim and seraphim are identical in that they both have six wings and stand on flaming wheels; see P. Romanelli and P. J. Nordhagen, S. Maria Antiqua (Rome, 1964) pls. 22, 23.

In the period following Iconoclasm, the liturgical maiestas remained popular, particularly in the monastic setting of the churches of Cappadocia. The fresco in the prothesis apse of the New Church at Tokali Kilise, dating from the middle of the tenth century, is typical of this Cappadocian iconography. See A. Wharton Epstein, Tokali Kilise. Tenth-century Metropolitan Art in Byzantine Cappadocia (Washington, D.C., 1986) 68–69, figs. 102, 103. Christ sits enthroned in the middle of the apse, and he is flanked by two pairs of fiery wheels, a seraphim, a cherubim, and two Archangels, Michael and Gabriel. On either side of Christ is an inscription based on the liturgy, “Holy, holy, holy Lord / of Hosts, Heaven and earth are filled with your glory.” The depictions of the seraphim and cherubim generally follow scripture. The seraphim, to Christ’s right, has six eyeless wings, the face of a man in the center of the wings, and hands and feet protruding from the wings; the cherubim has the heads of an ox and a lion to either side, and a man’s head in the middle of four many-eyed wings. Inscriptions above the seraphim and cherubim provide apocalyptic titles for the beasts, also used in the liturgy, “bellowing” (ΒΩΝΤΑ) and “calling” (ΚΕΛΕΤΟΝΤΑ), which are associated with the ox and man figures, respectively.

On the liturgy and the references to the apocalyptic beasts, see F. E. Brightman, “The Historia Mystagogica and Other Greek Commentaries on the Byzantine Liturgy,” JTS 9(1908):248–67, 387–97; G. de Jerphanion, “Les noms des quatre animaux et le commentaire liturgique de Pseudo-Germain,” in his Les voix des monuments. Notes et études d’archéologie chrétienne (Paris, 1930) 250–59; A. Wharton Epstein, “The Problem of Provincialism: Byzantine Monasteries in Cappadocia and Monks in South Italy,” Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 42(1979):39–40; and Galavaris, The Illustrations of the Prefaces in Byzantine Gospels, 86ff.

60. Mathews has raised objections about the imperial connotations of the term maiestas, but the liturgical function is stressed here, not the pagan antecedents of the iconography. See Mathews, The Clash of Gods, 117.

61. André Grabar noted examples, on the other hand, where Christ is enthroned, with the Trisagion printed on the pages of the book he holds; the cherubim and seraphim are not present in these examples. Grabar stresses the importance of theophanic vision, rather than of liturgical texts, in the formation of the iconography of the maiestas. See Martyrium. Recherches sur le culte des reliques et l’art chrétien antique, 2 vols. (Paris, 1943–1946; rp. London, 1972) II:306ff. Yet the number of examples cited above indicate that liturgy also played a fundamental part in the formation of this iconography.

The Trisagion appears to be a very early element in piety and liturgy. See V. Saxer, “Jalons pour servir à l’histoire du culte de l’archange Saint Michel en orient jusqu’à l’iconoclisme,” in Noscere sancta. Miscellanea in memoria di Agostino Amore (Rome, 1985) 362–63; and, more comprehensively, B. D. Sparks, The Sanctus in the Eucharistic Prayer (Cambridge, 1991).

confusion of these two angelic ranks. For example, Christ is addressed in the liturgy:

... for before thee stand thy two living creatures honourable exceedingly, the sixwinged and manyeyed, seraphim and cherubim, with two wings covering their faces by reason of thy godhead which none can gaze on nor comprehend, and with twain covering their feet, with twain also flying....⁶²

The liturgy of John Chrysostom, which mentions “the cherubim, the seraphim, six-winged and many-eyed” (τὰ Χερουβὶμ καὶ τὰ Σεραφίμ, ἑξαπτέρυγα, πολυόμματα), may also have contributed to the iconographic confusion of seraphim and cherubim, and artists often represented the cherubim and seraphim in identical fashion, with six, many-eyed wings.⁶³

Liturgy, therefore, influenced the development of the Christian iconography of these angelic beings, and furthermore encouraged

62. Translation from F.E. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, Vol. 1 (Oxford, 1896), 175. And see also the Historia ecclesiastica, a liturgical commentary written by the Patriarch Germanus (ca. 634–ca. 733): “You who sit upon the cherubim, manifest yourself to us” (Brightman, “The Historia Mystagogica,” 387).

63. J. Goar, Euchologion sive rituale graecorum (Venice, 1730; rp. Graz, 1960) 61; Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, 385; Wulff, Cherubim, Throne und Seraphim, 19ff.; RBK III:84.

For example, one must look ahead to the early tenth-century chapel (#3) at Güllü Dere, which contains a composite representation in the apse of visions of the seraphim, cherubim and tetramorphs, deriving from Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel and Revelation. The program includes two tetramorphs (ΠΟΛΥΩΜΜΑΤΟΝ [sic]), with eye-filled wings, flanking Christ who is enthroned in a mandorla held by the four beasts of Ezekiel and Revelation; two seraphim (ΕΞΑΠΤΕΡΥΤΟΝ) meanwhile give Isaiah and Ezekiel a coal and a book, respectively, to eat. Both of these seraphim have six many-eyed wings. See J. Lafontaine-Dosogne, “Théophanie-visions auxquelles participent les prophètes dans l’art byzantin après la restauration des images,” in Synthronon. Art et archéologie de la fin de l’Antiquité et du Moyen Âge (Paris, 1968) 138ff.; D.I. Pallas, “Eine Differenzierung unter den himmlischen Ordnungen (Ikonographische Analyse),” BZ 44(1971):55–60; and N. Thierry, Haut moyen-âge en Cappadoce. Les églises de la région de Çavuşin (Paris, 1983) 126ff., and pls. 52, 53.

A six-winged tetramorph guards paradise in the ninth-century Paris Gregory; L. Brubaker, Vision and Meaning in Ninth-Century Byzantium. Image as Exegesis in the Homilies of Gregory of Nazianzus (Cambridge, 1999) fig. 10, and also 282–83. This iconography of a tetramorph with an extra pair of wings is not uncommon; see Wulff, Cherubim, Throne und Seraphim, 32ff.

the iconography's dissemination. Neither Pseudo-Dionysius's speculations on the angelic hierarchy nor the increasing interest in the cherubim found in the contra Judaeos literature reveal any direct influence on the iconography of these beings.⁶⁴ Extant representations of cherubim and seraphim betray direct inspiration from liturgical descriptions. Because of this influence, mixing of the iconography of cherubim and seraphim is the rule by the Middle Byzantine period, and differentiation of the angelic beings is often possible only through inscriptions.⁶⁵ The iconography was, in fact, never settled, and this ambiguity indicates that the patrons and artists did not always see the need to distinguish the beings.

In pre-Iconoclastic art, style was a notable expression of iconographic meaning.⁶⁶ The manipulation of style by Christian painters, mosaicists and sculptors has particular interest in this context as style came to be an important means to communicate the difficult nature of angels. If pagan art provided antecedents for the creation of a Christian iconography of angels, it also furnished diverse stylistic modes.⁶⁷ In particular, stylistic analyses show that in the period before Iconoclasm painters and mosaicists used a more naturalistic "classical" style to indicate the distinct qualities of angels.

An examination of the icon of the Virgin and Child flanked by Saints Theodore and George in the Monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai (sixth/seventh century) reveals stylistic distinctions in the de-

64. The influence of the theological work of Pseudo-Dionysius is clearly perceptible in texts that discuss images in the period before Iconoclasm and is equally prevalent throughout the writings of iconophiles. The cherubim, as cited in the contra Judaeos literature, assumed an equally important place in iconophile theory. Both of these topics are treated in chapter 3.

65. For instance, it is unclear in the fourteenth-century mosaics whether the pendentives of the central dome of Hagia Sophia in Istanbul represented seraphim or cherubim. Although these creatures had six wings, neither the number of wings nor even the presence and absence of wings can be relied upon for general identification. On these mosaics, see C. Mango, Materials for the Study of the Mosaics of St. Sophia at Istanbul (Washington, D.C., 1962) 83ff.; and on this issue of confusion, see Wulff, Cherubim, Throne und Seraphim, 26ff., and *RBK*III:85.

66. See, for instance, Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 32ff., and also E. Kitzinger, Byzantine Art in the Making (London, 1977).

67. See O.J. Brendel, Prolegomena to the Study of Roman Art (New Haven and London, 1979) 125ff., on the use of disparate styles within the same monument in Roman art.

piction of angels and humans that communicate the dissimilar natures of these different categories of beings (fig. 11).⁶⁸ Ernst Kitzinger has considered the stylistic treatment of the angels on the icon who stand behind the Virgin's throne and look over their shoulders at the descent of the Holy Spirit. His interpretation stresses the use of "hellenistic" survivals in the handling of the angels, and the rift between angelic and human natures that this hellenistic style expresses.

At times it appears as though a bold, sketchy manner were, so to speak, in the nature of an "iconographic attribute" of angels. An obvious explanation is that it was a means of expressing the fact that they belong to a different order of beings, that they are incorporeal, ἀσώματοι. Hellenistic pictorial technique in these cases serves as a means not of actualizing physical, but of accentuating spiritual existence.⁶⁹

68. K. Weitzmann, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Icons. Volume One: From the Sixth to the Tenth Century (Princeton, 1976) 18ff., and pls. IV, V, VI, XLIII, XLIV, XLV, XLVI.

69. Kitzinger, "Byzantine Art in the Period between Justinian and Iconoclasm," in Berichte zum XI. Internationalen Byzantinischen-Kongress, München, 1958 (Munich, 1958) 47. See also his "On Some Icons of the Seventh Century," in Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. K. Weitzmann et al. (Princeton, 1955) 134, on the seventh-century fragment of the head of an angel from Sta. Maria Antiqua, Rome. See also H. Maguire, The Icons of Their Bodies. Saints and Their Images in Byzantium (Princeton, 1996) 70–71.

Andrei Cornea offers a complementary interpretation of the meaning of style in this image. See A. Cornea, "On 'Fiction' and 'Authenticity' in Byzantine Pre-Iconoclastic Painting," Revue roumaine d'histoire de l'art 17(1980):6. Cornea questions the assumption that communicating a sense of life and motion is the aim of the "hellenistic pictorial technique" in the depiction of angels. Cornea proposes two different modes of depiction that he calls "a symbol-image based on fiction" and "a history-image based on truth." The Virgin and Child and the saints are depicted in a frontal, hierarchic manner to indicate their essential historicity; this abstract manner is in direct opposition to the fictional, illusionistic depiction of the angels, which signifies their incomprehensibility. For Cornea, artists used this "hellenistic" manner because, "the naturalistic style could automatically awake in the spectators' minds the stereotypic link, indicating that the image was a fiction lacking a real bodily model, as the statues of gods were, according to the Christians, mere fictions having no anthropomorphic referent they could imitate" (ibid., 7). In other words, the fictional quality of naturalistic depiction of the angels is not an "iconographic attribute" for Cornea, but rather a "classification-index" that warns that any relation to reality is purely coincidental. See also the remarks of Belting, Bild und Kult, 148ff.

Figure 11. Icon of the Virgin and Child, flanked by Saints Theodore and George, Monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai, sixth / seventh century. Reproduced through the courtesy of the Michigan–Princeton–Alexandria Expedition to Mount Sinai.

According to this interpretation, the viewer must make a judgment on the distinct handling of the angels compared to the other figures on this icon, and discern differences in nature from differences in style. The delicate handling of the angels' features and their believable turning, even in the small space allowed, distinguishes the angels from the hieratic figures of the saints; as opposed to these static saints, the central figures of the Virgin and Child in the foreground appear more animated, less frontal, and thus more dynamically alert than the mortal saints to the descending Holy Spirit. Ultimately, analysis reveals that, in this case, the relatively naturalistic depiction of the angels has a paradoxical ability to indicate to the viewer a nature different from that of humanity.

In the hands of painters and mosaicists, style continued throughout the Early and Middle Byzantine periods to be a means of establishing a distinction between human and angelic nature. Two examples of middle Byzantine images reveal that a different style was, in fact, used to represent angels for different ends. For instance, Henry Maguire has contrasted the ninth-century mosaic of the Archangel Gabriel, found in the bema arch of Hagia Sophia, Constantinople, with the Virgin and Child in the apse (figs. 12, 13): "the bodies of the archangels in heaven tended to be rendered as flat and without modeling, because of their lack of materiality."⁷⁰ In the mosaic, the Archangel is set within a gold field that dematerializes his form, and his robes are unmodeled sheets, unrevealing of any substantial form beneath. In contrast, the faces of the Virgin and Child in the apse are naturalistically formed, and they are fashioned three-dimensionally, settled coherently on a substantial throne.

The angels are depicted in an abstract manner to denote the impalpable quality of the heavenly realm; conversely, a more naturalistic style in representations is the complement of angelic activity on earth. An example contemporary with the bema mosaic of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople is a depiction of the epiphany of the seraphim to Isaiah in the Vatican “Cosmas” (fig. 14).⁷¹ In contrast to the stationary, flat seraphim flanking Christ, the human, winged seraphim is clearly occupying a different sphere; the single seraphim strides toward Isaiah in a lively manner, and his torso bends at the waist as his outstretched hand inserts the coal into Isaiah’s mouth. The stylistic distinction between the celestial activities of the seraphim and their rare manifestations on earth is convincingly conveyed by the illusionistic handling of the appearance of the angel before Isaiah, distinct from the seraphim hieratically flanking Christ.

70. "Style and Ideology in Byzantine Imperial Art," Gesta 28(1989):223. The dating of the apse mosaics at Hagia Sophia to the ninth century is not uncontested; for an alternate view, see N. Oikonomidès, "Some Remarks on the Apse Mosaics of St. Sophia," DOP 39(1985):III–15.

Painters and mosaicists continued to be able to indicate through style the qualities of angels’ nature, as well as their mode of activity. The illustration of Isaiah’s epiphany in the Vatican “Cosmas” is particularly telling because iconography and style work in unison to suggest the earthly and unearthly activities of formless beings. On earth, the seraphim can take on a guise different from their heavenly “form,” and the difference between the seraphim’s anthropomorphism and their many-winged form reveals their fluid formlessness. Iconography can, therefore, distinguish modes of activity in the same illustration, while abstract and naturalistic styles further demonstrate the angels’ different capacities, both attendance in heaven and service on earth.

A more classical modeling can be employed after the ninth century, just the same, to show the earthly movement and work of the angels. Kurt Weitzmann has described the twelfth-century icon of the miracle of the Archangel Michael at Chonae from the Monastery of St. Catherine, Mount Sinai (fig. 15), as an example of classical modeling indicating corporeality and immediacy:

[Michael is] rendered as a youth of Apollonian beauty, gracious in the movement of the body which is shown in full plasticity under a garment which, in classical fashion, clings to the body and whose folds combine a rhythmic flow with modeling power.⁷²

71. See Topographie chrétienne, ed. Wolska-Conus, II: 249.

72. See K. Weitzmann, “The Classical in Byzantine Art as a Mode of Individual Expression,” in Byzantine Art. An European Art. Lectures (Athens, 1966) 166–67 [= K. Weitzmann, Studies in Classical and Byzantine Manuscript Illumination, ed. H. L. Kessler (Chicago, 1971) 166–67].

Figure 12. Archangel Gabriel, Mosaic, Bema arch, Hagia Sophia, Istanbul, ninth century. Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

In contrast, cordoned by the ropey water descending, the bantam hermit opposite Michael is insubstantial and hidden within the monastic carapace. The fuller angelic corporeality, perhaps an oxymoron, lends a sense of presence and actuality, while the self-denial practiced so arduously by the hermit effaces his physical being. The two fields denoted by the joining streams in the middle therefore create two areas of existence, the angelic one occupied by a full-bodied angel and the mortal one almost evacuated by the dematerializing body of the hermit.

Figure 13. Virgin and Child, Apse Mosaic, Hagia Sophia, Istanbul, ninth century. Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

This brief examination of representation of angels in the early Christian and Byzantine periods has revealed only an occasional engagement on the part of mosaicists, painters and sculptors with issues of nature and identity in art. The issues were never resolved as the subjects, that is the angels, were not open to autopsy by artists, since knowledge of angels was derived primarily through descriptions of their enigmatic epiphanies in scripture. Because of the distance of these subjects, painters, mosaicists and sculptors were forced to sidestep problems of making apprehensible something only partially seen and known in the past. Their circumvention of real description is most clearly evident in the straightforward use of an anthropomorphic form for angels. Evidently, the artist was abdicating responsibility for describing nature or identity and was placing the burden of recognizing the being depicted on the shoulders of the viewer. The iconography of the angels is only, then, occasionally complex in its exegesis of spiritual nature and appearances as in the important series of scenes describing the Philoxenia. This series shows that painters and mosaicists—or programmers—recognized the enigmatic quality of the event and attempted to indicate this quality through the description of the “men” as winged or unwinged.

Figure 14. Vision of Isaiah, The Christian Topography of “Cosmas Indicopleustes,” Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, gr. 699, fol. 72v, ninth century. Photo: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana.

Figure 15. Icon of the Miracle at Chonae, Monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai, twelfth century. Reproduced through the courtesy of the Michigan–Princeton–Alexandria Expedition to Mount Sinai.

Wings were used throughout as the primary means to communicate the symbolic nature of the iconography of angels. Color and cloud were also used to indicate the fire and wind composition of angels that scripture prescribed but these solutions were not common.⁷³ Preeminently, the winged youth is an expansive iconography that is allusive to all angels, corresponding to the semantic range of the word “angelos” (ἄγγελος), and not descriptive in any essential way of their nature or appearance. Theological writings furthermore show that Christians generally interpreted angelic epiphany as dissimulation, unrelated to the true nature and form of angels.⁷⁴ In the same way, visual representations are allusions to this angelic dissimulation, and the apparently straightforward representation of winged anthropomorphic figures paradoxically signifies the angels' multi-form constitution.

73. For instance, a sixth-century mosaic in the Church of St. Demetrius in Thessalonike shows an angel seamlessly emerging from a cloud; the mosaic does not correspond to any episode in the surviving hagiographic narratives, although it may depict the martyrdom of the saint. See R. Cormack, Writing in Gold. Byzantine Society and Its Icons (London, 1985) 79–80, fig. 22; Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, 97ff. Christian painters, mosaicists and sculptors also attempted to indicate the fiery quality of angels iconographically. For example, an early sixth-century mosaic in the church of San Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna, represents Christ as the shepherd and judge of Matthew 25. Two standing angels flank the seated Christ, one of whom is red, denoting fire and light, while the other is cobalt blue, denoting the tenebrous nature of a fallen angel. See E. Kirschbaum, “L’angelo rosso e l’angelo turchino,” RivAC 17(1940):209–48, and G. Bovini, Mosaici di S. Apollinare di Ravenna: Il ciclo cristologico (Florence, 1958) 37ff., fig. 4, pl. X. And at Sta. Maria Maggiore, Rome, the hands, feet and faces of the angels are depicted “meravigliosamente rosso” in the fifth-century mosaics; see Kirschbaum, “L’angelo rosso e l’angelo turchino,” 215, C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della Basilica S. Maria Maggiore (Turin, 1956) pls. XLIX, LIII, and Grabar, The Golden Age of Justinian, figs. 157, 161, 162. And, more generally, see A. Petzold, “‘His Face Like Lightning’: Colour as Signifier in Representations of the Holy Women at the Tomb,” Arte medievale 6/2(1992): 149–55.

74. For instance, Basil of Caesarea wrote, “For just as the brand is known through the fire, the one the underlying matter, the other the fire; so with the heavenly powers, they are in essence aerial spirit, if you would, or immaterial fire according to scripture, ‘Who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire’ (Ps. 104:4). Wherefore they are in a place, and become visible, they appear in an image of their own bodies, in this way, to the worthy. But the source of their holiness being outside of their nature is brought to fulfillment by contact with the Spirit” (De Spiritu Sancto, XVI.38, in Traité du Saint-Esprit, SC vol. 17 bis, ed. B. Pruche [Paris, 1968] 380–82).

The assimilation of pagan iconography of winged personifications described in this chapter did not go unnoticed or unopposed by certain figures within the church. Theodoret of Cyrrhus noted that the use of imperial models for Christian art was in keeping with the dignity owed to God.⁷⁵ Although subsequent chapters examine this dialogue in greater depth, the assertion made by the pagan in the pagan-Christian "dialogue," the Apocriticus, is also relevant here. The pagan stated that the gods and the angels were alike in everything, their proximity to God, their spirituality and service; only their names were different.⁷⁶ His opponent, Macarius Magnes, rejected any such connection between the dignity and nature of false gods and true servants; furthermore, he denied the ability of art to depict beings so pure and transcendent.⁷⁷ To Christians who held views similar to Macarius Magnes on angels and art, such connections between pagan and Christian iconography must have appeared as debasing to the spiritual beings and a dangerous invitation to pagan idolatry.

75. Orationes de imaginibus tres, III.80, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 176: "And just as the Romans in painting imperial images surrounded [the emperor] with spear-bearers and depicted subject peoples, so Christians depict by similar means. Since the emperor through his appearance assumes the form of God, as borne upon a throne, they reveal the images to all people on earth, and in his form they confer on him what is fitting, the ruler according to the teachings of God." See de' Maffei, Icona, pittore e arte al Concilio Niceno II, 74.

76. Blondel 200.1–12: "If therefore you say that the angels who are stationed near God are passionless and immortal and by nature incorruptible, which we ourselves call gods, on account of their nearness to God on high, what is there that should be disputed about the name or is it only a distinction brought out in the naming? For as far as the name goes the Romans call Minerva what the Greeks call Athena, and the Egyptians and the Syrians and the Thracians call her something else again. Is it not true that they conform despite the difference in names or removed from the name of the god? Some therefore call these angels, or either some call them gods, but there is not very much difference, since their divine nature is testified for, when Matthew wrote thus, 'But Jesus answered and said unto them, Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as angels in heaven' (22:29–30)."

77. Blondel 214–15.

The assimilation of pagan iconography into Christian art was not, therefore, universally approved, and in the first half of the sixth century Severus of Antioch delivered a sermon against the depiction of angels as “princes or kings, in a purple and royal robe, holding marks of universal power.” Despite the differences between pagan and Christian iconography, he evidently believed that the distinctions were not clear enough. Moreover, according to Severus, worshippers were led to think that these intangible servants were God’s co-rulers.⁷⁸ Depicting angels as terrestrial, temporal creatures appeared to opponents of images of angels to be a humiliation of spiritual qualities, and for some the pagan parallels for winged beings were potentially misleading.

The sixth-century epigrams, examined in chapters 2 and 3, display a degree of defensiveness that would certainly support this conclusion. The occasional attempts by mosaicists, painters and sculptors to come to terms with the nature and identity of angels were apparently not effective in the eyes of all Christians. Although these artists added wings to an anthropomorphic form in order to indicate certain symbolic alterations of form that angels accomplished, they could not describe angels in any definitive sense. Representation of angels potentially involved a number of unpalatable issues, idolatry, angelolatry and, at the very least, disrespect for profoundly spiritual beings. The anti-image accusations and iconophile answers to these accusations and the ways in which writers about angels, particularly in miracle stories, approached these issues are the subjects of the following chapters.

78. See chapter 2.

Two

ARGUMENTS AGAINST IMAGES OF ANGELS

Adherents to a literal interpretation of scripture and to intellectual worship simply could not reconcile angelic nature—which is essentially incomprehensible—with material, allusive representations in art. The best-known opponent of artistic representation in the period leading up to Iconoclasm in the eighth century was Epiphanius of Salamis (ca. 315–403). Epiphanius's theology developed from his anti-allegorical stance; and his opposition to religious imagery later made him a natural champion for the iconoclastic party.¹

Elaborate written defenses of images of angels evidently did not arise in the period between Epiphanius and Iconoclasm. However, epigrams are extant from the sixth century that reveal a development

1. On Epiphanius and Iconoclasm, see P. Maraval, "Épiphanes, 'Docteur des Iconoclastes,'" Nicée II, 787–1987. Douze siècles d'images religieuses. Actes du colloque international Nicée II tenu au Collège de France, Paris les 2, 3, 4 Octobre 1986, ed. F. Boespflug and N. Lossky (Paris, 1987) 51–62; on the anti-Origenist theology of Epiphanius, see E. A. Clark, The Origenist Controversy. The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate (Princeton, 1992) 86ff.

G. Ostrogorsky, Studien zur Geschichte des byzantinischen Bilderstreites (Breslau, 1929) 69ff., doubted the authenticity of some of the texts, while Holl showed that they are all Epiphanius's own writings. This study takes the position that the texts of Epiphanius as collected by iconoclasts and refuted by iconophiles reflects a real concern on the part of the fourth-century theologian concerning material representation.

in a direction quite different from Epiphanius's interpretation of angels' images. These show affinities with a symbolic, materialist theology that finds its most detailed and articulate defense in the eighth and ninth centuries. For instance, Agathias (ca. 532–ca. 580) wrote on an image of the Archangel Michael on the island of Plate in the Sea of Marmara, south of Constantinople:

The wax, greatly daring, has represented the invisible, the incorporeal chief of the angels in the semblance of his form. Yet it was no thankless [task] since the mortal who beholds the image directs his mind to a higher contemplation. His veneration is no longer distracted: engraving within himself the [archangel's] traits, he trembles as if he were in the latter's presence. The eyes encourage deep thoughts, and art is able by means of colours to ferry over [to its object] the prayer of the mind.²

Agathias's description of an approach to images of angels is antithetical to Epiphanius's literal position and reveals an ability to interpret material images as the symbolic means to knowledge of an incomprehensible creature. In this description of the image of the archangel, the difficulty of comprehension derives from the incorporeal nature which would seem to be incompatible with material representation; but in Agathias's conception the image also provides the viewer with the means to approach knowledge of the distant and immaterial archangel by way of contemplation of the colors and outlines on the surface of the image. The material image is therefore the bridge between mundane reality and spiritual truths otherwise unattainable. No less intellectual than Epiphanius's, this approach nonetheless admits and encourages material, symbolic aids for worship and contemplation. These two opposing methods of gaining knowledge of God characterize the two sides of a long-standing debate in Byzantine society leading to the convulsive conflict of the Iconoclastic period.

2. The Greek Anthology, ed. W.R. Paton, 5 vols. (London, 1927) I:34; trans. C. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire. 312–1453. Sources and Documents (Toronto, 1986) 115.

Debate over the proper means to a comprehension of divine things, in this case angels, characterizes the period leading up to Iconoclasm in the eighth century.³ Art was part of this debate because it generated discussion over seemly worship and appropriate avenues to gaining knowledge. The angels' iconography is essentially symbolic in that it relates a human form sometimes assumed by angels but not descriptive of their real nature. The addition of wings is a significant marker in this iconography since wings signal transcendence and ethereality and inhuman speed, all characteristics of the angelic host. This symbolic iconography was evidently not suitable to all Christians, and texts from the fourth century on reveal that such images of angels had excited opposition. Moreover, the dangers of idolatry that attached to material images and to angels themselves were important considerations. This chapter seeks to isolate these strands of theological discussion concerning images of angels and, furthermore, argues that these strands influenced one aspect of iconoclastic opposition to symbolic images of angels. The extant opposition to images of angels falls into two general categories: fourth-century anti-imagist theology and the Monophysitism of fifth-/sixth-century Syria. This chapter examines the particular historical context for these sources and concludes with an examination of the common concerns that allowed their authors to be harnessed to the iconoclastic cause.

Earlier evidence for opposition to images is known mainly through the marshaling of patristic precedents to support the iconoclasts' position on images. A sifting of iconophile texts provides firm documentation of the nature of pre-Iconoclastic opposition to symbolic images, particularly those of angels. Long-standing theological divisions manifest themselves in part by the choice of patristic precedent in the arguments of the opposing sides of the controversy.⁴ Iconoclasts argued that image worship was a recent re-introduction of the idolatry that Christians had overcome but to which they had again

3. See Cameron, "The Language of Images."

4. See the recent survey by A. Giakalis, Images of the Divine. The Theology of Icons at the Seventh Ecumenical Council (Leiden, New York and Köln, 1994) 22ff.

succumbed. Iconophiles, on the other hand, claimed their own patristic support in favor of their position of a long-standing and proper worship of icons, initiated and sanctioned by scripture.⁵ The traditions of the Church were thus understood in completely divergent ways by each camp. Both parties, therefore, claimed a distinct line of tradition within the church, written and unwritten, and this chapter examines the development of an anti-image, intellectual theology that motivated certain iconoclastic beliefs concerning representations of angels.

Evidence for the effects of this theology on material objects is scanty; one assumes that before Iconoclasm some images may have been removed because of philosophical differences but that on the whole images were produced and opponents simply avoided such material aids. However, at the end of this chapter, mosaics of the angelic powers in the bema arch of the church of the Dormition at Nicaea (Iznik) will furnish examples of how iconoclasts viewed—and corrected—angels' images.

Both sides of the Iconoclastic controversy claimed the great father of the early Church and renowned opponent of heretics, Epiphanius of Salamis. Iconoclasts declared him a paragon because of his writings against the manufacture and worship of images.⁶ Epiphanius was a particularly difficult case for iconophiles since he was a theologian of unassailable orthodoxy, having written two influential works, the Panarion, a famous anti-heretical treatise, and the doctrinal study An-

5. A certain disregard for scruples of historical research is evident, and indeed charges of falsification of texts were traded by both sides. P.J. Alexander described the collection and confirmation of patristic sources by the iconoclast faction in the preparation for the iconoclastic Council of Hagia Sophia in 815 as more painstaking and scrupulous than the first iconoclastic Council of Hiereia, held in 754. For this reason, the patristic citations of the later council were expanded and more accurately cited than the sources adduced at Hiereia. See P.J. Alexander, "Church Councils and Patristic Authority. The Iconoclastic Council of Hiereia (754) and St. Sophia (815)," Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 63(1958):493–505.

6. These survive only in the fragments found in the rebuttal of Nicephorus, in the Adversus Epiphaniidem, part of his Antirrhetics, written in the period 818–20; see Pitra IV:292–380. See Maraval, "Épiphanie, 'Docteur des Iconoclastes,'" 61, and H.G. Thümmel, Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit, TU vol. 139 (Berlin, 1992) 65ff.

coratus, the “Anchor of Faith.” Rather than making a frontal attack, iconophiles leveled the charge, often repeated in this period, of willful falsification.

Epiphanius’s position is the clearest and earliest statement of an opposition to images based on a literal reading of art and a spiritual mode of worship. His active iconoclasm with regard to Christian images is still in doubt,⁷ but his attitude to art is clear from the extant fragments. In short, Epiphanius rejected the ability of art to convey any truth about divine nature: “If someone endeavours to perceive the divine character of the holy Logos in the flesh, out of material colours.... [let him be anathema].”⁸ A corollary for Epiphanius is that angels who are spiritual, bodiless and immaterial—though not to the same extent as God—cannot be depicted materially. As he wrote, images, dead and lifeless matter, debase and diminish the angels.⁹ Epiphanius could not countenance the representation of Christ as man since this representation merely reduced Christ to one aspect of his duophysite nature; nor would he allow angels to be depicted as men with mortal traits of “bone and sinew,” because angels are essentially spiritual beings whose nature is like a “devouring fire.” Representations of angels in dead and lifeless matter degrade the prototypes and diminish their nature.

Furthermore, Epiphanius was a fervent opponent of artists’ “deceptions.” Artists’ handiwork is not purely spiritual and, therefore, misleading in his view. It follows that all worship based on material images is essentially idolatrous. According to Epiphanius, artists created empty inventions according to their own fancies, in a medium

7. The well-known incident of the destruction of a curtain covering a door in a church has been interpreted traditionally as a sign of Epiphanius’s active opposition to Christian art. See, for instance, E. Kitzinger, “The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm,” DOP 8(1954):92ff. However, Sister Charles Murray, Rebirth and Afterlife. A Study of the Transmutation of Some Pagan Imagery in Early Christian Funerary Art (Oxford, 1981) 31ff., convincingly analyzed this passage as proof of Epiphanius’s vigorous antagonism simply towards pagan art. The curtain, in her view, depicted a pagan figure, perhaps a god, that Epiphanius felt to be inconsistent with the decoration of a place of worship. Indeed, the event is related within the context of Epiphanius’s apology for not having sent a replacement sooner.

8. Holl 363 (#34) = Adv. Epi., V.14, Pitra IV:303.18–20.

9. Holl 357 (#4) = Adv. Epi., VI.16, Pitra IV:306.35–307.1.

clearly inadequate to the subject. On the representations of Christ and the saints, all Epiphanius saw was irrelevant whimsy that cannot be substantiated by witness.¹⁰ Epiphanius based his position on images of the saints on a pragmatic distinction: the saints lived on earth, had mortal form and so have a single likeness; nonetheless, artists cannot and do not retrieve this likeness because they did not see the subjects with their own eyes. With regard to angels and Christ, the difficulty is of a different order since they are essentially spiritual and comprehensible only in spiritual terms.¹¹ Furthermore, the images of angels falsely attempt to communicate another level of the unknowable which is misrepresented by anthropomorphic forms on material images. Distinct even from representing Christ as man, artists who attempt to contain angelic nature in “bone and sinew” are guilty of deceit since they are not capable of knowing or seeing angels properly; likeness in any meaningful sense is simply out of reach.

Epiphanius’s position on images was based on an anti-allegorical, anti-Origenist stance that could not conceive of an image relating symbolically to its prototype.¹² For Epiphanius, the image and the 10. Holl 361 (#24) = Adv. Epi., XVIII.79, Pitra IV:352.12–22: “At the same time they mislead by their strange notions, representing the appearance of the saints in this or that manner, sometimes as old men and sometimes as youths, such things as they had never seen, they make their own. For they paint the Savior with long hair by some fancy (ὑπονοίας), on account of his being called the Nazarene, as Nazarenes have long hair. And they fail who attempt to bind these types to him. For the Savior drank wine, whereas the Nazarenes did not drink.” And Epiphanius leveled the same accusation at painters of images of the apostles: “And again believing according to their own notions what they make, they deceive. For these deceivers portray Peter the holy apostle as an old man with hair and beard cut close. And also some describe Saint Paul as balding and some bald pated and with a beard, while the other apostles as cropped” (Holl 362 [#26] = Adv. Epi., XIX.86, Pitra IV:357.25–32).

11. Christ’s divine nature made likeness impossible: Epiphanius rejected the ability of art to represent “the unknowable, the inexpressible, the incomprehensible, the unspeakable, whom only Moses was able to face” (Holl 359 [#12]).

12. George Florovsky, in “Origen, Eusebius, and the Iconoclastic Controversy,” Church History 19(1950):77–96, and C. von Schönborn, L’icône du Christ. Fondements théologiques élaborées entre le Ier et le IIer Concile de Nicée (325–787) (Fribourg, 1976) 55ff., 164ff., have described the parallels between iconoclast theology and Origenism. The human nature of Christ was, in Origenist terms, overcome and superseded by the transcendental reality of Christ risen, and so his nature is beyond description in any material depiction or description. Certainly, this position has analogies with that of the iconoclasts, as well as that of prototype were fundamentally distinct and any defense that linked the two would inevitably demean the prototype. The only real worship is founded on intellectual approaches to spiritual truths and not on material aids consisting of images. Images of angels pose particular problems of the relation between material image and immaterial prototype, and seemed to Epiphanius to be more of an obstacle than a clarification and facilitation of worship.

A text relating a dialogue between the fourth-century theologian Macarius Magnes and a pagan opponent shows similar mistrust of material representations, once again in the case of angels.¹³ The exchange over angels formed part of a work known as the Apocriticus, likely an invented dialogue between Macarius and a pagan. The texts of Macarius Magnes and the pagan with whom he is engaged in discussion find their earliest testimony in the work of Nicephorus (ca. 750–828), patriarch of Constantinople at the second outbreak of Iconoclasm in 815.¹⁴ Despite Macarius Magnes's allegiances to the allegorical methods of Origen (ca. 185–254) which iconoclasts es-

Epiphanius; Epiphanius's position, which the iconoclasts found so attractive, was that Christ's divinity is essentially unknowable and can only be demeaned and made separate by merely depicting the human Christ. It must also be said, however, that Epiphanius's anti-Origenism lies primarily in his opposition to Origen's heterodox views on the Trinity; more importantly for this study, Epiphanius's rejection of Origen's method of allegorical interpretation was also an important part of his dissent. On this question, see Clark, The Origenist Controversy, 86ff. Moreover, it is just this openness to symbolic interpretations that characterizes the iconophile approach to images, especially those of angels; see chapter 3.

13. A. Harnack, Kritik des Neues Testaments von einem griechischen Philosophen des 3. Jahrhunderts. Die in Apocriticus des Macarius Magnes enthaltene Streitschrift, TU vol. 37/3 (Leipzig, 1911) and G. Bardy, in DTC IX:1456ff., put Macarius Magnes in the late fourth-century. Harnack identified the opponent as the pagan neo-Platonist Porphyry (ca. 232–ca. 303), the writer of a famous anti-Christian treatise in fifteen volumes, the Κατὰ Χριστιανῶν.

The full text is found in Blondel who reconstructed the original text from a manuscript found in Athens; we can now be certain of the author's original intent. See also L. Duchesne, Macario Magne et scriptis eius (Paris, 1877) and P.J. Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople. Ecclesiastical Policy and Image Worship in the Byzantine Empire (Oxford, 1958) 165ff.

14. De Magne, Pitra I:302–35. Nicephorus apparently knew little of the author and gleaned whatever information he had from internal evidence; he found firm evidence of Origenism in the texts, but he also charged Macarius Magnes with Nestorian and Manichaean sympathies. See T. W. Crafer, "Macarius Magnes, A Neglected Apologist," JTS 8(1907):402.

chewed, iconoclasts had invoked Macarius Magnes for his kindred approach to intellectual and non-material worship.

Two texts in the dialogue, one by the pagan and one by Macarius Magnes himself, have special bearing on this discussion of angels. In this portion of the dialogue, Macarius Magnes defended Christian worship from parallels with paganism that his opponent attempted to draw, particularly with regard to idols and representations of angels. The “angelic way of life,” a common epithet of the followers of the monastic vocation, was introduced by Macarius Magnes as an answer to the pagan opponent who is made to equate the angels and the gods of the Greeks.¹⁵ Macarius Magnes proceeded to counter the pagan’s arguments with a denial of any similarity between Christian angels and pagan gods. Pagan gods simply do not exist and furthermore, he stated, the idols of the pagans have no resemblance to the Christian images because God is incomprehensible, and Christians know better than to think that deity can reside in such matter. Macarius brought up images of angels as a means of providing a concrete example of the distinctions between pagan idolatry and purer Christian veneration. Macarius Magnes wrote:

So that if someone who is right thinking should hear of a spiritual existence in heaven, he rejoices in the word of immortality, [and] he himself emulates [the excellence of angels] in his deeds, and zealously affects their merit, by avoiding marriage and fleeing the symbols of corruption, and coming to the passage of death, he is lifted up in the end into the court of the blessed, that is to say, of the angels. But certainly [the good Christian] does not depict the form [of angels], as you yourself say, and [he] does not speak to the shadow or is delighted with the phantoms, conversing with soulless matter as if it had a soul, delighting in dead visions of forms, directing prayer to voiceless matter, imagining that the divine law giver inhabits stone or wood, or pretending to subjugate the insubjugable being in bronze or iron, thinking to capture the uncapturable, he unthinkingly sketches a vague image in a dead vision.¹⁶

15. Blondel 200.1–12.

16. Blondel 214.10–20.

Later, confronted with this text, clearly antagonistic to material images, Nicephorus argued that it misrepresented Macarius Magnes since iconoclasts had indubitably falsified the text and had confused Macarius Magnes's argument against paganism and idolatry with a denial of Christian images. However, Macarius Magnes clearly stated his opinion in this dialogue that a holy person makes a true and godly image by modeling himself after paragons of holiness in the past. For Macarius, the real image is ethical and not a material representation. Furthermore, false and misleading images made after illusory visions must be shunned.

Both Macarius Magnes and Epiphanius belong to a general debate that took place in the fourth century over images, intellectual and material, in worship. Moreover, both form part of an early tradition of spiritual, anti-image worship that was resurrected in the eighth and ninth centuries during renewed debates over worship. Epiphanius stated that divinity is unrepresentable, and can be worshipped only "in spirit and truth," quoting John 4:24.¹⁷ Both theologians were suspicious of the knowledge derived through sight, especially through the viewing of deceptive images.¹⁸ Epiphanius's strong iconoclastic stance, based on the incomprehensibility of God and the essential deceptiveness of images, has parallels with the anti-image theology of Evagrius Ponticus (ca. 345–399), and Macarius's advocacy of intellectual worship is akin to Evagrius's practice of "pure prayer."¹⁹ Evagrius taught that prayer must be rid of emotions and images that are derived from the sensual world; he called this process "apatheia" (ἀπάθεια), involving a resistance to mental image-making and a worship of God only "in spirit and in truth."²⁰ Evagrius advised dis-

17. See P.J. Alexander, "The Iconoclastic Council of St. Sophia (815) and Its Definition (Horos)," DOP 7(1953):43, on Epiphanius's "Treatise against Those who are engaged in making, after the fashion of idols, images in the likeness of Christ, the Mother of God, Martyrs, Angels and Prophets" (frag. 30b; for text, see 63–64).

18. See, for instance, Holl 363 (#33).

19. See Clark, The Origenist Controversy, 102ff., on Epiphanius, and Schönborn, L'icône du Christ, 168, on the affinities of the anti-image theology of Evagrius and iconoclasts.

20. See Clark, The Origenist Controversy, 60ff.; A. Guillaumont, Les "Képhalaia Gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'Origénisme chez les Grecs et chez les Syriens, Patristica Sorbonensis, vol. 5 (Paris, 1962) 37ff., 59ff.; Evagrius Ponticus, Traité Pratique ou Le Moine, 2 vols., SC vols. 170, 171, ed. A. Guillaumont and C. Guillaumont (Paris, 1971) I:98ff. Accord-engagement from all distractions: “Do not represent the divine in itself when you pray and do not permit your intellect to receive the impression of any form; but go from immaterial to immaterial, and you will comprehend.”²¹ In this sense, Epiphanius, Evagrius and Macarius share comparable positions with regard to approaches to knowledge of things divine: only intellectual and non-material routes were seemly and fruitful in their view.²²

Elizabeth Clark has described the “constellation” of practice and theory in the late fourth century that connects Epiphanius’s own iconoclasm, Evagrius’s anti-imagistic theology, and the destruction of idols in Egypt led by Theophilus (d. 412), patriarch of Alexandria from 385.²³ Epiphanius’s tearing down of a curtain depicting “some form of a man” and produced perhaps by a pagan workshop, and Macarius’s opposition to parallels made between the images of Christian angels and pagan gods must be seen in this context of the general struggle against the profane art of the pagan religion, as each theologian combated the possibility of idolatry inherent in images. Epiphanius recalled precisely the idolatrous practices censured by the Council of Laodicea in his dismissal of making images; and, indeed, that the writer of the Apocriticus has the pagan equate pagan idols with images of angels reveals the special fear that angels aroused in some theologians. Angels were divine creatures, certainly, but they attracted worship that was too easily equated with pagan practice. In the fourth and fifth centuries, angels and their images posed clear threats to proper approach and seemly worship as the Apocriticus, the Council of Laodicea and Theodoret of Cyrrhus demonstrate.

ing to Evagrius, only Moses had seen God in “his proper form and without enigma” and spoke with him “mouth to mouth”; see R. Draguet, “L’Histoire Lausiaque: Une oeuvre écrite dans l’esprit d’Evagre,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 41(1946):330ff.

21. De oratione, LXVI, PG 79:1181A.

22. The general affinities are noted by J. Gouillard, “Fragments inédits d’un antirrétique de Jean le Grammairien,” REB 24(1966):174–75, with regard to some fragments attributed to John the Grammarian, the iconoclastic patriarch of Constantinople from 837–43.

23. The Origenist Controversy, 43ff.; the thesis of the interaction of theology, politics and social practice of the fourth/fifth centuries is key to her description of these texts and events.

Some scholars cite Monophysitism as an important element in iconoclastic theology, and the accusations of iconoclastic beliefs leveled against Philoxenus of Mabbug and Severus of Antioch at the Second Council of Nicaea (787) would seem to suggest at least a theological affinity between iconoclasts and these Monophysite theologians.²⁴ Like Epiphanius and Macarius Magnes, Philoxenus of Mabbug (ca. 440–523), a bishop of Hierapolis-Mabbug in Syria, strongly opposed symbolic images in Christian worship. The opposition to allusive representations was consistent with Philoxenus's theology that emphasized the absolute transcendence and incomprehensibility of Christ's divinity; iconophiles often accused iconoclasts of just such an emphasis that led them into Monophysite error.²⁵ As an extension of this belief, Philoxenus appears to have objected to anthropomorphic images of Christ and the angels, as well as to representations of the Holy Spirit as a dove.²⁶ In a passage taken from the lost Ecclesiastical History of Theodore Lector or Anagnostes (d. after 527), Theophanes the Confessor (ca. 760–817/8) described the malignant Monophysite roots of Philoxenus of Mabbug's position on images:

Xenaias, the servant of Satan, taught that images of the Lord and of the angels should not be accepted. He was a Persian by extraction

24. See Mansi XIII:317–18. And secondary sources include Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, 52, and S. Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm during the Reign of Leo III with Particular Attention to the Oriental Sources (Louvain, 1973) 127. Sebastian Brock argued for a complete dissociation of Monophysitism and iconoclastic theology in "Iconoclasm and Monophysitism," in Iconoclasm. Papers Given at the Ninth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, University of Birmingham, March 1975, ed. A. Bryer and J. Herrin (Birmingham, 1977) 53–57.

25. On Philoxenus of Mabbug's theology, see A. de Halleux, Philoxène de Mabboug. Sa vie, ses écrits, sa théologie (Louvain, 1963); C. N. Tsirpanlis, "Some Reflections on Philoxenos' Christology," Greek Orthodox Theological Review 25(1980):152–62; R. C. Chesnut, Three Monophysite Christologies: Severus of Antioch, Philoxenus of Mabbug, and Jacob of Sarug (Oxford, 1976) 57ff.; and G. Lardreau, Discours philosophique et discours spirituel. Autour de la philosophie spirituelle de Philoxène de Mabboug (Paris, 1985).

26. See Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, 44–45, "[Philoxenus of Mabbug's] position on images then was a logical corollary to his theological views: the angels and the Holy Spirit were clearly incorporeal and in Philoxenus' monophysite theology, Jesus Christ was first and foremost God." See also Kitzinger, "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm," 131, and S. Der Nersessian, "Une apologie des images du septième siècle," B 17(1944/5):70.

and, by station, a slave. Having fled from his master and being unbaptised, although he called himself a cleric, he was at the time of Calandion perverting from the [true] faith the villages around Antioch. He was expelled by Calandion, but Peter the Fuller consecrated him bishop of Hierapolis and renamed him Philoxenus.²⁷

Despite unsympathetic descriptions, no evidence exists in the extant texts ascribed to Philoxenus of an unambiguous iconoclastic position.²⁸ However, other texts of Philoxenus can provide testimony concerning his position regarding images and worship. These at least substantiate the charge of fundamental suspicion of images and perhaps also active iconoclasm described in the text read at Nicaea.

Judging by extant texts, Philoxenus of Mabbug held strong views on the images of Christ, the angels and the Holy Spirit in particular, on account of their essential incomprehensibility. Because of the transcendence of these beings, only worship that is intellectual and

27. Theophanes, Chronographia, ed. C. de Boor, 2 vols. (Leipzig, 1883–1885) I:134; trans. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire, 43. I have changed Mango's "saints" to "angels." This alteration is in accordance with an extract found in J.A. Cramer, Anecdota graeca e codd. manuscriptis Bibliothecae regiae parisiensis, 4 vols. (Oxford, 1839–1841; rp. Hildesheim, 1967) II:109.1–2, and is in agreement with de Halleux, Philoxène de Mabbug, 88 n86, and Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, 44–45. See also the reading given by E. Miller, "Fragments inédits de Théodore Le Lecteur et de Jean d'Égée," Revue archéologique 26(1873):402, "Ξεναίαις ὁ Φιλόξενος οὔτε Χριστοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὔτε ἀγγέλου εἰκόνας ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ συνεχώρει ἀνατίθεσθαι."

At the Second Council of Nicaea, an excerpt was read from John Diakrinomenus's Ecclesiastical History of ca. 500 which more fully describes the reasoning behind Philoxenus of Mabbug's opposition to images of incorporeal beings and the affinities he had with Epiphanius and Macarius Magnes before him: "For Philoxenus said that it is not proper to give the angels, who are bodiless, bodies and thus in human-like shapes to depict them in a type of embodiment, and not to believe that one offers honour and faith to Christ through making an inscribed image; only that which is worship in spirit and in truth is acceptable to him. And a few lines below: he says to note this too, that [Philoxenus says] it is a childish mind that fashions the holy and venerable spirit in an image, despite the fact that the Gospels in no place teach that the Holy Spirit became a dove, but that at some point it appeared in the shape of a dove. Because it is by God's dispensation that it appeared one time in this way and not essentially, it is by no means fitting to make images of a body for the faithful. Philoxenus taught these things and followed this teaching in practice, too. In many places, he cast down the images of angels and hid the painted images of Christ in secret places." See Mansi XIII:180E–1B.

28. On this question, see de Halleux, Philoxène de Mabbug, 88ff.

unhindered by material images is possible. By faith alone, Philoxenus wrote, is humanity able to accept and understand the contradictory and difficult nature of angels:

And thus also it is in respect of the spiritual natures and orders of celestial beings, and it is faith which maketh it possible to receive every word which is spoken concerning them; for otherwise there must necessarily be unbelief, since the Book calleth them “absolute spiritual beings” [in one place], and in another it speaketh of them as “compacted bodies” to which it attributeth forms which are different from each other.²⁹

Philoxenus held that angelic appearances were not “real” but of a spiritual nature. These epiphanies consist of an appearance (φαντασία) or form (σχῆμα) intellectually accessible in some incomplete way. This formulation—in fact, not so very different from iconophile description of angelic appearances—led to a complete disregard for any images of the immaterial angels. Because angels appear in spiritual alterations, images of the angels in symbolic guise can only be defamations and distortions of transcendent, spiritual beings.³⁰

29. From Philoxenus’s sermon “On Faith,” trans. E.A.W. Budge, The Discourses of Philoxenus Bishop of Mabbôgh, A.D. 485–519. Vol. II. Introduction, Translation, etc. (London, 1894) 29–31, which continues, “... but [the angels] possess all the service of the members, although they have no compacted members. And how the operation of the members is established without the members themselves we have no power in our own knowledge to understand; but by this [power] which is given to us by God, I mean faith, we understand these things, and although they do not at all fall under the investigation of human thoughts they are accepted by us without any doubt.”

30. With regard to the particular case of images of Christ, the basis of Philoxenus’s resistance is ethical in that a true Christian ought to make him or herself a true image rather than worship material objects. Brock, “Iconoclasm and Monophysitism,” 54, saw the causes of Philoxenus’s hostility to images rooted in his “puritan asceticism.” Concerning the last charge made by John Diakrinomenos, Philoxenus does state in a commentary on Luke that the Holy Spirit was an intellectual vision, perceived by the intelligence of John the Baptist (Luke 3:22), and was in no way to be interpreted as an essential transformation of the Spirit itself; the Holy Spirit cannot, then, be depicted after John the Baptist’s vision since the vision was spiritual and not material. Brock hypothesized that Philoxenus’s resistance to images of doves was based on an antipathy to the local worship of Atargatis whose cult image was a dove. However, the resistance is theologically consistent with Philoxenus’s position on

Philoxenus's theological positions on intellectual worship and ethical guides are fully consistent with charges of antagonism to images, thereby substantiating his opponents' assessments of his position on art. It is noteworthy that the charges center on Philoxenus's rejection of a relation between image and model, and so any honor due the image; the charges also indicate opposition to a symbolic rendering of spiritual creatures which would make this relation of image and model untenable in Philoxenus's eyes. Moreover, writings by Philoxenus on imagination reveal affinities with the anti-image theology of Epiphanius, Macarius Magnes and Evagrius. Philoxenus believed that imagination naturally forms mental images but that these images lead one away from contemplation of true things; imagination must, therefore, be resisted and, by emptying the mind of thought and images, the spiritual path to true things can be opened.³¹ These views of Philoxenus clearly presage iconoclastic tenets. By tarring iconoclasts with the same brush as the Monophysite Philoxenus, iconophiles reinforced the frequently repeated accusation that iconoclasts were new Monophysites who rejected the incarnation in favor of Christ's divinity.³²

More ambiguous is the passage from the Second Council at Nicaea which impugned the Monophysite bishop Severus of Antioch (ca. 465–538) for his disapproval of the iconography of angels. An unsympathetic portrait of Severus's purposes in his homily on the Archangels Michael and Gabriel is given in a fragment taken from a lost Vita of Severus, written by John, bishop of Gabala, and read at Nicaea II. Iconophiles accused Severus of inappropriate attention to the appearance of angels in art, not iconoclasm strictly speaking:

[Severus of Antioch] used to stand in the bema and deliver long addresses, and he often attempted to persuade the multitude in the very church of the most-holy Michael that white vestments, not the incomprehensibility of wholly spiritual entities, like the Holy Spirit and Christ, and, to a lesser degree, angels.

31. See Lardreau, Discours philosophique et discours spirituel, 125ff., and R. Kearney, The Wake of Imagination. Ideas of Creativity in Western Culture (London, 1988) 144ff.

32. See, for example, K. Parry, Depicting the Word. Byzantine Iconophile Thought of the Eighth and Ninth Centuries (Leiden, 1996) 137, 144.

purple ones, were appropriate to angels. He was not ignorant of the fact that the holy [angelic] host had no concern with vestments, but tried by this device to cause division and to urge against one another people who had this or that opinion.³³

Fortunately, the homily to which John of Gabala refers is extant and the nature of Severus's antagonism can be ascertained. Rather than urging outright iconoclasm, the homily was largely concerned with the cult of angels and the unseemly excesses to which this devotion had been prone. Severus is not unusual for having this concern; as the Epistle to the Colossians (2:18), the Council of Laodicea and Theodoret of Cyrrhus bear witness, excessive worship of the angels had created anxiety within the Church since the first centuries of the Christian era. Severus began his sermon by recalling the pagan errors of angelolatry that had been forbidden under both the Old and the New Covenants.

But, forgetting their condition as soldiers and servants, let us not dishonour them for that reason, through a pagan error, by honours which are beyond their due. For all that which is taken from that glory, which alone is God's, is a dishonour to them. That is why the angel who spoke to Manoah said, "... if thou wilt offer a burnt offering, thou must offer it unto the Lord" (Judges 13:16). And this is why also Barnabas and Paul, those servants as faithful as the angels, prevented the Lycaonian worshippers of demons from offering them a sacrifice as to gods (Acts 14).³⁴

33. Mansi XIII:184C; trans. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire, 44. The response to the reading by the patriarch Tarasius (ca. 730?–806) at Nicaea is interesting because it ends in agreement with the heretic Severus of Antioch; Tarasius states that white vestments must be advocated, despite John of Gabala's assertion that iconographic detail is not a concern of the angels: "Tarasius, the holy patriarch, said, We shall consider, because he has been brought to this very thing by [the question of] relics, as he has said, that it is not befitting for angels to wear purple vestments, but they ought to wear white vestments instead" (Mansi XIII:184C). The iconographic particulars are, nonetheless, irrelevant to Tarasius's intention since in his statement he made it clear that the church takes an interest in artistic practice, to the point of managing and determining it. On this issue of ecclesiastical control of artistic production after Iconoclasm, see H. Maguire, "Magic and the Christian Image," in Byzantine Magic, ed. H. Maguire (Washington, D.C., 1995) 51–71.

34. Severus of Antioch, Les homiliae cathedrales, PO vol. 8/2, ed. M. Brière (Paris, 1919; rp. Turnhout, 1971) 82. Severus's work survives only in a Syriac translation by James of Severus of Antioch then lashed out at the effrontery of the painters who lead Christian worshippers to pagan idolatry by their unsuitable depictions of the angels. It is worth noting that the improper worship is the really contentious issue for Severus of Antioch.

But the hand of the painters, which is insolent and which is a law unto itself, favouring the pagan inventions or the imagination and things connected to idolatry and arranging everything to that end, clothe Michael and Gabriel, as princes or kings, with a purple and royal robe, adorning them with a crown and placing in their right hand the mark of authority and universal power. It is for these reasons and others like them that those who honour the angels in such excesses abandon the Church and transgress its laws and are anathematised by those who are ordained and establish the holy canons.³⁵

Although the passage from John of Gabala says that Severus defended white robes over purple for angels, the sermon clearly does not offer an alternative iconography; Severus denigrated the current iconography of purple-clad angels as strictly untoward and overweening for servants. Justinian's garb in the mosaic at San Vitale (consecrated 548), for example, is the same as that worn by the Archangels Michael and Gabriel in mosaics of the bema arch in the contemporary church of Sant' Apollinare in Classe.³⁶ The late fifth-century Cotton Genesis, moreover, shows the angels before Lot dressed in rich vermillion, one with gold highlights.³⁷ The program for which Severus provided his ekphrasis is, of course, lost, but unquestionably Severus was opposing just this kind of incorporation

Edessa. On this sermon, see the remarks of C. Mango, "St. Michael and Attis," DChAE 12(1984):39ff.

35. Les homiliae cathedrales, 83–84.

36. See A. Grabar, The Golden Age of Justinian. From the Death of Theodosius to the Rise of Islam, trans. S. Gilbert and J. Emmons (New York, 1967) figs. 171 and 11, respectively, and O. von Simson, Sacred Fortress. Byzantine Art and Statecraft in Ravenna, 2d ed. (Chicago, 1976) 60ff.

37. K. Weitzmann and H.L. Kessler, The Cotton Genesis. British Museum Codex Cotton Otho B. VI (Princeton, 1986) 81–82. For other examples, see RBK III:29–32.

of purple-clad, worldly rulers into the iconography of angels.³⁸ Severus then raised another issue surrounding the dangerous worship of angels, as an inoculation of the cult was also being carried out. The reason for their gathering, Severus went on to state, was the decorous consecration of the new church of the Archangel Michael by means of the introduction of the relics of human saints into the church.³⁹

Severus of Antioch proceeded to the charges of insolence he made against painters of angels. He made it clear that he was only speaking figuratively since the images of the angels are not in any sense representative of the real angelic nature, but only symbols.

No one, in effect, can judge that which has rapport [with the angels] by the aspects under which they appear sometimes to saintly men; for these [aspects] are various and they are known differently according to the time, according to the appropriateness of the circumstance and in some appearances such as the eyes of sensible beings are able to perceive.⁴⁰

As the nature of the angels is so difficult to perceive, their images are in a fundamental sense misleading as well as debasing. Artistic independence, and the presumptions this leads to, is also an important theme of the homily. Severus railed against “the hand of the painters who are insolent and are a law unto themselves,” and the affinities to paganism that this kind of practice encouraged in artists.

38. On the imperial garments worn by archangels, see G. Peers, “Patriarchal Politics in the Paris Gregory (B.N. gr. 510),” JöB 47(1997):53–57, and, covering some similar ground, C. Jolivet-Lévy, “Note sur la représentation des archanges en costume impérial dans l’iconographie byzantine,” CA 46(1998):121–28.

39. Relics of saints were apparently introduced into shrines in order to make more palatable this angelic cult with a dubious history. See P. Maraval, Lieux saints et pèlerinages d’Orient. Histoire et géographie des origines à la conquête arabe (Paris, 1985) 56. And P. Canivet has proposed that a crypt at the fifth-century church of the Archangel Michael at Huarte in Syria had been added to provide relics and stability to a potentially excessive cult. The connection proposed by Canivet, in “Le Michaelion de Huarte (Ve s.) et le culte syrien des anges,” B 50(1980):110ff., must remain tentative.

40. Les homiliae cathedrales, 76–78.

In summation, Severus of Antioch was attacking the worldliness of the angels' iconography, and he concluded that this iconography led worshippers to overlook the angels' bodiless and spiritual qualities. According to Severus, angels alter their forms according to the demands of the occasion in their appearances to just men. They are never seen according to their real nature, in fact, which has nothing of the coarseness of our bodies, but in an alteration of their real form. This alteration is necessary because of the unviewability of the angelic beings. Therefore, Severus is essentially unsympathetic to material images rendered by the artistic means derived from the deceitful pagans.

Severus was not an active iconoclast but, like Philoxenus of Mabbug, interpreted angelic appearances as symbolic transformations; and the natural conclusion holds for Severus, as for Philoxenus, that images cannot express the difficulties of comprehension and nature of angels.⁴¹ Sebastian Brock is right to point out that Severus was not aggressively iconoclastic and that, in fact, his conversion may have been influenced by a fresco of Paradise. However, the principal point of the sermon is not, as Brock maintains, the depiction of angels in purple. Severus had larger issues in mind in this homily, namely the inability of art to represent angels in any essential or descriptive way and art's misleading qualities, therefore, in the context of worship.

The theological perspective represented by these four theologians, Epiphanius, Macarius, Philoxenus and Severus, is based on an ultimate spirituality of angels that cannot be communicated by any material image. Painters cannot provide appropriate means for contemplating divine things since they are misled by pagan practice into producing figured matter wholly inadequate to describe transcendent beings. In this anti-imagistic theology, an emphasis on the ethical mode of worship is characteristic; John's dictum on worship "in spirit and in truth" (4:24) is a leitmotiv in the works of these theologians, as it was for iconoclasts themselves who gathered the writings of these earlier theologians for their own purposes. These theologians, therefore, represent a distinct position with regard to approaches to knowledge of God's bodiless creations; their common approach eschewed tangible, manufactured aids in favor of more intellectual methods that avoided the production of mental or material images.

41. Brock, "Monophysitism and Iconoclasm," 53–54.

In the fragmentary texts of Epiphanius and Philoxenus, angels appear to have been adduced as corollaries to the undepictability of Christ. For Epiphanius, just the same, the angels are differentiated from Christ by their special nature, "a devouring fire," at once less exalted than the divine nature of Christ and less tangible than the human saints. Epiphanius also stated the difficulties of rendering the humanity of Christ since artists describe Christ as man out of caprice rather than out of any attempt at true likeness. The fact that Epiphanius is able to make a double calumny against Christ's images, which are equally unable to manifest any truth about either of Christ's natures, indicates the essential distinction between Christ's and angels' images: to "bone and sinew" they cannot claim any likeness at all, as Christ as human could conceivably, since angels' assumptions of human form have only been momentary and illusory.

In the fuller texts of Macarius and Severus, the special distinctions of angels' images are clearer. These theologians saw angels as unique problems since they were concerned exclusively with the issue of angelic appearances and the manufacture of images deriving from these occasions. Both of these theologians viewed material commemorations of angelic epiphany as diminishing such difficult intellectual experiences to base, misleading caricature. The angels—unlike Christ, it ought to be stressed once again—appear in a semblance of their ethereal nature, and depicting the angels in human form, only one of many forms they have assumed, can in no way communicate their immaterial nature and activity.

The danger of idolatry represented by angels' images is also a common feature of these theologians' concerns. The nature and activities of angels allowed parallels to be drawn by pagans to their own deities. Moreover, Christians themselves were evidently not immune to the attraction that angels held for their direct worship separate from God. Severus certainly feared just this possibility and the deceitful allure that angels depicted as princes possessed.

The approach represented by these four theologians influenced the position taken by iconoclasts in the eighth and ninth centuries and reveals a continuity in this anti-imagistic, intellectual theology from the fourth century on. Therefore, an understanding of the iconoclastic position with respect to angels is properly derived from these theologians; it must, in fact, depend upon their limited testimony, since a particular iconoclastic theology of angels from the eighth and ninth centuries is not extant. As only iconophile rebuttals of certain texts survive, one must assume that iconophile dialogues, for instance Nicephorus against Epiphanius and Macarius Magnes, attack positions taken by iconoclasts, who collected and defended this patristic documentation in the first place.

The theological position that expressed considerable anxiety over both idolatry and angelolatry was the formative background for the eighth-/ninth-century iconoclastic opposition to depicting angels. It explains the concern the later anti-image theologians had for the inherent difficulties in representing angels, of course, but also for the dangers of worship of created things in general and angels in particular. As created beings, angels were not worthy of worship in and of themselves, but representing angels, as Severus pointed out, increased the likelihood of Christians mistakenly directing veneration at angels. Images in that view were the necessary nexus of idolatry and angelolatry. This association of idolatry with angelolatry reveals the primitive origins of iconoclasm, since an iconoclastic position on angels appears to be firmly rooted not only in an intellectual approach to worship but also in pastoral care for Christians who were easily led to immoderate worship of God's creature servants.⁴²

After 752, Constantine V (r. 740–775) seems to have begun a concerted assault against the iconophile position on both theological and political fronts. The strength of this attack, some twenty years after his father had initiated iconoclasm as government policy, indicates a delay in formulation of any truly radical reform. Constantine V, however, produced in the 750s an articulate expression of icono-

42. That the problem of dangerous devotion to angels still existed during Iconoclasm is likely revealed by the reworking of the Chonae miracle story in this period; see chapter 4.

clastic theology much beyond the apparent literalism and bluster of his father's theological convictions. Nicephorus discussed selections from the iconoclastic Πεύσεις, or "Inquiries," and specifically attributed them to Constantine's pen, and in this way he was able to impute personal initiative to the emperor in formulating an iconoclastic theology.⁴³

The iconoclastic theology revealed through the "Inquiries" and "Definition" of the council convened by iconoclasts in 754 is the culmination of one particular strand of theological interpretation of proper Christian worship and comprehension. Clearly, the common ground of these iconoclastic texts and of the patristic sources iconoclasts adduced is an agreement that the images of angels—like those of Christ—are impossible because of the subjects' immaterial, divine nature. Like Christ's image, an image of the angels' earthly appearance would merely separate one manifestation of their nature from their real formless nature.⁴⁴ Epiphanius made an important distinction since the angels—unlike Christ—cannot be depicted simply as "bones and sinew"; the angels have never taken human form, only assumed it symbolically. Therefore, the image of an angel cannot even have a stable visual relation to its prototype, let alone an essential relation. It is strictly a misleading invention by deceitful artists. Iconoclasts, augured by theologians like Epiphanius and Severus, possessed a fundamental distrust of artistic practice; since the angels are so distant from our comprehension, and indeed so rarely seen at all, artists cannot be expected to represent these spiritual beings in an accurate or meaningful way.⁴⁵

Here the shape of the theological debate may unlock the history of an important set of images, representations of angels significantly

43. Contra Eusebium, III, Pitra I:375–77. On the Peuseis, see S. Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Constantine V with Particular Attention to the Oriental Sources (Louvain, 1977) 37ff.

44. See Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Constantine V, 39ff., on iconoclastic Christology.

45. See Mansi XIII:336E; Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Constantine V, 89, and, also, 91 (#16); M. V. Anastos, "The Argument for Iconoclasm as Presented by the Iconoclastic Council of 754," in Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. K. Weitzmann et al. (Princeton, 1955) 185.

altered during Iconoclasm. Admittedly, the evidence for the Church of the Dormition at Nicaea, now Iznik, is not secure: first, destroyed in 1922, the church is lost and so unexaminable, and second, the sequence of creation of mosaics in the seventh century, emendation in the eighth / ninth century and finally restoration in the ninth depends on scholarly argument founded on probabilities. Nonetheless, the position assumed here conforms to general scholarly opinion that the Church of the Dormition reflected the changes in attitudes to images from the seventh to the ninth century. Located on the arch that separates the sanctuary or bema from the nave, these mosaics of angels in the Church of the Dormition have been variously dated in their initial phase to the sixth or seventh century.⁴⁶ Although the inscriptions stated that the figures represented different orders of the angelic hierarchy, the Principalities, Virtues, Dominations and Powers, mentioned together at Colossians 1:16, the angelic beings were depicted as identical winged youths wearing the loros and carrying orbs and standards (figs. 9, 10). A pair occupied both the north and south portion of the arch. The subject of the pre-Iconoclastic mosaic in the apse is still an open question, and an enthroned Christ, an orans Virgin and a seated Virgin and Child have been suggested (fig. 16).⁴⁷

46. Fernanda de' Maffei conjectured that the mosaics had been covered during Iconoclasm, not erased as is generally thought, and the repair evident is not connected to the restoration of images in 843. See F. de' Maffei, "L'Unigenito consostanziale al Padre nel programma trinitario dei perduti mosaici del bema della Dormizione di Nicea e il Cristo trasfigurato del Sinai I," Storia dell'arte 45(1982):91ff., and also her Icona, pittore e arte al Concilio Niceno II (Rome, 1974) 99ff. However, the restorations apparent in the areas around the angels and the replacing of the cross in the apse likely belong to the same phase, probably post-843, paid for by the otherwise unknown Naucratis, as stated in an inscription between the two angels on the south bema arch. For discussion and bibliography, see Peers, "Patriarchal Politics in the Paris Gregory," 54–56, and chapter 1.

47. de' Maffei hypothesized an enthroned Christ in the apse of the church at Iznik flanked by angelic powers. See "L'Unigenito consostanziale," 91ff. By tracing the exegetical history of the psalms (110:3, 93:5, 97:7) and Col. 1:16, de' Maffei attempted to reconstruct a christological program in the apse, which centered on an enthroned Christ. While ultimately untenable, her argument is compelling, especially as it is the only one, to my knowledge, to take into consideration the angelic powers and their relation to Christ, but she finds difficulty in overcoming the art-historical evidence. The only parallel she is able to cite is in the ninth-century Chludov Psalter in which the enthroned Christ is approached by

Figure 16. Virgin and Child, Apse Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea), ninth century.
Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

David (Moscow, Historical Museum, cod. 129, fol. 114v, ps. 110). See K. A. Corrigan, Visual Polemics in the Ninth-Century Byzantine Psalters (Cambridge, 1992) 44–45, fig. 54.

The illustration in the Chludov Psalter asserts the divinity of Christ, as the inscription accompanying the marginal illustration reads, “David prophesies concerning the son of God.” The assertion of Christ’s divine nature in this typological context derives from contra Judaeos literature of the sixth and seventh centuries, for example the Trophies of Damascus,

Such figured representations as found in the bema arch at Nicaea did not conform to the iconoclastic notion of the proper image of angels, and the figured portions of the bema arch were eliminated during Iconoclasm. Iconoclasts, of course, found representations of angels distasteful, as they found all figural religious imagery to be contrary to their beliefs concerning appropriate worship.⁴⁸ The distinguishing features of the iconoclastic alterations made on the bema arch at Nicaea were that the inscriptions and standards were left untouched. Evidently, iconoclasts did not object to every aspect of the program and felt that with editing the mosaics at Nicaea could provide proper “images” of angels that were non-figurative and relied on inscribed words.

That conversion provides vital information on attitudes toward, and meanings of, material representations of angels from the iconoclastic point of view. The sutures around the restored angelic powers reveal that the figures were erased and the mosaic field was left blank in which the same psalm (110) is adduced to defend the divine nature of Christ. See Les Trophées de Damas, PO vol. 15 / 2, ed. G. Bardy (Paris, 1920; rp. Turnhout, 1973) 32.12–33.6. Bardy points out that this psalm is a topos of Jewish-Christian debates from an early date. The currency that this psalm had for the defense of Christ’s divine nature in the period before Iconoclasm, both in exegesis and apologetic literature, lends support to de’ Maffei’s reconstruction of the apse program of Christ as Lord surrounded by his heavenly servants.

The general assumption, however—which moreover has the greater attraction of plausibility—is that the Virgin and child placed in the apse after the end of Iconoclasm was a replacement for a pre-Iconoclastic composition with the same subject. This premise informs C. Barber’s analysis, for example, in “The Koimesis Church, Nicaea: The Limits of Representation on the Eve of Iconoclasm,” JöB 41(1991):43–60.

48. In a review of T. Schmit’s Die Koimesis-Kirche von Nikaia, das Bauwerk und die Mosaiken (Berlin and Leipzig, 1927), E. Wiegand claimed that making symbolic images of angels did not warrant opprobrium from the iconoclastic point of view and the bema mosaics could have been produced during Iconoclasm; see Deutsche Literaturzeitung 53(1927):2607. E. Kitzinger, “Byzantine Art in the Period between Justinian and Iconoclasm,” in Berichte zum XI. Internationalen Byzantinischen-Kongress, München, 1958 (Munich, 1958) 13, dismissed Wiegand’s hypothesis and suggested himself that the angelic powers belonged originally to a pre-iconoclastic phase. P.A. Underwood, “The Evidence of Restorations in the Sanctuary Mosaics of the Church of the Dormition at Nicaea,” DOP 13(1959):235ff., followed up this suggestion and demonstrated conclusively—to my mind—that the church underwent three phases of mosaic decoration: pre-iconoclastic (before the 720s), iconoclastic (that is, without figured images of angels but with inscriptions and standards left intact, likely effected between the 720s and 787 but possibly also between 815 and 843), and post-iconoclastic, that is to say after the “Triumph of Orthodoxy” in 843.

during Iconoclasm. However, the inscriptions designating each of the powers, the standards that bore the inscribed Trisagion and the passage taken from Psalm 97:7 (“To him all the angels of God offer worship”) were apparently left intact and on view during this entire period.⁴⁹ Furthermore, a mosaic cross replaced either the figure of Christ or of the Virgin and Child in the apse.

This iconoclastic program demonstrates the practical limits of the depiction of angels during Iconoclasm and provides concrete form to the iconoclastic theology of angels. Given the preceding discussion of the views of iconoclasts and their predecessors, the elimination of the figural depictions of the angelic powers must be viewed as a natural extension of anti-image theory. The void outlined by the sutures, that is the absence of images, demonstrates iconoclastic belief in the inability of figural description to render angels. The preservation of the inscriptions of the angelic powers, then, marks the limit of representation according to this theory. The presence of the inscriptions, of course, was a happy coincidence for the iconoclasts since it served their purposes so well. The inscription shows that the route to contemplation of these beings must be attempted through meditation on the scriptural designations for angelic powers (Col. 1:16), the nominating inscriptions that signify the beings directly and without figural confusion.

Iconoclasts and their forbears believed that verbal worship was most appropriate.⁵⁰ Words signify purely, with none of the dissimulation or distraction of material images. Iconoclasts held that words were proper signifiers since they were capable of describing intellectually without the contamination and distraction of matter. At the iconoclastic council of 754, iconoclasts stated that “Christ” is a name that refers simultaneously to God and man; therefore, the name “Christ” is an “image” that contains reference to Christ as God and man with none of the futility and deception of the painters’ craft.⁵¹

49. See Underwood, “The Evidence for Restorations,” 240.

50. On this issue, see J.-M. Sansterre, “La parole, le texte et l’image selon les auteurs byzantins des époques iconoclastes et posticonoclastes,” in Testo e immagine nell’alto medioevo, Settimane vol. 41, 2 vols. (Spoleto, 1994) I:197–243.

51. Mansi XIII:252A. See de’ Maffei, Icona, pittore e arte, 26ff.

The names of angels are also images in this view in that they refer as pure signifiers to transcendence and incomprehensibility.

The angels' standards with the Trisagion illustrate—paradoxically—other important tenets of iconoclastic theology. The Trisagion is derived from the seraphim of Isaiah (6:3) and Revelation (4:8), and very early entered Christian piety and liturgy. In the context of Nicaea, it denotes the iconoclastic definition of the seemingly verbal and ethical character of worship that iconoclasts held to be the essential elements in devotion.⁵² Iconoclasts had stated that meditation on scripture and divine words contained therein, at Nicaea Psalm 97:7, was the most appropriate and purest approach to knowledge of divine things. The priests were the fitting custodians of such truths, and iconoclasts cited approvingly Malachi 2:7: "For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts."⁵³ The pastoral care of priests is emphasized here at Nicaea precisely in the public setting once decorated with figural images so denigrated by Severus. The communal aspect ought to be stressed here: the iconoclastic revisionists reveal themselves to be guardians of the "truth," that is, in this church they demonstrate their guidance, not just an intellectual ministering but an active, collective attendance. The danger of idolatry diminished considerably, and, their care therefore demonstrated, the iconoclastic clergy—presumably—at Nicaea also indicated the locus of their power and the source of their authority, the words of the gospels left untouched in the mosaic surface.

Finally, the program centered on a cross placed over earlier figural depiction. The cross has been interpreted as the iconoclastic sign par excellence, although it was not exclusive to the iconoclastic cause.⁵⁴

52. See M. V. Anastos, "The Ethical Theory of Images Formulated by the Iconoclasts in 754 and 815," DOP 8(1954):151–60.

53. See Mansi XIII:229E. On the issue of role of the ecclesiastical hierarchy in disseminating knowledge, see Sansterre, "La parole, le texte et l'image."

54. Bibliography and discussion found in L. Brubaker, "To Legitimize an Emperor: Constantine and Visual Authority in the Eighth and Ninth Centuries," in New Constantines. The Rhythm of Imperial Renewal in Byzantium, 4th–13th Centuries, Papers from the Twenty-sixth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, St. Andrews, March 1992, ed. P. Magdalino (Aldershot, 1994) 139–58.

The cross was a venerable sign of victory established by the unassailable precedent of Constantine the Great.⁵⁵ An epigram later quoted by the iconophile leader Theodore of Stoudios (759–826)⁵⁶ demonstrates both the political and devotional meanings of the cross for iconoclasts.⁵⁷ The epigram stated that the image (εἶδος) of Christ, voiceless, breathless and material has been taken down and replaced with the sign (τύπον) of the cross, thrice-blessed and glory of the faithful.

In this discussion of Nicaea, the opposition of image and sign on the bema arch and in the apse is of particular relevance. The illusionistic image of Christ, in an iconoclast's view, deceives through its attempts at describing a living, breathing being out of matter, and misleads the worshipper into adoring the image itself. The cross is an abstract sign, a true image, with no danger of devotional attachment that would lead to iconophile idolatry. The program in the church of the Dormition was altered in this way so that no risk existed of attachment to figured symbols—a paradoxical affinity that iconoclasts appear to have with the seminal theology of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (fl. ca. 500?). And, since no such abstract sign exists for angels, the inscriptions referring to angelic beings provided intellectual modes of comprehension and worship of bodiless beings.

At Nicaea, it is possible to see practice paralleling theory; the illusions of artists abhorred by iconoclasts were displaced in favor of purer signs, inscribed words. According to the iconoclastic definition of the real image, the image must be consubstantial with its prototype and this is clearly not possible for images of angels, given interpretations of their nature; only the eucharist can be a real image in

55. See A. Grabar, L'iconoclisme byzantin. Dossier archéologique (Paris, 1957) 134ff. and J. Moorhead, "Iconoclasm, the Cross, and the Imperial Image," B 55(1985):65–79.

56. Refutatio et subversio impiorum poematum, PG 99:437C.

57. See Grabar, L'iconoclisme byzantin, 130, and Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm during the Reign of Leo III, 113ff.: "The ruler does not tolerate that Christ be depicted [as] a voiceless shape and bereft of breath, with earthly matter, [which is] condemned by the Scriptures; Leo, with his son Constantine, marks the thrice-blessed image of the cross, the glory of the believers, upon the gates of the royal palaces" (trans. ibid., 114–15). The first portion of the epigram is examined briefly in G. Peers, "Breathless, Speechless Images: On the Chalke Gate Epigram," in Hommages Margaret Head Thomson, Cahiers des études anciennes, vol. 32, ed. L. Finnette and A. P. Booth (Trois Rivières, Québec, 1998) 109–12.

this view.⁵⁸ Approach and worship must be intellectual, spiritual and verbal. Symbolic interpretation of images of formless beings has no place in this theology, only direct contemplation and ethical worth. A coherent theology of angels' representations can, therefore, be derived from the fragments of iconoclasts and their forerunners, and the traces of iconoclastic "images" of angelic beings at Nicaea. This theology is literal in its attitude to symbolic manifestation: as Macarius Magnes described it, angelic epiphanies are intellectual and dissembling, and it behooves the good Christian to behave as Abraham and worship these revelations through scripture, inwardly in the soul, and not bow down before any image or creature.

58. Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Constantine V, 45ff.

Three

REPRESENTING ANGELS

Images and Theory

The practice of image worship excited opposition in certain quarters, and the theologians examined in the previous chapter were reacting to existing images that they could not reconcile with their beliefs about worship and contemplation. The preceding chapter described a process of gaining knowledge of God and things divine that had great importance for the formation of the intellectual and theological climate in the period leading up to and including Iconoclasm. This process, recounted here in terms of its relation to one kind of image, namely of angels, depended primarily on intellectual, non-material avenues to spiritual truths; it is essentially non-figural.¹ The influential theologian Evagrius Ponticus (ca. 345–399) was convinced that the mind's impulse to representation was a hindrance to proper devotion. In the opinion of Evagrius—and iconoclasts who belonged to the same theological tradition—material images were insurmountable hurdles to contemplation of divinity.²

1. Contrary to Cameron's contention in "The Language of Images," 28, not all Christian discourse was figural. The preceding chapter sought to demonstrate the slippery character of angels' appearances and nature, and the resistance this excited among certain theologians with regard to figuring angels intellectually and materially.

2. See E.A. Clark, The Origenist Controversy. The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate (Princeton, 1992) 80ff.

Yet many Christians clearly accepted figured, material signs for contemplation and worship. This acceptance represents a mode of approach completely separate from the literalist, intellectual conception described in chapter 2. Moreover, it finds no defender of the magnitude of Epiphanius and, indeed, texts defending images of angels date only to the sixth century, after the death of Severus of Antioch. The development of attitudes to images of angels, then, would appear to conform to a pattern of practice first, followed by opposition and defense.³ However, Methodius of Olympus (d. ca. 311) described images of angels as positive testimony of honor and faith in God.⁴ The pattern of practice, opposition and defense is perhaps too generalized, then, to be allowed to characterize the period of the rise of icons. Nonetheless, this chapter seeks to outline the defense in examining texts concerning images of angels, beginning in the sixth century and concluding with a longer examination of the articulate and extensive justification of images of eighth- and ninth-century iconophiles.

APPROACHES TO SYMBOLIC IMAGES

The most influential theologian for the defense of symbolic images is Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (fl. ca. 500?). Despite the fact that these writings deal with verbal images and the comprehension of divine things through these images, all subsequent discussion of symbolic images, both verbal and visual, relied on his seminal theology.⁵ Pseudo-Dionysius explored the diverse scriptural passages that mentioned angelic epiphanies for pattern, unity and meaning, and, in his Celestial Hierarchy, he offered a comprehensive examination of God's spiritual creations within a highly structured and essentially allegorical framework. His work helped articulate approaches to material

3. The classic formulation of this point of view is E. Kitzinger, "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm," DOP 8(1954):83–150.

4. See chapter 1.

5. See the Introduction, and Cameron, "The Language of Images," 24ff., and also her, "Byzantium and the Past in the Seventh Century: The Search for Redefinition," in The Seventh Century. Change and Continuity. Proceedings of a joint French and British Colloquium held at the Warburg Institute 8–9 July 1988, ed. J. Fontaine and J.N. Hillgarth (London, 1992) 268.

images found in the epigrams examined in this chapter, and it provided a framework within which iconophile theologians could rationalize non-representational, symbolic images of angels.

Pseudo-Dionysius stated that the angels are represented in scripture as a “concession to the nature of our own mind.”⁶ He was not speaking of images, but supporters of images understood a clear link between verbal and visual symbolism.⁷ Discussion of both verbal and visual symbolism concerns the negotiation of the means by which a Christian can come to a comprehension of God. Pseudo-Dionysius discussed one such means at great length, that is the symbolic significance of the angels and their appearances. In describing the meaning of Ezekiel’s angel which appeared in the form of four animals, for instance, Pseudo-Dionysius wrote an excursus on the meaning of their appearances as these varied beasts.⁸ The celestial intelligences took these forms, he says, because they intended to communicate obliquely some knowledge of their nature and duty. The angel took the form of a lion, for instance, to express domination, strength and unconquerability; the angel is represented as an ox because it had the “ability to plough deeply the furrows of knowledge”; the form of an eagle was assumed because of the angel’s “contemplation which is freely, directly, and unswervingly turned” to the divine light; and the form of the horse was taken on because of its “obedience and docility” which corresponds to the character of the angels.⁹ By this means, the angels imitate, as much as they are able, the secret of the ineffable divinity, and envelop themselves mysteriously so as to yield divine illumination.

6. De coelesti hierarchia, II.1, La Hiérarchie Céleste, SC vol. 58, ed. G. Heil and M. de Gandillac (Paris, 1958) 74; Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, The Complete Works, trans. C. Luibheid and P. Rorem (New York, 1987) 148. This contemplation of condescending symbols is also discussed in a question and answer guide from the second half of the sixth century; see J.-C. Guy, “Un Entretien monastique sur la contemplation,” Recherches des sciences religieuses 50(1962):234–35, 238–39.

7. See, for example, Kitzinger, “The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm,” 137ff., and U. Jeck, “Ps. Dionysios Areopagites und der Bilderstreit in Byzanz: Überlegungen zur Dionysiosrezeption des Johannes von Damaskos,” Hermeneia. Zeitschrift für ostkirchliche Kunst 8/2(1992):71–80.

8. De coel. hier., XV.8, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 184–88.

9. De coel. hier., XV.8, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 185–87.

According to Pseudo-Dionysius, symbols offer the primary access to God, as they are condescendences that render God accessible to incarnate intelligences. The angels then take on forms, figures and schemata that can fall to our senses and be more readily grasped and interpreted.¹⁰

That one has reason to attribute figures to that which is without figure, and forms to that which has no form ... is not sufficient. ... They require some appropriate elevations and that which has some affinity with our nature, so that consequently we are capable of gaining ourselves the figurations, which are accessible for us. ... But it must be said also that the thing which is hidden under unrevealable and sacred enigmas is suited most perfectly to the mysterious words, and to rendering inaccessible to most people, the holy and secret truth of the otherworldly spirits. For all persons are not saints, and, as scripture informs us, not all have knowledge (I Cor. 8:7).¹¹

The symbols provided by the celestial intelligences have, therefore, an educative role for those seeking greater knowledge of God. This process of contemplation is a simultaneous act of resistance to a complacency attached to matter, and it also involves a full engagement with the symbol itself, rather than a literal interpretation of the symbol.¹² By resistance to complacency, Pseudo-Dionysius meant that one must disengage the sensible images from all signification that is base or vulgar or simply natural which could alter or obscure the divine revelation borne by the images.¹³ The correct play of the

10. See R. Roques, "Introduction," in La Hiérarchie Céleste, xxi ff.

11. De coel. hier., II.2, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 76–77.

12. Roques, "Introduction," xxi; A. Louth, Denys the Areopagite (Wilton, Conn., 1989) 46.

13. And see J. Derrida, "How to Avoid Speaking: Denials," in Languages of the Unsayable. The Play of Negativity in Literature and Literary Theory, ed. S. Budick and W. Iser, trans. K. Friedan (New York, 1989) 44: "A predicate can always conceal another predicate, or rather the nakedness of an absence of predicate—as the (sometimes indispensable) veil of a garment can at once dissimulate and reveal the very fact that it dissimulates and renders attractive at the same time. Hence the voice of an utterance can conceal another, which it then appears to quote without quoting it, presenting itself as another form, namely as a quotation of the other."

symbolism demands that the intelligence adhere openly and exclusively to the intelligible richness of the sensible images. This operation requires an effort of lucidity that discerns the true intelligible value of the image.¹⁴

The exigencies of catharsis and anagogy make humanity prefer the dissembling symbols to symbols that resemble.¹⁵ For the latter places humanity in danger of becoming attached to these things and therefore misled. With dissembling symbols, the effort of anagogy is almost inevitable and so there is no seduction or bonding. With these dissembling symbols of the angelic beings the means of interpretation is a prudent but difficult, and necessarily provisional, act of anagogy.

Every being, every element and every sensible quality can serve as a point of departure to intelligible contemplation and reveal some character of the celestial essences. The anthropomorphism of the angels is, properly speaking, a symbolic dissimulation. The angels take human form for symbolic reasons, that is, on account of humanity's powers of intellect.

But [the angels] are described in human form on account of [human] intelligence, and they have powers of sight directed upwards, and because [humans] have the upright . . . form, and the ability to lead and command according to nature, [because humans live] the least according to sensation as opposed to the other powers that lead illogical lives, and [human nature] masters all of it by the strength of its spirit, and by the dominance of the logical knowledge, and according to the free and unfettered nature of [the human] soul.¹⁶

Each symbol, then, is accessible by an act of exegesis and imparts an amount of intelligible information according to the worth and effort of the person contemplating.¹⁷ The value and the level of the symbol

14. Roques, "Introduction," xxii.

15. De coel. hier., II, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 73–87.

16. De coel. hier., XV.3, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 171–73.

17. De coel. hier., XV, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 163–91.

are bound to the value and the level of the intelligence that uses it. Symbols are, therefore, essentially “cursive” and “mobile,” varying according to the order and receptivity of the intelligence.¹⁸ Pseudo-Dionysius’s position is based on an openness to symbolic interpretation; indeed, his theology demands it.

The ultimate goal of this process of symbolic interpretation is the empty and obscure site of incomprehension, “the brilliant darkness of a hidden silence,” “the truly mysterious darkness of unknowing.”¹⁹ The goal of Pseudo-Dionysius’s negative theology has striking parallels with Evagrius’s desired state of “apatheia” (ἀπάθεια).²⁰ Evagrius stated that the proper preparation for true contemplation of God and things divine was a humble emptying of the mind of all emotion and thought, especially of the figural kind.²¹ Pure prayer and contemplation can thus be accomplished in theory but only after all contaminating sensual “images” have been vanquished. For Pseudo-Dionysius, prayer too is necessary, as “a passage, a transfer, a translation.”²² Silent contemplation of scriptural signs, “secret manifestations” of God, is the route to knowledge of transcendent reality.

The two processes of Evagrius and Pseudo-Dionysius share similar goals in silent, empty contemplation of God, but Evagrius’s absolute

18. Roques, “Introduction,” xc.

19. Respectively, De divinis nominibus, XIII.1, PG 3:977B, The Complete Works, trans. C. Luibheid and P. Roemer, 135; and De mystica theologia, I.3, PG 3:1001A, The Complete Works, trans. C. Luibheid and P. Roemer, 137. And see, in general, on the negative theology of Pseudo-Dionysius, R. Mortley, From Word to Silence. Vol. II. The Way of Negation, Christian and Greek, Theophaneia, vol. 31 (Bonn, 1986) 229ff.

20. It might be said that Maximus Confessor (ca. 580–662) was a natural heir to both of these Church Fathers, indicating that the two systems of thought were reconcilable. Maximus was largely responsible for the dissemination of Areopagite theology in the east; see J. Pelikan, “Introduction,” in Maximus Confessor, Selected Writings (New York, 1985) 6. And in his description of the spiritual life and of pure prayer, Maximus clearly owed a debt to Evagrius; see M. Viller, “Aux sources de la spiritualité de S. Maxime: les oeuvres d’Evagre le Pontique,” Revue d’ascétique et de mystique 11(1930):156–84, 239–68, 331–36.

21. See Clark, The Origenist Controversy, 83ff.

22. See, for example, De div. nom., III.1, PG 3:680D. Quote in text from Derrida, “How to Avoid Speaking,” 41, and further: “Here prayer is not a preamble, an accessory mode of access. It constitutes an essential moment, it adjusts discursive asceticism, the passage through the desert of discourse, the apparent referential vacuity which will only avoid empty deliria and prattling by addressing itself from the start to the other, to you. But to you as ‘hyperessential and more than divine Trinity.’” eschewing of signs and images as the steps to this goal is the point of departure from Pseudo-Dionysius's process of meditation on unknowable things. Pseudo-Dionysius marks a distinct path, therefore, in his simultaneous process of engagement with a symbol and denial of its literal worth. The path he described was widely influential in the sixth century and beyond. Indeed, the operations he describes influenced much of the theology developed in subsequent centuries, and later iconophile theories of devotion before material images clearly relied on Pseudo-Dionysius's description of approaches to divine things. Moreover, the influence of Pseudo-Dionysius was not restricted to abstract theological speculation; traces of his theology can also be discerned in actual practice as gleaned from a set of sixth-century epigrams.

Written about images of the Archangel Michael, these epigrams illustrate in a concrete way perceptions of images in the period immediately following Pseudo-Dionysius. They reveal a thematic thread linking Pseudo-Dionysius's theology concerning symbolic approaches to images of angels and perceptions of tangible material images. The theology and more popular understanding represented by these epigrams occupy the same conceptual ground: that an image makes material in a dissembling way an immaterial being for contemplative rather than descriptive purposes. This group of epigrams, therefore, parallels positions described in abstruse terms by iconophile theologians, and taken as a whole these different texts show a mode of gaining knowledge through images common to both theory and practice.

This small group of epigrams was composed as part of a larger anthology, gathered during the reign of Justin II, perhaps around 568, by Agathias (ca. 532–ca. 580).²³ Based on the antique model of the

23. See Alan Cameron, The Greek Anthology from Meleager to Planudes (Oxford, 1993) 16. However, R. C. McCail thought that this group of epigrams on images of angels originated outside of the cycle proper; see his "The Cycle of Agathias: New Identifications Scrutinised," Journal of Hellenic Studies 89(1969):92ff. Furthermore, McCail dates the epigrams from a period ranging from 555 to 570, against Cameron who sees them as a coherent and contemporary group. See R. C. McCail, "On the Early Career of Agathias Scholasticus," REB 28(1970):142.

Garland written by Meleager (fl. ca. 60 B.C.E.), the epigrams were apparently written by a group of educated men on set topics and in similar styles. The collection is extant only because of a compilation made in about 900 by Constantine Cephalas. Its survival is of great importance as this cycle of epigrams provides remarkable evidence of attitudes to images of angels from the period preceding Iconoclasm.

In the first place, an image of the Archangel may be intended as a thank-offering for past benefit and as a request for future aid. Agathias wrote this epigram for an image of the Archangel at the Sosthenium near Constantinople:

Aemilianus of Caria and John with him, Rufinus of Alexandria and Agathias of Asia having completed the fourth year of their legal studies, O Archangel, dedicated to thee, O Blessed One, thy painted image, praying that their future may be happy. Make thyself manifest in the direction of their hopes.²⁴

The question of materiality is raised in this epigram to the extent that the Archangel's benign presence is beseeched through the lawyers' gift of depiction. The aim of materiality, the devotional goal of this epigram, is expressed more forcefully and more paradoxically in another epigram in the group. An epigram by Agathias on another image of the Archangel also expresses gratitude for the Archangel's intervention and protection but raises important issues of perception and depiction not brought up in the Sosthenium epigram:

24. The Greek Anthology, ed. W.R. Paton, 5 vols. (London, 1927) I:35. And see Averil Cameron, Agathias (Oxford, 1970) 5. Robin Cormack has discussed this epigram in connection with a newly discovered fresco from the theatre at Aphrodisias that he dates to the sixth century; see his "The Wall Painting of St. Michael in the Theatre," in Aphrodisias Papers 2. The Theatre, a Sculptor's Workshop, Philosophers, and Coin Types, ed. R.R.R. Smith and K. T. Erim (Ann Arbor, 1991) 115. And T.F. Mathews used this epigram to describe the creation of an "interior imprint" of a spiritual reality in the Byzantine viewer; however, he neglects the symbolic quality of likenesses of angels in favor of visual engagement and involvement. See his "Psychological Dimensions in the Art of Eastern Christendom," in Art and Religion: Faith, Form and Reform, 1984 Paine Lectures in Religion, ed. O. Overby (Columbia, Mo., 1986) 12ff.

“On a picture of Theodorus the Illustrious and twice Proconsul, in which he is shown receiving the insignia of office from the Archangel in Ephesus”: Forgive us, O Archangel, for picturing thee, for thy face is invisible; this is but an offering of men. For by thy grace Theodorus hath his girdle of a Magister, and twice won for his prize the Proconsular chair. The picture testifies to his gratitude, for in return he expressed the image of thy beauty.²⁵

The difficulty inherent in depicting the Archangel, and the referential quality that necessarily results in such depictions, is significant. Although the Archangel is by nature invisible, and in this way unperceivable, the image is made according to the means available to humanity. For this reason, the image is conditional and incomplete, but the image’s provisional quality, which the epigram states, is the crucial issue. The donor apologizes for the presumption of manufacturing an undepictable subject, since the image is only an approximation, but the image was made because the Archangel has made himself manifest, in some fashion, on the donor’s behalf. Commemorating the Archangel’s invisible guidance and protection, the image was clearly an emblem of angelic aid. The iconography of the Archangel—which one may safely assume was of the winged youth as celestial minister—is a sign for this watchful and benevolent presence.

The epigrams’ significant operation is the spiritual or intellectual contemplation that the material image initiates.²⁶ Agathias’s epigram

25. The Greek Anthology, I:36. See also P. Speck, “Ein Bild des Erzengels Michael in Ephesos (Anthologia Palatina I,36),” Varia II, ΠΟΙΚΙΛΑ ΒΥΖΑΝΤΙΝΑ, vol. 6 (Bonn, 1987) 355–62; and also Alan Cameron, The Greek Anthology, 72ff. and 152ff.

26. R.C. McCail, “The Erotic and Ascetic Poetry of Agathias Scholasticus,” B 41(1971):246, rightly questions Kitzinger’s view of the process of comprehension that Agathias describes. For Kitzinger, the viewer looks at the image “as if” the figure represented were there. See “The Cult of Images Before Iconoclasm,” 147 n268. Clearly, however, Agathias’s intellectual approach uses the image as a bridge over which one travels for knowledge and communication, not as an embodiment of the model. McCail also points out that Agathias’s formulation of the passage of honor from image to prototype relies on sound patristic foundations, like the statement of Basil of Caesarea (ca. 329–379), “ἡ τῆς εἰκόνας τιμὴ ἐπὶ τὸ πρωτότυπον διαβαίνει” (De Spiritu Sancto, XVIII, Traité du Saint-Esprit, SC vol. 17 bis, ed. B. Pruche [Paris, 1968] 406).

is significant in this regard since the image is explicitly said to incite the mind to a “higher contemplation” by means of the image’s colors.²⁷ Agathias’s description of approach is paralleled by a contemporary epigram of Nilus Scholasticus. Nilus is equally aware of the difficulties involved in the capturing of a likeness and notes the “daring” quality of representation: “‘On an image of the Archangel’: How daring it is to picture the incorporeal! But yet the image leads us up to spiritual recollection of celestial beings.”²⁸ The process by which the mind is ferried to higher contemplation is stated succinctly in this epigram. The image, Nilus and Agathias both assert, is not a representation of the form of the Archangel in any essential way, but only an approximation of the formless Archangel. But by this representation of an unviewable being the image allows the viewer to reflect on the being itself. In fact, the image maintains a tentative, intellectual proximity of the ineffable being, otherwise unknowable and unapproachable. The image gives Agathias’s “confused veneration” a focus and an object. The material image provides, therefore, a paradoxical ability to conduct through the eyes a lucid contemplation of the unviewable, incomprehensible Archangel.

These epigrams ought to be seen, moreover, in the context of the increasing number of formulations of art’s role in worship in the course of the sixth century. The anagogical function of images of angels as described in these epigrams parallels the function of images in Christian worship that Hypatius of Ephesus (d. ca. 541) describes in a letter written to Julian, bishop of Atramyntium.²⁹ In Hypatius’s view, images should be admitted, albeit grudgingly, into Christian worship because they are a means by which the weaker and less spiri-

27. The Greek Anthology, I:34. On this epigram, see chapter 2.

28. The Greek Anthology, I:33.

29. See P.J. Alexander, “Hypatius of Ephesus: A Note on Worship in the Sixth Century,” HTR 45(1952):177–84, and S. Gero, “Hypatius of Ephesus on the Cult of Images,” in Christianity, Judaism and Other Greco-Roman Cults. Studies for Morton Smith at Sixty, 4 vols. (Leiden, 1975) II:208–16; and G. Lange, Bild und Wort. Die katechetischen Funktionen des Bildes in der griechischen Theologie des sechsten bis neunten Jahrhunderts, Würzburg, 1969, 44ff. The text is found in F. Diekamp, Analecta patristica. Texte und Abhandlungen zur griechischen Patristik, Orientalia christiana analecta, vol. 117 (Rome, 1938) 127ff., and in H. Thümmel, Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit, TU vol. 139 (Berlin, 1992) 320–21.

tually advanced in the community might come to some introductory knowledge of divine things. For this reason, Hypatius told his correspondent, he shuns material aids, but admits images into worship,

... because we permit each order of the faithful to be guided and led up to the divine being in a manner appropriate to it [the order] because we think that some people are guided even by these [gold, silver, etc.] towards the intelligible beauty and from the abundant light in the sanctuaries to the intelligible and immaterial light.³⁰

Hypatius also stated that the cherubim on the Ark of the Covenant were one example of God's providence condescending for the sake of the weaker members of his chosen people; in this way, God gave material guidance to know him better.³¹ The anagogical function of images as described in this letter bears striking similarities to the epigrams discussed above, and also in a general way to the neo-Platonism of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite.³² These texts describe the spiritual elevation to divinity that signs, material and verbal, can provide for Christians. Yet Hypatius clearly saw a dichotomy between more advanced spirituality and the less perfect that depends upon these material signs, which Pseudo-Dionysius does not distinguish.

Evidently, sixth-century ecclesiastics and laymen alike, taking Hypatius and Agathias as examples, were grappling with the function and meaning of images in Christian worship. Hypatius was clearly

30. Diekamp, Analecta patristica, 128.26–30; trans. Alexander, "Hypatius of Ephesus," 180.

31. Alexander, "Hypatius of Ephesus," 179–80. The example of the cherubim presages the iconophile emphasis on God's prescription for the construction of the Ark and the cherubim; see below.

32. Kitzinger thought the theology of Pseudo-Dionysius an important factor in the formulation of image theory such as Hypatius expounded in this letter to Julian. See "The Cult of Images Before Iconoclasm," 137–38. Jean Gouillard, "Hypatios d'Éphèse ou du Pseudo-Denys à Théodore Studite," REB 19(1961):72ff., was also struck by the coincidence in thought regarding symbolism and ascent to higher mysteries in both Hypatius and Pseudo-Dionysius. However, Gero sees only a general knowledge of platonic concepts in Hypatius, and concluded that Hypatius was drawing from the same well without direct dependence on Pseudo-Dionysius. See "Hypatius of Ephesus on the Cult of Images," 211–12.

ambivalent on the ultimate value of images but open-minded and willing to admit the usefulness of images in Christian pedagogy. Slightly later, Agathias is quite certain of the purpose of images in the elevation of the Christian mind toward divine things. The use of images as a means by which the worshipper remembers and venerates the person depicted is also a theme of the anti-Jewish literature of the seventh century, and it becomes a standard response to accusations of idolatry from non-Christians and iconoclasts alike. Pseudo-Athanasius, for instance, wrote that Christians do not honor the icons themselves, “But we only show forth our soul’s condition (σχέσιν) and love toward the form seen on the icon.”³³ And in his Disputatio adversus Judaeos, Anastasius Sinaïtes (d. ca. 700) said that Christians honor and imitate Christ and the saints through a material image as the Jews honor the power of the word through a material book.³⁴

The epigrams of Agathias and Nilus take a similar position with regard to honor passing to the prototype. They also show in their emphasis on “higher contemplation” of incomprehensible angels certain affinities with philosophical ideas associated with pagan neo-Platonism. For example, the language used by Porphyry (ca. 232–ca. 303) to rationalize the worship of pagan statues in his treatise

33. Quaestiones ad Antiochum ducem, XXXIX, PG 28:621B–D. See also Leontius of Neapolis, preserved in the writings of John of Damascus, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III Contra imaginum calumniatores orationes tres, PTS vol. 17, ed. P.B. Kotter (Berlin, 1975) 156–58; V. Déroche, “L’Apologie contre les Juifs de Léontios de Néapolis,” TM 12(1994):79ff.; On the Divine Images. Three Apologies Against Those Who Attack the Divine Images, trans. D. Anderson (Crestwood, N.Y., 1980) 41–42; Trophies of Damascus (Les Trophées de Damas, PO vol. 15/2, ed. G. Bardy [Paris, 1920; rp. Louvain, 1973] 78.11ff.); the Armenian John Mayragometsi (S. Der Nersessian, “Une apologie des images du septième siècle,” B 17[1944/5]:60; and the Dialogue between the Jews, Papiscus and Philo, and a Monk (Dialogue between a Christian and a Jew entitled ANTIBOLH ΠΑΠΙΣΚΟΥ ΚΑΙ ΦΙΛΩΝΟΥ ΙΟΥΔΑΙΩΝ ΠΡΟΣ ΜΟΝΑΧΟΝ ΤΙΝΑ, ed. A.C. McGiffert [Marburg, 1889] 51–52).

See Lange, Bild und Wort, 188ff., K.A. Corrigan, Visual Polemics in the Ninth-Century Byzantine Psalters (Cambridge, 1992) 40ff., and V. Déroche, “L’authenticité de l’Apologie contre les Juifs de Léontios de Néapolis,” Bulletin de correspondance hellénique 110(1986):661ff.

34. PG 89:1233C–6A. John Mayragometsi compares the ink used to write scripture and the pigments used to depict the saints. See Der Nersessian, “Une apologie des images du septième siècle,” 66–67.

“Concerning Idols” is closer to the epigrams’ conception of images of angels than the down-to-earth polemic of texts against Jews. Porphyry stated that pagan statues are simply wood and stone, but also images suited for human perception through which the learned are able to comprehend the deity.³⁵ This formulation of the use of images for gaining knowledge of transcendent beings is a clear forerunner of the philosophical defense of images of the sixth-century epigrams.³⁶ As he may well have been Macarius Magnes’s “opponent” in the Apocriticus, Porphyry’s views on symbolic images are directly relevant here. One can clearly discern in this pagan-Christian dialogue of the fourth century the beginnings of the later disagreement between neo-Platonic ideas of symbolic images and intellectual, non-material worship.³⁷ In fact, the differences between Porphyry and Macarius Magnes seen in that dialogue can be taken as emblematic

35. See J. Bidez, Vie de Porphyre. Le philosophe néoplatonicien (Gand and Leipzig, 1913; rp. Hildesheim and New York, 1980) 143ff., text 1*–23*, F. Börtzler, Porphyrius’ Schrift von den Götterbildern (Erlangen, 1908) and C. Clerc, Les théories relatives au culte des images chez les auteurs grecs du II^e siècle après J.-C. (Paris, 1915) 253ff. The text on pagan statues is preserved in the third book of Eusebius of Caesarea’s Praeparatio Evangelica, GCS vol. 43, 2d ed., ed. K. Mras (Berlin, 1975). The connection between pagan defense of statues and Christian defense of image worship was noted by A. Grabar, L’iconoclasm byzantin. Dossier archéologique (Paris, 1957) 138ff., and P.J. Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople. Ecclesiastical Policy and Image Worship in the Byzantine Empire (Oxford, 1958) 27ff.

36. See Lange, Bild und Wort, 182ff. Leslie Brubaker, “Icons Before Iconoclasm?” in Morfologie sociali e culturali in Europa fra tarda antichità e alto medioevo, Settimane vol. 45, 2 vols. (Spoleto, 1998) II:1226–27, 1231, argues for the increased importance of the transparent image in the mid-sixth century, but a case can surely be made for continuity of this idea in Late Antiquity.

37. A. Harnack, Kritik des Neues Testaments von einem griechischen Philosophen des 3. Jahrhunderts. Die in Apocriticus des Macarius Magnes enthaltene Streitschrift, TU vol. 37/3 (Leipzig, 1911); G. Bardy, in DTC IX:1459. Macarius’s opponent defended pagan statues in this way: “Since it is then acknowledged that the angels share in the divine nature, those that make proper reverence to the respected gods do not think that it is the god, the image that is fashioned out of wood or stone or bronze, nor if some portion of the image should be cut off, do they believe that a portion of God’s power is subtracted. It should be called to mind that the images and temples were constructed by the ancients, that on account of coming hither the believers were brought to remembrance of God, when they go there, and being purified generally and offering devotion and supplication, and for what things they desired they asked from the gods. For even if someone makes an image of a friend, certainly one does not think that his friend is in it nor does one think that a part of the body is enclosed in the sections of the representation, but honour for the friend is shown through the image” (Blondel 200.12–22).

as the conceptual differences generally separating the defenders and opponents of images of angels under discussion in this study. The writers of the epigrams were clearly influenced by neo-Platonic ideas on images in their emphasis on the ascent of the mind to a higher reality through matter; in particular, Pseudo-Dionysius provided these writers with a suitably Christian framework for these neo-Platonic concepts. While these writers of the sixth-century epigrams, as well as Hypatius of Ephesus, have real affinities with the anti-Jewish theologians of the seventh century, they used more rarefied and subtle descriptions of intellectual processes involved in viewing images derived from direct contact with neo-Platonist ideas.³⁸

Agathias's epigrams are also marked by an element of defensiveness that leads one to think that the place of images in worship and devotion was not resolved in every Christian's mind. Images had been perceived more and more as incontrovertible proofs and venerable recollections by some Christians,³⁹ but the opposition discussed in the previous chapter reveals that certain church officials resisted with equal force the use of images in worship.⁴⁰ In this context, Agathias was not alone in seeing the representation of angels as "daring." And in the sixth century, John of Gaza also wrote of the undaunted artists who strove to depict such bodiless beings. In his description of paintings in a bath house at Gaza, John describes the artists as "boiling with boldness" and "made drunk in mind" in delineating the

38. The relation between pagan apologetics, such as Porphyry's defense of images, and Byzantine image theory was described with great economy by N. H. Baynes, "Idolatry and the Early Church," in his Byzantine and Other Studies (London, 1955) 116–43.

39. For example, A. D. Kartsonis, in Anastasis. The Making of an Image (Princeton, 1986) 58–59, discusses Anastasius Sinaïtes's view that images are theological proofs that cannot be falsified. Also, Canon 82 of the Council of Trullo (692) stated a belief in the ability of art to express truths about the divinity and incarnation of Christ: "in order that the perfect should be set down before everybody's eyes even in painting, we decree that [the figure of] the Lamb, Christ our God, who removes the sins of the world, should henceforward be set up in human form on images also, in the place of the ancient lamb, inasmuch as we comprehend thereby the sublimity of the humiliation of God's Word, and are guided to the recollection of His life in flesh, His Passion and His salutary Death and the redemption which has thence accrued to the world." See Mansi XI:977BC; trans. C. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire. 312–1453. Sources and Documents (Toronto, 1986) 139–40.

40. See Kitzinger, "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm," 139, and McCail, "The Erotic and Ascetic Poetry of Agathias Scholasticus," 241ff.

heavenly powers, that is “to lend body to bodiless nature.”⁴¹ Clearly, in the minds of some Christians, representing angels existed as an issue that was propelled by material images on view and in devotion. The embodying of angelic powers, begun in Christian art as early as the second century, remained an issue into the sixth century and grew in importance as images became increasingly prominent in cult practice. The issue of how one came to knowledge of angelic beings persisted as an element in the debates over worship and images of the period preceding Iconoclasm, and drew particular attention when the debates reached a head in the mid-eighth century as iconophile theologians turned their attention to the theory and practice of devotion to images.

THE ICONOPHILE THEORY OF SYMBOLIC IMAGES OF ANGELS

Commentary on images of angels did not appear again until the eighth-/ninth-century iconophile defense arose in reaction to the iconoclastic attack on religious images. The elaborate defense of images arose as circumstances demanded, but the striking parallels between iconophile theology and the epigrams discussed above must be seen as a sign of continuity in basic approach to images of angels. In the debates over worship and symbolism that were central to the development of Byzantine theology in the sixth and seventh centuries, a consistent feature was an acceptance of images of angels as means, albeit partial, to a comprehension of God’s spiritual servants. Dependent on earlier writings, iconophile theology is the most comprehensive treatment of the significance of such images in worship, and because of its articulation and extensiveness this image theory needs detailed examination. Moreover, theory helps shed light on the meaning of the ninth-century restoration of the mosaics of the angelic powers in the Church of the Dormition at Nicaea (Iznik), and this chapter ends by examining these mosaics with regard to the exchange between word and image.

41. See P. Friedländer, Johannes von Gaza und Paulus Silentarius. Kunstbeschreibungen justinianischer Zeit (Leipzig and Berlin, 1912; rp. Hildesheim and New York, 1969) 135.12–136.25. Abstract theological concepts, like the Trinity, are also depicted in this program. According to John of Gaza, a cross within three concentric circles referred to the Trinity. See Friedländer, Johannes von Gaza und Paulus Silentarius, 137.41–138.44; and H. Maguire, Earth and Ocean. The Terrestrial World in Early Byzantine Art (University Park and London, 1987) 12–13, 20–21. This symbolic mode of depicting the Trinity parallels Philoxenus’s scruples concerning depiction of the Holy Spirit, as discussed in the previous chapter; see McCail, “The Erotic and Ascetic Poetry of Agathias Scholasticus,” 245, who speculated that the misgivings of Philoxenus of Mabbug, Severus of Antioch and John of Gaza concerning images of angels may have derived from the influence of the Christian university at Gaza.

That images could lead viewers from the visible to knowledge of the invisible, however incomplete, was a primary defense of images for iconophiles.⁴² The faculty of sight was a necessary element in iconophile justifications of images in worship, and, although the ultimate goal was to transcend the material assistance that images afforded, vision was defined as a fundamental means of facilitating knowledge. John of Damascus (ca. 675–ca. 750), for instance, was strongly in favor of the comprehension that comes through the faculty of sight: “Sensation is the strength of the soul returned from matter, and therefore discernment. Sensory moreover are the organs.... The first sense is sight.”⁴³ Hearing and the other faculties follow in descending order of importance. John of Damascus was the first great opponent of iconoclastic doctrine and for that was anathematized at the iconoclastic council of Hieria in 754. John of Damascus’s image theory was perhaps not as sophisticated as that of such later opponents of iconoclasm as Nicephorus (ca. 750–828), Theodore of Stoudios (759–826) and Photius (ca. 810–d. after 893), but almost all the arguments regarding angels found in these ninth-century theologians can be seen in some form in John of Damascus’s work. Through John of Damascus, the general reliance on the theology of Pseudo-Dionysius is evident in iconophile theory. As John and other iconophiles stated, images may serve as sensible symbols, as Pseudo-Dionysius put it, that lead the worshipper to comprehension of the divine, because of the particular qualities of the sense of the sight.

42. For instance, in the eighth-century Adversus Constantinum Caballinum, the process is set out in one passage in the form of a fictional dialogue between an iconophile and an iconoclast. In the dialogue, the iconophile rhetorically asks the iconoclast how he himself would teach a stranger all the mysteries of their faith. The iconophile protests that one cannot be led to the higher mysteries of the invisible things without some kind of material prop or demonstration, "For if you said to him, 'It is invisible,' what has he seen that he should put trust in your conscience and faith?" The first thing one must do is build on sensible things so that in this way, little by little, one is led to invisible things. The didactic function of the material image is clearly emphasized in this passage, since the education and conversion of the stranger is accomplished by means of the images themselves. See Adversus Constantinum Caballinum, X, PG 95:325C–8B, and also P. Speck, Ich bin's nicht, Kaiser Konstantin ist es gewesen. Die Legenden vom Einfluß des Teufels, des Juden und des Moslem auf den Ikonoklasmus, ΠΟΙΚΙΛΑ ΒΥΖΑΝΤΙΝΑ, vol. 10 (Bonn, 1990) 402. The text begins this way: "You take him into the church. You reveal to him the world which surrounds him. You open up for him the forms of the figures of the holy icons. This unbeliever sees and he says, 'Who is this crucified? Who is this rising and who is trampling upon the head of this old man?' Do you not teach him from the icons, saying, 'This crucified man, he is the son of God, who was crucified for the sins of the world? This risen man, it is he who raises the forefather of the world, Adam, who fell because of disobedience, and he went into Hades, where he was held these many years kept in chains and by unbreakable bars in these nether regions?' And in this way do you lead this man in to the knowledge of God. Again, you lead him to the font of the baptistery. And he sees only water in the font, you the faithful one behold the water, and see light and spirit. When he has partaken of baptism, then he takes the truth from the senses, and applies them to the invisible ungenerated. If you offer the mystery of the body and blood of the Saviour, he sees bread and wine only. And you see the body and blood of Christ which flows from the undefiled source. And if he becomes worthy, he partakes with you." On this text, see also M.-F. Auzépy, "L'Adversus Constantinum Caballinum et Jean de Jérusalem," BS 56(1995):323–38.

43. Expositio fidei, II.18, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II Expositio fidei, PTS vol. 12, ed. P.B. Kotter (Berlin, 1973) 83–84. John of Damascus is typical, in this way, of iconophile stress on the importance of the sense of sight. For instance, the author of the Adversus Constantinum Caballinum, again, is explicit about the importance of sight and images for convincing the viewer of the truth and magnitude of doctrine; the means is again an engagement with an “iconic imprint,” but with real emotional compulsion. See VIII, PG 95:324C–5A. The Second Council of Nicaea in 787 was equally explicit about the role of the images and sight in spiritual development. The Fathers of the Council stated that the outlines and the representations of the apostles, martyrs, saints and holy persons are there “so we are led to remember, attend, and participate in their holiness.” See Mansi XIII:132E. Elsewhere it is stated that hearing of the appearance of the angel to the Virgin we call the event to mind, and yet “seeing the icon in this way we consider the consequences of the thing more manifestly.” See Mansi XIII:269C. And, finally, Nicephorus defended visual perception but in a more “scholastic” way, according to his method of discourse, “For we all know that sight is the most honoured and necessary of the senses and it may allow apprehension of what falls under perception more distinctly and sharply; for ‘it is the nature of that which is heard to travel less quickly than that which is seen,’ and seeing will attract faster than the other senses since it also has the attractive power to a larger degree.” See Refutatio et eversio, 119, Nicephori patriarchae constantinopolitani Refutatio et eversio definitionis synodalis anni 815, Corpus Christianorum. Series Graeca, vol. 33, ed. J. Featherstone (Louvain, 1997) 211.56–62, trans. Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, 211.

If iconophiles considered the anagogical and didactic function of images to be securely established, they needed to address other equally pressing iconoclastic accusations. In particular, Christological issues, which iconoclasts had already raised, became central for iconophiles;⁴⁴ and images of angels were used primarily as supports for the iconophile position on representing Christ. If this central Christological issue was the reason for the introduction of angels into these arguments, defense of images of angels soon diverged from the Christological path into new territory. It will become clear in the course of this chapter that this divergence occurred because of Christ's earthly life which the angels could not share.

In John of Damascus's theology, which typifies iconophile writing, Christ's life incarnate is the primary justification for representation. In turn, the incarnation had renewed a bond between God and humanity and initiated a new dispensation that images of Christ assert. The angels were brought into these arguments because they too appeared on earth and were apprehended in time and place. Description of the means by which their formless and immaterial nature was apprehended is the point at which justification of their images parts from the defense of Christ's images.

Important for the defense of Christ's representability was the definition of circumscription. The opponents of images had equated circumscription and painting so that the two were inseparable. This equation effectively ruled out the possibility of making images of Christ since the making of an image would presume that an essential aspect of the subject had been captured. And for God who is ineffable, capturing any part of his essence on an image is clearly impossible: God is simply uncircumscribable. From the beginning, then, the iconophile counterattack was centered on the definition of circumscription as distinct from painting, and circumscription, therefore, became a primary support in iconophile theory for the ability to represent spiritual beings.

44. Christology was central for western image theory, too, although anagogy was not a prescribed method of viewing. See H. L. Kessler, "Real Absence: Early Medieval Art and the Metamorphosis of Vision," in Morfologie sociali e culturali in Europa fra tarda antichità e alto medioevo, Settimane vol. 45, 2 vols. (Spoleto, 1998) II:1157–1213.

John of Damascus first discussed circumscription as a chief defense for the representations of Christ.⁴⁵ Angels were invoked and discussed in this connection in order to support the Christological argument for images. Angels substantiated the depiction of Christ because they are intellectual and bodiless, but apprehended in time and space, and thus circumscribable. Despite their nature, therefore, they can be depicted. John of Damascus wrote:

They are circumscribable. For when they are in heaven they are not on earth; and when they are sent to earth by God, they do not remain in heaven. They are not bound by walls or doors or keys or seals. For they are unbounded. I say that they are invisible; for not as they are do they appear to the worthy to whom God desires that they appear, but they see [the angels] altered, just as they are able to perceive. For only [God] is truly unbounded, only he is uncreated. For all creation is made finite by being created by God.⁴⁶

However, angels have particular problems attendant upon their nature since they have no visible form and change according to the situation:

God created them in his own image, of nature bodiless, wind, as it were, or immaterial fire, as the divine David said, “[God] who

45. Orationes de imaginibus tres, II.5, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 71–72; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 52–53: “If we attempted to make an image of the invisible God, this would be sinful indeed. It is impossible to portray one who is without body: invisible, uncircumscribed, and without form. Again if we made images of humans and believed them to be gods, and adored them as if they were so, we would be truly impious. We do neither of these things. But we are not mistaken if we make the image of God incarnate, who was seen on earth in the flesh, associated with humanity, and in his unspeakable goodness assumed the nature, feeling, form, and colour of our flesh. For we yearn to see how he looked, as the apostle says, ‘Now we see through a glass darkly’ (I Cor. 13:12). Now the icon is also a dark glass, fashioned according to the limitations of our physical nature.”

46. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II, 45. And also, “Physical things which have shape, bodies which are circumscribed, and have colour, are suitable subjects for image-making. Nevertheless, even if nothing physical or fleshly may be attributed to an angel, or a soul, or a demon, it is still possible to depict and circumscribe them according to their nature. For they are intellectual beings, and are believed to be present invisibly and to operate spiritually” (De imag. or., III.24, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 130–31; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 78).

maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire” (Ps. 104:4). [And he made them] ethereal, and ardent, and fervent, and incisive, and penetrating, according to the divine will, calling them servants, and ascendent, and free from all knowledge of material things.⁴⁷

According to John of Damascus, the angels are intellects, ceaselessly moving, who are in places which are intelligible. But their nature is such that they cannot be circumscribed corporeally, he said, as they are not formed corporeally by nature, nor are they three dimensional. Rather, they appear and perform intellectually where they are commanded to be by God, and nowhere else.⁴⁸ Unlike Christ they have no stable, earthly form, and yet, since they are still within the boundaries of John of Damascus’s definition of circumscription, they may be depicted. John of Damascus’s definition depends largely on the ability of the angels to occupy place, that is, to be corporeal enough to have limit and circumference:

And the angel while he is contained in a place somatically, has form and outline. It is said that he is in a place, because he is present intellectually and operates according to his nature, and is not elsewhere, but is circumscribed in that way intellectually, there in that place where he operates. For it is not possible according to this for him to operate in different places. Only God can operate everywhere at once. And the angel, quick by nature, and traveling speedily and readily, operates in different places. God being ubiquitous and over everything, by this operates differently by a single, simple operation.⁴⁹

It is characteristic of angelology, and iconophiles were no exception, that the distinction between God and his messengers must be maintained, as well as the discrimination of the nature of humanity and of the angels.

47. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II, 45.

48. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II, 47.

49. Exp. fid., I.13, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II, 38.

Therefore the angel is an intellectual being in perpetual motion, of free will, bodiless, serving God, having received an immortal nature according to grace, of which nature the form and definition is known only to the Creator. It is said that an angel is bodiless and immaterial but only in relation to us. For everything measured against God, who alone is incomparable, is found base and material. God alone is naturally immaterial and bodiless.⁵⁰

Because they share some spiritual characteristics with the divine nature, however, angels were useful parallels for the entry of Christ into the world. This parallel supported the iconophile contention that divinity can be represented because it had appeared on earth. Angels occupy the middle area—as a kind of third body—in nature somewhere between God and humanity, but with a nature not fully determinable. If beings as immaterial and unparticipating as the angels can be circumscribed and depicted, then Christ incarnate should surely be circumscribed as human, and depicted as such.

The notion of circumscribability of the angels was derived from a context not properly concerned with iconophile theology nor properly speaking with Christology, but rather with the problematic nature and role of the angels.⁵¹ John of Damascus's innovation was to

50. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos, II, 45.

51. For instance, Gennadius of Marseilles, who died between 492 and 505, wrote that all creatures are to some extent corporeal, even the intellectual creatures of God. The proof of this is that all these creatures can be circumscribed in place, just as the soul which is enclosed in flesh and the demons who are in nature similar to the angels. Only God however is truly incorporeal and invisible by nature. God is rightly thought to be incorporeal because he is everywhere and infuses all creation with his presence (De ecclesiasticis dogmatibus, XI, PL 58:984A).

And in the fifth century, Faustus Rhegiensis wrote in a similar vein, "I would not even doubt that the angels are in places, who are certainly now compassed by the heavens, now borne by the empty space of the ether, now descending to earth; who the divine sermon describes in the vision of the patriarch ascending and descending, at any rate as if they were not in one place; but they are not able to be present everywhere and by ascent and descent depart. The most blessed Gabriel himself, who is known to stand before God himself, when he announced to Mary that the Lord was to be mingled with flesh, and when he assisted the mother under divine vigilance, without a doubt he was not in heaven, he was not flying somewhere over Mary, and he was not filling that great diffuse emptiness of the endless ether, but he was occupying that place, in which he was. Since it is like that, anything that occupies space is a body, how could someone not be confined to a place who is sent from recognize the angels and their circumscription as a positive support for Christ's circumscription. The link with these qualities of circumscription and the making of images had not yet been developed to the same degree as it would be by ninth-century theologians, but the essential link had been made by John of Damascus a century or so previously.

The iconophiles arrived at a conclusion concerning the relation of angels' images to their bodiless models by examining art authorized and produced under the Old Covenant. They established an iconophile argument of the divinely ordained worship of images, and the relation of image and prototype that God himself stated, by referring to God's commands to Moses in Exodus. Iconoclasts had cited God's injunction not to make graven images (Ex. 20:4) as an argument against Christian images at the first stage of Iconoclasm in the second quarter of the eighth century. This charge, and the iconophile response, is not particular to the Iconoclast controversy but was an extension of the pagan-Jewish "debates," as argued in such seventh-century anti-Jewish texts of Stephen of Bostra and Leontius of Neapolis.⁵² Indeed, John of Damascus cited both these theologians in his treatise directed against the attackers of images.⁵³ place to place, and as if the body is transported by movement and ascent, descends with effort, moves with mobility, goes, returns, is remote, and descends again" (Epistolae, III, in Fausti Reiensis Praeter sermones pseudo-eusebianos opera, Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, vol. 21, ed. A. Engelbrecht [Prague, Vienna and Leipzig, 1891] 178).

The issue of circumscription continued to be discussed throughout the Byzantine period in examinations of angels' nature and their role in the cosmic hierarchy. For instance, see Nicetas Stethatos (1005?–ca. 1090), in Opusculum et lettres, SC vol. 81, ed. J. Darrouzès (Paris, 1961) 252, and Symeon of Thessalonike (d. 1429), Responsa ad Gabrielem Pentapolitanum, III, PG 155:841A.

52. See Corrigan, Visual Polemics, 33ff.

53. Stephen of Bostra in De imag. or., III.71–73, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 174. See also G. Mercati, Opere minori, Studi e testi, vol. 76 (Vatican City, 1937) 202–206, and A. Alexakis, "Stephen of Bostra: Fragmenta Contra Judaeos (CPG 7790). A New Edition," JöB 43(1993):45–60, text at 51ff.

Leontius of Neapolis in De imag. or., III.84–89, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 178–81, Déroche, "L'Apologie contre les Juifs," 79ff. Leontius was also cited at Nicaea II; see Mansi XIII:44B ff., and Déroche, "L'Apologie contre les Juifs," 66ff.

See also the seventh-century Armenian defense of John Mayragometsi, in Der Nersessian, "Une apologie des images du septième siècle," 59.

The cherubim, as paradigms of angelic beings, occupy a central place in iconophile rationalizations of images, and angels generally become implicated in these rationalizations because of the cherubim's prominent role in the iconophile version of the Christian history of art. The responses of both the Christian combatants in these anti-Jewish texts and the iconophile theologians directly implicate images of angels and so brought the example of the cherubim to the fore in iconophile responses. The iconophile rebuttal, as in the anti-Jewish texts, was to cite scripture in return, principally God's command to Moses to construct the Ark of the Covenant (Ex. 25:22): "And there will I meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy seat from between the two cherubims which are upon the Ark of the testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel." God's specific command for the Ark, with lengthy, explicit instructions on its manufacture, was presented as a typology of Christian art. John of Damascus cited the tabernacle as an injunction for the creation of material images for Christians, and he introduced Bezaleel as the archetypical artist inspired by the spirit of God. John of Damascus referred to Exodus (31:1–5) for support:

And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, See, I have called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah: and I have filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship, to devise cunning works, to work in gold, and in silver and in brass, and in cutting of stones for setting, and in carving of timber, to work in all manner of workmanship.

And John of Damascus continued by citing the gathering of the material for Moses's construction of the Ark (Ex. 35:4–10), and then rhetorically asked if this manufacture of images was not done according to God's will: "Behold the handiwork of humanity becoming the likeness of the cherubim! How can you make the law a reason for refusing to do what the law itself commands?" He concluded that because Christ had become human the ancient commandment against idols had been annulled.⁵⁴

The cherubim were directly mentioned by God in his specifications for the Ark (Ex. 25:18–20), and the cherubim were the most important example for iconophiles generally of an explicit command by God to produce figured images.⁵⁵ Nicephorus used the artistic typology of the Ark as a sign of the divine origins of image making. The cherubim that were placed upon the Ark, in this way, became for Nicephorus a primary focus in the argument for images deriving from scriptural precedent. Moreover, Nicephorus in his discussion of the cherubim used them as the paradigms of the nature of angelic beings. The cherubim were placed high in his heavenly hierarchy by the necessity of his argument, in a position which is closest to God in station and image. At certain points in his discussion of cherubim, Nicephorus skated dangerously close to heretical angelology since Christ was seriously underestimated as the principal agent of mediation between God and humanity.⁵⁶

Yet the consequent immateriality of the cherubim's nature was another way for Nicephorus to bridge the gap between the difficulty of

54. De imag. or., I.16, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 92; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 25. And see also, in the same vein, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 96–101. And on the question of the Tabernacle and the iconophile defense of images, see S. Dufrenne, “Une illustration ‘historique,’ inconnue, du Psautier du Mont-Athos, Pantocrator No. 61,” CA 15(1965):83–95, H. L. Kessler, “Through the Temple Veil: The Holy Image in Judaism and Christianity,” Kairos 32/33(1990/1):60ff., and Corrigan, Visual Polemics, 33ff.

55. For a use of the cherubim to underpin iconophile arguments, beyond those discussed infra, see The Letter of the Three Patriarchs to Emperor Theophilus and Related Texts, ed. J. A. Munitiz, J. Chrysostomides, E. Harvalia-Crook and Ch. Dendrinos (Camberley, 1997) 33.5–16 (7.e).

The cherubim were also a concern of western programmers and theologians. See L. Nees, “Image and Text: Excerpts from Jerome’s ‘De Trinitate’ and the Maestas Domini Miniature of the Gundohinus Gospels,” Viator 18(1987):11–17, A. Grabar, “Les mosaïques de Germigny-des-Prés,” in his L’art de la fin de l’Antiquité et du Moyen Âge, 3 vols. (Paris, 1968) II:995–1006, and A. Freeman, “Theodulf of Orleans and the Libri Carolini,” Speculum 32(1957):663–705.

56. See V. N. Giannopoulos, “Η περὶ ἁγγέλων διδασκαλία τοῦ Πατριάρχου καὶ Ὁμολογητοῦ Νικηφόρου Α΄ (+829),” Θεολογία 44(1973):328. On Nicephorus’s angelology, see also J. Travis, In Defense of the Faith. The Theology of Patriarch Nikephoros of Constantinople (Brookline, Mass., 1984) 30–43.

apprehension, which might seem to be incompatible with circumscription, and the fact of representation as commanded by God himself. The quality of the cherubim, and the rest of the angelic hierarchy, is such that humanity is incapable of perceiving them directly; their true nature is unviewable.⁵⁷ And yet God has allowed them, by means of a divine condescension, to be depicted in a “terrestrial impression.”⁵⁸ These “impressions” are clearly distinct from Christ’s own appearance on earth in which he was really made flesh and suffered as a human being.⁵⁹ In this view, images of angels are transcriptions of angelic appearances in a dissimulating way; they denote only the symbolic condescension and alteration of form for inferior human perception.

Aware of the distinctions between images of angels and Christ, John of Damascus and Nicephorus and other iconophile theologians were compelled to rationalize the obvious disjuncture between angels’ formlessness and their form on images. John of Damascus described the mutability of the angels in this way, “Therefore [the angelic nature] is a logical nature, both intellectual and autonomous, changeable at will or inclination.”⁶⁰ And also, “They are transformed for such things as the Lord God wills, and in this way they appear to humanity and reveal holy mysteries to it.”⁶¹ Despite the fact that the angels are changeable, unpredictable and ultimately un-

57. Apologeticus pro sacris imaginibus, 70, PG 100:769A, “For you might say somehow like this, as we know well, that the godly cherubim since they are invisible by nature, are scarcely perceptible by humanity.”

58. Humanity is incapable of seeing intelligible beings like the angels directly, and out of his beneficence God has commanded, “that the most blessed aspects of the heavenly powers are made manifest in symbolic impressions” (Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:777C). Furthermore the command given to Moses in Ex. 25:40 is an example of God’s providence. The cherubim mediate “the beneficent progressions of divine providence to others positioned below them and take on likenesses because of the function they perform, and in these, which are likenesses made on earth, are allowed due to divine condescension” (Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:776A).

59. On the opacity of images of Christ for Theodore of Stoudios, see G. Peers, “Breathless, Speechless Images: On the Chalke Gate Epigram,” in Hommages Margaret Head Thomson, Cahiers des études anciennes, vol. 32, ed. L. Finnette and A. P. Booth (Trois Rivières, Québec, 1998) 111–12.

60. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos, II, 45.

61. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos, II, 47.

knowable, John of Damascus justified their images as allusive and symbolic signs.

God wills that we should not be totally ignorant of bodiless creatures, and so he clothed them with forms and shapes, and used images comprehensible to our nature, material forms which could be seen by the spiritual nature of the mind. From these we make images and representations, for how else could the cherubim be shown as having form?⁶²

According to John of Damascus, images of angels are made with wings because these images are comprehensible to inferior human perception. Human perception is able to approach the image at a spiritual and not a literal level, in order to unlock the meaning behind its enigmatic demonstration of angelic nature. In this passage, John of Damascus gave a definition of relation of image and prototype wherein images have no ability to describe their model visually, only to provide intellectual means for the viewer to apprehend spiritually an otherwise unknowable creature.

Defining the precise quality of the relation between images and their prototypes, and consequently what this quality meant for understanding images, was an especially knotty problem in defending the representations of angels. John of Damascus's definition of relation determined, to a certain extent, the course of the theological discussion. For iconoclasts, of course, any relation of prototype to image was considered impossible because iconoclasts defined a true image as consubstantial with the prototype. John of Damascus, in contrast, denied that the image was able to have any essential relation with its prototype.

An image is of like character with its prototype, but with a certain difference. It is not like the archetype in every way. The Son is the living, essential, and precisely similar image of the invisible God, 62. De imag. or., III.24, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos, 132; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 79.

bearing the entire father within himself, equal to him in all things, except that he is begotten by him, the begetter.⁶³

The first kind of image for John of Damascus is the natural image.⁶⁴ The other images, and John of Damascus enumerated six more, are non-essential, artificial images.⁶⁵ The fourth kind includes the angels who do not relate to their images essentially, but rather symbolically and intangibly:

These [images] give us a faint apprehension of God and the angels where otherwise we would have none, because it is impossible for us to think immaterial things unless we can envision analogous shapes, as the great and holy Dionysius the Areopagite has said.⁶⁶

John of Damascus stated that the image and prototype are related in the case of the angels and God only in an indistinct and referential way, that affords human intellect some glimpse of incomprehensible matters. Images are therefore an important means by which knowledge of God, and of his manifestations and creations, is initiated and increased. According to John of Damascus, images are an incomplete but necessary reference and aid to better knowledge of the unknowable things of God:

Again, visible things are corporeal models which provide a vague understanding of intangible things. Holy scripture describes God and the angels as having descriptive form, and the same blessed Dionysius teaches us why. Anyone would say that our inability im-

63. De imag. or., I.11, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 83–84; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 19.

64. De imag. or., III.15ff., Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 126ff.; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 74ff.

65. On these types, see the remarks of M. Barasch, Icon. Studies in the History of an Idea (New York and London, 1992) 220–36. One should add that his discussion of angels, ibid., 236–43, along with J. Pelikan, Imago Dei. The Byzantine Apologia for Icons (Princeton, 1990) 153–82, has much usefulness.

66. De imag. or., III.21, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 128; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 76.

mediately to direct our thoughts to contemplation of higher things makes it necessary that familiar everyday media be utilized to give suitable form to what is formless, and make visible what cannot be depicted, so that we are able to construct understandable analogies.⁶⁷

Like Pseudo-Dionysius, John of Damascus argued for material signs as a necessary step to intellectual contemplation of immaterial reality. Paradoxically, “descriptive form” which does not have an essential relation to angels or God is provided for humanity’s weak understanding so that analogies proper to human intellect can be made.

Nicephorus asserted a highly intellectualized association of image and angelic prototype that was stricter and more articulated than that offered by John of Damascus.⁶⁸ He defined the angelic nature as “simple and incomposite”;⁶⁹ furthermore, the angels are “unseeable by corporeal eyes,” and bodiless and invisible and without form.⁷⁰ The angels are invisible exactly because they are “beyond and unparticipating in their shapes and forms.”⁷¹ However, the angels’ special quality of unviewability compelled Nicephorus to reconcile the many instances of appearances in scripture and angelic nature.⁷² Nicephorus thus claimed that the angels did not reveal their real nature, but rather effected a symbolic transformation that was analogous to the particular need of the moment.⁷³ God himself has ordained and created the angels because he knows well humanity’s

67. De imag. or., I.11, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 84–85; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 20.

68. See C. von Schönborn, L’icône du Christ. Fondements théologiques élaborées entre le Ier et le IIer Concile de Nicée (325–787) (Fribourg, 1976) 206ff.

69. Antirrheticus II adversus Constantinum Copronymum, ix, PG 100:349B. See M.-J. Mondzain[-Baudinet], Nicéphore le Patriarche: Discours contre les iconoclastes (Paris, 1990) and Image, icône, économie. Les sources byzantines de l’imaginaire contemporain (Paris, 1996) 281–92, for translations of this text.

70. Ant. II adv. Const. Cop., xi, PG 100:353A; and see Giannopoulos, “Η περί ἀγγέλων διδασκαλία,” 314ff.

71. See Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:769C.

72. Giannopoulos, “Η περί ἀγγέλων διδασκαλία,” 329ff.

73. Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:781AB, “Yet the holy cherubim, being simple and immaterial, imageless and formless, and therefore bodiless, and circumscribed in a sense perceptible place. . . . For if someone should hear somewhere that at some time the holy angels are weakness; ruling and guiding our affairs he knows fully our capacities for knowledge.⁷⁴ The forms of angels are disguised and vary according to circumstance and occasion. Likewise, the images are equally obscure, since they are unable to correspond visually and essentially.

For it must not be thought that in the forms of wild beasts or oxen or winged birds the nature of the other worldly powers is characterised. Nevertheless, it is by divine commands, because God wished it, that all these things are seen easily and readily, and the angels are depicted and painted.⁷⁵

The forms of angels are symbolic manifestations apprehended intellectually; and in a similar way the images of angels must be perceived symbolically, by intellectual and not only visual processes. Nicephorus described the representations of the angels as an approach to knowledge of God through a contemplation of their invisible formlessness. Furthermore, this approach, he stated, is imperative, in that “the forms of the formless ones and the figures of those without figures are to be laid before us justly.”⁷⁶ Images are non-descriptive but necessary aids to worship and comprehension of God’s formless ministers.

[B]ecause for us the comparison is impossible directly, with respect to an intellectual perception to be offered, . . . [the images of the angels] offer to us attainable forms of the formless and supernatural sights. For this is the work of divine goodness and of fatherly care seen embodied, one should not understand anything but that they manifest themselves symbolically, having transformed themselves, in such forms according to the matter in hand in which they perform their charges on earth; therefore their nature is unknown to us.”

74. Antir. II adv. Const. Cop., ix, PG 100:349C, “Many angelophanies have occurred in the services of God. The angels have not appeared according to their nature, but in the degree of sanctity and purity is it measured for him who is granted so great a vision, or for the matter in hand, necessity, and time required. In this way, the shapes and the forms of the shapeless and formless ones are formed and they make themselves manifest differently to those worthy of the vision with pure eyes of intellect.”

75. Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:781B.

76. Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:777B.

on our behalf, that the most blessed things are made manifest in the figured symbols of heavenly powers, and made comprehensible for us, matter worked by hand which leads us to an accessible imitation and contemplation of their proper nature.⁷⁷

The “figured symbols” are the means by which comprehension of the angelic powers are then conceded to weaker, mortal intellects by God. The symbols are entirely referential since they cannot capture any truth about the real nature or appearance of the angels. Following Pseudo-Dionysius and John of Damascus, Nicephorus concluded that the representations are an approachable and essential means to a spiritual contemplation of an invisible reality.

Nicephorus went on to state that no essential relationship exists between the prototype and the image, that “pictorial representation is an external factor and has nothing in common with the definition of essence.”⁷⁸ However, a direct relationship between image and prototype can be posited. The image and prototype possess resemblance

77. Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:777BC. See, too, John of Damascus in a similar vein: “We know that it is impossible to look upon God, or a spirit, or a demon, as they are by nature. We would be able to see them, however, if they appeared in forms alien to their nature. Therefore God in His providence has clothed in forms and shapes things which are bodiless and without form, in order to lead us to more particular knowledge, lest we should be totally ignorant of God and of bodiless creatures. Only God by nature is utterly without a body, but an angel, or a soul, or a demon, when compared to God (who alone cannot be compared to anything) does have a body, but when these are compared to material bodies, they are bodiless” (De imag. or., III.26, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 130–31; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 79).

78. Antir. I adv. Const. Cop., 29–30, PG 100:277C–80C; trans. Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, 200–201, “Therefore necessarily it belongs to, and is called, a relative [notion]. . . . If somehow the pattern should disappear, the relation does not end together with it: the law of mutual cancellation does not pertain to all such [notions], for sometimes the relations remain and survive although deprived of their object . . . for by the similarity and remembrance and form, it [the image] shows even the deceased as if he were present and it preserves the relation as time goes along. Now likeness is an intermediate relation and mediates between the extremes, I mean, the person represented and the representation. It unites and connects [them] through the form even though they differ in nature. . . . In addition likeness bestows also equivocallness, for the appellation is the same for both . . . it does not have identity of essence, nor can we in all respects predicate what is predicated of the pattern as pattern also of the image derived from it.”

not through essential relation, materially or visually, but through equivocation. “Although the matter from which an image is made is soulless and senseless and motionless, the image is addressed by the same name as the prototype and so worthy of glory and grace.”⁷⁹ The images, therefore, have an unlikeness to the archetype but have, nonetheless, relational qualities and are not then irrelevant.⁸⁰ It follows from this reasoning that the name determines resemblance for images of angels, and any question of similarity in nature and appearance is beside the point.

It is seen that nothing there is enigma, nothing obscure, nothing presented obliquely or wrapped in allegory, that these things which are soulless, unfeeling, entirely motionless, made out of soulless and illogical matter, merely carved and brilliant in appearance, and in the purest of material, are wisely different from those most holy cherubim, who are living, energised, eternally moving powers, named as the God of all deemed proper. For the images of the cherubim are neither similitudes nor are they direct impressions but God used the name in equivocity by his own command when he called them cherubim by voice purely and directly.⁸¹

As Nicephorus stated, the images of the cherubim are not of the same nature nor do they have any real resemblance, but the images are clearly they, because they are called so by God himself, as Exodus testifies. The images partake of the name of cherubim and also of the glory which is the share of the archetype.⁸² Therefore, “these things made of gold are images of images, quite obscure, quite dissimilar, and very much distinct from the paradigmatic cause.” The images do

79. Antir. II adv. Const. Cop., 8, PG 100:348C.

80. Giannopoulos, “Ἡ περὶ ἀγγέλων διδασκαλία,” 334ff.

81. Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:776CD. And also: “But may it be conceded that the cherubim on the Ark were given their name by God, whence the possession of glory presaged by them? Indeed this was the first command of God, which God announced and made venerable. For nothing is in vain or empty that proceeded from him” (Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:777C).

82. Apol. pro sac. imag., 71, PG 100:780AB.

not participate substantially with their prototypes, yet God himself formed the relation.⁸³

The ninth-century mosaics of the angelic powers in the bema arch of the destroyed church of the Dormition at Nicaea (Iznik) demonstrate the relationship of image and inscription discussed in iconophile theory. The mosaics were restored—in all probability—to their original state, a direct consequence of the restoration of images in 843, and this reinstatement attests to active iconophile involvement on both practical and theoretical levels in the mosaic program.⁸⁴ The four angelic powers, identical in appearance, were clearly differentiated by the (imperfect) inscriptions which refer to distinct angelic ranks based on Colossians 1:16: on the south side, the Principality (APXE) and Power (ΔΥΝΑΜΙΣ) (fig. 9), and on the north side, the Domination (ΚΤΠΙΟΤΙΤΕΣ) and Virtue (ΕΞΟΥΣΙΕ) (fig. 10). As this chapter contends, iconophile theory holds that images of angels cannot claim likeness, only a relation made through equivocation; in fact, the lack of likeness, the symbolic nature of the depiction, is the characteristic that exhorts the viewer to spiritual engagement. The mosaics at Nicaea were demonstrations of this characteristic, developed before Iconoclasm and fully articulated by iconophiles. The redundant and generalized nature of the depictions of these beings might lead the viewer to believe that only one category of angel is represented; yet, the inscriptions deny this interpretation by stating instead that the beings are distinct in office, aspect and character. In other words, with beings who possess no likeness, the inscription does not determine likeness. On the contrary, in representations of different angelic beings with identical forms, the possibility of individual resemblance is constantly thwarted.

83. Apol. pro sac. imag., 70, PG 100:773C.

84. The inscription in the bema stated that Naukratius restored the figural portions of the mosaics. Naukratius has been identified as a disciple of Theodore of Stoudios who died in 848. See E. Wiegand, "Zur Monogramminschrift der Theotokos-(Koimesis)Kirche von Nicaea," B 6(1931):411–20, E. E. Lipsić, "Naukratij i Nikeiskie Mozaikij," Zbornik Radova Vizantoloskog Instituta 8/ 2(1964):241–46, and R. Cormack, "Painting After Iconoclasm," in Iconoclasm. Papers Given at the Ninth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, University of Birmingham, March 1975, ed. A. Bryer and J. Herrin (Birmingham, 1977) 147.

The meaning of the restoration of the figural portions of this mosaic has been undervalued as an important statement on the significance of the visual in ninth-century Byzantium. Iconophile theory has partly contributed to this misunderstanding; it laid stress on the ability of inscription not only to establish the identity of images but also to maintain an essential distinction between prototype and image. This stress on the policing nature of words has led to a miscomprehension of the value and role of the visual; moreover, it has led to a neglect of the visual quality of the word in actual Byzantine images.

Not only did the mosaics of the angelic powers at Nicaea preserve the marks of restoration, the sutures revealing earlier editing, they also showed material words: on the one hand, the earlier inscriptions (psalms and nominations) and, on the other, a new cluster of letters between the powers on the south side (fig. 9). The latter reveal that a certain Naucrati^{us} (d. 848), probably a follower of Theodore of Stoudios, has returned a proper balance of figuration and inscription to the mosaics. This balance is the other important issue the mosaics raise: that the symbiosis of figuration and inscription worked as a negation, mutually denying these visual components any resemblance to the prototype. Unlike the literal—one might even say natural—quality of the images of the Virgin and Child in the apse (fig. 16), the powers were absolutely conventional signs since all aspects of description on the bema arch denied resemblance to their models; instead, they were prospective, transparent to a transcendental reality.

The Byzantine images of angels, such as those at Nicaea, relate to the angels themselves as negations and contradictions: the angels were represented in the mosaics only in a symbolic, allusive sense, and they did not correspond essentially or visually with that mosaic. The nominating inscriptions on these mosaics stated that the image “is” in a relative way an angelic being. At the same time, the inscriptions stated that the image “is not,” indeed cannot be, a likeness of this being. The inscriptions then pronounced a provisional state of correspondence, a series of possible relations between material images and the angels’ immaterial formlessness.

This quality of relation might be construed as an uneven association of text and image since the representation has no independent ability to state a visual resemblance.⁸⁵ Interpreting the iconophile definition of equivocation as logocentric would be mistaken, however, as the iconophile texts adduced at the beginning of this section demonstrate the fundamental importance of vision, of viewing images, for proper teaching and contemplation of God by Christians. Indeed, images of Christ depend primarily on the power of vision, that is, the ability of Christians to see God in his human form; viewing Christ's form literally is essential for understanding its meaning, as Theodore of Stoudios stated.

In contrast, both the epigrams and iconophile theory concerning angels showed that the compelling power of vision leads the viewer of images of angels into higher meditation because of the very lack of any possibility of resemblance in these images. In these cases, the inscriptions were also "images" since iconophiles did not hold to the exclusive notion of images that iconoclasts defended. Inscriptions and representations were brought equally to the fore in this mosaic of the angelic powers since the flat gold ground simulated no depth or, at least, equal depth, on the surface. No division was constructed for real or represented space, for word and image, that might prioritize one or the other.⁸⁶ Both nominating inscription and figures of powers are inclusive, complementary "images."

85. Gilbert Dagron has claimed that the image becomes redundant in iconophile image theory since the word, the name applied to the image, determines the likeness of the image. See G. Dagron, "Mots, images, icônes," Nouvelle revue de psychanalyse 44(1991):160ff. However, Dagron equated this iconophile notion of equivocalness with the earlier handbooks describing "εἰκονισμός." "Εἰκονισμός" involved a process of verbal delineation of visual appearance which relied upon direct equivalences of word and image; in this way, Dagron says one could convert a proper name into a visualizable formula. Yet this parallel only explains one aspect of the iconophile theologians' position since these theologians also viewed images with more complexity and allegorical insight and did not admit a simple equivalency of name and image in every case. The angels, of course, belie any simple equivalence of name and image by which Dagron might characterize the iconophile position and the methods of "εἰκονισμός": verbal delineation of angels, as well as the visual description, is allusive and imprecise.

In short, the image resembles only itself through the inscribed name on the image, "L'image de culte est un nomen sacrum. Elle possède une sacralité intrinsèque." See ibid., 162. Yet this formulation leaves the image as a merely reflexive sign, wholly determined by the inscription's verbal affirmation of likeness.

86. See L. Marin, "The Order of Words and the Order of Things in Painting," Visible Language 23(1989):197ff.

Figure 17. René Magritte, The Treachery of Images (Ceci n'est pas une pipe), c. 1928–29. Photo: Los Angeles County Museum of Art, purchased with funds provided by the Mr. and Mrs. William Preston Harrison Collection.

Looking at similar issues in different periods is sometimes helpful for casting new light on problems, and I propose here to use certain elements of Michel Foucault's analysis of René Magritte's The Treachery of Images from 1929 (fig. 17).⁸⁷ Foucault scrutinized a relationship of word and image that has striking parallels with Byzantine theory and practice of representing angels. In Magritte's painting, the likeness of a pipe is convincing in its realistic depiction of a pipe set against a stark background, but the inscription, "Ceci n'est pas une pipe," obstructs the mimetic quality that the depiction can claim. Foucault maintained that the relation of text and image becomes a 87. M. Foucault, This Is Not a Pipe, trans. J. Harkness (Berkeley, 1982). M.-J. Baudinet, "L'incarnation, l'image, la voix," Esprit (Feb. 1982):194–95, also discerned an affinity between Magritte's painting and the iconophile theory of equivocation.

“subtle and instable dependency” since the image is detached from the possibility of mimesis by the inscription.⁸⁸

On the inscription and representation in Magritte’s painting, Foucault wrote that they “annul the intrinsic resemblance they seem to bear within themselves, and gradually sketch an open network of similitudes.”⁸⁹ The inscribed image of the angelic powers also worked on the level of symbiosis of text and representation, whose mutual denial of real resemblance constituted a meaningful, material referent, at once opposed and complementary to the prototype. Moreover, each element of the inscription and the representation “denies along with resemblance the assertion of reality resemblance conveys,” to use Foucault’s terms,⁹⁰ and so the image provided a material sign which the viewer cannot interpret literally. The representation and inscription do not affirm one another.

Negation in the case of these mosaics was not only a function of language, here inscribed words; figuration was also negative. Distinct from these powers’ representations, resemblance is unavoidable in Magritte’s banal pipe. As Carlo Ginzburg has recently asserted, “In order to say, ‘Ceci n’est pas une pipe,’ we need words. Images are what they are.”⁹¹ Not so for images of angels: both figures and inscriptions are equal, non-resembling referents. All iconophile theory rested on the belief that angels as winged men were simply symbols that relied on their prospective nature to excite the viewer’s desire to explore the enigmatic transparency of the images.⁹²

88. Foucault, This Is Not a Pipe, 29: “No longer can anything pass between them save the decree of divorce, the statement at once contesting the name of the drawing and the reference of the text. Nowhere is there a pipe.”

89. Foucault, This Is Not a Pipe, 47. On this passage, see G. Shapiro, “Pipe Dreams: Eternal Recurrence and Simulacrum in Foucault’s Ekphrasis of Magritte,” Word & Image 13(1997):74, and D. Chateau, “De la ressemblance: un dialogue Foucault-Magritte,” in L’image Deleuze, Foucault, Lyotard, ed. T. Lenain (Paris, 1998), 95–108.

90. Foucault, This Is Not a Pipe, 47.

91. C. Ginzburg, “Idols and Likenesses: Origen, Homilies on Exodus VIII.3, and Its Reception,” in Sight and Insight. Essays in Honour of E. H. Gombrich at 85, ed. J. Onians (London, 1994) 67.

92. See, for instance, L. Marin, To Destroy Painting, trans. M. Hjort (Chicago and London, 1995) 7: “I am thinking of the desire to know the enigma that opens up the space of desire only to withhold all gratification; the desire to decipher the secret, to identify the let-

This definition of a simultaneous act of denying resemblance and engaging symbols is a primary mode of comprehension according to Pseudo-Dionysius, as discussed at the beginning of this chapter.⁹³ For Pseudo-Dionysius, proper symbols are not distracting in their resemblances or material quality, but allow the intelligence to interpret them as it is able. And, moreover, this play of the intelligence on a material image is described in practice outside abstract theological discourse in the epigrams of Agathias and Nilus Scholasticus. In these texts, the dissimilarity of image and model provided the image with a tension by which a “higher contemplation” is encouraged in the viewer. Furthermore, this striving to create a breach between image and model while still maintaining a meaningful relationship between the two has been shown to be of fundamental importance to iconophile theology. Proper worship—in this symbolic theology—is predicated upon the viewer not being seduced into believing that there is a real resemblance between image and model; equivocation provides in this sense a prudent, intellectual relation.

And yet the viewer has to be engaged by the image and believe it has meaning; as the epigrams state, colors and form of the incorporeal being compel the viewer through his or her eyes to direct the “mind to a higher contemplation.” The representation and inscription, rather than affirming one another,⁹⁴ perform just the opposite operation. A viewer of an image of an angel must engage the material object by means of its color and form, and through this engagement realize, in every sense, that “this is not an angel.”

ters (or letter) that constitute(s) the formula providing access to the painting; the desire finally to make explicit the discourse whose origin this formula conceals, the longing to transform the pleasure of painting or its jouissance into a pleasure or jouissance of language.”

93. And the text in praise of Michael and Gabriel by Michael of Stoudios attests to the currency of the thought of Pseudo-Dionysius in the second half of the ninth century. Furthermore, he adduces Pseudo-Dionysius in support of his pro-image orthodoxy. See “Éloge des archanges Michel et Gabriel par Michel le Moine (BHG 1294a),” ed. T. Matantseva, JöB 46(1996):136 (V.4), 145 (XII.1), and 119–20.

94. Dagron, “Mots, images, icônes,” 161.

Four

THE VENERATION OF ANGELS AND THEIR IMAGES

THEOLOGICAL VIEWS

Proper Christian worship was a central issue in the centuries preceding Iconoclasm, and iconophiles and iconoclasts continued this debate during the eighth and ninth centuries. Images dominated discussion during Iconoclasm but the debate naturally implicated long-standing questions of Christian ethics and appropriate devotion. As this chapter will demonstrate, angels figured large in this discussion of images, their worship and function. Iconophiles defended the symbolic representations of angels as a special case, with important historical precedents, both written, as in Hebrew scripture, and unwritten, as ancient Christian practice showed. In keeping with one strand of Christian theology, iconoclasts defended “images” that Christians made by modeling themselves after paragons from the past. The topos of the “angelic life” in monastic practice, as the following section will show, had special meaning in this regard, since an angelic “image” in this context meant a suitably pious life. Iconoclasts abjured worship offered to angels or to their material images, as undesired by these beings and inappropriate for a devout Christian. Miracle stories and theology intersect very intimately, then, in this chapter; both reveal self-conscious concern with the dangers of angelolatry and idolatry that had always been inherent in the cult of angels.

Because iconophile argumentation is extensive, it is possible to follow iconophile reaction to iconoclastic accusations of idolatry as these accusations implicated angels and their images. Iconophiles' understanding of the relation between image and model was a safeguard, in their view, against any risk of idolatry; and iconophiles established this notion on the firm ground of Christian history and custom.

Particular attention to iconophile sources that aim to combat iconoclastic arguments about the proper place of images in devotion, particularly images of angels, illuminates the history of the veneration of angels in Byzantium. The concept of the equivocal relation of image and model was central to iconoclastic objections to iconophile worship and ethics. Because angels, and particularly the cherubim, figured so prominently in iconophile defense, they emerged in a debate over worship and ethics as cornerstones to iconophile image theory. For this reason, discussion of the notional difficulties of this equivocal relation of spiritual angelic beings to their material representations was central to an iconophile defense of image worship. Moreover, further examination of iconophile texts on worship reveals attitudes of iconoclasts and their predecessors concerning images and angels themselves; these attitudes must be reconstructed from fragments and inference but a clear picture of iconoclastic ideas does indeed emerge from these limited sources.

Image worship invited misinterpretation, and iconoclastic charges forced iconophiles to react to accusations of idolatry. In their contentions over what constituted seemly and worthwhile worship, iconophiles used traditional defenses that derived largely from the anti-Jewish texts of the seventh century.¹ These texts comprise a body of polemical material from the sixth and seventh centuries aimed at combating perceived threats to Christian faith; they are often in the form of a dialogue, probably invented in most cases, but corresponding to points of faith which Christian theologians considered misconstrued or misunderstood by outsiders. A principal charge made in this genre was that Christians worship material objects; the authors denied that Christians worship matter, and they answered with the symbolic defense, that honor passed through the object to God.²

1. See K.A. Corrigan, Visual Polemics in the Ninth-Century Byzantine Psalters (Cambridge, 1992) 33ff.

Iconoclasts had consistently advanced charges of idolatry against iconophiles and cited Epiphanius of Salamis (ca. 315–403) as their champion in order to malign iconophiles' base and pointless worship of matter. In the course of his counterattack, the Adversus Epiphaniidem, one of the Antirrhetics written between 818 and 820, Nicephorus, the patriarch of Constantinople at the beginning of Iconoclasm in 815, quoted a number of passages written by Epiphanius that showed the thrust of the iconoclastic argument. The "thoughtless one"—called Epiphanides, a fourth-century Docetist, by Nicephorus, but in reality Epiphanius—posed this question: "How do you worship the angels, who are spirits and living without end, described in dead matter, since the prophet says, '[God] who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire' (Ps. 104:4)?"³ Against this attack Nicephorus first answered with the standard retort: "From these things who would not realise or discover that these are not the words of the holy Epiphanius, unless he were an exceeding disputatious and contentious person?"⁴

2. See Pseudo-Athanasius, Quaestiones ad Antiochum Ducem, XXXIX, PG 28:621B-D; Leontius of Neapolis, in Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III Contra imaginum calumniatores orationes tres, PTS vol. 17, ed. P.B. Kotter (Berlin, 1975) 156–58, V. Déroche, "L'Apologie contre les Juifs de Léontios de Néapolis," TM 12(1994):79ff.; the Trophies of Damascus, Les Trophées de Damas, PO vol. 15/2, ed. G. Bardy (Paris, 1920; rp. Louvain, 1973) 78.11ff.; the Dialogue between the Jews, Papiscus and Philo, and a Monk, Dialogue between a Christian and a Jew entitled ANTIBOLH ΠΑΠΙΣΚΟΥ ΚΑΙ ΦΙΛΩΝΟΥ ΙΟΥΔΑΙΩΝ ΠΡΟΣ ΜΟΝΑΧΟΝ ΤΙΝΑ, ed. A.C. McGiffert (Marburg, 1889) 51–52; Hieronymus of Jerusalem, De effectu baptisimi et notis Christiani, PG 40:865AB; Anastasius Sinaïtes, Disputatio adversus Judaeos, II, PG 89:1233C–6A; and, finally, the Armenian John Mayragometsi, in S. Der Nersessian, "Une apologie des images du septième siècle," B 17(1944/5):60. The Διδασκαλία Ἰακωβοῦ stated that the wood of the cross was not venerated but that it was a sign, a type for Christ and that honor passes to him through the object; see La Didascalie de Jacob, PO vol. 8/5, ed. F. Nau (Paris, 1912; rp. Turnhout, 1971) 61.12–62.3.

3. In Adversus Epiphaniidem, IX.35, Pitra IV:318.2–7; Holl 358, #7.

4. Adv. Epi., IX.35, Pitra IV:318.8–10.

Iconophiles saw God's command for the manufacture of the Ark of the Covenant as a circumvention of any charge of idolatry. Moving from charges of falsification, Nicephorus cited the authority of Exodus 25:22 and the necessary obedience to its strictures:

For Epiphanius did not ignore the things commanded by God to Moses concerning the cherubim, nor did he thrust away and reject the so-called holy of holies; although fashioned out of soulless matter, it was yet honorable. But indeed he believed and always adhered to these things with diligence and honor, especially what derived from the Jewish people, and he esteemed them as commands of God, passing them on as Christian teachings; unless indeed one supposes that the things written about his life were done mendaciously. This noble man appears to reveal the prophet in his words concerning the angels. Yet he speaks against God, and he speaks against Moses, who makes law in vain, since [Epiphanius] does not consider this legislating to constitute law, and [Moses] complies with it, and so [Moses] in vain toils against the making of the cherubim and of other things, such as God has commanded. Certainly [Epiphanius] would have been worthy if he had adhered at least to the letter and the laws of old. But this one is more disobedient than the Jews and more ignorant, not desiring to know that he who made his angels spirits and his ministers a burning fire, commanded by law that the cherubim be made from the purest gold. What then? Has he discarded it and esteemed it little? Yet he does introduce Paul who called these things the holy of holies and the cherubim of glory, truly extolling these things.⁵

For Nicephorus, the fact that Epiphanius could cite the injunction against the making of "graven images" (Ex. 20:4), while ignoring God's more specific charge to make images of angels, showed willful disregard for distinctions God himself had made. The citation of the Second Commandment was, therefore, a false position which was partially blind and wholly irreverent. Dismissing the express desire of God was heretical, and Nicephorus claimed furthermore that it led to an alignment with the pagans or the heretical Manichaeans.⁶ Iconoclasts questioned the validity of this injunction to construct the Ark for the New Covenant, as well as its applicability for the figurative arts. Iconoclasts—here represented by Epiphanius—regarded art literally and saw that the material outline of an image of the cherubim could in no way conform to, or in any meaningful way convey, the real nature of the angelic host. Conversely, iconophiles read the injunction at Exodus 25:22 literally but were able to view the worked image as a symbol whose value was activated in an intellectual, spiritual approach to worship.

5. Adv. Epi., IX.35, Pitra IV:318.13–319.12.

Iconophiles interpreted the Second Commandment as an injunction against untoward adoration, but at the same time they interpreted it as a law conditional on the initiation of the New Covenant.⁷ In this sense, they again adapted arguments put forward in the anti-Jewish literature of the seventh century. In these texts, the Second Commandment had only been dictated by God because the Jews themselves had been disposed to idolatry, and this Commandment was subsequently made obsolete by the incarnation of Christ.⁸ Iconophiles saw the Second Commandment as a directive from God with a specific historical context. As Ignatius the Deacon (ca. 770/80–d. after 845) wrote in his biography of the patriarch Nicephorus, the patriarch believed that the Second Commandment was addressed to the particular inclinations of the pagan Egyptians by whom the Israelites had been influenced while in captivity.⁹

6. Antirrheticus II, Adversus Constantinum Copronymum, 8, PG 100:348C.

7. On this question, see H.L. Kessler, “‘Pictures Fertile with Truth’: How Christians Managed to Make Images of God without Violating the Second Commandment,” The Journal of the Walters Art Gallery 49 / 50 (1991 / 2):53–65.

8. See the Dialogue between a Christian and a Jew, 73–77; Disputation of Sergius the Stylite against a Jew, ed. A.P. Hayman, 2 vols. (Louvain, 1973) II:48, 51–52, 54; and Anastasius Sinaïtes, Dis. adv. Jud., II, PG 89:1236A.

9. Vita Nicephori, VII, PG 100:93A–C: “Since therefore that law giver led the people entrusted to him by God out of Egypt, wishing to purify from their souls and erase the defilements acquired there, in order that human images not conceive of the divine in humanlike images or in other forms of living things. He exhorted them in this way giving this law: Do not according to the custom of the Egyptians, o humanity, nor learning from them absurdly let an image of god be made by us, nor of these things flying through the air, or moving on earth, or swimming the seas. For these things are not God even if the Egyptians say they are, and he must not be depicted by an image, he who cannot be contemplated. For Nicephorus then adduced the examples of the temple of Solomon and the Ark that God commanded, also mentioned in the Epistle to Hebrews (9:2ff.). God's commandment, therefore, did not apply to Christian images, which were sanctified by God's own injunction for their manufacture, but only applied to false idols.

The iconoclastic charge that iconophiles worshipped lifeless matter made it essential for iconophiles to render a counter-argument on a meaningful, though clearly demarcated, relation between image and prototype. Again, Exodus and its description of the cherubim provided the defense. As Nicephorus reasoned, Christians did not worship even the holy representations made out of the purest and brightest material, fabricated by human hands at the command of God himself. And yet the angels, intellectual and invisible beings, were "fashioned out of gold and sitting above the Ark, and these are neither intellects nor intellectual nor do they possess visible appearance..." These material images on the Ark were altogether destitute of life and power and energy, as their bodies are put in matter, even if the plate happens to be the purest and most splendid material. And having been made images and having bodies out of matter, they are alterations and schematisations, and they are not free from corruption and change.¹⁰

Material objects neither distract nor demean Christian worship since the images of angels were simply matter and fundamentally distinct. Nicephorus maintained that good Christians have the ability to discriminate between idols and true images through pious devotion and faith.¹¹ True images were representations of actual beings, ordained

God is unviewable and without form and invisible and is not at all among things seen by human eyes. But he is only perceptible to the mind, if someone somewhere should be capable of this.... Therefore, the law giver forbade that images of God alone be made."

10. Both quotations from Apologeticus pro sacris imaginibus, 70, PG 100:769D–72A.

11. Antirr. I, Adv. Const. Copr., 29, PG 100:277B, "An idol is a fictive thing and the representation of a non-existent being, such things as the Hellenes by want of good sense and godlessness make representations of, such as the tritons and the centaurs and other phantasms which do not exist. And in this respect icons and idols are to be distinguished from one another; those not accepting the distinction of these would rightly be called idolaters. And as by God, and securely related by the epigraphy contained on the images. The inscription on the images stabilized the relationship between image and prototype, and safeguarded against any misapprehension concerning the similarities between the two that might lead to inappropriate worship of the image itself. Therefore, in Nicephorus's view, good Christians had the ability to distinguish between worship directed at matter and veneration that ascends to the prototype through the image.

Iconophiles evoked a long-standing Christian tradition of images in worship as further proof of mature and correct discrimination by Christians. Moreover, Nicephorus claimed that this Christian legacy of images in worship was untainted by falsification of texts or misrepresentation of the past. The materialist worship that iconophiles defended was not an invention, as iconoclasts claimed, but an unbroken tradition of seemly devotion that began in the apostolic era.

Iconophiles fell back on the unwritten tradition that the worship of icons had been practiced and condoned from the church's inception. Against Epiphanius, Nicephorus stated that it was not merely a question of one or two or three or four people who disagreed with Epiphanius's position, but the entire catholic church.¹² Finally, he pointed out that images of angels were found in many churches, and always had been. "Everywhere on earth in the holy churches the stories are full of the powers of the bodiless ones in holy representations, and of the catholic church, through whose strength the tradition was anciently settled."¹³ On the most literal level of defense, Nicephorus offered the indisputable fact of practice: images of the angels exist and have done for the entire history of the Church, "For if someone were not to represent the angels, by reason of their incorporeality, it would have been stated many times previously."¹⁴ Iconoclasts could muster theologians to substantiate their position against for icons, there are icons of good and trifling sorts, and it is important to distinguish. One should honor the good, reject the worthless, and equally shun idolatry."

12. Adv. Epi., IX.35, Pitra IV:318.8–23.

13. Antir. II, Adv. Const. Copr., 7, PG 100:348A.

14. Adv. Epi., VI.17, Pitra IV:307.1–4.

angels' images, notably Epiphanius, but iconophiles considered their own record unblemished by heresy and falsification: both written and unwritten tradition corroborated their interpretation of images as indispensable to proper worship and understanding of God.

Iconophile and iconoclastic conceptions of proper worship were, therefore, fundamentally distinct: one side was able to posit a relation between image and prototype which was ineluctably binding but not essential, while the other saw any image not of the same substance as fraudulent and unnecessary. The divergence in approach was nowhere clearer than in a dialogue between Stephen the Younger (ca. 713–764?) and the emperor Constantine V (r. 740–775), in the Vita of Stephen the Younger written by Stephen the Deacon, perhaps in 806. Although clearly a set piece, as it was preserved in an iconophile saint's vita, this dialogue also gives an indication of the quality and depth of iconoclastic argumentation. The antagonist, Constantine V, offered real intellectual challenges to Stephen; he was not simply a "straw man." In the course of their encounter, Constantine V questioned Stephen about the significance and value of images of unknowable beings:

How is it possible to represent sensually the things announced by humanity to be beyond experience and difficult to see, and not lacking in intellectual quality, and to worship them through matter, when nothing is to be gained by these things in understanding of the being, except the infinity, as Gregory the Theologian said.¹⁵

This question was an example of an iconoclastic equation of prototype and image,¹⁶ and indeed Constantine V had pointed to the really problematic aspect of the iconophile argument, especially as it applied to angels: if material images of immaterial and invisible angels could only indicate their indescribable nature, then what practical use were these images in worship? Searching for the answer to 15. La vie d'Étienne le Jeune, Birmingham Byzantine and Ottoman Monographs, vol. 3, ed. M.-F. Auzépy (Aldershot, 1997) 156 (ch.55).

16. See A. Kazhdan and H. Maguire, "Byzantine Hagiographical Texts as Sources on Art," DOP 45(1991):9.

Constantine V's intellectually challenging question in the reply of Stephen the Younger is not entirely satisfying:

Indeed who would say, being in control of their own mind, that worshipping the things in the church, whether they be stone or gold or silver, is a worshipping of material things? Wherefore they are altered by name to holy things. You cannot distinguish between holy and profane, nor are you afraid to state in demented folly that the icon of Christ is an idol, as if it were an image of Apollo, or that an image of the Virgin is the same thing as an image of Artemis, and to trample upon these things and to burn them.

This reply was an interesting, if not entirely persuasive, evasion. Stephen the Younger fastened onto one phrase in Constantine V's question, on the worship of divine things through matter, and made the common claim that proper worship exploited material images to pious ends. And he then proceeded to accuse the emperor of confusing pagan and Christian images.¹⁷ This response was not entirely typical of the quality of iconophile debating skills, and yet it highlighted the difficulties involved in answering all of the implications of iconoclastic attacks. Iconophiles commonly accused iconoclasts of not being able to discern which images were worthy of worship, and in this way they sidestepped some of the conceptual difficulties involved in comprehending Christian images of imperceptible beings.

The argument of equivocation posited an intimate relation between image and prototype that was difficult to sustain fully, and the near identity implied in the proposed relation provoked profound puzzlement among iconoclasts. In the vita of Stephen the Younger, after

17. This reply was a standard refutation of the iconoclastic comparison of idols and images. See, for instance, the ninth-century Vita of the Patriarch Tarasius (d. 806) by Ignatius the Deacon: "For, if you compare Zeus to our Saviour in that they are both reverently represented and you affirm that without making any distinction, consider whether you attach to Christ's holy form the insult you bestow upon the false-named Zeus." See The Life of the Patriarch Tarasius by Ignatius the Deacon (BHG 1698), Birmingham Byzantine and Ottoman Monographs, vol. 4, ed. S. Efthymiadis (Aldershot, 1998) 144.9–12, 197. And see Nicephorus, Antirr. I, Adv. Const. Copr., 28, PG 100:277B, who accused idols of representing what does not exist.

Stephen's claim that trampling upon the image of Christ visits violence upon Christ himself, the emperor exclaimed, "Are you then blinded in your mind, and forget yourself, to say that in treading upon the images of Christ, we are treading upon Christ himself? It would not be so!"¹⁸ Stephen answered him by taking out a coin with a representation of the emperor and his name inscribed, and asked if disrespect directed at the coin was not also directed at the emperor himself.

If Stephen's modest but dramatic act demonstrated that images were related to their prototypes, the iconophile theory of equivocation and relation answered the iconoclastic accusation of full identity of prototype and model with a great deal more philosophical clout. In the Adversus Epiphanidem, after he has cited Epiphanius's charge that the angels' images were misleading and essentially irrelevant, Nicephorus returned with the charge that iconoclasts did not have the necessary capability for discrimination that would enable them to distinguish true and false images.¹⁹ He fell back on an argument similar to Stephen the Younger's, that iconoclasts were without the grace that proper faith provided and so they understood Christian images as pagans would. And for both Stephen and Nicephorus, the name applied altered the image through the forging of an intellectual link independent of the material aspects of the image.

The argument of relation of model and image through equivocation sanctioned by usage answered Constantine V's objection to images of angels as pointless and unenlightening material objects. Essential or visual similarity was not necessary for an evaluation of the worth of images in worship. Likeness was established mainly through veneration offered the prototype by means of the image. In common with other Christian images, the images of the angels did not, therefore, rely on witness and skill of the artist but on the value that society put on such images.²⁰ Despite the dissimilarity and ob-

18. La vie d'Étienne le Jeune, 156 (ch.55).

19. Adv. Epi., VI.17, Pitra IV:306.24–35, "And he then calls the holy icons pseudonymous, attempting by this to destroy the relation (λόγον)." This passage is part of Nicephorus's answer to Epiphanius: see Holl 357, #4.

20. According to iconophiles, relation does not depend on artistic skill in its ability to render likeness. For Theodore of Stoudios, no need existed for similarity between the two, curity of the images of the angels in comparison to their models, Christians accepted these objects in worship as worthy of devotion and of spiritual contemplation because of convention.²¹ Tradition and Christian custom sanctioned the devotion offered to images of angels as signs of “infinity,” as Constantine phrased it. As iconophile descriptions of symbolic images asserted, the value of images of angels resided in their necessarily incomplete testimony to the incomprehensible nature of the angels.

Against this iconophile idea of Christian custom and practice, iconoclasts cited precedents for their views on idolatry and the misleading worship advocated by iconophiles. Iconoclasts advanced both Epiphanius and the fourth-century theologian Macarius Magnes because of their positions on scrupulous behavior before angels and their images. Both had defended restraint in honor given to angels; and because of the attendant difficulties in witnessing angels, Christians must abstain from the adoration of images since these could only be reductions and caricatures of the experience. For these reasons, iconoclasts recommended the two theologians and, in turn, iconophiles such as Nicephorus refuted and reinterpreted them. These precedents represent the traditional opposition to images preceding Iconoclasm, as well as the position of iconoclasts themselves, since the oppositional texts are only preserved in iconophile rebuttals.

neither regarding substance, size, dimension, nor genuine resemblance. Indeed, resemblance, in any precise visual sense, is entirely unnecessary. Only the equivocation of name need be applied for relation. See Antirrheticus adversus iconomachos, II.iii.5, PG 99:421CD.

Photius argued in the 860s that the recognition of relation was a matter of convention deriving from devotion. He stated that images ought not to be maligned because of dissimilarity in nature or in truth. For resemblance rests not only on the depiction’s outline of form and colors of shapes, but also on such things as arrangements and practice and expression of understanding and placement in holy areas, inscription and choice of symbols. See Ad Amphilochium, CCV, PG 101:952AB; Epistulae et Amphilochia, ed. B. Laourdas and L. G. Westerink, 6 vols. in 7 pts. (Leipzig, 1983–1988) I:110. He also considered the definition of similarity in the case of the cross; he concluded that the cross to which worship is offered and from which copies are made is most similar to its prototype. See ibid., PG 101:949BC; Laourdas/Westerink, Epistulae et Amphilochia, I:110. For Photius, and iconophiles generally, a definition of likeness rested on consensus and not on a visual or essential similarity between image and prototype.

21. On this text, see G. Dagron, “Holy Images and Likeness,” DOP 45(1991):24–25.

Judging from the iconophile reaction, iconoclasts had objected that the angels, for one, did not desire worship and raised the ethics of worship of angels—and consequently their images—as important issues. They attempted in this way to undermine the iconophiles' defense of a cultural consensus of worship built around the equivocal images of the angels. Again in the Adversus Epiphanidem, Nicephorus quoted Epiphanius's objection, "I say that [the angels] do not desire to be worshipped,"²² and exclaimed in response:

Therefore, do they desire to be insulted likewise? And for this reason does the impious one pour down so much scorn on them, at once ordaining these must not be worshipped, on account of his wicked and unthinking view of the glory reserved for them?²³

According to Nicephorus, Epiphanius had associated image and prototype with too little distinction. Indeed, Epiphanius's text revealed iconoclastic prejudices. As iconoclasts believed true images and models to be consubstantial, they had evidently produced Epiphanius's claim that angels did not desire worship as a corollary to their belief that images of angels were likewise not to be worshipped.²⁴ At this point, the intersection of theological discourse with models of worship found in saints' lives becomes clear: iconoclasts had confused angelolatry with idolatry; the two were inseparable in their view because of the belief in the necessary consubstantiality of the model and prototype. This confounding of angel and image into one ethical issue is an interesting strategy by iconoclasts: if angels had always been dangerously venerated, so were their images; if angels do not desire worship, neither do they want images. The answer to this ethical issue—as found in miracle stories of angels—is explored in the following section.

22. Adv. Epi., IX.36, Pitra IV:319.15–16.

23. Adv. Epi., IX.36, Pitra IV:319.17–21.

24. This claim is likely connected with the iconoclast belief in the necessary consubstantiality of image and prototype. Iconoclasts argued that the only true image was of the same matter as its model; therefore, the eucharist was a real image and any image that had only relation to its model was false. On this issue, see K. Parry, Depicting the Word. Byzantine Iconophile Thought of the Eighth and Ninth Centuries (Leiden, 1996) 178–90.

In Nicephorus's view, the angels did not seek veneration for themselves, nor did their images receive it. Epiphanius and his iconoclastic followers simply offered a wrong-headed definition of relation in seeing the angels and their images as equivalent. They sullied the proper non-essential relation of image and model through equivocation that iconophiles defended. Honor given to images did not stop there but proceeded to the prototypes themselves; consequently, "just as the icons are not worshipped, neither are the archetypes honoured."²⁵

A confusion of honor of prototype and image would suggest pagan worship, Nicephorus said. For pagans worship gods that did not exist, so that they were simply worshipping vain objects. In his De Magnete, Nicephorus had also defended Macarius Magnes from the charge pressed by his pagan opponent that Christians worshipped angels. The pagan stated that Christian angels were comparable to gods and that honor bestowed on images of angels and gods were similarly appropriate. Nicephorus supported Macarius by insisting on the fundamental distinction between empty pagan idols and authentic Christian images:

Protecting our own worship from these ignoble mysteries that deserve darkness, he does not consider them worthy of Christians, nor does he desire to make images or honour them, such as [the Hellenes] make images and worship.²⁶

Thus, in theory, honor passed through the image, without material obstacle, directly to the prototype and in a way fundamentally different from pagan misapprehension of idols that were destitute of archetypes.

Despite Nicephorus's defense, an ethical definition of the "true" Christian image guided Epiphanius's and Macarius Magnes's arguments, and this fourth-century advocacy for the ethical image must ²⁵ Adv. Epi., IX.41, Pitra IV:323.39–40; and also 324.4–7, "So that since the image of Christ is not honoured, it follows that he would wish that Christ himself not be honoured." In general, see Adv. Epi., IX.36ff., Pitra IV:319.23ff.

²⁶ De Magnete, I.14, Pitra I:311.19–23.

certainly have been a compelling precedent for iconoclasts. Nicephorus tried consistently to bring Macarius's arguments into line with iconophile concerns, but in fact Macarius had contended that a virtuous Christian did not make material images. In true worship, Macarius wrote, Christians modeled themselves after paragons of Christianity from the Church's teaching, thereby fashioning a true "image." Against the use of Macarius's writings by iconoclasts, Nicephorus responded with the normal accusation of falsification and stated that, in fact, Macarius Magnes was discussing the pagan position on images and not the Christian view.²⁷

Nicephorus attacked further the perverse use of the text by iconoclasts when discussing a passage by Macarius Magnes concerning the appearance of the angels to Abraham: "As the angels appeared often in the form of men, they were not that which appeared, but that which they were, that is, invisible."²⁸ Nicephorus persisted in his belief in the willful tamperings of iconoclasts when he commented on this passage, "as if compensating for the things not adduced, he introduces in the middle of the passage as an example the person of the patriarch Abraham."²⁹ For iconophiles, Abraham was one of the most venerable instances of witness to angelic epiphany.³⁰ But he did

27. De Magnete, I.41, Pitra I:326.35–327.13: "For one must note that after the author has said, 'Certainly [he does not make] their images formed in outline ...' [Blondel 214.15] the Christomachos again willfully takes away the phrase, 'as you yourself say,' [Blondel 214.15–16] in order that he seem credible to the readers. He thereby says that the author believes in the destruction of the holy icons, which the author does not believe. Rather he stands opposed to the faith of the Hellenes, as he said to the Hellene that he did not agree with him, providing the 'as you say' concerning the idols, statues and images of the gods. Moreover, those seeking to imitate the angelic way of life, in this fashion, which forbids and spurns, that is to say, the abominations of the idols, they make an end of the images. For opposing this, they are manifestly taking away the idols, and they have a horror of them, as loathsome and hateful."

28. Blondel 214.21–22, and De Magnete, I.42, Pitra I:327.16–19.

29. See De Magnete, I.43, Pitra I:327.20–37.

30. One might also expect, given the significance of Abraham's hospitality to the three "men" at Mamre for iconophile defense in the eighth and ninth centuries, a commensurate number of representations of the Philoxenia after Iconoclasm. Yet the Philoxenia is represented in the Chludov Psalter once (fol. 49v), in the context of its eucharistic symbolism and not as an epiphany. See Corrigan, Visual Polemics, 52ff. In the Sacra Parallela (Paris. gr. 923, fol. 245r), the middle of the three angels is depicted without a crossed-nimbus and relates the Christological symbolism of the event like the Chludov illustration. See K.

not create a commemorative image, and this oversight needed explaining since iconoclasts could forcefully point to the lack of mention of material testimonial in scripture. Nicephorus explained the lapse between witness in the Old Covenant and their apparent failure to commemorate the event by first citing a passage by Macarius Magnes: "And as these things occurred wisely and in truth, Abraham did not outline the appearance of these visions, nor did he carve an idol in resemblance nor did he paint a panel, thinking to see the strangers in these things."³¹ Nicephorus's subsequent explanation fell back on the belief in a historical lapse into idolatry by the Jews that necessitated the Second Commandment, but ultimately rested on the charge of falsification and misrepresentation of the original text of Macarius's dialogue.³²

Yet the real reason for the discussion of Macarius Magnes must have been iconoclastic emphasis on the ethical, "true" image. According to Milton Anastos, this emphasis dates to the Hieria of 754 and was, therefore, a central argument against material images in worship from the early stages of Iconoclasm.³³ In the iconoclastic formulation of "images," "one should put reliance, not upon pictorial representations, but upon the scriptures and the biographies of the saints."³⁴ As Anastos noted, the Fathers quoted at the Council of 754 dealt primarily with spiritual worship. The Council cited Basil the Great (ca. 330–379):

The study of the holy writings constitutes the best path to the ascertainment of what is proper, because they provide a guide for Weitzmann, The Miniatures of the Sacra Parallela. Parisinus graecus 923 (Princeton, 1979) 40, fig. 27.

31. Blondel 215.30–32.

32. De Magne, I.43, Pitra I:328.3–17: "For it is not likely that the patriarch being a friend of God would be induced into error of the superstitious persons of that time, only just having risen above the manufacture of idols. And it is necessary to note that one must supply the things there left out, that is to say, 'as you say.' The Hellene, who had been inserted above, after it has, 'Certainly [he does not make] their images formed in outline ...'" (Blondel 214.15–16).

33. See M. V. Anastos, "The Ethical Theory of Images Formulated by the Iconoclasts in 754 and 815," DOP 8(1954):151–60.

34. Anastos, "The Ethical Theory of Images," 153.

conduct, together with the biographies of the blessed ones, that serve as living images of a godly life and the inspiration for the emulation of god-like behaviour.³⁵

Iconophiles did not oppose this emphasis on spiritual worship, and they even interpreted such worship as a commendable mode of adoration of God. However, iconophiles saw the consequent dismissal of images by iconoclasts as obdurate and willful behavior; by dismissing images, iconoclasts were denying an equally venerable means of adoring and comprehending God. Both sides could, in fact, support the importance of the ethical image, but from entirely divergent perspectives. Moreover, these divergent perspectives on ethics and worship of images of angels parallel practice as seen in miracle stories, as the following section will demonstrate. This long-standing concern over angels and their images influenced image theory and practice both, and it led to serious divergences in opinion during Iconoclasm: suspended between humanity and God, angels demanded particular treatment, and iconophile texts clearly reveal the complexities of this peculiar case.

HAGIOGRAPHICAL VIEWS

Miracle stories of the angels produced before, during and after Iconoclasm were directly influenced by this debate over worship proper to angels and their images. By examining the traces of this debate in miracle stories, this section demonstrates that the concerns of image theory extended beyond limited theological circles into the public realm. Miracle stories of angels, in the hands of either iconoclasts or iconophiles, were intended to provide persuasive examples of correct worship of angels and images through forceful and compelling narratives of divine interventions. In this way, these didactic texts parallel the concerns of the more rarefied image theory.

In the period preceding Iconoclasm, proper worship of angels did include images; in practice, images of angels could express both doctrinal concerns and exegesis of nature and identity. This incorporation of images into worship likewise appeared in miracle stories. The Miracles of St. Artemius, written in the 660s about Artemius's shrine in the church of John the Baptist in Oxeia at Constantinople, contained the earliest description of images of angels in a miracle story. It described, moreover, the complete integration by the seventh century of images of the saints into popular piety.³⁶ In one of the episodes, a young girl, Euphemia, saw two angels in a night vision; in the morning, she identified them by reference to icons hanging in the church.³⁷

35. Mansi XIII:300AB; trans. Anastos, "The Ethical Theory of Images," 154–55.

The saints' lives of the sixth and seventh centuries testified to an increased importance of images in miracles of healing and other interventions by saints. The miracle story of Artemius is replete with miracles that occurred at his shrine, often effected through his images.³⁸ And other pre-iconoclastic miracle stories attested further the central role images were assuming in devotion; these texts showed that the faithful increasingly perceived images as signs of the presence of the saint and as a means by which Christians could encourage the saints' activity and protection.³⁹ A seventh-century text, once ascribed to Athanasius of Alexandria (ca. 296–373), for one, defended images on the grounds that the miracles performed by images irrefutably demonstrated images' divine qualities. Furthermore, the author ranked images as a match to relics in sanctity and dignity, and as equally able to perform miracles of healing and exorcism.⁴⁰ This

36. On this question, see V. Déroche, "L'authenticité de l'Apologie contre les Juifs de Léontios de Neapolis," Bulletin de correspondance hellénique 110(1986):658ff., and also his, "L'Apologie contre les Juifs de Léontios de Néapolis," TM 12(1994):85ff.; and E. Kitzinger, "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm," DOP 8(1954):96ff., and, in particular, 107 on Artemius.

37. V. S. Crisafulli and J. W. Nesbitt, The Miracles of St. Artemios. A Collection of Miracle Stories by an Anonymous Author of Seventh-Century Byzantium (Leiden, New York and Köln, 1997) 176–84. And see C. Mango, "On the History of the Templon and the Martyrion of St. Artemios at Constantinople," Zograf 10(1979):40–43.

38. For instance, Crisafulli / Nesbitt, The Miracles of St. Artemios, 88.7 and 108.4.

39. For example, Cosmas and Damian, L. Deubner, Kosmas und Damian. Texte und Einleitung (Leipzig, 1907) 133.23–24, and Theodore of Sykeon, Vie de Théodore de Sykéôn, ed. A.-J. Festugière, 2 vols. (Brussels, 1970) I:32.9–13, I:39.5–6.

40. Quaest. ad Ant. Duc., XXXIX, PG 28:621CD.

early devotion included images of angels, as the miracle at the shrine of Artemius showed, but the lives of saints of the eighth and ninth centuries offered alternate models of access to angels, and to the saints more generally.

The miracle story of the Archangel Michael at Chonae, the Narration of the Miracle Accomplished at Chonae by the Archangel Michael, re-worked in the eighth century, related a pattern of worship that conformed to the ethical models stressed in the Iconoclastic debates.⁴¹ In so doing, it avoided patterns found in the Miracles of St Artemius which relied upon images for access to, and provisional identification of, spiritual beings. The Chonae text offered a paradigm of behavior for approaching an angel and receiving the benefits of that proper approach. The miracle story, and its message, were neither overtly iconoclastic nor iconophile. Yet it has common elements with “non-iconophile” miracle stories analyzed by Marie-France Auzépy, and these common elements provided a discrete iconoclastic context for the Chonae miracle story.⁴²

41. The first recension of the Chonae hagiography, and clearly the model for later texts, was edited with commentary by Bonnet [= AB 8(1889):289–307]. Bonnet placed the hagiography between the fifth and seventh century. Examining Bonnet’s evidence, William Ramsay thought the anonymous text was not earlier than the ninth century, citing the local names employed in the text as proof of this date. See W. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire Before 170 A.D. (New York and London, 1893) 468, 478. However, the name change sometime in the course of the eighth century is the terminus post quem because the miracle is said to have occurred at Chonae itself, and the hagiography is most likely from an eighth-century milieu. Other versions survive: Symeon Metaphrastes (d. ca. 1000) produced a version (Bonnet, 20–28 = AB 8(1889):308–16), and Sissinius wrote a hagiography of Michael at Chonae in the late tenth century, Acta apparitionis in Chonis, in AASS, Sept. 8:41–49). And Pantaleon (late ninth/early tenth century) mentioned the miracle in his Sermo festo S. Michaelis Archangelis (PG 98:1264A). See, for complete references for the hagiographies of Michael, Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca, ed. F. Halkin, 3 vols. (Brussels, 1957) II:118–21, nos. #1282ff.

42. M.-F. Auzépy, “L’analyse littéraire et l’historien: l’exemple des vies de saints iconoclastes,” BS 53(1992):57–67. She analyzed four hagiographies: the lives of Philaretus (702–792), George of Amastris (d. 802–807), Eudocimus (807–840) and Leo of Catania (fl. second half of the eighth century). The first three were discussed by I. Ševčenko, “Hagiography of the Iconoclast Period,” in Iconoclasm. Papers given at the Ninth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, University of Birmingham, March 1975, ed. A. Bryer and J. Herrin (Birmingham, 1977) 113–31. The last life has been edited by A. Acconcia Longo, “La vita de S. Leone di Catania e gli incantesimi del mago Eliodoro,” RBSN 26(1989):3–98; subsequently, she refuted Auzépy’s interpretations in “A proposito di un articolo recente sul-

The miracle story of the Archangel Michael at Chonae was an apologetic text intended to communicate models of proper and successful devotion to an audience. In the tale, a group of pagans threatened the hermit Archippus and the shrine of the Archangel Michael with a series of destructive plots; eventually, they dammed two local rivers in order to flood the area and overwhelm shrine and inhabitant. With the waters approaching, the Archangel Michael appeared, addressed the hermit and, by striking the rock before the shrine, created a source for the famous healing spring (fig. 15). The miracle story had the basic goal of glorification, edification and conversion of the worshipper to an orthodox position. It lauded the work of the leader of the heavenly host in this world and established a framework of approach for the common worshipper.

The text also worked to convince an audience of access to Michael, and, through Michael, to God. A key term in the text was “parrêsia” (παρρησία), which can be rendered as “familiarity” or “patronage” or even “boldness.”⁴³ The classical meaning was “freedom of speech,” but by the Byzantine period the word had taken on a broader meaning that in the devotional context implied mediation between divinity and humanity made successful by proper preparation. At Chonae, the miracle was accomplished “through the grace and familiarity (παρρησία)” (1.6) of Michael with God; at a later stage in the miracle story, the same familiarity was passed on to the distraught hermit, when Michael commanded Archippus, “Be bold, and come towards me so that the approaching rivers will not devour you” (15.11–12).⁴⁴ Thus, the miracle story signaled the completion of the hierarchy, ascending from the holy man to the Archangel to God. To a lesser degree, this familiarity or access was offered to the reader/listener according to his or her worthiness and ability to comprehend.

l’agiografia iconoclasta,” RSBN 29(1992):3–17. Auzépy and Acconcia Longo offered final defenses in RSBN 30(1993):3–15.

See also V. Déroche, “L’autorité des moines à Byzance du VIII^e siècle au Xe siècle,” Revue Bénédictine 103(1993):241–54, on related issues.

43. On parrêsia, see C. Mango, Byzantium. The Empire of New Rome (London, 1980) 159.

44. All citations in the text refer to Bonnet.

Although this “familiarity” or “boldness” (παρρησία) was not peculiar to the cult of the Archangel Michael,⁴⁵ the incomprehensible nature of the Archangel made “access” more difficult than to the mortal saints. The unique nature of the angels and the archangels, hovering between heaven and earth, was the basis for this difficulty. The incomprehensible nature of the appearances and the miracles of the Archangel must be understood in ways outside of the purely rational.⁴⁶ As Philoxenus of Mabbug (ca. 440–523) wrote concerning angels, faith was paradoxically the first step to comprehension.⁴⁷ The angels clearly were a special problem in terms of devotion and approach. The angels’ particular nature and qualities demanded individual treatment in theological texts, and miracle stories also acknowledged these distinctions.

In the miracle story, jealous rumblings began among the locals on account of the great success of the spring, and open insurrection against the shrine was not long in appearing. In the meantime, the miracle story introduced a “dishonourable and idolatrous” pagan, from the nearby city of Laodicea (3.14ff.). This pagan had a daughter who was deaf and dumb. Michael appeared in a dream and told him to go to the shrine, and “by my name, if you believe, you will not leave disappointed” (4.5). The pagan then traveled to the spring and questioned those at the spring about the healing process. He was told that one must call on the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, 45. For instance, see Kazhdan / Maguire, “Byzantine Hagiographical Texts,” 14.

46. See Metrophanes, Metropolitan of Smyrna ca. 857–880, who says that the Archangel Michael and Gabriel are great, but small are the means to describe them, “Your [Michael and Gabriel’s] image is broad and elevated in being and manifold in its bodiless and immaterial and entirely splendid shape, but the word, coming from our hearts through corporeal organs, is narrow and humble and artless.” A little below he adds that it is necessary for the archangels “to illuminate the intellectual eyes of our hearts.” The text is found in Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ Ἀληθεία 7(1887):390.

47. See his sermon “On Faith,” trans. E.A.W. Budge, The Discourses of Philoxenus Bishop of Mabbogh, A.D. 485–519. Vol. II. Introduction, Translation, etc. (London, 1894) 29–31. For Pantaleon, the process of apprehension is also indirect, “You illuminate our intellectual eyes of the heart, so that we should know, and apprehend in the mind and pronounce . . . the miracles of your majesty.” See his Nar. mir. max. Arch. Mich., II, PG 140: 575A. Much later, Damaskenos Stoudite (sixteenth century) wrote, “On account of this, open your spiritual and corporeal eyes, so that you can understand precisely what I am about to say.” (See his Θησαυρός [Venice, 1838] 185.)

and to Michael, and then raising one's hands and eyes to heaven say, "O Father, O Son, O Holy Ghost, through the ministry of Michael, help me, a sinful person" (4.11–13). He then poured water into the mouth of his child saying, rather alarmingly, "The God of the Christians, your power is truly great, Michael Archistrategos" (4.15–16).⁴⁸ The daughter of the pagan was forthwith healed, and the pagan with his entire household was baptized on the spot. Finally, he built there a small chapel in the name of Michael in order to shelter the holy source.

The statement of the subservience of Michael to God in the prayers of the pagan was part of the appeal of the miracle story in the eighth- and ninth-century "non-iconophile" context of debate over proper worship. Michael himself at a later point stated the source of his own power as he commanded the water to flow harmlessly into the chasm that he had opened in the name of the Trinity. Michael had made the water halt moments before by making the sign of the cross in the face of the rushing waters. These were statements then of a scale of access or "parrêsia" that communicated to the audience of the miracle story where Michael stood in the divine hierarchy, that is, under the command of God.

The holy man, Archippus, was at the ethical center of the miracle story in the sense that he described, in his faultless way of life and correct appeal to God, the proper model of behavior for the audience. This ethical model was fundamental to the structure of the miracle story in that the large part of the miracle story described the hermit's way of life and qualifications. Moreover, this character study provided the miracle story's "image" for Christians to try to imitate. The epiphany of the Archangel Michael in comparison was not described to the same degree as the character of the hermit, and Archippus also figured significantly in the encounter between angel and man after the epiphany. Nonetheless, nothing about Archippus would appear to be individualized. Even his name would seem to be borrowed from the Epistle to the Colossians (4:17).⁴⁹ Archippus came to the shrine of the Archangel, the narrator of the miracle story stated (5.6ff.), when he was only a precocious ten-year-old, having left his parents in Laodicea to take up the ascetic way of life.⁵⁰ In this way, ninety years after its foundation, the shrine got its first caretaker, Archippus.⁵¹ The description of his life after his commitment to Michael's shrine was largely undistinguished. It was apparently cobbled together from various ascetic sources and was mainly a remembrance of other familiar texts.⁵² Archippus's anonymity made him an "everyman" that all Christians could aspire to imitate.⁵³

48. See the Introduction on the overweening position Michael was put in by certain heterodox adherents at Chonae.

The Chonae miracle story described a way of life familiar to miracle stories for its guileless devotion and comfortless longevity. The narrator clearly wanted to convince the audience of Archippus's worthiness. Archippus spent the next sixty years perfecting himself in his vocation, his angelic way of life ("ἄσκησις ἀγγελική," 7.11 and 8.7).⁵⁴ He never ate bread or meat, nor did he bathe; he ate boiled wild plants without salt; he sprinkled his honorable body with three

49. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire Before 170 A.D., 469. According to P. Batti-fol, Studiorum patristicorum. Études d'ancienne littérature chrétienne, 2 vols. (Paris, 1889–1890) I:33, this hermit in the hagiography is perhaps a true survival of the real Archippus mentioned at Col. 4:17.

50. A. G. Elliott, Roads to Paradise. Reading the Lives of the Early Saints (Hanover and London, 1987) 77ff., has described certain characteristics of the childhood of hagiographic heroes.

51. See C. Mango, "Germia: A Postscript," in JöB 41(1991):298–99, on προσμονᾶριος.

52. Some examples taken from the Lausiac History of Palladius (ca. 363–ca. 431): The Lausiac History of Palladius, ed. C. Butler, 2 vols. (Cambridge, 1898–1904) II:15–16, 16–17, 29, 48, 60–61, and Bonnet xxii n1, for others.

53. I follow this idea in hagiography, liturgy and art in my "Holy Man, Supplicant and Donor: On Representations of the Miracle of the Archangel Michael at Chonae," Mediaeval Studies 59(1997):173–82.

54. Elliott, Roads to Paradise, 132ff., has noted the opposition of nature and culture with regard to the position of the hermit. On the topos of monks as angels, see P. S. Frank, ΑΓΓΕΛΙΚΟΣ ΒΙΟΣ. Begriffsanalytische und begriffsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum "Engelgleichen Leben" im frühen Mönchtum (Münster, 1964). And Peter Brown's remarks on the degendering of monks through the simile of angelic qualities has interesting possibilities. See "The Rise and Function of the Holy Man in Late Antiquity, 1971–1997," J ECS 6(1998): 371–72. The confrontation of monk and angel at Chonae, in literature and art, also has a potential for elevation of the everyman Archippus. Raised to exalted company, he joins these celestial ranks through his extra-terrestrial vocation.

measures of water one day out of three, and in this way refreshed his soul; for clothing he wore two sacks and he slept on stones with a pillow filled with thorns; never did he relax, or reveal his body, all the while guarding his stainless soul from belonging to the other one (that is, the devil). The value of such an anonymous portrait at the center of this text lay in Archippus's quality as a model for imitation. Not everyone would be capable of this demanding way of life. At an elevated level, Archippus figured as an exemplar who might be out of reach to many in his worthiness but who at least presented an ideal of approach to the Archangel and, most important, of answered prayer.⁵⁵

Archippus's reaction to the threat of the pagans is instructive. The group of several thousand, seething with hatred and envy of Archippus, the shrine, and their patron, were impressively bestial, and were thus fundamentally distinct from the holy man. They roared like lions (8.15) and gnashed their teeth in working out their wicked designs.⁵⁶ As Archippus saw the designs of the devil and the unclean things of the idolaters, he attempted to counter the base workings of the pagans by going into the church where he fell as if dead. He beseeched God and the Archangel Michael to guard the shrine from the approaching water, and spent ten days neither eating nor drinking nor raising himself from the floor. He said,

I do not depart from this church nor do I leave off from prayer but I will die by this water. For I believe that my God will save me from faintness and tempestuousness through the agency of the Archangel Michael so that it will make no mark either on this holy shrine or on this land . . . (13.10–14).⁵⁷

55. The idea of the holy man as exemplar, of course, has deep roots in Late Antique and Byzantine society, and it also informed the iconoclastic image of the ideal Christian discussed in chapter 2. On the holy man in Late Antiquity, see M. Vessey, "The Demise of the Christian Writer and the Remaking of 'Late Antiquity': From H.-I. Marrou's Saint Augustine (1938) to Peter Brown's Holy Man (1983)," J ECS 6(1998):403–11.

56. In the Menologium Basilianum (late tenth/early eleventh century), PG 117:33C. Also, Bonnet 3.9 and 5.3.

57. Chrysippus (ca. 405–479) described Daniel and his preparations for the epiphany (Dan. 10:2–3): "In those days I Daniel was in mourning three whole weeks. I ate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth, neither did I anoint myself at all, till

For ten days, the pagans stored up the water behind their dams and on the tenth day they unleashed the rivers. Archippus, hearing the advancing waters crush the rocks, intensified his prayers, and wet with tears called on God once more, reciting Psalm 93, particularly lines 3–5:

The floods have lifted up, O Lord, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves. The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea. Thy testimonies are very sure: holiness becometh thine house, O Lord for ever.⁵⁸

When Archippus had finished the Psalm, there came from outside a great clap of thunder and the Archistrategos came “to that place, standing on the head of the impenetrable rock” (14.17–18). Archippus’s access to the Archangel, his recommendation to “parrêsia,” was founded on his unimpeachable way of life, and proved by the Archangel’s intervention on his behalf. Archippus “pursues the angelic life while in the flesh” and, therefore, was worthy of visions (24.7).⁵⁹

The goal in devotion to Michael was an access from which benefit derives, and this access was made possible through the paradigm of approach present in the miracle story. This conclusion was latent in the anonymous version and explicit in later versions of the miracle. “Therefore truly we shall imitate this wondrous Archippus, this worthy one himself, [who] on account of his excellence was made most familiar to the great Archangel Michael and was revealed a vision. . . .”⁶⁰ Only the just and righteous were allowed into the presence of the angels, for protection and revelation, as Paul warned in three whole weeks were fulfilled.” He then went on to describe what Daniel saw at Dan. 10:5, 12:5, and Michael’s identification at 10:12–13. See A. Sigalas, “Χρυσίππου πρεσβυτέρου Ἐγκώμιον εἰς Ἀρχάγγελον Μιχαήλ,” EEBS 3(1926):90.17ff.

58. In the Theodore Psalter (1066), British Museum Add. 19.352, fol. 125r, the scene of the miracle at Chonae illustrates just this passage from Psalm 93. See S. Der Nersessian, L’illustration des psautiers grecs du Moyen Age. II. Londres, Add. 19.352 (Paris, 1970) 46, fig. 203.

59. Here Sissinius, Acta apparitionis in Chonis, 9, AASS Sept. 8:44F, “βίον ἰσάγγελον ἐν σαρκὶ μετερχόμενος.”

60. Sissinius, Acta apparitionis in Chonis, 18, AASS Sept. 8:47B.

1 Corinthians 11:10.⁶¹ The miracle was proof of the promise made on proper approach for all worshippers, exemplified by the generalized but scrupulous Archippus. The only miracle performed by Archippus was the successful answering of his extensive prayer, and for that one power he was worthy of emulation.⁶²

Auzépy has noted the lack of miracles performed by subjects of saints' lives of the eighth and ninth centuries.⁶³ Although Archippus was not himself active in good works in a community, the legend dated from before Iconoclasm, and must have retained some of its original elements. Its rewriting and elaboration in the eighth century must have been connected to the contemporary appeal of the legend. In the Chonae miracle story, it is significant that the central character lacks any miraculous power. Archippus's abilities were restricted to, and made laudable by, a holy life and energetic prayer.

Some modern commentators, typically historians of the nineteenth century, have criticized the miracle story of Chonae for its lack of inventiveness, focusing on the generalized portrait of Archippus, a holy man with no real personality. This generalization works to a purpose, however, presenting a behavior meant to persuade its audience of the best route to fulfilled entreaty. Commentators have accused the narrator of the anonymous version of being artless, rude in style, and incomplete in knowledge of the event and region.⁶⁴ However, repetition of details in miracle stories and saints' lives, often cited derogatorily by modern commentators, comply with audience expectations of recognizable patterns.⁶⁵ In the mind of the writ-

61. See J.A. Fitzmeyer, "A New Feature of Qumrân Angelology and the Angels of 1 Cor. XI:10," New Testament Studies n.s. 4(1957/8):55–56. The idea of the unblemished being allowed into the presence of the angels is one found in Jewish apocrypha and the Qumran texts, although with a visionary quality not often found in the Christian texts; see G. Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English (Harmondsworth, Middlesex, 1962) 76.

62. Contrast the lack of Archippus's own power with examples of the might some saints do exhibit given by R. Browning, "The 'Low Level' Saint's Life in the Early Byzantine World," in The Byzantine Saint, ed. S. Hackel (London, 1981) 122.

63. Auzépy, "L'analyse littéraire et l'historien," 60, and Ševčenko, "The Hagiography of the Iconoclast Period," 120ff.

64. For example, see Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire Before 170 A.D., 468, and Bonnet vi.

65. See Elliott, Roads to Paradise, and also Holy Women of the Syrian Orient, ed. S.A. Harvey and S. Brock (Berkeley, 1987) 13ff.

ers of miracle stories and saints' lives, edification—as well as “access”—was the key to these texts, and ethical truth was far more important than historical accuracy. The aim of the miracle story of Chonae was not to provide a topographical survey or an historically accurate document: rather it was to provide a model for imitation in veneration and a confirmation of the proximity of the Archangel at a given site. For this reason, the later writers of the miracle at Chonae of the ninth and tenth centuries did not alter the basic structure of the anonymous version but merely added their own flourishes to a successful text.⁶⁶ And it must also be stressed that the miracle story could have posed no threat to the church after 843; images and idolatry do not figure, but the text provided a portrait of a holy way of life and seemingly angel worship which became very popular indeed after Iconoclasm.⁶⁷

A further similarity of the Chonae miracle story with “non-iconophile” saints' lives was the importance placed on references to Hebrew scripture. The prophets, patriarchs, and kings of Hebrew scripture figured in the texts Auzépy discussed, rather than models derived from the saints of Church tradition.⁶⁸ The encounter of holy man and angel at Chonae, as described in the miracle story, was very

66. See Bonnet xii, on the working methods of Metaphrastes and Sissinius.

67. Archippus's prayer is a fruitful act for angelic intervention and the active element in his piety is recognized in depictions by his gesture of imprecation, as well as the accompanying inscription. In the representation of the scene in the Church of the Asomatoi at Archanes on Crete from 1315/6, the inscription accompanying the image states that the miracle occurred “because of Archippus's prayers.” See S. Koukiales, Τὰ θαύματα—Ἐμφάνισεις τῶν Ἀγγέλων καὶ Ἀρχαγγέλων στὴν Βυζαντινὴ Τέχνη τῶν Βαλκανίων (Athens, 1989) 70, “ΘΑΥΜΑ ΤΟ ΤΩΝ ΕΝ Τ(ΑΙΣ) ΧΩΝΑΙΣ <ΝΑΟΝ ΤΟΥ> ΜΙΧΑΗΛ/ΤΟΥ ΑΡΧΙΣΤΡΑΤΗΓΟΥ> ΔΙ ΕΥΧΩΝ ΑΡΧΙΠΠΙΟΥ.”

Ironically, the sixteenth-century hagiographer, Damaskenos Stoudite, states that Archippus prayed to an icon for the intervention of the Archangel in the face of the pagan floods. See his Θησαυρός, 198.

A further irony is evident in the frescoes, ca. 1500, in the Church of Cosmas and Damian, Palaiochorio in the Troodos, Cyprus. In these frescoes, the donor has supplanted Archippus and is represented before the Archangel in the miracle at Chonae. See S. Gabelić, “The Iconography of the Miracle at Chonae. An Unusual Example from Cyprus,” Zograf 20(1989):95–103, and Peers, “Holy Man, Supplicant and Donor.”

68. Auzépy, “L'analyse littéraire et l'historien,” 58ff. See, however, the remarks of D. Krueger, “Typological Figuration in Theodoret of Cyrrhus's Historia Religiosa and the Art of Postbiblical Narrative,” J ECS 5(1997):393–417.

much within the scriptural structure of divine epiphany as found in the accounts of Moses, Joshua, Daniel and Isaiah in Hebrew scripture.⁶⁹ Furthermore, the encounter indicated the difficulties—often described in Hebrew scripture—attendant in confronting and perceiving an angelic being. Archippus weathered this confrontation and emerged as not unworthy of comparison to ancient examples of witnesses to epiphany; he did not worship the Archangel but humbly followed orders, and afterwards expressed gratitude for the safeguarding of the shrine and his own escape.

The Vita of Leo of Catania, dating to the first half of the ninth century, presented behavior which contrasts starkly with Archippus's propriety. In this miracle story, a magus by the name of Heliodorus introduced idolatry into the city in the form of an idol (ξόανον) of an aerial deity; the idol was also designated as a "sign" (στοιχείον), recalling a talisman through which a demon works and, more generally, the magic arts Heliodorus practiced.⁷⁰ Auzépy interpreted this episode as an inversion whereby the iconoclastic sympathies of the saint's life were revealed.⁷¹ The antagonist of the saint's life, Heliodorus, was a magician, that is, one who worked wonders or even miracles; significantly, he also worshipped idols. Auzépy sees idols in this context to mean any image, and so denoting all image worshippers, since Heliodorus was intended as an iconophile anti-hero in the saint's life; the aerial deity was also strikingly suggestive of all images of winged beings, notably angels. Although not delineated to the same degree as Heliodorus, Leo of Catania, the real hero of the text, derived his sanctity from his social standing as priest and his good deeds which did not include miracles or image worship. Moreover, Leo replaced the statue which Heliodorus worshipped with a cross, the favored iconoclastic sign.⁷²

69. On this structural similarity, see also chapter 5.

70. Acconcia Longo, "La vita de S. Leone di Catania," 89.21–26 (#8). And see also C. Blum, "The Meaning of στοιχείον and its Derivatives in the Byzantine Age. A Study in Byzantine Magic," Eranos 44(1946):315–25.

71. Auzépy, "L'analyse littéraire et l'historien," 62ff.

72. Acconcia Longo, "La vita de S. Leone di Catania," 97.1–7 (#18).

In this sense, too, Archippus could be considered to be a hero of the iconoclastic cause: his way of life was the focus of the miracle story rather than any miraculous deeds or interventions. The standard of behavior and the rigor of his prayer were clearly the persuasive means by which the audience was meant to be won over to a proper and efficacious worship. Moreover, like Abraham, Archippus did not make an image in commemoration.⁷³ He guarded the memory of a difficult but enlightening experience in his soul. Finally, he did not lapse into worship of the Archangel himself, and fall into pagan ways, as iconoclastic sources forewarned.

The patriarch Nicephorus (ca. 750–828) fully agreed with the position on idols and worship expressed by the fourth-century anti-image theologians Macarius Magnes and Epiphanius: one should not make idols of angels after the pagan fashion, neither should one worship them. Yet Nicephorus was unwilling to dismiss images commemorating interventions from worship on this account. On the one hand, for Nicephorus and other iconophiles, material objects were appropriate intermediaries for directing honor toward such spiritual beings as angels. Iconoclasts, on the other hand, denied the value of such distracting intermediaries, particularly in the case of such unrepresentable entities. For them, angels and their images had too many inherent dangers for Christians to negotiate. Rather, listening to the text—scripture or, as here, miracle stories—and hearkening to its message was proper and intellectual worship that allowed the reader/listener to ascend to spiritual truths without hindrance. Iconoclastic theology simply could not countenance any mediating steps, especially material ones, between worshipper and spiritual reality. Ethical instruction through persuasive texts such as miracle stories and saints' lives created a “true image” for the behavior and beliefs of conscientious Christians.

73. According to Sissinius, after Michael's disappearance Archippus retired to the shrine and returned to prayer. "The venerable one saw him as if a flame of fire streamed up into the heavens, [and] filled with puzzlement and fear, he went back to sing psalms in the holy shrine, 'God has sent his angel and liberated and saved me from the snares of the beasts, and he guarded his sacred shrine from the inundation of the waters.'" See Acta apparitionis in Chonis, 18, AASS Sept. 8:47AB.

Although the Chonae miracle story must have been written or reworked as a consequence of the debates over worship in the eighth century, it was not dismissed after Iconoclasm. The text provided valid models of worship within the iconophile position as well. Indeed, the miracle was retold by Pantaleon in the late ninth/early tenth century and Sissinius and Symeon Metaphrastes in the tenth century; all of these redactions depended upon the anonymous text of the eighth century. Furthermore, the iconography of the miracle is first found in the tenth century, and it became popular thereafter, as the gorgeous twelfth-century icon from Sinai can attest (fig. 15).⁷⁴ The text did not dismiss images, but did describe a successful and orthodox form of worship; in this sense, Archippus was the miracle story’s “true image.” The Chonae story’s models of worship had relevance for both sides of this controversy, and, like the Vita of Leo of Catania, they must be seen within the context of debates over images of aerial deities and angels both. And the issue of angelolatry and idolatry are also present in this text as at Chonae since for iconoclasts the two forms of unsuitable worship were inseparable.

One final example of a miracle story including angels serves to show that in the period following Iconoclasm proper worship was again integrated with images, thereby coming full circle with the means of healing described in the seventh-century collection of miracles by Artemius. A miracle that occurred at the church of Michael at Eusebios in Constantinople, described by Pantaleon in his Narration of the Miracles of the Mighty Archangel Michael, illustrated this transition from the behavioral model of the Chonae miracle story to orthodox worship that includes icons.⁷⁵ The miracle occurred immediately following the reintroduction of images in the reign of Michael III (842–867) under the regency of his mother, Theodora.

74. The first extant representation of the miracle is found in the Church of St. John, north chapel #4, at Güllü Dere (ca. 900). See N. Thierry, Haut moyen-âge en Cappadoce. Les églises de la région de Cavusin (Paris, 1983) 155–56, pl. 71; C. Jolivet-Lévy, Les églises byzantines de Cappadoce. Le programme iconographique de l’abside et ses abords (Paris, 1991) 37ff. The earliest example of an illustration of the miracle at Chonae, in the canonical scheme, is found in the late tenth-/early eleventh-century Menologium of Basil II (Vat. gr. 1613, page 17). The iconography of the miracle is treated thoroughly by Gabelić, “The Iconography of the Miracle at Chonae,” 96–98.

The story described Marcianus, a candle maker, and a godly servant of the shrine of Michael. Marcianus was never ill, according to the miracle story, but if he felt the slightest pain he needed only go into the church in order to recover. Once, however, Marcianus became ill and went to the shrine, but not before he was convinced by one of the doctors who congregated around the church to wear a poultice with some medicine. That night Marcianus slept in the church, as was the custom at this shrine, and, as in an ecstasy, he saw a terrifying vision. All the doors of the church were suddenly flung open and towards him came “a fearful man as out of the heaven, with a rush descending on a white and terrible steed.” This man got down from the horse and entered the church with an escort, dressed in the costume of court officials. The church also became suffused with an unworldly odor. After a moment, the man came to Marcianus’s cot and inspecting the recumbent man found the doctor’s medicine. He asked Marcianus what it was and identified himself by demanding who had dared bring such medicine into his house. Marcianus told him, and Michael sent his minions off to find the unfortunate doctor. Michael then took Marcianus to a candle hanging before an icon of the Archangel, dipped his finger in the oil, and made the sign of the cross on the patient’s forehead. Michael got back on his horse and rode off into the heavens. Straightaway all the doors of the church closed by themselves and Marcianus was left to marvel.

In the morning, Marcianus told his vision to the deacon who, seeing the cross on the man’s forehead, believed all he had been told. The deacon then sent to discover what had happened to the doctor

75. Pantaleon, Narr. mir. max. Arch. Mich., XXVI–XXVIII, PG 140:586A–8A, and F. Halkin, Inédits byzantins d’Ochrida, Candie et Moscou (Brussels, 1963) 147ff.

The text in praise of the Archangels Michael and Gabriel by Michael of Stoudios (late ninth century) also described the connection between icons and healing. See “Éloge des archanges Michel et Gabriel par Michel le Moine (BHG 1294a),” ed. T. Matantseva, JöB 46(1996):145 (XI.8).

and learned that the doctor had taken gravely ill during the night. Marcianus went to the doctor, saw his suffering, and ordered that the doctor be brought on his bed to the shrine of Michael to beg forgiveness and mercy. Marcianus re-enacted the method of healing with the oil and icon shown to him by Michael, and so offered the shrine's model for successful healing; forthwith, the doctor was miraculously relieved of his suffering.

Clearly, this text fully integrated images and worship, a remarkable development when compared to the image-less miracle story of Michael at Chonae, and to the unflattering portrait of iconophile worship of angels' images in the Vita of Leo of Catania. Behavior was not in the first place the means of gaining an epiphany in the episode described by Pantaleon, but the Archangel himself demonstrated the methods of efficacious healing; this method of approach was convincing by its results and was henceforth reproduced (we are led to believe) at the shrine of Michael at Eusebios. In fact, the shrine with its icon and oil provided the only proper method, as the unfortunate doctor learned.

The assimilation of proper behavior and images was the outcome of this long-standing debate on worship. Icons did not exclude other approaches, like Christian virtue as a "true image," but they were now an inextricable component in a complete Christian ethic. Indeed, the ancient Christian custom of accepting images in worship that iconophiles defended in the ninth century has been seen in practice through these miracle stories and saints' lives: despite inherent difficulties in gaining likeness in art, images were granted relation to their models through practice, through the consensus of worship and, most dramatically, through the miraculous example of Michael himself in the shrine at Eusebios.

Five

APPREHENDING THE ARCHANGEL MICHAEL

MANUFACTURING SIGNS OF PRESENCE

This chapter examines the means by which hagiographical writings, that is, miracle stories, attempt to describe the presence and appearances of the Archangel Michael. Dealing with several miracle stories at some length demonstrates the ways in which each text persuades its audience of the Archangel's benign proximity. The tales of the miracle at Chonae contribute particularly in this examination since the "pre-history" of this cult is relatively clear and the shrine's activities during the Byzantine period were famous. Discussing other miracle stories, namely of the sanctuary at Monte Gargano in southern Italy and of the shrine in Asia Minor described by Michael Psellus (1018–1081?), allows certain structural similarities to emerge: the miracle stories reveal the Archangel Michael's elusive, elemental force active in a landscape and consequently bind him to places to strengthen expectation of worshippers' devotional return.

Several tales of the miracle at Chonae are extant, and, as accounts of the most popular miracle of Michael in the Byzantine world, they deserve special attention. All narrate the same series of events: a group of pagans attempt to destroy the shrine of Michael at Chonae along with the guardian, Archippus, by flooding the vicinity. At the last moment, Michael appears and creates a chasm into which the water is forced to flow. The shrine and its newly fashioned spring henceforth work wonders.

The dating of the earliest miracle story cannot be decided with any finality, but more weight should be given to a late date, preferably in the eighth century, since the “lapses” in topographic detail in the miracle story point to a place of composition distant from the shrine itself and a time after the cult has been firmly established. This anonymous text, Narration of the Miracle Accomplished at Chonae by the Archangel Michael, was surely a reworking, however, of an early legend, since the cult of angels, and especially Michael, had an ancient history around Chonae. That the miracle story was re-worked in the eighth century attests to the popularity of the cult in the Byzantine world, but also to a contemporary relevance of its subject.¹

One can be certain, just the same, that the “inconsistencies” and “lapses” in the miracle story work to a purpose and communicate important information about the cult of the Archangel. Indeed, the stories of the miracle of the Archangel Michael at Chonae were persuasive texts, intended to communicate models of proper and successful devotion to an audience. The texts also worked to convince an audience of access to Michael, and through him God, guaranteed by the miracle and appearance of the Archangel at a holy place.

The quality of familiarity with the Archangel, however, is of a different order than that derived from “lives” of the mortal ranks of saints. As Symeon Metaphrastes (d. ca. 1000) wrote in the prologue to his version of the miracle at Chonae (20.8–12),

It is a great deal more beneficial to describe the details of the bodiless powers, to proclaim their heavenly portents and marvels. For by this how much more is familiarity and consort with God and these [powers] increased, by this how much greater the beneficence we harvest in these narratives concerning these [powers].²

1. See chapter 4.

2. All citations in the text refer to Bonnet.

The key term in this passage is “parrêsia” (παρρησία), which I have translated here as “consort” but which could also be rendered as “access” or “patronage” or even “boldness.”³ Although this “access” is not unique to the cult of the Archangel Michael, the incomprehensible nature of the Archangel made “access” more difficult than to the mortal saints. The cult of the Archangel Michael posed special problems for all aspects of devotion, based upon the unique, difficult nature of the angels and the archangels. The elemental qualities of Michael, which removed him from the more easily understood traits and operations of the once human saints, compounded this difficulty.

A topos of texts about the angels is the incomprehensibility of angelic beings and the insuperable distance that separates the angels from humanity. Despite its commonplace aspect, the topos has real meaning as a defining characteristic of the angels and archangels. Michael Psellus in his narrative in praise of the Archangel Michael stated that it is difficult to describe the deeds of humanity, but having surpassed any of these deeds the Archangel lies above in measure.⁴ Moreover, the Archangel remains beyond the praise deriving from speech, and is beyond the power of both the artful and artless.

3. On parrêsia, see E. Peterson, “Zur Bedeutungsgeschichte von παρρησία,” in Reinhold Seeberg Festschrift, ed. W. Koepp, 2 vols. (Leipzig, 1929) I:283–97; G. Scarpata, Parresia. Storia del termine e delle sue traduzioni in latino (Brescia, 1963); P. S. Frank, ΑΓΓΕΛΙΚΟΣ ΒΙΟΣ. Begriffsanalytische und begriffsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum “Engelgleichen Leben” im frühen Mönchtum (Münster, 1964) 67–68; G. J. M. Bartelink, “Quelques observations sur ΠΑΡΡΗΣΙΑ dans la littérature paléo-chrétienne,” in Graecitas et latinitas christianorum primaeva, suppl. 3 (Nijmegen, 1970) 5–57, 155–57; C. Mango, Byzantium. The Empire of New Rome (London, 1980) 159.

4. On this encomium, see Michael Psellus, Oratio in Archangelum Michaellem, in Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, ed. E. A. Fisher (Stuttgart and Leipzig, 1994) 230–56, as well as E. A. Fisher, “Nicomedia or Galatia? Where Was Psellus’ Church of the Archangel Michael?” in Gonimos. Neoplatonic and Byzantine Studies Presented to Leendert G. Westerlink at 75, ed. J. Duffy and J. Peradotto (Buffalo, 1988) 175–87, and C. Mango, “La croix dite de Michel le Cérulaire et la croix de Saint-Michel de Sykéon,” CA 36(1988): 41–49.

This topos of the author avowing inability to describe is also “an aesthetic choice bearing moral value.” See D. Krueger, “Hagiography as an Ascetic Practice in the Early Christian East,” The Journal of Religion 79(1999):216. But “authorial self-denigration” goes one step further for angels.

In other words, Michael surpasses the abilities of language to describe and honor. The difficulties of understanding are crucial since, as Psellus stated, the seeing and the hearing of a paradoxical, incomprehensible event establishes true faith.⁵ The incomprehensible nature of the appearances and the miracles of the Archangel must be understood in ways outside of the purely logical. Faith, in the face of the inexplicable event communicated by the miracle story, is the first step to comprehension. For Pantaleon, the process of apprehension is also indirect, “You illuminate our intellectual eyes of the heart, so that we should know, and apprehend in the mind and pronounce . . . the miracles of your majesty.”⁶ The difficulties inherent in the nature of the Archangel made for special problems of apprehension. For this reason, a textual and devotional footing distinct from the mortal saints determined access (παρρησία) to the Archangel.

Focusing on the generalized portrait of Archippus, a holy man with no real personality, some modern commentators have criticized the anonymous text describing the miracle at Chonae for its lack of inventiveness. Archippus came to the shrine as a boy and, as the miracle story describes it, he led an austere and, with one exception, an uneventful life. This generalization works to a purpose, however, in that it presents a behavior meant to persuade its audience of the best route to fulfilled entreaty. The narrator of the anonymous version has also been charged with being artless, rude in style, and incomplete in knowledge of the event and region.⁷ The burden of nineteenth-century rationalism doubtless blinkered these scholars to some of the positive aspects of the literary tradition of the Chonae miracle. Hopefully, some of these aspects will emerge from the discussion to follow.

5. Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 231.3ff. and 240.224–26.

6. Narratio miraculorum maximi archangeli Michaelis, II, PG 140:575AB.

7. W. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire Before 170 a.d. (New York and London, 1893) 468. See also Bonnet, who comments on the lack of coherence and the implausible additions: “nec arte nec ingenio excellentis nec omnino tamen utroque carentis” (vi), and “Genus dicendi tale est fere quale ab eiusmodi narratore expectes, rude et impolitum, modo tritum et volgare modo arcessitum, modo humile et abiectum modo poeticis verbis infucatum, nonnullis locis etiam soloecum aut barbarum” (vii). The hagiography is not, however, without “viribus et nervis” (vii).

The manner in which the anonymous miracle story described the topography of the area of Chonae is undeniably imprecise. For example, the apostles Philip and John appear at Chairetopa, a town otherwise without importance,⁸ and predict the Archangel's appearance in the future; the story places Chairetopa some miles to the southeast of the shrine and is too far distant to be the site where Michael appeared and the famous church was built. The anonymous redactor of the miracle story evidently assumed that Chairetopa was in the vicinity of Chonae.⁹ Yet the etymology of the toponym may be worth remarking because the place name may then refer generally to the place of the encounter, a station then proleptic to the meeting of Michael and his client. Egregious, too, is the way in which the redactor describes the rivers in the area of Chonae.¹⁰ For example, the Lykokapros is a nonsensical combination of two rivers, and the Lykos itself is said to flow in a direction which is clearly errant. Because of these errors, William Ramsay and others have been willing to accept this miracle story as a kind of naive aetiology of a half-forgotten event concerning earthquake and water supplies.¹¹

8. K. Belke and N. Mersich, Phrygien und Pisidien, Tabula Imperii Byzantini, vol. 7 (Vienna, 1990) 221.

9. And this must have been the case, despite the inexactitude of the redactor's description. Chairetopa may have been to the south or west of Colossae. See L. Robert, Villes d'Asie Mineure. Études de géographie antique (Paris, 1935) 105ff., and further 105–106 n4: "Il n'y a rien à tirer de précis, pour la topographie, de cet absurde babillage; le rédacteur ne connaissait évidemment pas les lieux de façon précise. Sur la valeur topographique nulle de ce récit [cf. Bonnet and Ramsay]. Une fois que j'ai fixé le site de Keretapa, la question ne se pose plus tout à fait de la même manière; l'hypothèse qu'avait d'abord envisagée M. Bonnet ... s'adapte de façon curieuse à la localisation qu'il ne soupçonnait pas; mais je ne crois pas que ce petit problème vaille la peine d'être repris. De ce Miracle on conclura seulement que Chonae et Keretapa devaient être voisines."

10. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 470–71, and see Bonnet xxviii ff.

11. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 471–72, offers three possibilities for the writing of this legend. First, "Some are mere inventions to explain a name. In this way a tale might be made to explain the name Khonai, 'funnels,' as derived from a channel or funnel through which a neighbouring river flows." Second, "In many cases old legends, told originally of some pagan deity, were transferred to a Christian saint." Third, "Some legends were founded on historical facts, which occurred in Christian times." Ramsay favors the last and cites ancient authors on his behalf. Herodotus described Colossae as a place "wherein the

Regardless of the possible historicity of events giving rise to the cult, the anonymous account of the miracle is clearly dependent upon an amount of artifice for its persuasive power.¹² Its purpose is to provide the Archangel with a comprehensive history, an apostolic initiation, and an open ending; in this view, the text is notably successful. The tale takes place in a plausible geography—despite the apparent inconsistencies—which in the course of the story is miraculously altered to a form more or less familiar to contemporaries. At the end of the miracle story, the rivers ran their proper course, the places had the right names, the crevices spewed their healing water—in other words, the actions of the Archangel completely transformed and purified the area (in the text's terms). The text, then, is not a failed document of unlikely aetiology but rather a reinforcement of the object of Michael's cult, which was to make the angel apprehensible and grounded in a specific place from which his bodiless might emanates. Michael assumes, therefore, a "power base" for his cult.¹³ river Lycus plunges into a cleft in the earth out of sight, till it appears again about five furlongs away and issues like the other river into the Maeander" (7.30; trans. A.D. Godley, 7 vols. [London, 1922] III:345). Pliny wrote in the Natural History, "At Colossae is a river, and bricks when cast into it are of stone when taken out" (31.20; trans. W.H.S. Jones, 10 vols. [London, 1963] VIII:395).

And Bonnet xxvi, says that this hagiography is not only a fable (of which this is an example "luculentissimum") but also an "αἰτιολογικόν." It is not just for admiration and exhortation, "sed ab uno aliquo homine excogitari, qui, cum ad miraculum aliquod mens conversa sit et causae cognoscendae studio capta, non rem ipsam qualem oculis adspexit et animo exornavit verbis splendidis exprimit, sed quod quaerendo et ratiocinando de rei cause effecisse sibi videtur quasi memoriae proditum et certum exploratumque credulis auditoribus proponit."

12. Evelyn Patlagean warned against those who use a literal approach, seen to some extent in Ramsay's approach to the hagiography, and who see hagiographies "as a mere stringing together, with some variations in their order, of a limited number of legendary themes, among which the authors, who were both stupid and truthful, had inserted certain facts which were the only elements worthy of attention." Using this method exclusively, she adds, "substitutes for the dynamic coherence of a living work a fictive chimera in which cock-and-bull stories and reliable observations are inexplicably interwoven." See E. Patlagean, "Ancient Byzantine Hagiography and Social History," in Saints and Their Cults. Studies in Religion, Sociology, Folklore, and History, ed. S. Wilson, trans. J. Hodgkin (Cambridge, 1983) 101 [= "Ancien hagiographie byzantine et histoire sociale," Annales 23(1968):106–26, and Structure sociale, famille, chrétienté à Byzance, IXe-XIe siècle (London, 1981) item V].

13. See Mango, Byzantium, 157.

Localizing the immaterial Archangel was a goal of cult practice, a strategy reflected in the texts of the miracle in several ways. For instance, the miracle takes place at Colossae or Chairetopa, but miracle stories inevitably describe the change of the name of the site. In the so-called Menologium of Basil II (late tenth / early eleventh century), a compilation of brief saints' lives according to the liturgical calendar, the tale begins in a deceptively colorless manner. The narrator says, "in a town called Chonae, once Colossae ..." and he then proceeds to explain how this name change took place.¹⁴ Michael appears to his hermit and creates a cleft in the rock into which the water flows, more miraculously than before. The final sentence is, "Thereafter the place was called Chonae." This text is a condensed version of the transformational capabilities of the Archangel, in this case for landscape. The two topographical markers, the setting stated at the outset which signals a change and the final sentence which signals the reason for the change, are parentheses within which Michael's safeguarding of shrine and hermit take place. These markers, furthermore, give the narrative a sense of coherence and, importantly for a healing shrine, continuity.

In the texts, furthermore, the sense of place is also determined at a more fundamental level than narrative. The semantic play on "chone" (funnel) and its verbal form "choneuo" plant Michael's action firmly in the landscape from the moment of his intervention and into the future.¹⁵ The anonymous redactor has Michael commanding the water into its course at the height of the drama, "Fling yourself into this funnel, and be funnelled into this chasm, and the splendour of this holy place will be throughout ..." (19.5–7). In the version of the miracle written by Symeon Metaphrastes, Michael, before striking the rock, says to the water, "Funnel yourself into the funnel" (27.24). In the Menologium text, Michael in the penultimate sentence "funnels the water," and in the last the narrator tells us that the place was henceforth called "funnels" or Chonae.

14. Menologium Basilianum, PG 117:33CD: "In a town called Chonae, once Colossae, there was a man by the name of Archippos, prudent and God fearing. He settled at the spring, which gushed forth on account of the guardianship of the Archistrategos, and because of the many miracles, and conversions and baptisms which occurred at the spring, Archippos provoked the jealousy of the Hellenes, who could not bear to see the wonderful miracles. Gnashing their teeth over the venerable agiasma and over Archippos they gathered a great many sympathisers, and damned two rivers, and mixing them together, unleashed them directly to overturn the church, agiasma and Archippos. As Archippos heard the roaring of the waters, he called on the Archistrategos to help. And straightaway he appeared and struck the rock with his staff which he held and he funneled the water into the opening. Thereafter the place was called Chonae."

15. See H.G. Liddell and R. Scott, A Greek-English Lexicon (Oxford, 1968) s.v. χοανεύω, iv [= χονεύω].

This play is common, in some form, to all versions of the miracle. The pun binds Michael's act precisely to exact properties of the site, in a region known for its uncertain geology, with fissures and hidden sources, now controlled and marked by Michael, as well as signifying an exact quality of the site as a place made salutary and benign by the extraordinary act of the Archangel.¹⁶ The nature of the act appears to create the name of the site, that is, Michael creates funnels and the place is henceforth known as "funnels." However, the miracle story's pseudo-etymology of "funnels," in linguistic terms, is "retro-motivated."¹⁷ The process of "retro-motivation" implies a paradoxical inversion since the name, here Chonae, determines the character of the event. The place, given new significance in the text, in fact limits Michael's own movements. The paradoxical operation

16. For E. Gothein, "L'arcangelo Michele, santo popolare dei Longobardi," Rassegna Pugliese di scienze, lettere ed arte 13(1896):108–109, the chasm created in the hagiography is the reason for the entire cult. It was the work of a demigod, and the impression "che qui si tratti di un culto naturale, è prodotta anche da tutto il resto: dalla sacra fonte e dalla figura fiammeggiante dell'angelo. È un fatto caratteristico, che solo la trasformazione ecclesiastica posteriore delle leggende, la quale va sotto il nome di Metafrasto, gli faccia sedare e respingere l'onde furiose col segno della croce.... Appunto la potenza personale dell'angelo e la trasformazione arbitraria della natura, per la qual cosa egli, più che qualunque santo umano, avvicinavasi alla natura divina, cosituiva l'attrattiva per la fantasia popolare."

Similarly, F. W. Hasluck, Letters on Religion and Folklore (London, 1926) 85ff., stated that Michael's connection with Chonae was with the chasm and not the spring. He saw Michael's role as primarily a "devil-dompter" at the mouth of hell; as the opponent of the devil, Michael took care of healings and madness.

17. P. Guiraud, "Étymologie et ethymologia (Motivation et rétro-motivation)," Poétique 11(1972):408: "Mais dans tous les exemples ici en cause le nom reprend ses droits et c'est lui qui motive le statut sémiologique du signifié: la forme crée le fond, le mot engendre la chose, par un procédé que l'on pourrait appeler 'rétro-motivation.'" And also, N. Struever, "Fables of Power," Representations 4(1983):112: "In retro-motivation, names create situations, narratives generate structures, words engender things ... the newly endowed word is then used as a proof of phenomenal character or event...."

both situates him and deprives him of initiative at the heart of his own act. Moreover, the predetermined quality of Michael's act is typologically reinforced by a parallel overtly made to Moses's miracle at Horeb (Ex. 17:6). This retro-motivation and typology indicate the inherent difficulties of describing an indescribable being and the processes by which he made his presence known.

Michael's imprint on the material world, here the physical realignment of his shrine and renewal of the miraculous qualities of the inexhaustible spring, is the only possible relic for a bodiless angel. The relic of an angel can only be negative, as the common epithets of the angels, bodiless (ἄσώματος) or immaterial (ἄύλος), are only negative attributes. At Chonae, the relic is not additive since nothing is left behind; Michael alters the landscape and in that way leaves traces of his immaterial presence. In the face of the natural uncertainties surrounding the Archangel, this alteration is the only positive proof possible. Moreover, the text promotes a place where regular exchange with the incomprehensible Archangel is possible and where a balance of prayer and reward is effected.¹⁸ Cult binds Michael to the site as the retro-motivated act embeds him within the very topography.

This structure of transformation and imprint is common to miracle stories concerning the Archangel Michael and is often an attribute of Michael's successful sanctuaries. For this reason, an examination of other miracle shrines and their texts situates this structure further in the cult of the Archangel Michael. The shrine of the Archangel Michael on Monte Gargano in Apulia in southern Italy has long been recognized as a descendant of the cult of Michael at Chonae.¹⁹ The miracle story of Michael at Gargano dates in its pres-

18. J. Walter, "St Demetrius: The Myroblytos of Thessalonika," Eastern Churches Review 5(1973):158 [= C. Walter, Studies in Byzantine Iconography (London, 1977) item V], notes the difficulties in dislodging Demetrius from his shrine at Thessalonike, and ventures that, paradoxically, this may have arisen from the fact that Demetrius was not there. The cult relied on proofs deriving from the ex voto images set up in his church. In contrast, Michael's cult relied on different kinds of material proofs commensurate with his formless nature.

19. See Gothein, "L'arcangelo Michele, santo popolare dei Longobardi," 111ff.; W. v. Rintelen, Kultgeographische Studien in der Italia Byzantina. Untersuchungen über die Kulte des Erzengels Michael und der Madonna di Constantinopli in Süditalien (Meisenheim am Glan, 1968) 3ff.; idem, "Kult- und Legendenwanderung von Ost nach West in frühen Mittelalter," Saeculum 22(1971):98; G. Otranto, "Il 'Liber de apparitione,' il santuario di San Michele sul ent form to the eighth or ninth century,²⁰ and a Greek version was written in the late ninth or early tenth century, a time of the Byzantine re-conquest of the region.²¹

The Monte Gargano miracle story comprises three distinct, and rather disjointed, sections. At the beginning of the tale, a bull strayed from the herd of a wealthy local landowner, Garganus, on the slopes of the mountain. Garganus set out in search of the animal himself and eventually found the bull in a cave. The hot-headed squire, Garganus, became incensed at the animal and fired an arrow at it, but this arrow inexplicably returned “as if breathed upon by wind,” and struck the sender instead.²² Garganus returned to town and told his story to the locals, who were astounded by the incident. When canvassed, the bishop undertook a fast of three days and nights to discover the hidden cause. On the third night, a vision of the Archangel Michael visited the bishop, and it told the bishop that Michael had returned the arrow. At this Michael identified himself,²³ and said that the reason for his intervention was that he wished “to dwell in this place on earth and guard all.” Going to the mountainside the next day the bishop and townsfolk found that two doors were cut into the face of the mountain.

In the next episode, Michael appeared in another dream of the bishop and predicted the victory of the Sipontini, and their allies the Beneventi, over their enemies, the “heathen” Neapolitans. The next Gargano e i Longobardi del Ducato di Benevento,” in Santuari e politica nel mondo antico, ed. M. Sordi (Milan, 1983) 241ff.

20. G. Otranto, “Il ‘Liber de apparitione’ e il culto di San Michele sul Gargano nella documentazione liturgica altomedievale,” VetChr 18(1981):44off.

21. This text was first reported by A. Petrucci, Una versione greco-bizantina dell'Apparitione Sancti Michaelis in Monte Gargano (Rome, 1955) and has been subsequently edited by Sandro Leanza. See also G. Otranto, “Per una metodologia della ricerca storico-agiografica: Il Santuario micheleico del Gargano tra Bizantini e Longobardi,” VetChr 25(1988):400ff.

22. Leanza 301.38–39, AASS Sept. 8:61C, and MGH 541.28–31. Otranto, “Il ‘Liber de apparitione,’” 217ff., sees a trace of the defeat of paganism in this episode, a kind of battle between Garganus, a local god perhaps, and the new occupant, Michael. Although it is true that Garganus is not called vir in the texts, neither is paganism mentioned; in the text's terms, Michael's redirection of the arrow is a sign of presence and also nomination.

23. Leanza 315, on ll.48–49, where terms very close to Matt. 2:13 are used, and the Greek text simply substitutes “ἀρχάγγελος” for “ἄγγελος,” and “ἀγιωτάτῳ ἐπισκόπῳ” for “Ἰωσήφ.”

day strange things happened on the mountain, amongst them rumblings like thunder, lightning and darkness.²⁴ The “pagan” enemies were frightened off by these inexplicable signs and the Sipontini enjoyed an “angelic victory.”²⁵ Ascending to the site of the doors, the locals entered the cave and found traces there of the Archangel’s presence—“a small trace, as if the footstep of a man, struck there in the marble.”²⁶ By means of the signs of his tracings, this church was called the “place of the footprints.”²⁷

After the third visitation of the Archangel, the shrine was completed. The bishop, wondering about the proper way to consecrate this unparalleled chapel, had another vision, and the Archangel himself told the bishop not to consecrate the church because, “I myself have put it in order and consecrated it. You need only come and approach with your entreaties since I am attending as master in that place.”²⁸ Michael told him to come the next day and he would at that time show them how that place would guide them. The bishop visited the next day and found at the same spot a chapel ready made, carved out of the living rock “as if by the hands of the Archangel” (fig. 18). The chapel was clearly not produced by human hands, the narrator remarks, because the chapel was so irregular and rough, so full of corners and angles, that only an Archangel could have manufactured it.²⁹ They also found there a red cloak covering the altar—recollecting Elijah’s abandoned mantle (2 Kings 2:13)—and a spring erupted nearby which became a famous healing source.³⁰

The structural similarities, in the means by which the immaterial Archangel is grounded and made more really present, are striking in

24. Leanza 303.83ff. and 315–16; AASS Sept. 8:61D.

25. Leanza 302.81–303.2.

26. AASS Sept. 8:61E, MGH 542.23–24, and Leanza 303.98ff.

27. Leanza 303.105–304.107. In Greek, the allusion to the imprint of the feet is more obvious since Apodonia is clearly a loan word within the Latin text. See Leanza 313.

28. Leanza 305.139–42. Compare MGH 542.39–543.3.

29. Leanza 306.156ff.; AASS Sept. 8:62AB; MGH 543.4–14.

30. Leanza 307.182–83, which recalls Matthew 4:24 (“And his fame went throughout all Syria: and they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatick, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them”); AASS Sept. 8:62BC; MGH 543.19ff.

Figure 18. Sanctuary of the Archangel Michael at Mt. Gargano, Apulia, Italy.
Photo: Biblioteca Comunale, Città di Monte Sant'Angelo.

the cases of Chonae and Gargano.³¹ In the Gargano miracle story, the first appearance of the Archangel brings about a renaming of the mountain, for now, “ex eventu,”³² the mountain is named after the wealthy Garganus. As at Chonae, Michael works at this nominative level and also transforms the holy site in a manner that specifically signals archangelic agency. The gradual construction of the chapel and his own heavenly consecration confirm Michael’s voluntary presence. The impression of Michael’s “body” is, furthermore, a dynamic relic, reductive and yet stamped at the focus of cult, the altar, a sign of immanence contained.³³ Footprints are an ancient sign of pres-

31. Rintelen, Kultgeographische Studien, 15.

32. AASS Sept. 8:60B. The identity of the figure of Garganus has been the source of much speculation. Most authors see Garganus as a remnant of some uncertain pagan deity Michael supplants. See, for an overview, Otranto, “Il ‘Liber de apparitione,’” 213ff., and especially 220ff., on the interesting parallels of the episode with Barlaam and the ass (Numbers 22:22ff.).

33. Footprints are common signs of presence in Greco-Roman sanctuaries throughout the Mediterranean, either of the divinity or of the worshipper (ambivalence is built into ence, and at Gargano the assurance is essential for an incorporeal being who has chosen a place on earth for his “fleeting abode.”³⁴ Furthermore, the inscription over the door of the church at Gargano reinforces the notion of the spot hallowed by contact with Michael by recalling Exodus 3:5, where Moses is ordered to take off his shoes on account of the holy ground.³⁵

As at Chonae, a moral directive functions in the miracle story that describes the behavior proper to receiving revelation and epiphany of angels. God has sent Michael, the Greek miracle story of Gargano states, as guardian for those who were worthy.³⁶ Inevitably the text presents a moral program for devotees to follow in order to be considered deserving. When Garganus descended with his mysteriously inflicted wound, he naturally appealed to the bishop.³⁷ The bishop then fasted in order to learn the cause, since, as in the case of Archipus, the rules for this kind of appeal were well established in scripture and in other texts. After the bishop had completed the fast, the Archangel visited the bishop in a dream, and he said, “let it be known to you that it occurred because I willed it. For I am the Arch-these signs). On this, see K. M. D. Dunbabin, “‘Ipsa deae vestigiae ...’ Footprints Divine and Human on Graeco-Roman Monuments,” Journal of Roman Archaeology 3(1990): 85–109. Christianity absorbed this feature of pagan religions by the fourth century, at least, as the shrine on the Mount of Olives built for the footprints of Christ shows. See B. Köting, “Fußspuren als Zeichen göttlicher Anwesenheit,” Boreas 6(1983):200–201.

For angels the sign of footsteps has a different meaning. The footsteps describe a fleeting presence made imminent and concrete. For instance, at Santa Maria in Aracoeli, Rome, the marble footsteps of the angel who appeared to Gregory the Great are kept. See M. M. Guarducci, “Le impronte del ‘Quo vadis’ e monumenti affini, figurati ed epigrafici,” Rendiconti. Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia 19(1942/4):315; and B. Pesci, “Il problema cronologico della Madonna di Aracoeli alla luce delle fonti,” RivAC 18(1941):53ff. In the case of the angels, footprints serve to give form to formless beings; they are simple, visible signs of past manifestation and constant presence.

34. Gothein, “L’arcangelo Michele,” 142; and see C. Angelillis, Il santuario del Gargano e il culto di S. Michele nel mondo, 2 vols. (Foggia, 1956) I:231.

35. Angelillis, Il santuario del Gargano, I:47.

36. Leanza 300.9–10. At 311, he also remarks on the same effacement of ancient heresy found in the Chonae hagiographies. In the Latin text Michael is moved in favor of the Sipontini because of his compassion for human frailty, while in the Greek text it is God who has compassion for human fragility and this in turn moves Michael on the behalf of the Sipontini. Leanza plausibly suggests the modification is due to theological preoccupations with making Michael’s intervention subservient to God’s will.

37. Leanza 301.39ff.

angel Michael, he who always stands in the presence of God.”³⁸ The bishop fasted a second time, “so as to be worthy of Michael’s aid and presence,”³⁹ and had a second vision. Michael’s appearances and construction henceforth miraculously transformed the site, and the access given to the bishop was opened, in lesser degrees, to all those far and wide who were worthy.⁴⁰

Important for devotional ends, however, was the emphasis on presence. The prologue to the Greek text specifies the “digging” and manufacture of the cave-church as an incontrovertible sign of the Archangel’s visitation and presence. The miracle story remarks on the very roughness and oddity of the construction as a mark of the benevolence and heartfelt solicitation of devotion. Michael’s presence infuses every corner and crevice of the chapel because of the superhuman technique of construction, as Michael’s extraordinary act of intervention at Chonae impressed his presence on the spring and chasm. Since Gargano was the radiating point for the cult of Michael for the West, other shrines in Italy and the rest of Europe consistently imitated the idiosyncratic invention and shape of the church.⁴¹ The foundation of the monastery at Mt. Tumba in Normandy self-consciously modeled itself after the Gargano sanctuary, down to the importation of monks and a piece of the altar stone as a relic from Gargano.⁴² In western Europe roughly designed churches

38. Leanza 301.47ff.

39. Leanza 302.66ff.

40. Leanza 307.188.

41. Gothein, “L’arcangelo Michele,” 141: “questa sua miracolosa abitazione terrena lo fece apparir sempre come una specie di divinità naturale”; and in time, Gothein says, the irregularity and the roughness of the shrine became “un simbolo prediletto dall’arcangelo.” He adds that the candles which burn during the day in the grotto are allowed to snuff out at dusk because it is then that the archangel is believed to enter his sanctuary. And see G. Otranto and C. Carletti, Il santuario di S. Michele arcangelo sul Gargano dalle origine al X secolo (Bari, 1990) 57–71, and O. Campagna, “La grotta di S. Michele alla Serra di Grisolia,” Bolletino della Badia Greca di Grottaferrata n.s. 40(1986):57–65, on the typology of Michael’s cave sanctuaries.

42. The similarities between Tumba and Gargano are striking and indeed entirely purposeful. Michael makes his will known through signs and visions and more importantly in his reshaping of the holy sanctuary. See AASS Sept. 8:75E, 77C, and Millénaire monastique du Mont-St.-Michel, 3 vols. (Paris, 1971).

placed on mountain tops became a symbol of the Archangel's presence.⁴³

These palpable signs are momentous within the cult of Michael since, as the narrator of the Greek miracle story states, "order is made through signs and heavenly power."⁴⁴ These signs are more apprehensible when made materially and dramatically. The first incident on Gargano was really a signal of Michael's intent; the returned arrow is noteworthy in the miracle story because of its ambiguity and fleeting quality. Further, the dreams of the bishop are transitory visions in the murky realms of the unconscious, and they are restricted to one person. The irrefutable physical impressions made by the Archangel inspired the collective imagination and other sanctuaries reproduced them. The miracle story presents these marks of voluntary presence as ways in which they bridle Michael so that material signs mediate his immaterial being and make him comprehensible.⁴⁵

Psellus's eleventh-century narrative praising the Archangel Michael provides an important contrast to the stories of the miracles at Chonae and Gargano and their cult certainties. The precise location of the shrine described by Psellus is not known, since he presented little topographical detail, but it may well have been in Galatia in Asia Minor, perhaps in the city of Sykeon.⁴⁶ In the prologue, Psellus extolled the Archangel's splendid qualities. Michael surpasses in mea-

43. See T. Baumeister, "Religionsgeschichtliche und kultgeographische Aspekte der westlichen Michaelsverehrung," in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes: miscellanea in onore di Monsignor Victor Saxer, Studi di antichità cristiana, vol. 48 (Vatican City, 1992) 11–19.

44. Leanza 300.5–7.

45. Michael's immanent protection was held to be magically ensured by means of images and names in some popular legends. See, for example, E. Amélineau, Contes et romans de l'Égypte chrétienne (Paris, 1888) 41, on the Coptic legend of Euphemia. In the legend, Satan says to Michael, "O Monseigneur l'archange, aie pitié de moi; j'ai eu l'audace de commettre la faute d'entrer dans une chambre où se trouvaient ton nom et ton image: je t'en supplie, ne me fais pas périr avant que le terme de mon existence soit arrivé.... Je vais te promettre devant Dieu de ne plus entrer dans un endroit où sera ton nom."

46. On the topography, see Fisher, "Nicomedia or Galatia?" 170ff.; Mango, "La croix dite le Cerulaire," 48; V. Ruggieri, Byzantine Religious Architecture (582–867): Its History and Structural Elements, Orientalia christiana analecta, vol. 237 (Rome, 1991) 242ff., on the village of Sykeon in Galatia, but especially 249; R. Volk, Der medizinische Inhalt der Schriften des Michael Psellos (Munich, 1990) 196ff.

sure and magnitude the nature and deeds of humanity. One must “announce the great things of the nature over us” and proclaim the miracles of the Archangel even more than those of the human saints.

Psellus then proceeded to narrate the events that led up to the foundation of the church of Michael. Heraclius (ca. 575–641) was in the course of returning to Constantinople after a triumphant campaign against the Persians in the Holy Land.⁴⁷ His victories were aided in no small part by a miraculous cross, which had powers against unseen hateful ones and all other battling powers. The emperor had decided to rest on this return journey in the vicinity of a church dedicated to the Theotokos, and he deposited the cross on the altar of that church for the duration of the stay. When it was time to recommence the journey, Heraclius sent some soldiers to collect the cross at the church. However, the cross refused to be moved and could not be dislodged from the altar no matter what effort was applied to it, “just as some rocky outcrop is unshaken by waves falling upon it.”⁴⁸ Almost immediately the soldiers were distracted by a second and more wondrous miracle when the cross kindled into strange flame.

The sparks of an unseen fire shone forth at first. Thereupon, the cross caught fire entirely. And the kindling increased a little, and with a little help it, having been brought altogether to a head, also spread through the whole building and around the church. And now [the fire] was thrown from the building and it seemed that the whole thing was about to be burned. . . . But the fire was consumed in the same way as the ancient bush. Whence it burned, it did not consume the church, but rather the church burning to ashes was beaming with light. And in the same way that it had been attacked invisibly, in this same way it was again extinguished with the flames quenched, and the church showed forth as before, only more pure than it had been. But at least I do not suppose that this was a so-matic fire, though it had been seen and considered by many in this way, but the divine Archangel decided to appear out of immaterial-

47. Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 233.50ff.

48. Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 238.158ff.

ity possessing a being of fire, in the church of the Mother of God, since the intelligible lightning of burning heat was being made manifest to the onlookers as sensual burning heat.⁴⁹

When the emperor heard of this miracle, he was greatly moved and he commissioned churches for the Archangel and the Mother of God as well as providing monks for the foundation, thereby “making an angelic order on earth for the Archangel.”⁵⁰ And Psellus concluded by saying that the former flame still burns in the hearts of those practicing there and the Archangel oversees them still.

This is a remarkable miracle not least because of the inscrutability of the cause. Psellus did not declare Michael’s agency except by the nature of the miracle, which itself has congruity with Michael’s own nature. Michael’s fiery and spiritual constitution seems to have been the only possible means by which such a paradoxical miracle could have been accomplished. Psellus, moreover, could not state the reason for Michael’s intervention in a church of the Theotokos through an object which he himself said is inextricably linked to Christ. Psellus offered two possibilities: “Either he wanted to take up residence in this sacred church and to perform miracles there, or honouring the image of the Virgin, he desired to serve under the personal command of the queen there.”⁵¹ Psellus confessed he did not know for certain. He continued his miracle story with descriptions of some of the miracles that followed on this miraculous enunciation of intent by the Archangel. Michael brings about cures and miracles in a number of ways, either through the agency of the cross, or by a person’s simply being in the church or taking sacraments. By these means, Michael shows his “great power” and his “overshadowing presence.”⁵² The inscrutability of Michael’s presence is noteworthy when 49. Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 238.179–239.192. The icon that is not consumed by fire also has a history. See O. Meinardus, “A Typological Analysis of the Traditions Pertaining to Miraculous Icons,” in Wegzeichen. Festgabe zum 60. Geburtstag von Prof. Dr. Hermangild M. Lieberman OSA, ed. E. C. Suttner and C. Patock (Würzburg, 1971) 220–21.

50. Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 239.203ff.

51. Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 239.198–201.

52. Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 247.404–406.

compared to the direct, unmistakable traces left at Chonae and Gargano. And yet the cross contained and channeled Michael's presence through the cross there. This object is in some sense a conduit for Michael's activity "by which and in which the great Archistrategos works miracles."⁵³ Michael's immanence has thereby found some kind of cast.

These miracle stories all display the extraordinary means necessary for the foundation of cult shrines of the bodiless Archangel. These special strategies are even more evident when contrasted to miracle stories of the mortal saints. For example, in the ninth century, Nicephorus, a priest at the church of the Virgin in Blachernai at Constantinople, wrote an encomium in honor of Theodore of Sykeon (d.613) in which he described the procession of the body of Theodore from his home province of Galatia to Constantinople. A miracle which has striking similarities to Michael's initial miracle described by Psellus occurred in the course of that procession.⁵⁴ Theodore of Sykeon's bier halted of its own accord outside the walls of the capital and could not be moved. A second miracle followed this first as one of the team of animals drawing the cart spoke in order to make the saint's will known. Reminiscent of Balaam's ass (Numbers 22:22ff.), the animal said that the saint wished to reside in this place and work wonders there.⁵⁵ The immovable object followed by a more fantastic miracle constitutes a striking similarity between the miracles of Theodore of Sykeon and Michael.⁵⁶

53. Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 244.319ff.

54. K. Kirch, "Nicephori Sceuphyllacis encomium in S. Theodorum Siceotam," AB 20(1901):269.22–32.

55. Similar foundation legends are noted by G. Dagron, "Constantinople. Les sanctuaires et l'organisation de la ville religieuse," Actes du XIe congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne. Lyons, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève et Aoste (21–28 Septembre 1986), 3 vols. (Vatican City, 1989) II:1072–73.

56. Fisher, "Nicomedia or Galatia?" 182. She sees several elements in common between the two hagiographies: first, a sudden and persistent immovability and, second, a greater miracle which serves to confirm the first. Moreover, Fisher posits the dependence of the hagiography of Psellus on that of Theodore of Sykeon on account of local competitiveness between the two local cults. She also sees significance, in both instances, of an offering of an explanation for the incidents, even though Psellus's interpretation is notably vague. Michael is connected to the phenomenon at the church because of its elemental force, the natural association of Michael with fire. Fisher also sees "imagery of flashing light associated with the Important, however, are the differences which do show the particular character of Michael's cult. In the narrative of Psellus, Michael works through the cross. By contrast, Theodore of Sykeon continued to operate after his death through his corporeal relics, thus making his presence known on earth thereafter. In fact, relics are key in the cult of most mortal saints and serve to distinguish them from the cult activity of the Archangel.⁵⁷ Moreover, as the sermon of Severus of Antioch (ca. 465–538) shows, the church often introduced relics of mortal saints into shrines of angels in order to make the cult of angels palatable to authorities.⁵⁸

With or without a relic, Michael's presence at the church Psellus described is simply inexplicable and unpredictable, but undeniably there. The ambiguity of Michael's appearance is also noteworthy in comparison to the unmistakable communication of Theodore of Sykeon's will concerning his earthly remains. Michael's will, on the other hand, asserts itself through a kind of immanence and an effect on the shrine that purifies through invisible contact with the Archangel. Michael has left traces on the site in that he has perceptibly altered the church, and the subsequent thaumaturgic character of the shrine proves this alteration.

holy one," although I do not see this figuring in the Theodore text in the same way. What seems more important, then, are the factors not shared, notably relics, an unambiguous revelation of will and the incomprehensible angelic manifestation. On the textual level, moreover, one can make an equally strong case for scriptural precedents as providing clearer paradigms for the Psellus hagiography.

57. M. Rouche, "Le combat des saintes anges et des démons: La victoire de Saint Michel," Santi e demoni nell'alto medioevo occidentale (secoli v–xi), Settimane vol. 36, 2 vols. (Spoleto, 1989) I:534.

58. See chapter 2 for the sermon, but see also the Council of Carthage (ca. 400?) which ruled that churches and shrines of the saints themselves must not be founded without relics. The Fathers of this Council decided against the custom of establishing shrines by the faithful who invoke some apparition of saints or of the martyrs in dreams or revelations. See G. A. Ralles and M. Potles, Σύνταγμα τῶν θείων καὶ ἱερῶν κανόνων, 6 vols. (Athens, 1852–1859) III:508ff. On relics and angels, see P. Canivet, "Le Michaelion de Huarte (Ve s.) et le culte syrien des anges," B 50(1980):110ff.; P. and M. T. Canivet, Huarte. Sanctuaire chrétien d'Apamène (IVe–VIe s.), 2 vols. (Paris, 1987) I:279ff.; Severus of Antioch (ca. 465–538), Les homiliae cathedrales, PO vol. 8/2, ed. M. Brière (Paris, 1919; rp. Turnhout, 1971) 84ff.; and P. Maraval, Lieux saints et pèlerinages d'Orient. Histoire et géographie des origines à la conquête arabe (Paris, 1985) 56. And see Vie de Théodore de Sykéôn, ed. A.-J. Festugière, 2 vols. (Brussels, 1970) I:36 (40.10ff.), 57 (70.1ff.), 80 (100.1ff.), 82–83 (103.1ff.), 140 (161.51ff.), on the association of St. George and Michael in Galatia.

Another telling comparison can be made to the “life” and cult of Thecla.⁵⁹ The saint, according to her miracle story, appears in dreams and in other ways beyond her shrine at Seleucia in southeastern Asia Minor. The “life” states that the shrine is located on the site of her descent into the living rock. According to the “life,” God opened the rock in order to engulf her, saying,

“Do not fear . . . behold how it has opened up before you, for there shall be your eternal dwelling place, and there you shall receive shelter.” And . . . Thecla beheld the rock opening up, as much as made room for a person to enter . . . and she entered the rock. And the rock closed straightaway. . . .⁶⁰

The legend is clearly charged with explaining the lack of actual relics or known grave site. The rock simply split at the altar and all suffering and illness were dispelled at that spot. Gilbert Dagron saw this as an alternate tradition that arose locally in Seleucia, orally perhaps, in order to compensate for the absence of relics.⁶¹ For the locals, he proposed, Thecla continued to inhabit the place, eternally resting and alive, like Enoch. Indeed, Severus of Antioch wrote in his homily on Thecla that the saint’s body was entrusted to the earth whence her miracles and healings continue.⁶²

The relics of Cyrus and John, on the other hand, are witness to the authenticity of the cult, at Menuthis near Alexandria.⁶³ The relics had been found by Cyril of Alexandria (378–444),⁶⁴ though they were previously unknown, and brought to the sanctuary at Menuthis. The author of the “life,” Sophronius (ca. 560–638), would brook no doubt on the subject of the relics’ worth and veracity. In one of the miracles, a woman called Athanasia from Alexandria re-

59. L. Deubner, De incubatione capita quattuor (Leipzig, 1900) 98ff.

60. Deubner, De incubatione, 102.

61. Vie et miracles de sainte Thècle. Texte grec, traduction et commentaire, ed. G. Dagron (Brussels, 1978) 50ff.

62. Les homiliae cathedrales, 136–37.

63. Maraval, Lieux saints et pèlerinages d’Orient, 384ff.

64. Homilia xviii. Fragmenta de translatione reliquiarum martyrum Cyri et Joannis, PG 77:1100C ff.

fused the title of martyr to Cyrus and John because no documents existed to satisfy her concerning the saints' deeds and the provenance of their relics.⁶⁵ Sophronius observed that many martyrs do not have documentation for their relics and that devotees piously venerated them for their qualities as intercessors. He further claimed that Cyril of Alexandria's texts are documentation enough for the relics' authenticity. Even without this indisputable fact, he continued, the martyrs' bona fides is the number of miracles, which exceeds those of certain other martyrs. Athanasia was willfully deaf to any argument and was struck by paralysis as punishment; only with her repentance was the affliction lifted. With mortal saints, the traces of activity constituted a partial proof of their existence; and yet the infallible proof was their relics.

In contrast to the mortal saints, the bodiless Archangel, who has no earthly existence, is made known by imprints and transformations of the perceptible world; remnants of a physical, mundane past are not possible. The relative stability of the effects, and the wonders deriving from them, is a necessary counterbalance to the essentially incomprehensible nature of the cause, the Archangel Michael. The invisible movements and inscrutable purposes of the angels are sometimes manifest, however, and in a way recognizable and approachable even to humanity. Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite described the invisible, intellectual life of the angels using the metaphor of the lion who walks towards the sun without leaving any trace.⁶⁶ In this manner, the angels themselves imitate divine discretion in dissimulating the traces of their intelligence. The angels are permitted a divine illumination in enveloping mysteriously and without arrogance this ascension towards the Thearchy. The intellectual nature of the angels' activities necessitates that unmistakable tracks be left behind to signal the protective presence of Michael, or any other angel, for cult. The abstract and recondite nature of the theology of Pseudo-Dionysius could not have satisfied any desire for devotional certainties. Just the same, these passages on the intellectual life of the angels describe the remoteness and incomprehensibility of the angelic host. This theological conception, then, is the counterpoint to the miracle stories' descriptions of Michael's effect on place. The continuing guardianship manifest in Michael's traces, and underlined in the miracle stories, maintain his immanence in the wake of his difficult epiphany.

65. Homilia xviii, XXIX, PG 87.3:3508A–13C.

66. Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, La Hiérarchie Céleste, SC vol. 58, ed. G. Heil and M. de Gandillac (Paris, 1958) 185 nr.

The Archangel's own promise of intent in the accounts of the Chonae miracle underlines the importance of place in his cult. At the climax of the miracle story, with the water standing before them to the height of ten persons, Michael struck the impenetrable rock, which resounded throughout the land like thunder. Michael then made his vow (18.8–12): "In this very place will be crushed all suffering and every evil and illness and enchantment and poison and all workings of wickedness. Here all fetters will be loosened and the troubled and the feeble will be healed."

At Gargano also Michael made explicit the motive behind his appearances. He appeared to Garganus and to the bishop, and constructed the chapel, in order that he might make known his will to remain present with benevolent purpose at that site. The material traces of this difficult presence at a blessed place are the signs the cult depended upon and are the common structure of these texts and the cult the texts relate.

Pilgrimage is an extension of this basic impulse to find ongoing testimony of Michael's benevolent activity. The hope of finding deliverance is greater at places where presence is promised and proven.⁶⁷ Victor and Mary Turner have written, "All sites of pilgrimage have this in common: they are believed to be places where miracles once happened, still happen and may happen again."⁶⁸ The shrine at Chonae was the site of pilgrimage and famous festivals in honor of the saint, at least until the late twelfth century and possibly 67. V. Turner and M. Turner, Image and Pilgrimage in Christian Culture. Anthropological Perspectives (New York, 1978) 6.

68. Turner/Turner, Image and Pilgrimage, 6.

beyond.⁶⁹ Testimony establishes that pilgrims came to Chonae for the efficacious quality of a site where the presence of the bodiless Archangel was tangible, visible and constant.⁷⁰

The difficulties of perception and comprehension of the angels, particularly of the active and popular Michael, made certain strategies desirable in cult and its textual manifestations. The enigmatic nature of the Archangel found counterbalances in the positive proofs of cult, that is, material traces of the bodiless Archangel. On a textual level, the miracle stories underscore the importance of material traces by such devices as retro-motivation and re-nomination. Pilgrims sought the Archangel's favor, and healing and other assistances were expressions of his material interventions of a benevolent character: these were the cult certainties that the devotion to an immaterial being demanded. According to the stories of the miracle at Chonae, the landscape witnessed in a crucial sense Michael's presence and still contains the effects of that intervention. In a more radical, more thoroughgoing way, the landscape is a witness, since—as will be seen in the following section—autopsy is elusive and illusory.

69. Michael Choniates (ca. 1138–ca. 1222) described the gatherings for the shrine of Michael in this way: “The miracles in the church gave rise to a festival, a multitudinous festival, about it. It is multitudinous, indeed very multitudinous, for it draws, not to exaggerate, all the neighbouring towns, but also in addition the Lydians, Carians, Paphlagonians, and Lycians from beyond, and in addition barbarian Iconiotes, in order to buy and sell.” See Μιχαήλ Ἀκομινάτου τοῦ Χωνιατοῦ τὰ Σωζόμενα, ed. S.P. Lampros, 2 vols. (Athens, 1879–1880) I:56; trans. S. Vryonis, Jr., “The Panegyris of the Byzantine Saint: A Study in the Nature of a Medieval Institution, Its Origins and Fate,” in The Byzantine Saint, ed. S. Hackel (London, 1981) 216.

70. On the pilgrimage to Chonae, see S. Vryonis, Jr., The Decline of Medieval Hellenism in Asia Minor and the Process of Islamization from the Eleventh through the Fifteenth Century, Berkeley, 1971, 20, 33 n165, and B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa. Wallfahrten in der Antike und das Pilgerwesen in der alten Kirche (Münster, 1950; rp. Münster, 1980) 166ff., Belke/Mersich, Phrygien und Pisidien, 223, and Maraval, Lieux saints et pèlerinages d'Orient, 385.

Pilgrims also made their way to the shrine of Michael described by Psellus. He mentions a panegyros held for Michael there (Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 246.388), and a pilgrims' hostel (Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 246.368–72). And for Gargano, the long and well-documented history of pilgrimage is outlined by Angelillis, Il santuario del Gargano, II:163–250.

By their use of metaphor and scriptural model, miracle stories reveal the distance that separates human comprehension from full knowledge of the Archangel. The disparity between this desire for a greater apprehension and the ultimate failure to describe marks the verbal impasse in reports of the Archangel and his activities. Material images also share in this impasse. They normally show a winged youth, as in the Sinai icon of the Chonae miracle (fig. 15), but such a representation is simply an allusion to a transcendent nature rather than a literal rendering of an angel's appearance. Descriptions from miracle stories examined here do not provide stable models for representing the Archangel as they can for human saints. Like images, miracle stories provide a means for apprehension that not only compels contemplation but also denies resemblance and complete discernment of the archangelic subject.

Pre-existing structures derived from scripture and other texts determine to a large extent verbal descriptions in miracle stories of angels, including the Archangel Michael. These descriptions are recognizably "borrowed" and thus venerable because of their origins. They create familiarity and persuade the audience as to the miracle story's verity. At the same time, the unoriginal quality of the descriptions work to another purpose: descriptions of the Archangel obtained from scriptural passages reporting epiphanies indicate the impossibility of language truly rendering an Archangel or angel.

The encounter of holy man and angel at Chonae, as described in the miracle stories, is very much within the scriptural structure of divine epiphany. Furthermore, the encounter indicates the difficulties attendant upon confronting and perceiving an angelic being. Archippus had no sooner finished his Psalm than there arose a great peal of thunder outside the chapel and the Archistrategos appeared (14.16ff.). In the dialogue that ensues, Michael tries to calm the shaken monk. This structure of awful epiphany and conciliation—not to mention the preparations—has an obvious antecedent in the appearance of the "one like the similitude of the sons of men" to Daniel (Dan. 10:1ff.). Michael called out to the monk in a "great voice” to leave the shrine before he is plunged in the water. Archippus came out very cautiously and saw a vision “glancing like lightning,” and he fell to the ground “as if dead.”⁷¹

At this moment Archippus is given a full vision of the power of his protector, and of his faith: the Archangel is a pillar of fire from earth to heaven.⁷² Exodus described the Angel of the Lord who led the Israelites out of the desert identically, “through the pillar of fire and of the cloud” (Ex. 14:24).⁷³ Moreover, Michael’s fiery nature, established by scripture, Psalm 104:4 most notably, often manifests itself in texts on epiphanies. Fire is a textual veil referring to the difficult nature and aspect established by scripture.

The Archangel thereupon told Archippus to stand firm and witness the power of God. Michael commanded the still approaching rivers to stop, and the waters stood to the height of ten persons. And then, Sissinius says, Michael acted just as Moses at the Red Sea: “For as Moses once formed walls of the waters when he struck them with his staff, and led the people to the promised land out of Egypt, why not even (greater) by the word of the Taxiarch Michael, leader of the entire host of heaven?”⁷⁴ Michael is able to stop the waters with a

71. Sissinius, Acta apparitionis in Chonis, 15, AASS Sept. 8:46EF, describes Michael further as a “flashing forth of angelic glory,” an implicit comparison to Moses at Exodus 34:29ff. For instance, Gregory of Nyssa (ca. 330–ca. 395), In Canticum Canticorum homiliae xv, XII, PG 44:1025C, says that Moses was like the sun, with “the light flashing forth from his face.”

Archippus’s reaction is not untypical of such a dreadful epiphany: see C. Rowland, The Open Heaven. A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York, 1982) 367.

72. The same description is found in the Metaphrastic version (Bonnet 27.8–9). Sissinius, Acta apparitionis in Chonis, 15, AASS Sept. 8:46E, signals the indescribable nature of the vision with ὡσεὶ στύλος πυρὸς ἀπὸ γῆς εἰς οὐρανὸν standing on the hard rock near the shrine. The “just as” (ὡσεὶ) is a significant marker of an approximate description.

A fiery nature is one of the aspects of the angels’ being naturally. See, for instance, Pseudo-Dionysius, De coelestii hierarchia, XV.2, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 166–71.

The importance of the fiery nature in theology is translated into hagiographical description as seen in the Chonae hagiographies. See also T. Preger, Scriptores originum Constantinopolitanarum, 2 vols. (Leipzig, 1901–1907; rp. New York, 1975) I:87.

73. See Theodore of Stoudios (759–826), In sanctos angelos, 3, PG 99:733CD, on this passage: the “divine angel transformed himself into a pillar of fire,” and “the beauty of the countenance took on the image of a cloud.”

74. Sissinius, Acta apparitionis in Chonis, 16, AASS Sept. 8:46F–7A.

word, Sissinius also says, while Moses had to use his staff. The first miracle of stopping the water, then, is comparable to Moses's, but the second is even greater. Michael struck the impenetrable rock which resounded like thunder and shook the entire land, leaving the inhabitants in the surrounding area panic-stricken. At the creation of the chasm Michael made his important promise, that his benign presence would overshadow that place (18.8–17).⁷⁵

The encounter clearly owes some of its structure of awful epiphany, incomprehensible vision, and comforting and revelations to the Book of Daniel, as well as to the Gospel according to Matthew (28:2ff., for example). The identification of the vision is equally fraught. Michael asks, “Do you know who I am, that you shudder at my sight?” To this Archippus can only deny knowledge. Michael thereupon states his identity in terms that evoke the meeting of Joshua and the angel before the battle of Jericho (Joshua 5:14).⁷⁶ Like Joshua, Archippus misapprehends the nature of the epiphany but he saves the situation by not falling on his face and worshipping the “captain of the host of the Lord” as Joshua did. The appearance of the angel to Joshua occurs on holy ground for he tells Joshua, “Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy” (5:15). This comparison is not explicit in the miracle story but the appearance of Michael at Chonae is also the marking of a permanently hallowed spot, as his promises indicate. In other words, the sanctification of the site, and the identification of the agent of that sanctification, is predetermined.

Michael's appearances at Chonae in the miracle story are multi-form. His first appearance is in a dream to the Laodicean pagan. The story described Michael as merely a “night vision” (4.2ff.) in the 75. Μηναία τῷ ὁλοῦ ἐνταυτοῦ, 6 vols. (Rome, 1888–1901) I:71 on Moses and Michael at Horeb (Ex. 17:6), and, 73, at the Red Sea. Michael is at the Burning Bush (Ex. 3:2), as described in the Analecta hymnica graeca, ed. A. Kominis (Rome, 1972) 232; the text also suggests a comparison between Moses who parted the sea with his staff (Ex. 14:16.21) and Michael's own similar deed (237). See Pantaleon, Narratio miraculorum maximi archangeli Michaelis, XIII, PG 140:580C–1A, on Michael's role in the engulfing of Pharaoh's army in the Red Sea (Ex. 14:1ff.).

76. Elliott, Roads to Paradise, 116ff., notes that in the Book of Tobias Raphael identifies himself in this way: Ego enim sum Raphael angelus (12:15).

anonymous version; in the Metaphrastian version, the pagan saw “a more Godly vision announcing better goodnesses” (22.13ff.). The Laodicean pagan is granted an incomplete glimpse of the Archangel, although his vision, according to Metaphrastes again, was a vision of some intellectual being standing beside him (22.22–23). “For he was not worthy of being a spectator of such things, how then can he see with the eyes of his soul, embracing as he did, an unbeliever, that gloom of the faithless” (22.18–20)? And the apparition told the pagan to go to the spring, and the result was the new chapel for Michael’s shrine (22.23ff.).

Later, in the destructive schemes of the local pagans, Michael makes his presence known in several different ways. The first plan of the pagans was direct assault, but this went wrong when they encountered at the source an inexplicable phenomenon: “Those who came saw flames of fire reflecting from the water in their own faces. And in this way the disbelievers were turned back, having been overpowered” (9.2–5). After this the pagans determined an indirect approach would accomplish their ends better and they diverted the Chryses; but Michael’s invisible intervention subverted that plot as well: the river divided in two and missed the shrine altogether. The pagans then decided to go one better; they dammed the Lykophros and the Kouphos until the rivers should have enough power to overwhelm the shrine, the hermit and the holy spring. At this point the most dramatic epiphany occurs:

In order therefore that the just be safeguarded, and the site of his holy spring, and church . . . and that God be extolled, he who makes great and inscrutable miracles, the Archangel Michael acting as servant was seen just as a pillar of fire reaching from the earth to the heavens and standing on the immovable rock by the shrine. . . .⁷⁷

77. Acta apparitionis in Chonis, 15, AASS Sept. 8:46E. According to Sissinius, Michael disappeared as incomprehensibly as he arrived, “The venerable one saw him as if a flame of fire streamed up into the heavens, filled with puzzlement and fear, he went back to sing psalms in the holy shrine, ‘God has sent his angel and liberated and saved me from the snares of the beasts, and he guarded his sacred shrine from the inundation of the waters’” (Acta apparitionis in Chonis, 18, AASS Sept. 8:47AB).

The miracle story describes, then, a progression of revelation, all of a difficult and incomprehensible nature. Michael's mutability is an inescapable aspect of his appearances, as well as the manner in which human comprehension and description come up short in the face of such epiphanies. The security of angelic epiphanies from Hebrew scripture offers a kind of textual anchor in these miracle stories for otherwise impossible descriptions.

The epiphany on the mountainside at Gargano, for instance, uses direct borrowings from scripture to describe Michael's terrible appearance. The day after he had appeared in a dream to the bishop predicting "angelic victory" of the Sipontini, Michael made his presence on the mountain known through rumblings, darkness and lightning, which borrow directly from Exodus 19:16: "And it came to pass on the third day, when it was morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of a trumpet exceeding loud; and all the people that were in the camp trembled." The Greek text is more overt than the Latin version about its scriptural models and also calls up images from Isaiah 60:2 ("For behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the peoples; but upon thee the Lord will arise, and His glory shall be seen upon thee").⁷⁸ The fire that mysteriously announces the presence of Michael at the shrine of Psellus has appropriated the particulars of the textual description from the scene of Moses and the Burning Bush in Exodus (3:2ff.). Michael as the fire which does not consume the bush, as the pillar of fire that led the Israelites, as the lightning and darkness on Sinai, are all sanctioned allusions to incomprehensible epiphanies of divine power.⁷⁹

78. Leanza 303.83ff. and 315; AASS Sept. 8:61D.

79. One further example is the appearance of Michael to Gregory the Great (ca. 540–604) on top of Hadrian's Mausoleum, subsequently Castel San Angelo, in 590 (AASS Sept. 8:72BC). Michael appears and silently returns his sword to its sheath, thereby signaling the reconciliation between God and the people of Rome. This reconciliation is effected through the disclosure of the source of the affliction and of the cessation of its attack. Michael is the bearer of reconciliation, not particularly benign, and of the abeyance of heavenly wrath, which is very much in the tradition of an Old Testament appearance. Rome is likened implicitly to Jerusalem, and Gregory to David, as the appearance has an antecedent at 1 Chronicles 21:15–27: "And God sent an angel unto Jerusalem to destroy it: and as he was destroying, the Lord beheld, and he repented him of the evil, and said to the angel

The miracle stories did not efface Michael's character as an angel of nature or as an elemental force. The choice of texts from scripture emphasizes this aspect of the Archangel's nature while also pointing to the Archangel's essential indescribability. The miracle stories describe Michael's appearance at Chonae as fire, thunder and lightning. Miracle stories often express Michael's character by such naturalistic metaphors, and, as Olga Rojdestvensky wrote, Michael is typically described in such elemental terms as "flashes of lightning, explosions of thunder, babbling of springs, sound of water falls, mystery of abyss and of grottoes, eternal silence of summits."⁸⁰ The descriptions of Michael are in an essential way profoundly dissembling, and the revelation at Chonae and his personal intervention in the local geography were strategies by which Michael's expansive and elusive character gained delineation and real presence.⁸¹

The topos concerning the distance between humanity and the angels common to theological speculation is equally present in the descriptions in miracle stories of the acts of the angels in this world. Pantaleon, in his miracle story of the Archangel Michael, is explicit about the inability of words to convey, and human comprehension to embrace, the nature of the angels.

How therefore shall we undertake to praise you according to your excellence, by what means shall we aspire to your praises, O Leader of the Host of the almighty God? What incorporeal voice, accord-that destroyed, It is enough, stay now thine hand. . . . And David lifted up his eyes, and saw the angel of the Lord stand between the earth and the heaven, having a sword in his hand stretched out over Jerusalem. . . . And the Lord commanded the angel; and he put his sword again into the sheath thereof." Again, scripture provides the structure for these difficult epiphanies.

This connection of the appearance of Michael to Gregory and 1 Chronicles was noted by Hasluck, Letters on Religions and Folklore, 84–85.

80. O. Rojdestvensky, Le culte de saint Michel et le moyen age latin (Paris, 1922) 54, and also 53: "La dramatique légende de saint Michel, pleine de jeux de lumière et d'ombre, devait ressusciter avec une puissance toute particulière là où les forces volcaniques et neptuniennes creusaient les précipices, faisaient jaillir les cascades, là où les vapeurs, fumées et flammes sulfuriques faisaient irruption." See also W. Lueken, Michael. Eine Darstellung und Vergleichung der jüdischen und der morganländisch-christlichen Tradition vom Erzengel Michael (Göttingen, 1898) 73–74.

81. Gothein, "L'arcangelo Michele," 108–109.

ing with the level of your incorporeal intelligence, shall we offer by means of our material and corporeal lips? What sounds shall we use to signify the ineffability and inexplicability of your glory? It is doubtful in truth that the collective nature of all earth born creation could laud and praise you, you who are the Leader of the Heavenly Host. For the matter of your divine beauty and splendor cannot be narrated and told by words. For in this way marvelous knowledge of God was made by us. . . . It is not possible by human comprehension for him to be apprehended and discovered.⁸²

If real description is therefore impossible, then recognition and identification of angelic epiphany is equally laden with risk of failure. As noted above, Archippus was completely at a loss until Michael revealed his identity in terms comprehensible to a man—and to the listener—thanks to the scriptural meaning behind this particular identification. At Gargano, Michael was identified subsequently by dream revelation and more securely by the material effects. Pantaleon also relates a miracle at the church of Michael at Eusebios, Constantinople, concerning a certain candle-maker Marcianus. All the doors of the church were suddenly flung open and towards him came “a fearful man as out of the heaven, with a rush descending on horseback on a white and terrible steed.”⁸³ Michael is dressed in the robe of a praepositus, or court official.⁸⁴ Marcianus knew only the terrifying aspect of his ecstatic vision until Michael declared his proprietorship of the shrine. Although Michael led Marcianus to the candle before his own icon, the icon plays no role in determining the identity of the vision but only the place and means of real healing.

82. Narr. mir. max. arch. Mich., I, PG 140:573B–4B.

83. The parallel with the appearance of the angels to drive Apollonius out of the temple in the Third Book of Maccabees is striking: “there appeared from heaven angels, with flashing armour, who filled them with dread and terror. Then did Apollonius fall half dead in the court of the Gentiles and he stretched his hands to heaven. . . .” See The Third and Fourth Book of Maccabees, trans. M. Hadas (New York, 1953; rp. New York, 1976) 164 (4:9–14).

84. F. Halkin, Inédits byzantins d'Ochrida, Candie et Moscou (Brussels, 1963) 149–50; the other comes from the Life of Andrew the Fool (seventh century?), 233–36, PG 111:877A–80C. Other examples are found in Ch. Angelidi, “La version longue de la Vision du moine Cosmas,” AB 101(1983):86.188–187.196; Preger, Scriptores originum Constantinopolitanarum, I:86.8ff.; and Achmet ibn Sirin (late eighth / early ninth century), Oneirocriticon, ed. F. Drexler (Leipzig, 1925) 5–6 (#10).

Visual identification of an Archangel is not possible since miracle stories and theology both agree that he has no form fully comprehensible to humans. Consequently, any stable resemblance in images of such a being remains out of reach. Cyril Mango has written that the angels are represented as they are, that is, as beardless, winged young men, because that is how they generally appear. "Whenever angels and archangels make themselves manifest in the Lives of saints and other edifying texts they do so in the guise of eunuchs or imperial cubicularii, not that of emperors."⁸⁵ Instances of the angels appearing as eunuchs are not uncommon.⁸⁶ Yet the texts are not homogeneous in this regard, as the miracle stories of the Archangel Michael discussed above show.⁸⁷ Moreover, the relation between description in miracle stories and the images of angels is not straightforward. Making images of angels is not a matter of transcription of visual information (or even textual description), since visions of these beings are clearly difficult to process, comprehend and render.

85. C. Mango, "St. Michael and Attis," DChAE 12(1984):44.

86. The post-Iconoclastic assimilation of court officials, particularly eunuchs, and angels, and the incongruities of that assimilation, have been examined recently by E. V. Maltese, "Gli angeli in terra: sull'immaginario dell'angelo bizantino," Materiali e discussioni per l'analisi dei testi classici 24(1990):III–32 [= Dimensione bizantine. Donne, angeli e demoni nel medioevo greco (Turin, 1995) 69–92].

87. Finally, one need only browse through the many texts concerning Michael and the other angels collected by Amélineau, Contes et romans de l'Égypte chrétienne, to realize the endless variations possible. For instance, Michael appears to Donatius, in "Comment se convertit la ville d'Athènes," as "un homme lumineux sous l'apparence d'un général d'armée, tenant un sceptre d'or à la main" (ibid., 2). And in the "Vision de Saint Jean l'Évangile racontée par le patriarche Timothée," Michael "descendit du ciel monté sur sa barque de chérubims, escorté de tous les anges, des saints, des plus grands parmi les prophètes et les martyrs: ils étaient tous enveloppés d'une gloire indescriptible" (ibid., 13–14). And the Archangel Gabriel in the "Histoire d'Aour" appeared to the young Aour in another fashion: "Depuis le jour de ma naissance, le vingt-deuxième jour de chaque mois, il vient à moi vers le matin un oiseau dont le face brille comme le soleil; il est ceint d'une ceinture dorée, coiffée d'une couronne d'émerande et tient à sa maison une baguette d'or rouge. Son corps semble du feu, ses pieds du cuivre brillant, sa figure est celle d'un homme, ses traits étincellent et le son de sa voix est comme le bruit des flots de la mer quand elle est agitée. Toutes les fois que je l'ai vu ... je suis tombé à ses pieds rempli d'effroi et il m'a relevé en disant: Ne crains pas! je suis l'archange Gabriel que me tiens devant le trône de Dieu ..." (ibid., 112–13).

Identification of an angel by means of the description on an image is theoretically possible, however, if not in any way definitive. In the text praising Michael written by Psellus, a monk named Ephraim was able to recognize Michael because the Archangel had chosen the form manifested on his image for this epiphany in the monastery's church.⁸⁸ And the miracle story of Artemius, written in the 660s about his shrine in the church of John the Baptist in Oxeia at Constantinople, describes an identification of an angel.⁸⁹ One of the stories in the miracle story describes the night vision of a young girl, Euphemia.⁹⁰ In her vision angels led her to the lead coffin of the eponymous saint of the shrine, Artemius, and made her lie down in it. The coffin was then locked by the saint, trapping her inside. When she awoke, recovered from her illness, she gave an account of her vision. Her mother asked her if she had seen the angels, and Euphemia replied that she had. Her mother then asked her in what form had they appeared.⁹¹ The girl answered by indicating the images of the angels found in that church.⁹²

The mother's question is telling. In asking what form the angels appeared, she was acknowledging the possibility of other guises. And in voluntarily making themselves commensurate with their appearance on images in the church, the angels revealed their ability to condescend in form for human comprehension. In other words, angels manifest their terrible elemental force in famous instances of awesome intervention but for this girl the angels took a benign aspect in keeping with her youth and fitness.

The topos of recognition of a holy person by means of his or her image, therefore, has relevance for discussion of miracle story de-

88. Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, 253.565–69. On this episode, see A. Cutler and R. Browning, "In the Margins of Byzantium? Some Icons in Michael Psellos," BMGS 16(1992):24–25.

89. C. Mango, "On the History of the Templon and the Martyrion of St. Artemios at Constantinople," Zograf 10(1979):40ff.

90. V.S. Crisafulli and J.W. Nesbitt, The Miracles of St. Artemios. A Collection of Miracle Stories by an Anonymous Author of Seventh-Century Byzantium (Leiden, New York and Köln, 1997) 176–84, and Mango, "On the History of the Templon," 43.

91. Crisafulli/Nesbitt, The Miracles of St. Artemios, 180.23.

92. Crisafulli/Nesbitt, The Miracles of St. Artemios, 180.23–24.

scriptions of angels. For Gilbert Dagron, images play a central role in the identification of saints in miracle stories, to the point of fundamentally determining the manner in which Byzantines visually perceived their saints.⁹³ For example, Cosmas and Damian approach the bed of a suppliant “in the form in which they are outlined.”⁹⁴ A letter of Nilus of Ankara (d. ca. 430) describes an episode of St. Platon’s life in which he freed a monk’s son from prison. Platon was recognized by the son through the saint’s image.⁹⁵ A similar episode exists in the tenth-century Vita of Irene of Chrysobalanton: “... while the holy woman stood interceding with her hands lifted up, she saw Basil the Great standing before her, looking such as the icons represent him.”⁹⁶

The second way miracle stories can state resemblance are instances where the saint appears to provide a perfect model for a painter, effectively taking the brush out of the painter’s hand. For instance, the “life” of Cornelius the Centurion emphasized the fidelity of the saint’s image, which was venerated at Skepis in the Hellespont. The exactitude of the copy, after the archetype, was particularly commended. The painter Egratius was hired by the bishop to make a copy of this image in order to send it from Skepis to Caesarea in

93. G. Dagron, “Holy Images and Likeness,” DOP 45(1991):30ff.; and idem, “Rêver de Dieu et parler de soi. Le rêve et son interprétation d’après les sources byzantines,” in I sogni nel medioevo, ed. T. Gregory (Rome, 1985) 42ff.

94. L. Deubner, Kosmas und Damian. Texte und Einleitung (Leipzig, 1907) 133.23–24.

95. See Mansi XIII:32C–3C.

96. The Life of St Irene Abbess of Chrysobalanton. A Critical Edition with Introduction, Translation, Notes and Indices, ed. J. O. Rosenqvist (Uppsala, 1986) 56.9–13: “... τοιοῦτον οἶον αἱ εἰκόνες γράφουσιν.”

Other examples are found in the seventh-century Vita of Theodore of Sykeon, written by his disciple George; see Vie de Théodore de Sykéôn, I:34 (39.5–6): “The two saints were seen by him according to the likeness therefore of that which is seen in divine worship.” Festugière translates this as “sous l’aspect qu’ils avaient en cette image de culte.” The monk is said to be praying beneath the icon of Cosmas and Damian. And also at I:29 (32.9–13), Theodore’s mother has a vision of George according to the depicted story of the martyr George. George is described as a golden youth with curly hair and shining aspect.

And from the tenth-century “Vision of Cosmas the Monk”: “And suddenly, as if sent by someone, two men appeared with white robes and very venerable, and I recognised them to be the apostles Andrew and John, as I was put in mind (ἀναλογιζόμενος) of their appearances on the holy icons.” See Angelidi, “La version longue de la Vision du moine Cosmas,” 4.125–28.

Palestine. Egratius was then afflicted and healed by the saint, and with thanks he made an image “just he had seen him.” The portrait was then sent to Palestine and valued, the narrator says, because of the exactitude of its copying.⁹⁷ From examples such as these, Dagron concludes that the relationship between images and their models is reversed and “that [images] are no longer attached to the past but to the future.”⁹⁸ And further, “It is no longer the image that resembles the saint, but the saint who resembles his image.”⁹⁹

The number of examples in which the image determines the nature of the vision is, however, quite limited. The majority of examples of appearances of saints, by far, is in forms of disguise, if the miracle story provides a description at all. Artemius appears as a butcher, sailor, patrician, and in other guises.¹⁰⁰ Cosmas and Damian appear in many different guises (in the form of clerics, for example), alone or with a third person; they do their work either by “invisible hands” or “their own hands.”¹⁰¹ This last denotes the really important aspect: their activity and traces of their activity radiate from the center of their cult, that is, their bodies and relics. Nevertheless, the most significant admission concerning the nature of the saints’ appearances is that they appear “in a form not their own,”¹⁰² as the miracle story states. The miracle story of Cyrus and John furnishes another important example. It describes the two saints as appearing fulgent, in white robes, in a monk’s habit, as doctors, as the deacon Julian and in various other guises, but also, significantly, in

97. F. Halkin, “Un abrégé inédit de la vie ancienne et disparue de Corneille le Centurion,” RSBN n.s. 1(1964):37 (#6). And other examples are found in the Vita S. Mariae Iunoris (before 866?–ca. 902/3), AASS Nov. 4:699BC, and the life of Athanasius the Athonite (925/30–ca. 1001), Vitae duae antiquae Sancti Athanasii Athonitae, Corpus Christianorum, Series Graeca, vol. 9, ed. J. Noret (Turnhout, 1982) 122 (#254).

98. Dagron, “Holy Images and Likeness,” 31.

99. Dagron, “Holy Images and Likeness,” 31, and also: “more than ever it is [the saints’] cult image that serves as a reference.”

100. Crisafulli/Nesbitt. The Miracles of St. Artemios, 88.15–16, 96.22, 104.12–13, 144.21, 194.15–16.

101. See Deubner, De incubatione, 68ff.

102. Deubner, Kosmas und Damian, 99.21 (my emphasis). And other examples of guises: 135.25, “appearing in the form of a περιχύτος,” and 145.43–44, “the two appeared to him in the forms of clerics.”

their own form.¹⁰³ Again, the saints must acknowledge an earthly existence, even after death, that determines the essential nature of their being, even if this does not altogether regulate their subsequent manifestations. Angels have no such mooring. They are changeable by nature and essentially unknowable—all their outward forms are not their own.

This chapter has sought to indicate the means by which miracle stories, and cult as well, made the Archangel Michael more apprehensible and proximate. For a being that is bodiless, immaterial and elemental, the signs of appearance and presence made apparent in the texts are tangible and incontrovertible. Moreover, because of Michael's uncontainable nature, they are impressions; Michael does not relinquish anything of his "body," only indications of attendance. These signs that are both tangible and provisional give the texts and cult their special tension in that they simultaneously assert that he is really present but also powerfully immanent. By means of retro-motivation, indeed, Michael's acts, and even his will, are superseded by the texts' logic. The place name engenders its own sequence of activities and the text works backwards from "the place was thereafter known as Chonae" to create Michael's seminal act preset by language itself.

This desire for more apprehensibility is the complement of the other textual device examined in this chapter, that is, how miracle stories "got round" the difficulties of expressing the inexpressible nature of Michael. The seamless application of scriptural description to this task of expression is the clearest sign of descriptive impasse. On an overt level, the scriptural passages indicate enigmatic theophanies and venerable acts that parallel and prefigure Michael's own appearances and acts. Michael is like Moses in the miraculous manipulation of water for the protection of God's chosen people. Michael's manifestations recall the phenomena revealed to the prophets during sacred disclosures in the past. And the scriptural structures of receiving epiphany found in Daniel, Joshua and Matthew provide a mold within which witness under the New Covenant can be cast. In this sense, the narrators of these miracle stories of Michael provided scriptural models of revelation that were recognizable and accessible descriptions of the Archangel's famous moments on earth.

103. Deubner, De incubatione, 80ff.

On the level of latent meaning, the arrogation of description signals at important points the lack of ability, or even intent, of speech and text to render in an original or descriptive fashion a being like the Archangel Michael. On this level, recognition of the original site of the text, in Exodus or Matthew for instance, is not essential for the audience. The descriptions of Michael as fire and earthquake and lightning do not rely for their full meaning on the audience's identifying the original context of the description. They signal the difficulty of comprehension, just the same, in their evocation of grand, irrational phenomena: the formless Archangel assumes all of these elements as his cloak but none are his own, none make him fully known.

Material images are likewise allusive to difficult nature, and this allusive quality makes angels' images incapable of possessing real likeness. Beings as transcendental as angels possess no definitive likeness inherently, and images partake equally of this indefinable resemblance. Recalling the theology of Pseudo-Dionysius, images are dissembling signs which the viewer engages in intellectually and without adherence. Describing an approach to images of angels, Agathias's epigram reveals an ability to interpret material images as the symbolic means to knowledge of an incomprehensible creature.¹⁰⁴ In this description of the image of the Archangel, the difficulty of comprehension derives from the incorporeal nature which would seem to be incompatible with material representation; but in Agathias's conception, the image also provides the viewer with the means to approach knowledge of the distant and immaterial Archangel by way of contemplation of the colors and outlines on the surface of the image. The material image is, therefore, the bridge between mundane reality and spiritual truths otherwise unattainable.

Michael's bodiless, relic-less existence provides such signs for human comprehension; less ambiguous material effects such as

104. Discussed in chapters 2 and 3.

Michael's transformations of landscape, imprints of invisibility, are essential proofs for a degree of knowledge of his activity and nature. Miracle stories and images work subtly. Texts exploit recognizable patterns from scripture to give the descriptions of events and appearances structure but at the same time deny any essential descriptiveness in their evocation of elemental and multiform wonders. In a comparable way, images depend on their non-resembling qualities to attract and lead the viewer to recognition of a higher, invisible reality. Michael transcends the ability of words and images to describe such a reality but it is this inability that attracts and compels contemplation.

CONCLUSION

This study has been concerned with representation in the widest sense. Examinations of material images notwithstanding, it has primarily explored conceptual problems involved in representing angels that arise from the unquantifiable nature of the bodiless host. “Subtle bodies” was a favored theological formulation for the nature of angels. The formulation was ascribed to Macarius the Great,¹ but it was the primary definition used by John of Thessalonike (d. 649?) in his defense of the worship of angels’ images ostensibly before a pagan opponent.² Moreover, the fathers of the Second Council of Nicaea in 787 included the “dialogue” between John of Thessalonike and the pagan in the conciliar acts, and so the definition—slippery, imprecise, but apt—became the basic definition of the nature of God’s messengers. Complementary to its examination of the representational problems of angels, this study has also examined the “image” of the holy man who sought the intercession of the Archangel

1. See the Introduction.

2. Mansi, XIII:164–65; H. Thümmel, Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit, Texte und Untersuchungen, vol. 139 (Berlin, 1992) 327–28. And see G. Peers, “Imagination and Angelic Epiphany,” BMGS 21(1997):113–31, on this text.

Michael and witnessed the awful result of that prayer. Clearly, worship of angels, their “persons” and their images both, was a divisive issue in the Byzantine world, and the story of the miracle at Chonae was an attempt to establish a basis for a more seemly and more orthodox worship.

Evidently, then, angels raised issues that writers of theology and miracle stories tried to resolve. Many of the difficulties arose from the pagan antecedents to angel worship and, indeed, their iconography in Christian art. The “dialogue” of John of Thessalonike reveals just this difficulty as late as the seventh century, and its resolution by this earlier theologian still had relevance for the Council at Nicaea in the following century. The pagan, with whom John was in theory debating, had no difficulty in seeing the parallels between pagan worship of gods and Christian worship of angels. In a most polite manner, he observed that Christians paint the angels as human and worship them through these paintings, despite the belief that these beings were not human but incorporeal and spiritual. Surely, he reasoned, like Porphyry long before, this practice is no different than the pagan worship of their gods. John, of course, sidestepped the parallel drawn and offered a complete rebuttal to this possible rapprochement. He based his position primarily on the truth of the Christian pantheon versus the falseness of the pagan gods, but the fact that such a rebuttal was necessary as late as the seventh century shows that perceived parallels between angels and pagan beings were still possible.

The miracle story of Michael’s appearances at Chonae is further proof of an ongoing problem that the church thought necessary to combat. The story itself reveals that in the eighth century the issue of proper approach to angels was still alive. The caretaker Archippus is a prescriptive “image” of the appropriate manner of praying to the Archangel, and his answered prayer is the clearest indication of its appropriateness. The Archangel nonetheless revealed his origins as an angel of uncontrollable natural forces—earthquake, lightning, thunder and water—and, although the story sublimates these forces in scriptural allusions, Michael still had some of the overweening characteristics that made an orthodox presentation of angelology necessary in the miracle story. The miracle story could not altogether efface Michael the Nile god of the Coptic text examined in the Introduction.

This study has also sought to demonstrate that representing angels—in miracle stories and material images—was part of a desire to make these bodiless beings more comprehensible and proximate. As theological discussion of angels had antecedents in pagan vocabulary and concepts, and contended with these antecedents, so self-conscious continuity from the Classical past was a characteristic of descriptions of angels in the visual arts. Sculptors, painters and mosaicists clearly were aware of models available in pagan art that could aid them in their search for an iconography capable of describing, albeit partially, the special immaterial, formless nature of angels. As seen on the Sarigüzel sarcophagus (fig. 3), they borrowed iconographic elements from pagan art, most notably wings, to this end, but maintained at the same time the angels' peculiarity as Christian beings.

Most Christian viewers evidently found this iconography sufficiently expressive of angelic nature and activity. On the evidence of sixth-century epigrams, painted panels with single figures of angels or Archangels became more common in devotion in this period. As a way of communicating the nature and activities of this invisible host, many Christians perceived these icons as "guarantors of knowledge,"³ even if images of angels ultimately frustrated full comprehension of the models.

In the period preceding Iconoclasm, sources dealing with images of angels reveal an increasing desire to regulate and define the place of images in Christian worship.⁴ For some Christians, the break with the Classical past in the visual arts was not clear enough, and the iconography of angels, though consciously distanced from its antecedents, was sullied by any association with pagan art. From the fourth to the seventh century, the writings of Macarius Magnes, Severus of Antioch and John of Thessalonike reveal a defensiveness on the part of Christians concerning the iconography of these bodi-

3. Cameron, "The Language of Images," 2.

4. See Cameron, "The Language of Images," 30.

less beings. The writings of opponents to angels' images also show dissent over the route to knowledge that images provide. For these opponents, material signs were clearly inadequate to describe the transcendental nature of angels.

Yet the increasing importance that images came to have in the period preceding Iconoclasm attests to a wide acceptance of material images as a means to understand divine things. The divergence shown in these two positions stands for a fundamental divide in Byzantine society over appropriate commemoration and worship. This study has attempted to describe the long-standing debate over the conceptual problems of representing angels, both visually and verbally. In the course of the sixth and seventh centuries, as Christian images became more common in devotion, these debates became more acute. This study has traced the "realignment" in Byzantine society that Averil Cameron describes but with specific regard to angels in texts of this period, taking passages from theological writings on images, question and answer guides and anti-Jewish tracts.⁵ All of these writings showed an increased concern over the meaning and nature of angelic signs, appropriate commemoration and material worship. This struggle over worship and images only became more acute in the eighth and ninth centuries, when this crisis came to a head with the declaration of Iconoclasm in the 720s, and the sources from the period of Iconoclasm attest to the role angels and their images played in this conflict.

The end of Iconoclasm in 843 effectively resolved the debate over the role of images of angels that had been decided in favor of a careful and abundant synthesis of material signs in spiritual worship. Just the same, images of angels always partake of a measure of ambiguity despite their full acceptance into Byzantine worship. Cameron writes, "Religious images ... fell naturally into place as one of the signs by which the impossibility of understanding God through language could be circumvented."⁶ This statement implies, however, that the debates over images that lasted from the sixth to the ninth century were resolved in favor of images that were explicit and literal in their description of spiritual reality.⁷ Rather, the tension between manifest form and incomprehensible nature, evident in the texts—epigrams, theology and miracle stories—is a defining characteristic of images of angels throughout the Byzantine period. This tension continued to determine the production and perception of images of angels long after the end of Iconoclasm. This Conclusion also aims, then, to examine briefly the tension between presence and transcendence, description and incomprehensibility, in images and texts of the middle and late Byzantine periods.

5. See Cameron, "The Language of Images," 3–4.

6. Cameron, "The Language of Images," 30; and see L. Brubaker, "Byzantine Art in the Ninth Century: Theory, Practice, and Culture," BMGS 13(1989):75ff.

A Palaiologan icon of the Archangel Michael in the Byzantine Museum, Athens, is a particularly fine example of the pull between materiality and incorporeality that images of angels can communicate (fig. 19).⁸ This icon, in fact, manifests an especially subtle manipulation of style and iconography. Michael's spiritual qualities were made immediately clear to the Byzantine viewer since the Archangel is winged. Michael gracefully holds a staff and an orb in his hands, and a delicate fillet, tied at the back, is visible in his shoulder-length hair. The face of the Archangel is handled with great refinement. Indeed, the qualities of his face and expression, the full mouth, finely modeled cheeks and chin and detailed shaping of luxuriant hair, show a desire on the part of the painter to manifest a degree of sensuality in this image. Yet the painter at the same time denies the apparently terrestrial presence of the Archangel, in particular through his treatment of the eyes which are large and focused directly on the beholder. The Archangel's piercing eyes create a distance from the realm of the viewer that the sensual handling of the Archangel para-

7. This position is taken also by H. L. Kessler, "Real Absence: Early Medieval Art and the Metamorphosis of Vision," in Morfologie sociali e culturali in Europa fra tarda antichità e alto medioevo, Settimane vol. 45 (Spoleto, 1998) II:1157–70. But as C. von Schönborn, L'icône du Christ. Fondements théologiques élaborées entre le Ier et le IIer Concile de Nicée (325–787) (Fribourg, 1976) 217ff., has demonstrated, the characteristic of an image of Christ is opacity and particularity.

8. See M. Soteriou, "Παλαιολογέιος εἰκὼν τοῦ Ἀρχαγγελοῦ Μιχαήλ," DChAE 1(1959): 80ff., M. Alpatov, "Sur l'iconographie des anges dans l'art de Byzance et de l'ancienne Russie," Zograf 11(1980):6, and Conversation with God. Icons from the Byzantine Museum of Athens (9th–15th Centuries). The Hellenistic Centre, London, 22 May–20 June 1998 (Athens, 1998) 65–69.

Figure 19. Icon of the Archangel Michael, Byzantine Museum, Athens, Palaiologan. Photo: Byzantine Museum, Athens.

doxically encourages. But the eyes also impart a sense of presence since the archangel is not gazing frontally out of the icon. In order to accommodate the equipment he presents, he has his right shoulder pushed closer to the picture plane than the left, and consequently his head turns slightly back to the left. This turning, found in some early icons also (fig. 1), gives the impression of animation, of the body and eyes swiveling in order to take the viewer into account. So the eyes have the ability to create distance and presence at the same time, both through the penetrating scrutiny and the illusion of alertness which the sidelong stare implies. On this icon, style and iconography form a conjunction of corporeality and transcendence that encourages approach but thwarts familiarity: ultimately, the icon describes a nature contingent upon our material world, a nature that is only partially described and describable.⁹

While a formal analysis of this particularly fine example shows that painters could communicate the conditional quality of human comprehension of angelic nature, epigrams and ekphraseis from the Middle and Late Byzantine periods demonstrate that this quality was fully appreciated by the Byzantine viewer. The contingency of angelic nature, which images can state so subtly and compellingly, evoked articulate responses in writers on images and these responses show a striking continuity in writings about images of angels from the sixth century on. The persistence of these responses could be interpreted as normative, that is, as literary topoi that reappear periodically in Byzantine culture without demonstrable connection to real images.¹⁰ Yet formal analyses of images of angels show that painters did sometimes employ elements of style and iconography to attempt description of the problems of angelic nature. Texts about images of angels demonstrate that Byzantine viewers were fully engaged with these artistic attempts. The allusive, contingent quality of such images was a significant intellectual and devotional assumption that had real and ongoing meaning for the Byzantine viewer. Noteworthy, too, is the continuity from iconophile descriptions of angelic appearance and images to these later texts; evidently, iconophile image theory did have a degree of influence over the perpetuation of certain

9. Charles Barber has described the non-representational quality of Byzantine art as its primary attractive component; that is, the tension between reality and abstraction draws the viewer to contemplate the image in a more active manner. See C. Barber, "From Transformation to Desire: Art and Worship after Byzantine Iconoclasm," ArtB 75(1993):12: "one could argue that the formal practices employed in Byzantine art draw attention to the pictorial field itself as an autonomous significant space rather than as a representational space."

10. A problem addressed in D. Freedberg, The Power of Images. Studies in the History and Theory of Response (Chicago and London, 1989) 291–94.

perceptions of images after the issues had been decided in the mid-ninth century.

Several epigrams on images of angels by John Mavropus (ca. 1000–ca. 1075/81), Metropolitan of Euchaïta, reveal continuity with earlier epigrams and image theory, and also a meaningful engagement with conceptual problems raised by material images of immaterial beings. Like the epigram of Agathias on the icon given in thanksgiving to the Archangel Michael, Mavropus also described an icon vowed because of particular devotion to the Archangel:

“On the bodiless one”: Who can give shape to the shapeless nature?
The faithful Theodora [has provided] a crown. And how does one depict the unknowable sight? Faith easily reconciles all these things.
And what reward does this most pious woman desire? She yearns after the spiritual saviour of all things. Archistrategos, hasten, fulfill the yearning. This faithful woman will hold to this desire especially.¹¹

In relating Theodora’s longing for the protection of the Archangel, Mavropus played on the idea of Michael’s immanence. The epigram noted the transcendence of Michael’s nature, the “shapeless” and “bodiless” quality of the Archangel, that is essentially “unknowable.” The gap between this unknowable nature and human comprehension is bridged by two complementary means: the tension between the material shaping of “the shapeless nature” and “the unknowable sight,” and the faith of the viewer that leads him or her to contemplation and conviction. This process is a remarkable condensation of the elaborate image theory of the Iconoclastic period. The need to prove the circumscribability of a formless, immaterial host and the subsequent defense of the symbolic, non-resembling iconography of angels had lost any urgency that the eighth- / ninth-century context demanded; yet this same theoretical construct that justified the making of images of angels and the value they have for Christians was still valid in the eleventh century.

11. Versus iambici, PG 120:1177AB; Iohannis Euchaïtorum metropolitae quae in codice vaticano graeco 676 supersunt, ed. P. de Lagarde (Göttingen, 1882; rp. Amsterdam, 1979) 38 (#73).

Another epigram by Mavropus also described the tension between matter and immateriality that is the defining characteristic of images of angels; while this tension was common in some form to other religious images, capturing ethereal formlessness on a material image is an act peculiar to representing angels. In this epigram, Mavropus recounted the unresolved coincidence of color and formlessness on an image of the Archangel Michael:

“On the Archangel Michael”: Light, spirit and fire, we know the angels to be altogether above baseness and feeling: but the leader of immaterial host is set here formed out of colours. O faith, such wonders have you the power to bring about, so easily [you give] shapeless nature in shapes. Yet the representation reveals what is represented, not as he is by nature, but as he was made manifest many times.¹²

The irresolution that such an image manifests is, in fact, its compelling feature. As the subject is transcendent “light, spirit and fire,” delineating the Archangel does not capture his nature in any essential way; rather, this act shows him in one of his forms made manifest in the past. Moreover, the sense that such an image is contingent on this partial disclosure of the Archangel’s true nature lends the image its attractive quality to the viewer. As Mavropus said, the fact that the bodiless Archangel has condescended to assume a form comprehensible to humanity in material colors and lines makes Michael paradoxically present: in these shapes, Michael’s presence is somehow brought nearer, made more proximate. Like the neo-Platonic descriptions of Agathias and the iconophiles on the apprehension of such images, the material image is conceived as a non-resembling symbol that paradoxically makes the object of desire proximate.

12. Anthologia graeca, ed. E. Cougny, 3 vols. (Paris, 1871–1890) III:413; very like the epigram at Versus iambici, PG 120:1139A, Iohannis Euchaitorum metropolitae, 11–12 (#24). See also Anthologia graeca, III:361–63; III:415, “On the Archistrategos: In gold, like fire, from silver, as light, I shape you, light to me, flames to enemies”; and III:401: “On the Archistrategos: How does a material hand render the immaterial? The spirit the spirit renders, the hand the sign.” On some of these epigrams, see H. G. Thümmel, Bilderlehre und Bilderstreit. Arbeiten zur Auseinandersetzung über die Ikone und ihre Begründung vornehmlich im 8. und 9. Jahrhundert (Würzburg, 1991) 161ff.

If Mavropus described the compelling paradox of angels' images, Michael Psellus—who, incidentally, knew Mavropus—attempted an interpretation of the appearance and attributes used to render angelic nature and activity. In an analysis of the iconography of angels, Psellus separated the appearance of angels in images into its component parts. The most notable aspect is their anthropomorphic form: “this shows them to be rational beings; for man alone among all living creatures has been enriched with intellect and reason.”¹³ The puzzling quality of the angels' appearances in images had profoundly discomfited such theologians as Epiphanius of Salamis and Severus of Antioch; that is, the depiction of angels as men with pagan-style dress and attributes was manifestly incommensurate with the angels' spiritual quality. Like the iconophiles, Psellus accepted the distance between angelic nature and material representation as a positive provision of incomplete knowledge of angels for humanity. Psellus's description is strikingly close in detail to the Palaiologan icon discussed above. While this icon is an especially fine example, and so worthy of examination, it is not exceptional iconographically, and clearly Psellus was examining an image very similar to that Palaiologan icon of the Archangel Michael. An ekphrasis closer in time to this Palaiologan icon is not lacking, however. For example, Symeon of Thessalonike, who died in 1429, responded in a similarly symbolic vein before just such an image.¹⁴ Both Psellus and Symeon, it should be

13. The individual attributes also hold clues for understanding the angels' being. The wings indicate “their exalting and heavenly upward motion”; the sphere often placed in one hand “suggests their quickness of movement: for the sphere is such that, touching a tiny portion of the ground, it is able to arrive independently of time and in less than an instant wherever it wishes”; the fillet denotes “the purity and chastity of their undefiled nature.” See K. Snipes, “An Unedited Treatise of Michael Psellos on the Iconography of Angels and on the Religious Festivals Celebrated on Each Day of the Week,” in Gonimos. Neoplatonic and Byzantine Studies Presented to Leendert G. Westerlink at 75, ed. J. Duffy and J. Peradotto (Buffalo, 1988) 200ff.

14. Responsa ad Gabrielem Pentapolitanum, PG 155:869B–D. He was asked the reason why the angels wear the fillet in images, why the angels and saints have nimbi, and why in the hands of the angels there are circular, cloudy forms. With regard to the fillet, he an-noted, took seriously the iconography of the angels as imparting, or showing covertly, the divine truths which are otherwise difficult of access.¹⁵

As these two ekphraseis show a continuity in engagement with the iconography of angels, so Palaiologan epigrams consistently reveal an appreciation of the tension between materiality and immateriality that images of angels play on. Nicephorus Kallistus Xanthopoulos (before 1256?–ca. 1335?) wrote specifically on the presence evoked through representation, and, while the paradoxical quality of the description of immateriality in colors is raised, this quality is left at the level of an irreconcilable contradiction. Michael's presence is someswered, "In examining the images of the holy angels, one surmises that the fillet worn round their heads shows covertly (ὑπεμφαίνει) the purity of their intellect, since it is worn round the place of the intellect, so that they are even bonded intellectually to God, and by these things are offered [such] for our contemplation and care in a fine appearing manner (ἀγαθοειδῶς). And moreover, as they are pure and immaterial beings, they wear [the fillet] just as a crown of their endless and heavenly virtue. And they have worn this (δεδεμένους) about their hair, so that they do not move confusedly or superfluously, but only concerning divine compulsion, and their intellect is speeded from above." Furthermore, the nimbi of the angels and of the saints "show covertly" the grace and radiance and action descended from God. Lastly, he addressed the reason for the orb carried by the angels, "And the cloudy and circular thing that the angels hold in their hands symbolises the consecration by the Spirit, and that they have been fixed immobile in the dispensation of the Saviour. In the midst of the circle is seen written this figure, X, so that by this Christ is revealed. But the form of the circle is also a theological sign. For if Christ teaches that he was made flesh, he also teaches that as God he has neither beginning nor end, and that Christ rules the universe, and has the whole cosmos in his hand, as David says." The orb is not the symbol of fleetness that it was for Psellus but a sign of Christ's duophysite nature, and of the delegation of offices to the angels in the new dispensation brought about through the incarnation. In contrast to the incorruptibility that the fillet denoted for Psellus, the fillet was a sign of the angels' intellectual unity with God for Symeon of Thessalonike.

15. See, however, the negative remarks of C. Mango, "St. Michael and Attis," DChAE 12(1984):39, on these texts. But see, too, H. Saradi-Mendelovici, "Christian Attitudes toward Pagan Monuments in Late Antiquity and Their Legacy in Later Byzantine Centuries," DOP 44(1990):58, who describes how far Byzantine viewers were from understanding pagan statues. She cites the interpretation of the iconography of a statue of Athena from the eighth-century Parastaseis as an example: Athena is represented without helmet because her wisdom is invisible, the gorgon on her chest is to show the speed of her mind, and so on. See Constantinople in the Eighth Century. The "Parastaseis Syntomoi Chronikai," ed. Averil Cameron, J. Herrin et al. (Leiden, 1984) #3; and see 215–16. The text does not demonstrate detachment or ignorance since indeed it is following a literary tradition from antiquity, as in the writings of Porphyry on statues (see chapters 2 and 3). Likewise, Psellus's and Symeon's interpretations are not banal or without real explanatory power but take their form from ancient topoi and newly apply them to symbolic, Christian images of angels.

how alluded to by the representation, for he is by some inexplicable means made present in this ambiguous image:

“On the Archangel Michael, a work of art by the famous painter, master Eulalios”: It seems either that the painter has dipped his brush in immateriality to delineate a spirit, or else the spirit remains unobserved in his picture, hiding in colours his incorporeal nature. How is it that matter can drag the spirit down and encompass the immaterial by means of colours? This is [a work] of ardent love (as shown by the facts), and it kindles the heart.¹⁶

The “kindling of the heart” implicitly refers to the intellectual or spiritual process which, paradoxically, the material image initiates. The closing sentence, then, indicates an important function of images of the Archangel as it was described in the sixth-century epigrams of Agathias and Nilus, and in the elaborate image theory of the iconophile theologians. Indeed, as stated in chapter 3, the conceptual framework established by Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite determined subsequent approaches to symbolic images of divine things, namely angels. In this framework, the symbols best suited for contemplation of divinity are non-resembling, since the intellect cannot adhere to these symbols and become simply mired in its material reality. Xanthopoulos’s epigram describes this very process: either matter has overcome its limitations and ascended to spirit or spirit has condescended to be captured in matter; the issue is not resolved, in fact is unresolvable, and leaves the image as allusive to the model in some indeterminate but compelling way. By this lack of essential likeness, the viewer is forced beyond the material surface to contemplation of a transcendent reality. In other words, images of angels remained fine examples of areopagite symbols.

The numerous epigrams of Manuel Philes (ca. 1275–ca. 1345) on images of angels exhibit the same basic dependence upon this neo-Platonic framework. Like other epigram writers, Philes engaged the incongruity of matter attempting to capture a spiritual creature. Writing on an image of an Archangel, Philes noted that paradoxically the matter of the image contains intellect, spirit, light and fire; the image is “intellect visible, spirit caught fast.”¹⁷ More strangely, he wrote, the flame submitted to be captured in human form, clothed, with hair and feathers, but marvelously the icon does not burn. The face ought to be red to indicate that fiery nature but, instead, the painter has used clever artifice and manipulated material color, that is yellow, to show the fire of the model. Like Xanthopoulus’s epigram, this epigram reveals an awareness of the distance between craft that deceitfully manifests an angelic form and the reality that is unknowable and uncontainable; in fact, this tension makes these images remarkable and compelling for the writers. At the same time as the images appear to make the Archangel apprehensible, they declare his transcendence:

16. “Νικηφόρος Κάλλιστος Ξανθόπουλος,” ed. A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, BZ 11(1902):46–47 (#16); trans. C. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire. 312–1453. Sources and Documents (Toronto, 1986) 231.

Just now we see a strange blending in life. The painter mingles the flame with water. For having described the immaterial nature by means of flesh, he provides water to the faithful [to quench] the flames of desire.¹⁸

As the texts adduced in this Conclusion show, the irresolvable problem of depicting angels became a determining and compelling feature that always made their images a distinctive kind of representation. Representing angels brought angels nearer to their desiring worshippers, as Xanthopoulus averred, but not so near as to satisfy

17. Manuelis Philae carmina ex codicibus Escorialensis, Florentinis, Parisinis et Vaticanis, ed. E. Miller, 2 vols. (Paris, 1855–1857) II:202 (CLXXXVII).

18. Manuelis Philae carmina, II:415 (XLVIII). Philes also wrote the following two epigrams: “‘On an icon of the Archangel Michael’: If you desire to depict animation, Why do you depict, painter, a winged man, But not the intellect and spirit and light and flames? If not for the fact that no one can depict the immaterial in matter?” (ibid., I:357–58 [CXCII]) and, “‘On the guardian in stone’: You (are) spirit and flame, but behold, before me you do not burn. And you are found as a guard armed for us. Michael, loosening all darkening of sufferings into stony fire, you return to the light” (ibid., II:158–59 [CXVIII]). See also Manuelis Philae carmina graeca, ed. G. Wernsdorf (Leipzig, 1768) 28ff. (I.109ff.). Philes also wrote an epigram on the miracle at Chonae; see Manuelis Philae carmina, II:236 (CCXXVI).

that desire; as all writers on images of angels maintained, the angels are always absent from their images. But, by representing these creatures materially as well as verbally, Byzantines felt this spiritual world was made tantalizingly near and an immanence was provisionally contained.

BLANK PAGE

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- Achmet ibn Sirin. Oneirocriticon. Ed. F. Drexler. Leipzig, 1925.
- Acta apostolorum apocrypha*. Ed. C. Tischendorf. Leipzig, 1861.
- Acta Sanctorum*. 71 vols. Paris, 1863–1940.
- Adversus Constantinum Caballinum*. PG 95:309–44.
- Analecta hymnica graeca*. Ed. A. Kominis. Rome, 1972.
- Anastasius Sinaïtes. Disputatio adversus Judaeos. PG 89:1203–81.
- Anthologia graeca*. Ed. E. Cougny. 3 vols. Paris, 1871–1890.
- Athanasius. Orationes contra Arianos. PG 26:12–468.
- Basil of Caesarea. Traité du Saint-Esprit. SC vol. 17 bis. Ed. B. Pruche. Paris, 1968.
- The Book of Enoch or 1 Enoch. A New English Edition*. Ed. M. Black. Leiden, 1985.
- The Book of Jubilees or The Little Genesis*. Trans. R. H. Charles. London, 1902.
- Chrysippus. Des Chrysippos von Jerusalem Enkomion auf den hl. Johannes den Täufer. Texte und Forschungen zur byzantinisch-neugriechischen Philologie, vol. 20. Ed. A. Sigalas. Athens, 1937.
- “Χρυσίππου πρεσβυτέρου Ἐγκώμιον εἰς Ἀρχάγγελον Μιχαήλ.” Ed. A. Sigalas. EEBS 3(1926):85–93.
- Clement of Alexandria. Excerpta ex scriptis Theodoto. Stromata Buch VII und VIII. Excerpta ex Theodoto. Eclogae propheticae. Quis dives saluetur. Fragmente. GCS vol. 17. 2d ed. Ed. O. Stählin, L. Früchtel and U. Treu. Berlin, 1970.
- Constantinople in the Eighth Century. The “Parastaseis Syntomoi Chronikai.”* Ed. Averil Cameron, J. Herrin et al. Leiden, 1984.
- Constitutiones Apostolicae*. In Didascalia et Constitutiones apostolorum. Ed. F. X. Funk. Paderborn, 1905; rp. Turin, 1962.

- "Cosmas Indicopleustes." Topographie chrétienne. SC vols. 141, 159, 197. Ed. W. Wolska-Conus. Paris, 1968–1973.
- Cyril of Alexandria. Homilia xviii. Fragmenta de translatione reliquiarum martyrum Cyri et Joannis. PG 77:1100–1105.
- Cyril of Jerusalem. Catéchèses mystagogiques. SC vol. 126. Ed. A. Piédagnel. Paris, 1966.
- Damaskenos Stoudite. Θησαυρός. Venice, 1838.
- Dialogue between a Christian and a Jew entitled ANTIBOLH ΠΑΠΗΣΚΟΤ ΚΑΙ ΦΙΛΩΝΟΤ ΙΟΥΔΑΙΩΝ ΠΡΟΣ ΜΟΝΑΧΟΝ ΤΙΝΑ*. Ed. A. C. McGiffert. Marburg, 1889.
- La Didascalie de Jacob*. PO vol. 8/5. Ed. F. Nau. Paris, 1912; rp. Turnhout, 1971.
- Disputation of Sergius the Stylite against a Jew*. Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium, vol. 339, 2 vols. Ed. A. P. Hayman. Louvain, 1973.
- Epiphanius of Salamis. "Die Schriften des Epiphanius gegen die Bilderverehrung." Ed. K. Holl. Sitzungsberichte der Königlich Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften 35.2(1916):828–68. [= K. Holl. Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte, II:351–87. Tübingen, 1928; rp. Darmstadt, 1964.]
- Eusebius of Caesarea. Praeparatio Evangelica. GCS vol. 43. 2d ed. Ed. K. Mras. Berlin, 1975.
- Evagrius Ponticus. De oratione. PG 79:1165–1200.
- . Euagrius Ponticus. Ed. W. Frankenberg. Berlin, 1912.
- . Traité Pratique ou Le Moine. SC vols. 170, 171. Ed. A. Guillaumont and C. Guillaumont. Paris, 1971.
- Faustus Rhegiensis. Epistolae. In Fausti Reiensis Praeter sermones pseudo-eusebianos opera. Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, vol. 21, ed. A. Engelbrecht, 159–220. Prague, Vienna and Leipzig, 1891.
- Gennadius of Marseilles. De ecclesiasticis dogmatibus. PL 58:979–1054.
- The Greek Anthology*. Ed. W. R. Paton. 5 vols. London, 1927.
- Gregory of Nazianzus. Orationes xlv. PG 36:12–664.
- Gregory of Nyssa. The Catechetical Orations of Gregory of Nyssa. Cambridge Patristic Texts, vol. 2. Ed. J. H. Srawley. Cambridge, 1903; rp. Cambridge, 1956.
- . In Canticum Canticorum homiliae xv. PG 44:756–1120.
- . Gregorii Nysseni opera. II. Contra Eunomium Libri. Ed. W. Jaeger. 2d ed. Leiden, 1960.
- . Oratio catechetica magna. PG 45:11–105.
- Hieronymus of Jerusalem. De effectu baptismi et notis Christiani. PG 40:860–66.
- Ignatius the Deacon. The Life of the Patriarch Tarasius by Ignatius the Deacon (BHG 1698). Birmingham Byzantine and Ottoman Monographs, vol. 4. Ed. S. Efthymiadis. Aldershot, 1998.
- . Vita Nicephori. PG 100:41–160.
- John Chrysostom. Ad eos qui scandalizati. PG 52:479–528.
- . Homiliae 1–67 in Genesim. PG 53:21–54, 580.
- . In Isaiham dominum (Is. 6:1), homiliae 1–6. PG 56:97–142.

- John Mavropus. Iohannis Euchaitorum metropolitae quae in codice vaticano graeco 676 supersunt. Ed. P. de Lagarde. Göttingen, 1882; rp. Amsterdam, 1979.
- . Versus iambici. PG 120:1149–1200.
- John of Damascus. Expositio fidei. Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II Expositio fidei. PTS vol. 12. Ed. P.B. Kotter. Berlin, 1973.
- . Orationes de imaginibus tres. Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III Contra imaginum calumniatores orationes tres. PTS vol. 17. Ed. P.B. Kotter. Berlin, 1975.
- Justin Martyr. Dialogus cum Tryphone Iudaeo. Ed. J. Goodspeed, Die ältesten Apologeten, 90–265. Göttingen, 1915; rp. New York, 1950.
- . Justin. Dialogue avec Tryphon. Ed. J. Archimbault. 2 vols. Paris, 1909.
- The Letter of the Three Patriarchs to Emperor Theophilus and Related Texts*. Ed. J.A. Munitiz, J. Chrysostomides, E. Harvalia-Crook and Ch. Dendrinis. Cambridge, 1997.
- The Life of St Irene Abbess of Chrysobalanton. A Critical Edition with Introduction, Translation, Notes and Indices*. Ed. J.O. Rosenqvist. Uppsala, 1986.
- The Life of Saint Nikon*. Ed. D.F. Sullivan. Brookline, Mass., 1987.
- Macarius Magnes. Macarii Magnetis quae supersunt ex inedito codice. Ed. C. Blondel. Paris, 1876.
- Manuel Philes. Manuelis Philae carmina ex codicibus Escorialensis, Florentinis, Parisinis et Vaticanis. Ed. E. Miller. 2 vols. Paris, 1855–1857.
- . Manuelis Philae carmina graeca. Ed. G. Wernsdorf. Leipzig, 1768.
- Μηναία τοῦ ὁλοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ*. 6 vols. Rome, 1888–1901.
- Menologium Basilianum*. PG 117:20–613.
- Metrophanes, Metropolitan of Smyrna. “Προσφωνητικὸς εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους Ἀρχαγγέλους Μιχαὴλ καὶ Γαβριήλ.” In Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ Ἀληθεία 7(1887): 386–93.
- Michael Akominatus. Μιχαὴλ Ἀκομινάτοῦ τοῦ Χωνιατοῦ τὰ Σωζόμενα. Ed. S.P. Lampros. 2 vols. Athens, 1879–1880.
- Michael Psellus. Oratio in Archangelum Michaellem. In Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae, ed. E.A. Fisher, 230–56. Stuttgart and Leipzig, 1994.
- Michael of Stoudios. “Éloge des archanges Michel et Gabriel par Michel le Moine (BHG 1294a).” Ed. T. Matantseva. JöB 46(1996):97–155.
- Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum et Italicarum saec. VI–IX*. Hannover, 1878.
- Narratio de miraculo a Michaelle Archangelo Chonis patrato*. Ed. M. Bonnet. Paris, 1890.
- Nicephorus, Patriarch of Constantinople. Adversus Epiphanidem. In Pitra IV: 292–380.
- . Antirrheticus adversus Constantinum Copronymum. PG 100:205–533.
- . Apologeticus pro sacris imaginibus. PG 100:533–850.
- . Contra Eusebium. In Pitra I:371–503.
- . De Magnete. In Pitra I:302–35.

- . Nicephori patriarchae constantinopolitani Refutatio et eversio definitionis synodalis anni 815. Corpus Christianorum. Series Graeca, vol. 33. Ed. J. Featherstone. Louvain, 1997.
- Nicephorus, Priest of Hagia Sophia. Vita S. Andreae Sali. PG 111:628–888.
- Nicephorus Skeuophylactus. “Nicephori Sceuophylacis encomium in S. Theodorum Siceotam.” Ed. K. Kirch. AB 20(1901):248–72.
- Nicetas Stethatos. Opusculs et lettres. SC vol. 81. Ed. J. Darrouzès. Paris, 1961.
- Palladius. The Lausiac History of Palladius. Ed. C. Butler. 2 vols. Cambridge, 1898–1904.
- Pantaleon. Encomium in maximum et gloriosissimum Michaellem coelestis militiae principem. PG 98:1259–66.
- . Narratio miraculorum maximi archangeli Michaelis. PG 140:573–92.
- Philoxenus of Mabbug. The Discourses of Philoxenus Bishop of Mabbôgh, A.D. 485–519. Vol. II. Introduction, Translation, etc. Ed. E. A. W. Budge. London, 1894.
- Photius. Bibliothèque, Tome V (“Codices” 230–241). Ed. R. Henry. Paris, 1967.
- . Epistulae et Amphilochia. Ed. B. Laourdas and L. G. Westerink. 6 vols. in 7 pts. Leipzig, 1983–1988.
- Procopius of Gaza. Commentarii in Genesim. PG 87.1:21–512.
- Pseudo-Athanasius. Quaestiones ad Antiochum Ducem. PG 28:597–700.
- Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite. De divinis nominibus. PG 3:585–984.
- . De ecclesiastica hierarchia. PG 3:369–569.
- . De mystica theologia. PG 3:997–1048.
- . La Hiérarchie Céleste. SC vol. 58. Ed. G. Heil and M. de Gandillac. Paris, 1958.
- Pseudo-Macarius. Die fünfzig geistlichen Homilien des Makarios. PTS vol. 4. Ed. H. Dörries, E. Klosterman and M. Kroeger. Berlin, 1964.
- Severus of Antioch. Les homiliae cathedrales. PO vol. 8/2. Ed. M. Brière. Paris, 1919; rp. Turnhout, 1971.
- Sissinius. Acta apparitionis in Chonis. AASS Sept. 8:41–49.
- Sophronius. Narratio miraculorum Ss. Cyri et Joannis. PG 87.3:3424–3676.
- Stephen the Deacon. La vie d’Étienne le Jeune. Birmingham Byzantine and Ottoman Monographs, vol. 3. Ed. M.-F. Auzépy. Aldershot, 1997.
- Symeon of Thessalonike. Responsa ad Gabrielem Pentapolitanum. PG 155:829–952.
- Tertullian. Apologeticum adversus gentes pro Christianis. In Tertulliani Opera. Pars I. Opera Catholica, Adversus Marcionem. Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina, vol. 1, ed. E. Dekkers, 85–171. Turnhout, 1954.
- Theodore of Stoudios. Antirrheticus adversus iconomachos. PG 99:328–436.
- . In sanctos angelos. PG 99:729–48.
- . Refutatio et subversio impiorum poematum. PG 99:436–77.
- Theodoret of Cyrillus. De providentia orationes x. PG 82:556–773.
- Theophanes. Chronographia. Ed. C. de Boor. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1883–1885.
- The Third and Fourth Book of Maccabees*. Trans. M. Hadas. New York, 1953; rp. New York, 1976.

- Les Trophées de Damas*. PO vol. 15 / 2. Ed. G. Bardy. Paris, 1920; rp. Turnhout, 1973.
Vie de Théodore de Sykéôn. Ed. A.-J. Festugière. 2 vols. Brussels, 1970.
Vita S. Mariae Iunoris. AASS Nov. 4:692–705.
Vitae duae antiquae Sancti Athanasii Athonitae. Corpus Christianorum, Series Graeca, vol. 9. Ed. J. Noret. Turnhout, 1982.
 Xanthopoulos, Nicephorus Kallistus. “Νικηφόρος Κάλλιστος Ξανθόπουλος.” Ed. A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus. BZ 11(1902):38–46.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- Alexakis, A. “Stephen of Bostra: Fragmenta Contra Iudaeos (CPG 7790). A New Edition.” JöB 43(1993):45–60.
 Alexander, P.J. “Church Councils and Patristic Authority. The Iconoclastic Council of Hiereia (754) and St. Sophia (815).” Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 63(1958):493–505.
 ———. “Hypatius of Ephesus: A Note on Worship in the Sixth Century.” HTR 45(1952):177–84.
 ———. “The Iconoclastic Council of St. Sophia (815) and Its Definition (Horos).” DOP 7(1953):35–66.
 ———. The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople. Ecclesiastical Policy and Image Worship in the Byzantine Empire. Oxford, 1958.
Le ali di Dio. Messagerie e guerrieri alati tra oriente e occidente. Ed. M. Bussagli and M. D’Onofrio. Milan, 2000.
 Alpago-Novello, A., et al. Art and Architecture in Medieval Georgia. Trans. N. Holloway. Louvain-la-Neuve, 1980.
 Alpatov, M. “Sur l’iconographie des anges dans l’art de Byzance et de l’ancienne Russie.” Zograf 11(1980):5–15.
 Amélineau, E. “Le christianisme chez les anciens Coptes.” Revue de l’histoire des religions 14(1886):308–45, 15(1887):52–87.
 ———. Contes et romans de l’Égypte chrétienne. Paris, 1888.
 Anastos, M.V. “The Argument for Iconoclasm as Presented by the Iconoclastic Council of 754.” In Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. K. Weitzmann et al., 177–88. Princeton, 1955.
 ———. “The Ethical Theory of Images Formulated by the Iconoclasts in 754 and 815.” DOP 8(1954):151–60.
 Angelidi, Ch. “La version longue de la Vision du moine Cosmas.” AB 101(1983):73–99.
 Angelillis, C. Il santuario del Gargano e il culto di S. Michele nel mondo. 2 vols. Foggia, 1956.
 Auzépy, M.-F. “L’Adversus Constantinum Caballinum et Jean de Jérusalem.” BS 56(1995):323–38.
 ———. “L’analyse littéraire et l’historien: l’exemple des vies de saints iconoclastes.” BS 53(1992):57–67.

- . "Le destruction de l'icône du Christ de la Chalcé par Léon III: Propagande ou réalité." B 60(1990):445–92.
- . "À propos des vies de saints iconoclastes." RSBN 30(1993):3–5.
- Barasch, M. Icon. Studies in the History of an Idea. New York and London, 1992.
- Barbel, J. Christos Angelos. Die Anschauung von Christos als Bote und Engel in der gelehrten und volkstümlichen Literatur des christlichen Altertums. Theophaneia, vol. 3. Bonn, 1941.
- Barber, C. "From Transformation to Desire: Art and Worship after Byzantine Iconoclasm." ArtB 75(1993):7–16.
- . "The Koimesis Church, Nicaea. The Limits of Representation on the Eve of Iconoclasm." JöB 41(1991):43–60.
- Barker, M. The Great Angel. A Study of Israel's Second God. London, 1992.
- Barsanti, C. "Una nota sulle sculture del Tempio di Giacinto nella Chiesa della Dormizione (Koimesis) di Iznik-Nicea." Storia dell'arte 46(1982):210–18.
- Bartelink, G.J.M. "Quelques observations sur ΠΑΡΡΗΣΙΑ dans la littérature paléo-chrétienne." In Graecitas et latinitas christianorum primaeva, suppl. 3, 5–57, 155–57. Nijmegen, 1970.
- Battifol, P. Studiorum patristicorum. Études d'ancienne littérature chrétienne. 2 vols. Paris, 1889–1890.
- Baumeister, T. "Religionsgeschichtliche und kultgeographische Aspekte der westlichen Michaelsverehrung." In Memoriam sanctorum venerantes: miscellanea in onore di Monsignor Victor Saxer, Studi di antichità cristiana, vol. 48, 11–19. Vatican City, 1992.
- Baynes, N.H. "Idolatry and the Early Church." In N.H. Baynes, Byzantine and Other Studies, 116–43. London, 1955.
- Beck, A.C.M. Genien und Niken als Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst. Giessen, 1936.
- Belke, K., and N. Mersich. Phrygien und Pisidien. Tabula Imperii Byzantini, vol. 7. Vienna, 1990.
- Belting, H. Bild und Kult. Eine Geschichte des Bildes vor dem Zeitalter der Kunst. Munich, 1990.
- Berefelt, G. A Study on the Winged Angel. The Origin of a Motif. Stockholm, 1968.
- Bertelè, T. L'imperatore alato nella numismatica bizantina. Rome, 1951.
- Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca*. Ed. F. Halkin. 3 vols. Brussels, 1957.
- Bidez, J. Vie de Porphyre. Le philosophe néoplatonicien. Gand and Leipzig, 1913; rp. Hildesheim and New York, 1980.
- Blum, C. "The Meaning of στοιχείον and its Derivatives in the Byzantine Age. A Study in Byzantine Magic." Eranos 44(1946):315–25.
- Börtzler, F. Porphyrius' Schrift von den Götterbildern. Erlangen, 1908.
- Bovini, G. Mosaici di S. Apollinare di Ravenna: Il ciclo cristologico. Florence, 1958.
- Brendel, O.J. Prolegomena to the Study of Roman Art. New Haven and London, 1979.
- Brenk, B. Die frühchristliche Mosaiken in S. Maria Maggiore zu Rom. Wiesbaden, 1975.

- Brightman, F.E. "The Historia Mystagoga and Other Greek Commentaries on the Byzantine Liturgy." JTS 9(1908):248–67, 387–97.
- . Liturgies Eastern and Western, Vol. 1. Oxford, 1896.
- Brock, S. "Iconoclasm and Monophysitism." In Iconoclasm. Papers Given at the Ninth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, University of Birmingham, March 1975, ed. A. Bryer and J. Herrin, 53–57. Birmingham, 1977.
- Brown, P. "The Rise and Function of the Holy Man in Late Antiquity, 1971–1997." J ECS 6(1998):353–76.
- Browning, R. "The 'Low Level' Saint's Life in the Early Byzantine World." In The Byzantine Saint, ed. S. Hackel, 117–27. London, 1981.
- Brubaker, L. "Byzantine Art in the Ninth Century: Theory, Practice, and Culture." BMGS 13(1989):23–93.
- . "Icons Before Iconoclasm?" In Morfologie sociali e culturali in Europa fra tarda antichità e alto medioevo. Settimane vol. 45, II:1215–54. Spoleto, 1998.
- . "To Legitimize an Emperor: Constantine and Visual Authority in the Eighth and Ninth Centuries." In New Constantines. The Rhythm of Imperial Renewal in Byzantium, 4th–13th Centuries, Papers from the Twenty-sixth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, St. Andrews, March 1992, ed. P. Magdalino, 139–58. Aldershot, 1994.
- . Vision and Meaning in Ninth-Century Byzantium. Image as Exegesis in the Homilies of Gregory of Nazianzus. Cambridge, 1999.
- Büchsel, M. "Die Schöpfungs mosaiken von San Marco. Die Ikonographie der Erschaffung des Menschens in der frühchristlichen Kunst." Städte-Jahrbuch n.s. 13(1991):29–80.
- Budge, E.A.W. Miscellaneous Coptic Texts in the Dialect of Upper Egypt. London, 1915.
- Bussagli, M. "Angeli." Enciclopedia dell'arte medievale, I:629–38. Rome, 1991–.
- . "Gli angeli e i venti: considerazioni sul simbolismo aereo delle ali angeliche." Arte medievale 5/2(1991):107–26.
- . "Il Precursore. Giovanni l'angelo, martire della luce." Abstracta 27(1988): 23–29.
- . Storia degli angeli. Racconto di immagini e di idee. Milan, 1991.
- Byzance. L'art byzantin dans les collections publiques françaises*. Paris, 1992.
- Cameron, Alan. The Greek Anthology from Meleager to Planudes. Oxford, 1993.
- Cameron, Averil. Agathias. Oxford, 1970.
- . "Byzantium and the Past in the Seventh Century: The Search for Redefinition." In The Seventh Century. Change and Continuity. Proceedings of a joint French and British Colloquium held at the Warburg Institute 8–9 July 1988, ed. J. Fontaine and J.N. Hillgarth, 250–76. London, 1992.
- . "The Language of Images: The Rise of Icons and Christian Representation." In The Church and the Arts, Studies in Church History, vol. 25, ed. D. Wood, 1–42. London, 1992.

- Campagna, O. "La grotta di S. Michele alla Serra di Grisolia." Bolletino della Badia Greca di Grottaferrata n.s. 40(1986):57–65.
- Canivet, P. "Le Michaelion de Huarte (Ve s.) et le culte syrien des anges." B 50(1980):85–117.
- Canivet, P., and M. T. Canivet. Huarte. Sanctuaire chrétien d'Apamène (IVe–VIe s.). 2 vols. Paris, 1987.
- Cecchelli, C. I mosaici della Basilica S. Maria Maggiore. Turin, 1956.
- Chandler, R. Travels in Asia Minor: Or, an account of a tour made at the expense of the Society of Dilettanti. Dublin, 1775.
- Chateau, D. "De la ressemblance: un dialogue Foucault-Magritte." In L'image Deleuze, Foucault, Lyotard, ed. T. Lenain, 95–108. Paris, 1998.
- Chesnut, R. C. Three Monophysite Christologies: Severus of Antioch, Philoxenus of Mabbug, and Jacob of Sarug. Oxford, 1976.
- Clark, E. A. The Origenist Controversy. The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate. Princeton, 1992.
- Clausberg, K. Die Wiener Genesis. Eine Kunstwissenschaftliche Bilderbuchgeschichte. Frankfurt am Main, 1984.
- Conversation with God. Icons from the Byzantine Museum of Athens (9th–15th Centuries)*. The Hellenistic Centre, London, 22 May–20 June, 1998. Athens, 1998.
- Cormack, R. "Painting After Iconoclasm." In Iconoclasm. Papers Given at the Ninth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, University of Birmingham, March 1975, ed. A. Bryer and J. Herrin, 147–63. Birmingham, 1977.
- . "The Wall Painting of St. Michael in the Theatre." In Aphrodisias Papers 2. The Theatre, a Sculptor's Workshop, Philosophers, and Coin Types, ed. R. R. R. Smith and K. T. Erim, 109–22. Ann Arbor, 1991.
- . Writing in Gold. Byzantine Society and Its Icons. London, 1985.
- Cornea, A. "On 'Fiction' and 'Authenticity' in Byzantine Pre-Iconoclastic Painting." Revue roumaine d'histoire de l'art 17(1980):3–11.
- Corrigan, K. A. Visual Polemics in the Ninth-Century Byzantine Psalters. Cambridge, 1992.
- Crafer, T. W. "Macarius Magnes, A Neglected Apologist." JTS 8(1907):401–23, 546–71.
- Cramer, J. A. Anecdota graeca e codd. manuscriptis Bibliothecae regiae parisiensis. 4 vols. Oxford, 1839–1841; rp. Hildesheim, 1967.
- Crisafulli, V. S., and J. W. Nesbitt. The Miracles of St. Artemios. A Collection of Miracle Stories by an Anonymous Author of Seventh-Century Byzantium. Leiden, New York and Köln, 1997.
- Cumont, F. "Les anges du paganisme." Revue de l'histoire des religions 72(1915):159–82.
- Cutler, A., and R. Browning. "In the Margins of Byzantium? Some Icons in Michael Psellos." BMGS 16(1992):21–32.
- Dagron, G. "Constantinople. Les sanctuaires et l'organisation de la ville religieuse." Actes du XIe congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne. Lyons, Vienne,

- Grenoble, Genève et Aoste (21–28 Septembre 1986), II:1069–85. Vatican City, 1989.
- . “Holy Images and Likeness.” DOP 45(1991):23–33.
- . “Mots, images, icônes.” Nouvelle revue de psychanalyse 44(1991):151–68.
- . “Rêver de Dieu et parler de soi. Le rêve et son interprétation d’après les sources byzantines.” In I sogni nel medioevo, ed. T. Gregory, 37–55. Rome, 1985.
- . Vie et miracles de sainte Thècle. Texte grec, traduction et commentaire. Brussels, 1978.
- D’Alverny, M.-Th. “Les anges et les jours.” CA 9(1957):271–300.
- Daniélou, J. Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes avant Nicée. Vol. I. Théologie du judéo-christianisme. Tournai, 1958.
- Delbrueck, R. Die Consulardiptychen und verwandte Denkmäler. 2 vols. Berlin and Leipzig, 1929.
- Der Nersessian, S. “Une apologie des images du septième siècle.” B 17(1944/5):58–87.
- . L’illustration des psautiers grecs du Moyen Age. II. Londres, Add. 19.352. Paris, 1970.
- . “Note sur quelques images se rattachant au thème du Christ-ange.” CA 13(1962):209–16.
- Déroche, V. “L’Apologie contre les Juifs de Léontios de Néapolis.” TM 12(1994):45–104.
- . “L’authenticité de l’Apologie contre les Juifs de Léontios de Néapolis.” Bulletin de correspondance hellénique 110(1986):655–69.
- . “L’autorité des moines à Byzance du VIII^e siècle au Xe siècle.” Revue Bénédictine 103(1993):241–54.
- Derrida, J. “How to Avoid Speaking: Denials.” In Languages of the Unsayable. The Play of Negativity in Literature and Literary Theory, ed. S. Budick and W. Iser, trans. K. Friedan, 3–70. New York, 1989.
- Deubner, L. De incubatione capita quattuor. Leipzig, 1900.
- . Kosmas und Damian. Texte und Einleitung. Leipzig, 1907.
- Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie*. Ed. F. Cabrol and H. Leclercq. Paris, 1924–.
- Dictionnaire de théologie catholique*. Ed. A. Vacant and E. Magenot. Paris, 1899–1950.
- Diekamp, F. Analecta patristica. Texte und Abhandlungen zur griechischen Patristik. Orientalia christiana analecta, vol. 117. Rome, 1938.
- Draguet, R. “L’Histoire Lausiaque: Une oeuvre écrite dans l’esprit d’Evagre.” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 41(1946):321–64, 42(1947):5–49.
- Drandakes, N. V. “Παλαιολόγειος εικὼν Βρεφοκρατούσης τοῦ εἰς Βενετίου Ἑλληνοῦ ναοῦ.” Θεολογία 28(1957):238–51.
- Duchesne, L. Macario Magnete et scriptis eius. Paris, 1877.
- Dufrenne, S. “Une illustration ‘historique,’ inconnue, du Psautier du Mont-Athos, Pantocrator No. 61.” CA 15(1965):83–95.

- Dunbabin, K.M.D. "Ipsa deae vestigiaie ..." Footprints Divine and Human on Graeco-Roman Monuments." Journal of Roman Archaeology 3(1990):85–109.
- Elliott, A.G. Roads to Paradise. Reading the Lives of the Early Saints. Hanover and London, 1987.
- Engemann, J. "Zu den Dreifaltigkeit darstellungen der frühchristlichen Kunst: Gab es in 4. Jahrhundert anthropomorphe Trinitätsbilder?" JAC 19(1976):157–72.
- Erim, K. T. Aphrodisias. City of Venus—Aphrodite. New York and London, 1986.
- . Aphrodisias. Ein Führer durch die antike Stadt und das Museum. Trans. E. Alföldi-Rosenbaum. Istanbul, 1990.
- Felis, K. "Die Niken und die Engel in altchristlicher Kunst." RQ 26(1912):3–25.
- Ferrua, A. La pittura della nuova Catacomba di via Latina. Vatican City, 1960.
- Finney, P.C. The Invisible God. Early Christians on Art. Oxford, 1994.
- Firatli, N. La sculpture byzantine figurée au Musée Archéologique d'Istanbul. Paris, 1990.
- Fisher, E.A. "Nicomedia or Galatia? Where Was Psellos' Church of the Archangel Michael?" In Gonimos. Neoplatonic and Byzantine Studies Presented to Leendert G. Westerlink at 75, ed. J. Duffy and J. Peradotto, 175–87. Buffalo, 1988.
- Fitzmeyer, J.A. "A New Feature of Qumrân Angelology and the Angels of I Cor. XI:10." New Testament Studies n.s. 4(1957/8):48–58.
- Florovsky, G. "Origen, Eusebius, and the Iconoclastic Controversy." Church History 19(1950):77–96.
- Foucault, M. This Is Not a Pipe. Trans. J. Harkness. Berkeley, 1982.
- Fox, R.L. Pagans and Christians. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, 1986.
- Francis, F.O. "Humility and Angelic Worship in Col. 2:18." Studia Theologica 16(1963):109–34. [= Conflict at Colossae. A Problem in the Interpretation of Early Christianity Illustrated by Selected Modern Studies, ed. F.O. Francis and W.A. Meeks, 163–95. Missoula, Mont., 1973.]
- Francovich, G. de. "I mosaici del bema della chiesa della Dormizione di Nicea." In Scritti di storia dell'arte in onore di Lionello Venturi, I:3–27. Rome, 1956.
- Frank, P.S. ΑΓΓΕΛΙΚΟΣ ΒΙΟΣ. Begriffsanalytische und begriffsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum "Engelgleichen Leben" im frühen Mönchtum. Münster, 1964.
- Freedberg, D. The Power of Images. Studies in the History and Theory of Response. Chicago and London, 1989.
- Freeman, A. "Theodulf of Orleans and the Libri Carolini." Speculum 32(1957):663–705.
- Friedländer, P. Johannes von Gaza und Paulus Silentarius. Kunstbeschreibungen justinianischer Zeit. Leipzig and Berlin, 1912; rp. Hildesheim and New York, 1969.
- Gabelić, S. "The Iconography of the Miracle at Chonae. An Unusual Example from Cyprus." Zograf 20(1989):95–103.
- Galavaris, G. The Illustrations of the Prefaces in Byzantine Gospels. Vienna, 1979.
- Gero, S. Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Constantine V with Particular Attention to the Oriental Sources. Louvain, 1977.

- . Byzantine Iconoclasm during the Reign of Leo III with Particular Attention to the Oriental Sources. Louvain, 1973.
- . "Hypatius of Ephesus on the Cult of Images." In Christianity, Judaism and Other Greco-Roman Cults. Studies for Morton Smith at Sixty, II:208–16. Leiden, 1975.
- Giakalis, A. Images of the Divine. The Theology of Icons at the Seventh Ecumenical Council. Leiden, New York and Köln, 1994.
- Giannopoulos, V.N. "Ἡ περὶ ἁγγέλων διδασκαλία τοῦ Πατριαρχοῦ καὶ Ὁμολογητοῦ Νικηφόρου Α' (+829)." Θεολογία 44(1973):312–38.
- Ginzburg, C. "Idols and Likenesses: Origen, Homilies on Exodus VIII.3, and Its Reception." In Sight and Insight. Essays in Honour of E. H. Gombrich at 85, ed. J. Onians, 55–72. London, 1994.
- Goar, J. Euchologion sive rituale graecorum. Venice, 1730; rp. Graz, 1960.
- Godwin, J. Mystery Religions in the Ancient World. San Francisco, 1981.
- Gothein, E. "L'arcangelo Michele, santo popolare dei Longobardi." Rassegna Pugliese di scienze, lettere ed arte 13(1896):81–89, 107–12, 137–46, 162–68.
- Gough, Mary, ed. Alahan. An Early Christian Monastery in Southeastern Turkey. Toronto, 1985.
- Gouillard, J. "Fragments inédits d'un antirrhétique de Jean le Grammairien." REB 24(1966):171–81.
- . "Hypatios d'Éphèse ou du Pseudo-Denys à Théodore Studite." REB 19(1961):63–75.
- Grabar, A. The Golden Age of Justinian. From the Death of Theodosius to the Rise of Islam. Trans. S. Gilbert and J. Emmons. New York, 1967.
- . L'iconoclisme byzantin. Dossier archéologique. Paris, 1957.
- . Martyrium. Recherches sur le culte des reliques et l'art chrétien antique. 2 vols. Paris, 1943–1946; rp. London, 1972.
- . "Les mosaïques de Germigny-des-Prés." In A. Grabar, L'art de la fin de l'Antiquité et du Moyen Âge, II:995–1006. Paris, 1968.
- Grooth, M., and P. van Moorsel. "The Lion, the Calf, the Man and the Eagle in Early Christian and Coptic Art." Bulletin Antiecke Beschaving 52/3(1977/8): 233–45.
- Guarducci, M.M. "Le impronte del 'Quo vadis' e monumenti affini, figurati ed epigrafici." Rendiconti. Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia 19(1942/4): 305–44.
- Guillaumont, A. Les "Képhalaia Gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'Origenisme chez les Grecs et chez les Syriens. Patristica Sorbonensis, vol. 5. Paris, 1962.
- Guiraud, P. "Étymologie et ethymologia (Motivation et rétro-motivation)." Poétique 11(1972):405–13.
- Guy, J.-C. "Un Entretien monastique sur la contemplation." Recherches des sciences religieuses 50(1962):230–41.
- Halkin, F. "Un abrégé inédit de la vie ancienne et disparue de Corneille le Centurion." RSBN n.s. 1(1964):31–39.

- . Inédits byzantins d'Ochrida, Candie et Moscou. Brussels, 1963.
- Halleux, A. de. Philoxène de Mabbog. Sa vie, ses écrits, sa théologie. Louvain, 1963.
- Hanfmann, G.M.A. The Season Sarcophagus in Dumbarton Oaks. 2 vols. Cambridge, Mass., 1951.
- Harnack, A. Kritik des Neues Testaments von einem griechischen Philosophen des 3. Jahrhunderts. Die in Apocriticus des Macarius Magnes enthaltene Streitschrift. TU vol. 37/3. Leipzig, 1911.
- Hasluck, F.W. Letters on Religion and Folklore. London, 1926.
- Heiser, L. Die Engel im Glauben der Orthodoxie. Trier, 1976.
- Hinks, R.P. Catalogue of the Greek, Etruscan and Roman Paintings and Mosaics in the British Museum. London, 1933.
- The Holy Face and the Paradox of Representation*. Villa Spelman Colloquia, vol. 6, ed. H.L. Kessler and G. Wolf. Bologna, 1998.
- Holy Women of the Syrian Orient*. Ed. S.A. Harvey and S. Brock. Berkeley, 1987.
- Honigmann, E. "Pierre l'Ibérien et les écrits du Pseudo-Denys l'Aréopagite." Mémoires de l'Académie Royale de Belgique, Classe des Lettres et des Sciences morales et politiques 47/3(1952):3–57.
- Ihm, C. Die Programme der christlichen Apsismalerei vom vierten Jahrhundert bis zur Mitte des achten Jahrhunderts. Wiesbaden, 1960.
- Jeck, U. "Ps. Dionysios Areopagites und der Bilderstreit in Byzanz: Überlegungen zur Dionysiosrezeption des Johannes von Damaskos." Hermeneia. Zeitschrift für ostkirchliche Kunst 8/2(1992):71–80.
- Jerphanion, G. de. "Les noms des quatre animaux et le commentaire liturgique de Pseudo-Germain." In G. de Jerphanion, Les voix des monuments. Notes et études d'archéologie chrétienne, 250–59. Paris, 1930.
- Joannou, P.-P. Discipline generale antique (IVe-IXe siècles). Tome I.2. Les canons des synodes particuliers. Grottaferrata, 1962.
- Jolivet-Lévy, C. "Culte et iconographie de l'archange Michel dans l'orient byzantin: le témoignage de quelques monuments de Cappadoce." Cahiers de Saint-Michel de Cuixà 28(1997):187–98.
- . Les églises byzantines de Cappadoce. Le programme iconographique de l'abside et ses abords. Paris, 1991.
- . "Note sur la représentation des archanges en costume impérial dans l'iconographie byzantine." CA 46(1998):121–28.
- Kartsonis, A.D. Anastasis. The Making of an Image. Princeton, 1986.
- Kazhdan, A., and H. Maguire. "Byzantine Hagiographical Texts as Sources on Art." DOP 45(1991):1–22.
- Kearney, R. The Wake of Imagination. Ideas of Creativity in Western Culture. London, 1988.
- Kessler, H.L. "'Pictures Fertile with Truth': How Christians Managed to Make Images of God without Violating the Second Commandment." The Journal of the Walters Art Gallery 49/50(1991/2):53–65.

- . "Real Absence: Early Medieval Art and the Metamorphosis of Vision." In Morfologie sociali e culturali in Europa fra tarda antichità e alto medioevo. Settimane vol. 45, II:1157–1213. Spoleto, 1998.
- . Studies in Pictorial Narrative. London, 1994.
- . "Through the Temple Veil: The Holy Image in Judaism and Christianity." Kairos 32/33(1990/1):53–77.
- Kinney, D. "The Apocalypse in Early Christian Monumental Decoration." In The Apocalypse in the Middle Ages, ed. R. K. Emerson and B. McGinn, 200–16. Ithaca and London, 1992.
- Kirschbaum, E. "L'angelo rosso e l'angelo turchino." RivAC 17(1940):209–48.
- Kitzinger, E. Byzantine Art in the Making. London, 1977.
- . "Byzantine Art in the Period between Justinian and Iconoclasm." In Berichte zum XI. Internationalen Byzantinischen-Kongress, München, 1958, 1–50. Munich, 1958.
- . "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm." DOP 8(1954):83–150.
- . "On Some Icons of the Seventh Century." In Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. K. Weitzmann et al., 132–50. Princeton, 1955.
- Kleiner, D. Roman Sculpture. New Haven and London, 1992.
- Koester, H. History and Literature of Early Christianity. Philadelphia, 1982.
- Kötting, B. "Fußspuren als Zeichen göttlicher Anwesenheit." Boreas 6(1983):197–201.
- . Peregrinatio religiosa. Wallfahrten in der Antike und das Pilgerwesen in der alten Kirche. Münster, 1950; rp. Münster, 1980.
- Koukiales, S. Τὰ θαύματα—Ἐμφάνισεις τῶν Ἀγγέλων καὶ Ἀρχαγγέλων στὴν Βυζαντινὴ Τέχνη τῶν Βαλκανίων. Athens, 1989.
- Krausmüller, D. "God or Angels as Impersonators of Saints. A Belief and its Contexts in the "Refutation" of Eustratius of Constantinople and in the Writings of Anastasius of Sinai." Gouden Hoorn 6/2(1998/9):5–16.
- Krueger, D. "Hagiography as an Ascetic Practice in the Early Christian East." The Journal of Religion 79(1999):216–32.
- . "Typological Figuration in Theodoret of Cyrrhus's Historia Religiosa and the Art of Postbiblical Narrative." J ECS 5(1997):393–417.
- Ladner, G. "The Concept of the Image in the Greek Fathers and the Byzantine Iconoclastic Controversy." DOP 7(1953):1–34.
- Lafontaine-Dosogne, J. "Une icône d'Angélos au Musée de Malines et l'iconographie du saint Jean-Baptiste ailé." Bulletin de Musées Royaux d'Art et d'Histoire 48(1976):121–44.
- . "Théophanie—visions auxquelles participent les prophètes dans l'art byzantin après la restauration des images." In Synthronon. Art et archéologie de la fin de l'Antiquité et du Moyen Âge, 135–43. Paris, 1968.

- Lange, G. Bild und Wort. Die katechetischen Funktionen des Bildes in der griechischen Theologie des sechsten bis neunten Jahrhunderts. Würzburg, 1969.
- Lardreau, G. Discours philosophique et discours spirituel. Autour de la philosophie spirituelle de Philoxène de Mabboug. Paris, 1985.
- Leanza, S. "Una versione greca inedita dell'Apparitio S. Michaelis in monte Gargano." VetChr 22(1985):291–316.
- Legrand, E. Bibliothèque grecque vulgaire. 9 vols. Paris, 1881; rp. Athens, 1974.
- Lethaby, W.R. "The Painted Book of Genesis in the British Museum." Archaeological Journal 69(1912):88–III.
- Lexicon iconographicum mythologiae classicae*. Zurich and Munich, 1981–.
- Liddell, H. G., and R. Scott. A Greek-English Lexicon. Oxford, 1968.
- Lightfoot, J. B. St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon. London, 1879.
- Lipsić, E. E. "Naukratij i Nikeiskie Mozaikij." Zbornik Radova Vizantoloskog Instituta 8/2(1964):241–46.
- Loerke, W. "Observations on the Representation of Doxa in the Mosaics of S. Maria Maggiore, Rome, and St. Catherine's, Sinai." Gesta 20(1981):15–22.
- Longo, A. A. "A proposito di un articolo recente sull'agiografia iconoclasta." RSBN 29(1992):3–17.
- . "Di nuovo sull'agiografia iconoclasta." RSBN 30(1993):7–15.
- . "La vita de S. Leone di Catania e gli incantesimi del mago Eliodoro." RSBN 26(1989):3–98.
- Louth, A. Denys the Areopagite. Wilton, Conn., 1989.
- Lueken, W. Michael. Eine Darstellung und Vergleichung der jüdischen und der morgenländisch-christlichen Tradition vom Erzengel Michael. Göttingen, 1898.
- McCail, R. C. "The Cycle of Agathias: New Identifications Scrutinised." Journal of Hellenic Studies 89(1969):87–96.
- . "The Erotic and Ascetic Poetry of Agathias Scholasticus." B 41(1971):205–67.
- . "On the Early Career of Agathias Scholasticus." REB 28(1970):141–51.
- Maffei, F. de'. Icona, pittore e arte al Concilio Niceno II. Rome, 1974.
- . "Tradizione ed innovazione nei dittici eburnei: Giuliano, Pulcheria, Giustiniano." Rivista degli Studi Orientali 40(1986):89–139.
- . "L'Unigenito consostanziale al Padre nel programma trinitario dei perduti mosaici del bema della Dormizione di Nicea e il Cristo trasfigurato del Sinai." Storia dell'arte 45(1982):91–116, 46(1982):185–200.
- Maguire, H. Earth and Ocean. The Terrestrial World in Early Byzantine Art. University Park and London, 1987.
- . The Icons of Their Bodies. Saints and Their Images in Byzantium. Princeton, 1996.
- . "Magic and the Christian Image." In Byzantine Magic, ed. H. Maguire, 51–71. Washington, D.C., 1995.
- . "Style and Ideology in Byzantine Imperial Art." Gesta 28(1989):217–31.

- Maltese, E.V. Dimensione bizantine. Donne, angeli e demoni nel medioevo greco. Turin, 1995.
- . "Gli angeli in terra: sull'immaginario dell'angelo bizantino." Materiali e discussioni per l'analisi dei testi classici 24(1990):111–32.
- Mango, C. The Art of the Byzantine Empire. 312–1453. Sources and Documents. Toronto, 1986.
- . Byzantine Architecture. London, 1986.
- . Byzantium. The Empire of New Rome. London, 1980.
- . "La croix dite de Michel le Cérulaire et la croix de Saint-Michel de Sykéôn." CA 36(1988):41–49.
- . "Germia: A Postscript." JöB 41(1991):297–300.
- . Materials for the Study of the Mosaics of St. Sophia at Istanbul. Washington, D.C., 1962.
- . "Notes d'épigraphie et d'archéologie: Constantinople, Nicée." TM 12(1994):343–57.
- . "On the History of the Templon and the Martyrion of St. Artemios at Constantinople." Zograf 10(1979):40–43.
- . "St. Michael and Attis." DChAE 12(1984):39–62.
- Mansi, G.D. Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio. 53 vols. in 58 pts. Paris and Leipzig, 1901–1927.
- Maraval, P. "Épiphané, 'Docteur des Iconoclastes.'" In Nicée II, 787–1987. Douze siècles d'images religieuses. Actes du colloque international Nicée II tenu au Collège de France, Paris les 2, 3, 4 Octobre 1986, ed. F. Boespflug and N. Lossky, 51–62. Paris, 1987.
- . Lieux saints et pèlerinages d'Orient. Histoire et géographie des origines à la conquête arabe. Paris, 1985.
- Marin, L. "The Order of Words and the Order of Things in Painting." Visible Language 23(1989):189–203.
- . To Destroy Painting. Trans. M. Hjort. Chicago and London, 1995.
- Marini Clarelli, M.V. "I giorni della creazione nel 'Genesi Cotton.'" OCP 50(1984):65–93.
- Mathews, T.F. The Clash of Gods. A Reinterpretation of Early Christian Art. Rev. ed. Princeton, 1999.
- . "Psychological Dimensions in the Art of Eastern Christendom." In Art and Religion: Faith, Form and Reform, 1984 Paine Lectures in Religion, ed. O. Overby, 1–21. Columbia, Mo., 1986.
- Meinardus, O.F.A. "St. Michael's Miracle of Khonae and Its Geographical Setting." Εκκλησία καὶ Θεολογία 1(1980):459–69.
- . "A Typological Analysis of the Traditions Pertaining to Miraculous Icons." In Wegzeichen. Festgabe zum 60. Geburtstag von Prof. Dr. Hermangild M. Lieberman OSA, ed. E. C. Suttner and C. Patock, 201–32. Würzburg, 1971.
- Mercati, G. Opere minori. Studi e testi, vol. 76. Vatican City, 1937.

- Meyendorff, J. "Iconographie de la Sagesse divine dans la tradition byzantine." CA 10(1959):259–77.
- . "Wisdom–Sophia: Contrasting Approaches to a Complex Theme." DOP 41(1987):391–401.
- Millénaire monastique du Mont-St.-Michel*. 3 vols. Paris, 1971.
- Miller, E. "Fragments inédits de Théodore Le Lecteur et de Jean d'Égée." Revue archéologique 26(1873):393–403.
- Millet, G. Monuments byzantins de Mistra. Paris, 1910.
- . La peinture du moyen âge en Yougoslavie (Serbie, Macédonie et Monténégro). 4 vols. Paris, 1954–1969.
- Mondzain-Baudinet, M.-J. Image, icône, économie. Les sources byzantines de l'imaginaire contemporain. Paris, 1996.
- . "L'incarnation, l'image, la voix." Esprit (Feb. 1982):188–99.
- . Nicéphore le Patriarche: Discours contre les iconoclastes. Paris, 1990.
- Moorhead, J. "Iconoclasm, the Cross, and the Imperial Image." B 55(1985):65–79.
- Mortley, R. From Word to Silence. Vol. II. The Way of Negation, Christian and Greek. Theophaneia, vol. 31. Bonn, 1986.
- Müller, C.D.G. Die Engellehre der koptischen Kirche. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der christlichen Frömmigkeit in Ägypten. Wiesbaden, 1959.
- Murray, Sister Charles. Rebirth and Afterlife. A Study of the Transmutation of Some Pagan Imagery in Early Christian Funerary Art. Oxford, 1981.
- Nees, L. "Image and Text: Excerpts from Jerome's 'De Trinitate' and the Maestas Domini Miniature of the Gundohinus Gospels." Viator 18(1987):1–21.
- Nelson, R. S. The Iconography of the Prefaces in Byzantine Gospels. New York, 1980.
- Oikonomidès, N. "Some Remarks on the Apse Mosaics of St. Sophia." DOP 39(1985):111–15.
- Ostrogorsky, G. Studien zur Geschichte des byzantinischen Bilderstreites. Breslau, 1929.
- Otranto, G. "Il 'Liber de apparitione' e il culto di San Michele sul Gargano nella documentazione liturgica altomedievale." VetChr 18(1981):423–42.
- . "Il 'Liber de apparitione,' il santuario di San Michele sul Gargano e i Longobardi del Ducato di Benevento." In Santuari e politica nel mondo antico, ed. M. Sordi, 210–45. Milan, 1983.
- . "Per una metodologia della ricerca storico-agiografica: il Santuario micaelico del Gargano tra Bizantini e Longobardi." VetChr 25(1988):381–405.
- Otranto, G., and C. Carletti. Il santuario di S. Michele arcangelo sul Gargano dalle origine al X secolo. Bari, 1990.
- Ouspensky, L., and W. Lossky. The Meaning of the Icons. Boston, 1952.
- Pallas, D.I. "Eine Differenzierung unter den himmlischen Ordnungen (Ikono-graphische Analyse)." BZ 44(1971):55–60.
- . "Ὁ Χριστός ὡς ἡ θεία Σοφία. Ἡ Εἰκονογραφικὴ Περιπέτεια μιᾶς θεολογικῆς Ἐννοιᾶς." DChAE 15(1989/90):119–42.

- Parry, K. Depicting the Word. Byzantine Iconophile Thought of the Eighth and Ninth Centuries. Leiden, 1996.
- Patlagean, E. "Ancient Byzantine Hagiography and Social History." In Saints and Their Cults. Studies in Religion, Sociology, Folklore, and History, ed. S. Wilson, trans. J. Hodgkin, 101–21. Cambridge, 1983. [= "Ancien hagiographie byzantine et histoire sociale." Annales 23(1968):106–26, and Structure sociale, famille, christianité à Byzance, IXe-XIe siècle. London, 1981. Item V.]
- Patrologia cursus completus, Series graeca*. Ed. J.-P. Migne. 161 vols. in 166 pts. Paris, 1857–1866.
- Patrologia cursus completus, Series latina*. Ed. J.-P. Migne. 221 vols. in 222 pts. Paris, 1844–1880.
- Peers, G. "Breathless, Speechless Images: On the Chalke Gate Epigram." In Hommages Margaret Head Thomson. Cahiers des études anciennes, vol. 32, ed. L. Finnete and A. P. Booth, 109–12. Trois Rivières, Québec, 1998.
- . "Holy Man, Supplicant and Donor: On Representations of the Miracle of the Archangel Michael at Chonae." Mediaeval Studies 59(1997):173–82.
- . "Imagination and Angelic Epiphany." BMGS 21(1997):113–31.
- . "Patriarchal Politics in the Paris Gregory (B.N. gr. 510)." JöB 47(1997): 51–71.
- . "The Sosthenion near Constantinople: John Malalas and Ancient Art." B 68(1998):110–20.
- Pelikan, J. Imago Dei. The Byzantine Apologia for Icons. Princeton, 1990.
- . Introduction to Maximus Confessor. Selected Writings, 1–13. New York, 1985.
- Perler, O. "Les théophanies dans les mosaïques de Sainte-Marie-Majeure à Rome." RivAC 50(1974):275–93.
- Peschlow, U. "Neue Beobachtungen zur Architektur und Ausstattung der Koimesiskirche in Iznik." Istanbuler Mitteilungen 22(1972):145–87.
- Pesci, B. "Il problema cronologico della Madonna di Aracoeli alla luce delle fonti." RivAC 18(1941):51–64.
- Peterson, E. "Zur Bedeutungsgeschichte von παρρησία." In Reinhold Seeberg Festschrift, ed. W. Koepf, 1:283–97. Leipzig, 1929.
- Petrucchi, A. Una versione greco-bizantina dell'Apparitio Sancti Michaelis in Monte Gargano. Rome, 1955.
- Petzold, A. "'His Face Like Lightning': Colour as Signifier in Representations of the Holy Women at the Tomb." Arte medievale 6/2(1992):149–55.
- Pitra, J. B. Spicilegio Solesmense complectens sanctorum patrum scriptorumque ecclesiasticorum anecdota hactenus opera. 4 vols. Paris, 1852–1858.
- Preger, T. Scriptores originum Constantinopolitanarum. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1901–1907; rp. New York, 1975.
- Ralles, G.A., and M. Potles. Σύνταγμα τῶν θείων καὶ ἱερῶν κανόνων. 6 vols. Athens, 1852–1859.

- Ramsay, W. The Church in the Roman Empire Before 170 A.D. New York and London, 1893.
- Rauch, J., F. Schenk zu Schweinsberg, and J.M. Wilm. "Die Limburger Stau-rothek." Das Münster 8(1955):201–40.
- Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum.* Stuttgart, 1950–.
- Reallexikon zur byzantinischen Kunst.* Stuttgart, 1963–.
- Reitzenstein, R. Poimandres. Studien zur griechisch- ägyptischen und frühchristlichen Literatur. Leipzig, 1904.
- Rintelen, W.v. Kultgeographische Studien in der Italia Byzantina. Untersuchungen über die Kulte des Erzengels Michael und der Madonna di Costantinopoli in Süd-italien. Meisenheim am Glan, 1968.
- . "Kult- und Legendenwanderung von Ost nach West im frühen Mittelal-ter." Saeculum 22(1971):71–100.
- Robert, L. Hellenica. Recueil d'épigraphie de numismatique et d'antiquités grecques, vol. XI–XII. Paris, 1960.
- . Villes d'Asie Mineure. Études de géographie antique. Paris, 1935.
- Rohland, J.P. Der Erzengel Michael. Arzt und Feldherr. Zwei Aspekte des vor- und frühbyzantinischen Michaelkults. Leiden, 1977.
- Rojdestvensky, O. Le culte de saint Michel et le moyen age latin. Paris, 1922.
- Romanelli, P., and P.J. Nordhagen. S. Maria Antiqua. Rome, 1964.
- Roques, R. Introduction to Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, La Hiérarchie Céleste. SC vol. 58, ed. G. Heil and M. de Gandillac, v–xcvi. Paris, 1958.
- . L'univers dionysien. Structure hiérarchique du monde selon le Pseudo-Denys. Paris, 1954; rp. Paris, 1983.
- Ross, M. C. Catalogue of the Byzantine and Early Mediaeval Antiquities in the Dum-barton Oaks Collection. Volume One. Metalwork, Ceramics, Glass, Glyptics, Paint-ing. Washington, D.C., 1962.
- Rouche, M. "Le combat des saintes anges et des démons: La victoire de Saint Michel." In Santi e demoni nell'alto medioevo occidentale (secoli v–xi), Settimane vol. 26, I:533–71. Spoleto, 1989.
- Rowland, C. The Open Heaven. A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Chris-tianity. New York, 1982.
- Ruggieri, V. Byzantine Religious Architecture (582–867): Its History and Structural Elements. Orientalia christiana analecta, vol. 237. Rome, 1991.
- Sansterre, J.-M. "La parole, le texte et l'image selon les auteurs byzantins des épo-ques iconoclastes et posticonoclastes." In Testo e immagine nell'alto medioevo, Settimane vol. 41, I:197–243. Spoleto, 1994.
- Saradi-Mendelovici, H. "Christian Attitudes toward Pagan Monuments in Late Antiquity and Their Legacy in Later Byzantine Centuries." DOP 44(1990): 47–61.
- Saxer, V. "Jalons pour servir à l'histoire du culte de l'archange Saint Michel en ori-ent jusqu'à l'iconoclasme." In Noscere sancta. Miscellanea in memoria di Agostino Amore, 357–426. Rome, 1985.

- Scarpata, G. Parrësia. Storia del termine e delle sue traduzioni in latino. Brescia, 1963.
- Schmit, F.I. Die Koimesis-Kirche von Nikaia, das Bauwerk und die Mosaiken. Berlin and Leipzig, 1927.
- Schönborn, C. von. L'icône du Christ. Fondements théologiques élaborées entre le Ier et le IIe Concile de Nicée (325–787). Fribourg, 1976.
- Ševčenko, I. "Hagiography of the Iconoclast Period." In Iconoclasm. Papers given at the Ninth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, University of Birmingham, March 1975, ed. A. Bryer and J. Herrin, 113–31. Birmingham, 1977.
- Shapiro, G. "Pipe Dreams: Eternal Recurrence and Simulacrum in Foucault's Ekphrasis of Magritte." Word & Image 13(1997):69–76.
- Shepherd, A. R. R. "Pagan Cults of Angels in Roman Asia Minor." Talanta 12/13 (1980/1):77–101.
- Simon, M. Verus Israel. Étude sur la relation entre chrétiens et juifs dans l'empire romain (135–425). Paris, 1948.
- Simson, O. von. Sacred Fortress. Byzantine Art and Statecraft in Ravenna. 2d ed. Chicago, 1976.
- Smith, R. R. R. "Myth and Allegory in the Sebasteion." Aphrodisias Papers. Recent Work on Architecture and Sculpture. Ed. C. Rouché and K. T. Erim, 89–100. Ann Arbor, 1990.
- Snipes, K. "An Unedited Treatise of Michael Psellos on the Iconography of Angels and on the Religious Festivals Celebrated on Each Day of the Week." In Gonimos. Neoplatonic and Byzantine Studies Presented to Leendert G. Westerlink at 75, ed. J. Duffy and J. Peradotto, 189–205. Buffalo, 1988.
- Sokolowski, F. "Sur le culte d'angelos dans le paganisme grec et romain." HTR 53(1960):225–29.
- Sörries, R. Die Bilder der Orthodoxen im Kampf gegen den Arianismus. Eine Apologie der orthodoxen Christologie und Trinitätslehre gegenüber der arianischen Häresie dargestellt an den ravenattischen Mosaiken und Bildern des 6. Jahrhunderts. Bern, 1983.
- Soteriou, M. "Ἀμιπρόσωπος εἰκὼν τοῦ Βυζαντινοῦ Μουσειοῦ Ἀθηνῶν ἐκ τοῦ Ἡπειροῦ." DChAE 4(1959):135–43.
- . "Παλαιολογείος εἰκὼν τοῦ Ἀρχαγγελοῦ Μιχαήλ." DChAE 1(1959):80–86.
- Spain, S. "'The Promised Blessing': The Iconography of the Mosaics of S. Maria Maggiore." ArtB 61(1979):518–40.
- Sparks, B. D. The Sanctus in the Eucharistic Prayer. Cambridge, 1991.
- Speck, P. "Ein Bild des Erzengels Michael in Ephesos (Anthologia Palatina I,36)." In Varia II, ΠΟΙΚΙΛΑ ΒΥΖΑΝΤΙΝΑ, vol. 6, 355–62. Bonn, 1987.
- . Ich bin's nicht, Kaiser Konstantin ist es gewesen. Die Legenden vom Einfluß des Teufels, des Juden und des Moslem auf den Ikonoklasmus. ΠΟΙΚΙΛΑ ΒΥΖΑΝΤΙΝΑ, vol. 10. Bonn, 1990.
- Stein, D. Der Beginn des byzantinischen Bilderstreits und seine Entwicklung bis in der 40er Jahre des 8. Jahrhunderts. Munich, 1980.

- Struever, N. "Fables of Power." Representations 4(1983):108–27.
- Stuhlfauth, G. Die Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst. Freiburg, 1897.
- Talbot Rice, D., et al. The Church of Haghia Sophia at Trebizond. Edinburgh, 1968.
- Testini, P. Archeologia cristiana. Nozioni generali dalle origini alla fine del sec. VI. Rome, 1958.
- Thierry, N. Haut moyen-âge en Cappadoce. Les églises de la région de Çavuşin. Paris, 1983.
- Thümmel, H. Bilderlehre und Bilderstreit. Arbeiten zur Auseinandersetzung über die Ikone und ihre Begründung vornehmlich im 8. und 9. Jahrhundert. Würzburg, 1991.
- . Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit. TU vol. 139. Berlin, 1992.
- Thunberg, L. "Early Christian Interpretations of the Three Angels in Gen. 18." Studia Patristica 8(1966):560–70.
- Travis, J. In Defense of the Faith. The Theology of Patriarch Nikephoros of Constantinople. Brookline, Mass., 1984.
- Trombley, F. R. Hellenic Religion and Christianization c. 370–529. 2d ed. 2 vols. Leiden, New York and Köln, 1995.
- Tronzo, W. The Via Latina Catacomb. Imitation and Discontinuity in Fourth-Century Roman Painting. University Park and London, 1986.
- Tsirpanlis, C. N. "Some Reflections on Philoxenos' Christology." Greek Orthodox Theological Review 25(1980):152–62.
- Turmel, J. "L'angélologie depuis le faux Denys l'Aréopagite." Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse 4(1899):289–309, 414–34, 536–62.
- . "Histoire de l'angélologie des temps apostoliques à la fin du Ve siècle." Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse 3(1898):289–308, 407–34, 533–52.
- Turner, V., and M. Turner. Image and Pilgrimage in Christian Culture. Anthropological Perspectives. New York, 1978.
- Underwood, P. A. "The Evidence of Restorations in the Sanctuary Mosaics of the Church of the Dormition at Nicaea." DOP 13(1959):235–44.
- Vessey, M. "The Demise of the Christian Writer and the Remaking of 'Late Antiquity': From H.-I. Marrou's Saint Augustine (1938) to Peter Brown's Holy Man (1983)." JECS 6(1998):377–411.
- Viller, M. "Aux sources de la spiritualité de S. Maxime: les oeuvres d'Evagre le Pontique." Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 11(1930):156–84, 239–68, 331–36.
- Volbach, W. F. Early Christian Art. Trans. C. Ligota. New York, 1961.
- . Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters. 3d ed. Mainz am Rhein, 1976.
- Volk, R. Der medizinische Inhalt der Schriften des Michael Psellos. Munich, 1990.
- Vryonis, S., Jr. The Decline of Medieval Hellenism in Asia Minor and the Process of Islamization from the Eleventh through the Fifteenth Century. Berkeley, 1971.

- . "The Panegyris of the Byzantine Saint: A Study in the Nature of a Medieval Institution, Its Origins and Fate." In The Byzantine Saint, ed. S. Hackel, 196–226. London, 1981.
- Walter, J. "St. Demetrius: The Myroblytos of Thessalonika." Eastern Churches Review 5(1973):157–78. [= C. Walter. Studies in Byzantine Iconography. London, 1977. Item V.]
- Weitzmann, K. "The Classical in Byzantine Art as a Mode of Individual Expression." In Byzantine Art. An European Art. Lectures, 149–77. Athens, 1966. [= K. Weitzmann, Studies in Classical and Byzantine Manuscript Illumination, ed. H. L. Kessler, 151–75. Chicago, 1971.]
- . "The Genesis Mosaics of San Marco and the Cotton Genesis Miniatures." In O. Demus, The Mosaics of San Marco. Part 2: The Thirteenth Century. Volume One: Text, 105–42. Chicago and London, 1984.
- . The Miniatures of the Sacra Parallela. Parisinus graecus 923. Princeton, 1979.
- . The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Icons. Volume One: From the Sixth to the Tenth Century. Princeton, 1976.
- . "Observations on the Cotton Genesis Fragments." In Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. K. Weitzmann et al., 112–31. Princeton, 1955.
- Weitzmann, K., and G. Galavaris. The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Illuminated Greek Manuscripts. Volume One: From the Ninth to the Eleventh Century. Princeton, 1990.
- Weitzmann, K., and H. L. Kessler. The Cotton Genesis. British Museum Codex Cotton Otho B. VI. Princeton, 1986.
- . The Frescoes of the Dura Europos Synagogue and Christian Art. Washington, D.C., 1990.
- Werner, M. "On the Origin of Zoanthropomorphic Evangelist Symbols: The Early Christian Background." Studies in Iconography 10(1984–1986):1–35.
- . "On the Origin of Zoanthropomorphic Evangelist Symbols: The Early Medieval and Later Coptic, Nubian, Ethiopian and Latin Evidence." Studies in Iconography 13(1989–1990):1–47.
- Wharton Epstein, A. "The Problem of Provincialism: Byzantine Monasteries in Cappadocia and Monks in South Italy." Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 42(1979):28–46.
- . Tokali Kilise. Tenth-century Metropolitan Art in Byzantine Cappadocia. Washington, D.C., 1986.
- Wiegand, E. Review of T. Schmit, Die Koimesis-Kirche von Nikaia, das Bauwerk und die Mosaiken, Berlin and Leipzig, 1927. Deutsche Literaturzeitung 53(1927):2601–11.
- . "Zur Monogramminschrift der Theotokos-(Koimesis)Kirche von Nicaea." B 6(1931):411–20.

- Williams, A. L. "The Cult of the Angels at Colossae." JTS 10(1909):413–38.
- Wilsdorf, H. "Zur Staurothek vom Limburg." BF 18(1992):197–208.
- Wolska-Conus, W. "Stéphanos d'Athènes et Stéphanos d'Alexandrie. Essai d'identification et de biographie." REB 47(1989):5–89.
- Wulff, O. Altchristliche und byzantinische Kunst. Munich, 1914.
- . Cherubim, Throne und Seraphim. Ikonographie der ersten Engelshierarchie in der christlichen Kunst. Altenburg, 1894.

INDEX

Abraham, 30, 88, 139–40, 153; and Philoxenia, 36–41, 58
Adversus Constantinum Caballinum, 104n42, 105n43
 Agathias, 62, 95–98, 99, 100, 102, 125, 192, 201, 202, 205
 Alahan (Seleucia), 45
 Alexandria, 30, 32
 Anastasius Sinaïtes, 100
 Anastos, Milton, 140
 “angelic life,” 68, 126, 147, 149 angelolatry, 8–11, 60, 75, 80, 127, 137–40, 153, 154 angelology, heretical, 112
 angels: anthropomorphism of, 93, 187–93; changeability of, 16, 17, 19, 21, 28, 107–8, 113–14, 116–8, 184–5; devotion to, Christian, 4, 6–11, 13, 15, 16, 17, 126; —, Coptic, 7; —, Jewish, 6, 8; —, pagan, 6, 8, 9–10; elemental, 6–8, 9, 11, 90, 102, 106, 107, 108, 109, 113, 116, 117, 128, 129, 144, 146, 149, 157, 158, 159, 163, 164, 167, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 177, 178, 179, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 192, 193, 195–96; epigrams on, 60, 61–62, 95–103, 122, 196, 201–202, 204–06; epiphany of, 1, 5, 16, 56, 58, 73, 77, 78, 79, 88, 149–52, 155–56, 157–93; as gods, 15, 59, 68, 70, 79, 138, 168n32, 195; hagiographies of, 141–56, 157–93; and healing, 142, 145–46, 154, 155–56, 178, 179; hierarchy of, 4–5, 11, 41, 112–13, 120; iconography of (see iconography of angels); and liturgy, 47–49; materiality of, 9698, 102–3, 107–8; nature of, 1–6, 11, 16, 17, 19, 20, 58, 107–9, 112–13, 116, 159–60; and relics, 17, 77, 119, 120, 123, 142, 165, 167, 168–69, 175–78, 192–93; in scripture, 1–2, 3–4, 5, 6, 16, 17, 19, 20, 23, 35, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 56, 139, 140, 180, 181, 182, 184, 191, 193; symbolic images of, 90–125; symbolic interpretation of, 91–99, 100, 103, 104, 105, 113–19, 121, 124, 125, 130, 131, 136–39, 141, 180, 192

 Antinoë, 32
 Apatheia, 69, 94
 Aphrodisias, Imperial Sebasteion, 32;
 Theatre, 96n24
 Archanes (Crete), Church of the Archangels, 151n67
 Archippus, 144, 146–52, 153, 154, 158, 160, 180–82, 186, 195

- Ark of the Covenant, 43, 99, 111–12, 129–31
 Athanasius of Alexandria, 36n44, 142
 Augustine, 30, 31
 Auzépy, Marie-France, 143, 150, 151, 152
- Basil of Caesarea, 58n74, 97n26, 140–41, 189
 Bawît, Chapel XXVI, 46n59
 Belting, Hans, 16
 Bezaleel, 111
 Brock, Sebastian, 78
- Cameron, Averil, 13, 14, 197
 Carthage, Council of (ca. 400?), 175n58
 Chairetopa, 161, 163
 cherubim, 4, 19, 35, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 91, 99, 111–13, 114, 119–20, 127, 129–31; confusion with seraphim, 48
 Chonae, 8, 9–10, 11, 15, 53, 143–51, 154, 156, 157–93, 195, 206n1; icon of miracle of, 53–55, 154, 180; pilgrimage to, 178–79
Christian Topography. See ‘Cosmas Indicopleustes’
 Christology, 66–67n12, 106–7, 112
 Chrysippus, 3–4, 16, 148n57
 Chrysostom, John, 4n20, 23–24, 35–36, 48 circumscription, 106–110, 113
 Clark, Elizabeth, 70
 Clement of Alexandria, 2n5, 31n32
 Colossae, 8–10, 163. See also Chonae
 Colossians, Epistle to, 8, 9, 43, 75, 147
 Constantine V, 14, 80, 133–36
 Constantine VI, 14
 Constantine Cephalas, 96
 Constantinople (Istanbul): Chalke Gate, 13, 87n57; Council of Hagia Sophia (815), 64n5; Eusebios, Church of the Archangel Michael, 154–56, 186–87; Hagia Sophia, 49n65, 52; Oxeia, Church of St. John the Baptist, 142, 188; Sosthenium, 96
Constitutiones Apostolicae, 4n20
 Contra Judaeos literature, 49, 83–84n47, 100–101, 110–11, 127–28, 130, 197
 I Corinthians, 149–50
- Cornelius the Centurion, 189
 Cosmas and Damian, Sts., 189, 190
 ‘Cosmas Indicopleustes,’ 20–21, 45–46n57, 52–53
 Cotton Genesis, 30–33, 38, 76
 Council of Trullo (692), 102n39 cross, and Iconoclasm, 85, 86–87, 152
 Cyril of Alexandria, 176
 Cyril of Jerusalem, 4n20
 Cyrus and John, Sts., 176–77, 190–91
- Dagron, Gilbert, 176, 189, 190
 D’Alverny, Marie-Thérèse, 30, 31
 Damaskenos Stoudite, 145n47, 151n67
 Daniel, Book of, 35, 148–49n57, 152, 180, 182, 191
 David-Garedja, Georgia, Monastery of Dodo, 46n59
 Deuteronomy, 3–4
 Diakrinomenus, John, 72n27 dominations, 5, 19, 42, 43, 82
- Egratius, 189–90
 Eikonismos, 122n85
 Elijah, 167
 Enoch, Book of, 6
 Epiphanides, 128
 Epiphanius of Salamis, 61–62, 64–67, 69, 74, 78–81, 90, 128–33, 135, 136, 137–39, 153, 203
 equivocation, 119–25, 127
 Eusebius of Caesarea, 2n6, 101n35
 Evagrius Ponticus, 69–70, 74, 89, 94–95
 Exodus, 20, 35, 110, 111, 119, 129–31, 169, 181, 184
 Ezekiel, 1, 35, 43, 46, 91
- Faustus Rhegiensis, 109–10n51
 Foucault, Michel, 123–24
- Gabriel, Archangel, 76, 145n46
 Gargano, Monte, 157, 165; miracle of Michael at, 165–71, 178, 184, 186
 Gennadius of Marseilles, 109n51
 Ginzburg, Carlo, 124
 Gregory I (Pope), 184n79
 Gregory of Nazianzus, 3, 48n63

- Gregory of Nyssa, 3, 181n71
 Güllü Dere, 48n63, 154n74
- Hebrews, Epistle to, 1, 131
 Heraclius, 172
 Hiereia, Iconoclastic council of (754),
 64n5, 81, 85, 105, 140
 Hierotheus, 5
 Holy Spirit, symbolic representation of, 71,
 103n41
 Hyacinthus, 43n55
 Hypatius of Ephesus, 98–100, 102
- Iconoclasm, 13–14, 17, 61, 62–65, 74–75, 80–88, 89, 90, 96, 102, 103, 104, 106,
 110, 120, 126–28, 130–41, 143, 150, 151,
 153, 154, 96, 197, 201
 iconoclasts, 15, 59, 60, 67, 68, 80–88, 89, 100, 102, 103, 105, 106, 110, 114, 120, 122, 126–28, 130–41, 151, 153, 154
 iconography of angels, 16–59, 63, 76–77, 96, 198–205; as anthropomorphic (without wings), 21–23, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40n51, 41, 46, 58; as bearded, 23; and birds, 28n25; Christian invention, 33–36; as cloud, 58; as color, 58; as days, 30, 31, 32, 33; literal interpretation of, 61–88; as nikes, 25, 26, 28–29n27; pagan models, 25–33, 34, 36, 40, 59, 60, 126; as pagan princes, 76–77; pagan style, 49, 50, 53;
 as personifications, 26, 28, 29n27, 30, 33n38, 59; Philoxenia, 30, 36–41, 58; as psyches, 30n28, 31; as seasons, 28, 29; style as, 49–55; symbolic interpretation of, 19, 21, 36, 37, 40, 41, 58, 61–62, 77, 88; as winged men, 16, 18, 19–20,
 23–25, 26–27, 30, 33, 35, 36, 37–38, 40,
 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 56, 58, 60, 96, 97, 124, 180, 187
 iconophiles, 14, 62, 64, 65, 74, 90, 91, 95, 97, 98, 99, 101, 102, 103–41, 143, 152, 153, 154, 156
 idolatry, 10, 11, 15, 60, 63, 68, 79, 80, 86, 89, 100, 112, 127, 128, 130, 131, 132, 134,
 137–40, 151, 152, 153, 154
 Ignatius the Deacon, 130, 134n17
 Ihm, Christa, 46
- images: in Christian history, 132–33, 136;
 consubstantial, 137; of emperor, 135; ethical, 69, 73n30, 78, 86, 138–41, 153–54, 156; eucharist as, 87–88, 137n24; and healing, 142–56; likeness in, 16, 19, 66, 113–25, 135–36; and prototype, 66–67, 114–25, 127, 131–35; and relics, 142; and text, 84–86, 121–25, 131–32; in worship, 11, 14–16, 64, 67, 99–100, 104, 125,
 126–42, 154–55, 196–97
 Irene (empress), 14
 Irenaeus, 33–35n40
 Irene of Chrysobalanton, 189
 Isaiah, 1, 5, 35, 44, 46, 53, 86, 152, 184
- James of Edessa, 75–76n34
 John of Damascus, 3, 41n53, 105–15,
 113–16, 118
 John of Gabala, 74–75, 76
 John of Gaza, 102–3
 John of Thessalonike, 15, 194, 195, 196
 John the Grammarian, 70n20
 Joshua, 152, 182, 191
 Jubilees, Book of, 6
 Justin Martyr, 36n44
- Kitzinger, Ernst, 50
- Laodicea, 147; Council of, 10, 15, 70, 75
 Leo I (pope), 32n33
 Leo III (emperor), 13, 14
 Leontius of Neapolis, 110
 Leo of Catania, 152, 154, 156
 Leuken, Wilhelm, 10
 Limburg, Reliquary of the True Cross,
 46n57
- Macarius Magnes, 15, 59, 67–70, 74, 78, 79, 80, 88, 101–2, 136–40, 153, 196
 Macarius the Great, 3, 194
 Maccabees, Book of, 186n83
 Magritte, René, 123–24
 Maguire, Henry, 52
 Malachi, 86
 Mango, Cyril, 187
 Manichaeans, 130
 Marini Clarelli, Maria, 31, 32

- Matthew, Gospel of, 191, 192
 Mavropus, John, 201–3
 Mayragometsi, John, 100n34, 110n53
 Meleager, 96
 Menologium of Basil II, 154n74, 163, 164
 Methodius of Olympus, 2–3, 41, 90
 Metrophanes of Smyrna, 145n46
 Michael III, 14, 155
 Michael, Archangel, 3–4, 6, 7–11, 15, 17, 18, 53, 54, 62, 76, 77, 95, 96–98, 143–56, 157–93, 201–3; and fire, 8, 172–74, 181, 183; icons of, 18, 53–55, 198–200, 203, 204, 205
 Michael Choniates, 179n69
 Michael of Stoudios, 125n93, 155n75
Miracles of St. Artemius, 142, 143, 154, 188, 190
 Monophysitism, 63, 71, 74
 Moscow, Chludov Psalter (Historical Museum cod. 139), 82–83n47, 139n30
 Moses, 110–11, 152, 165, 169, 181, 182, 184
Narration of the Miracle Accomplished at Chonae by the Archangel Michael, 143–52, 158, 161–65, 178
 Naucratus, 82n46, 121
 Nicaea (Izник), Church of the Dormition, 42–43, 64, 82–88, 104, 120–24; Second Council of, 14, 71, 72, 74, 75n33, 105n43, 194, 195
 Nicephorus, patriarch, 64n5, 67, 69, 80, 81, 105, 105n43, 112–13, 116–20, 128–33, 135, 136, 137–40, 153, 174
 Nicetas Stethatos, 110n51
 Nilus of Ankyra, 189
 Nilus Scholasticus, 98, 100, 125, 205
 Origen, 67
 Pachymeres, George, 3n13
 Palaiochorio (Cyprus), Church of Sts. Cosmas and Damian, 151n67
 Pantaleon, 7, 143n41, 145n47, 154–56, 160, 185–86
 parrêsia, 144, 145, 146, 149, 159
 Philes, Manuel, 205–6
 Philo, 31n32
 Philoxenus of Mabbug, 71–74, 78, 79, 103n41, 145
 Photius, 105, 136n20
 Porphyry, 100–102, 195
 powers, 5, 19, 41, 42, 43, 82, 120, 121 principalities, 5, 19, 41, 42, 43, 82
 Procopius of Gaza, 36–37n44 psalms, 1, 3, 85, 86, 149
 Psellus, Michael, 7–8, 157, 159–60, 171–75, 179n70, 184, 188, 203–4
 Pseudo-Athanasius, 2n6, 100, 142
 Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, 3, 4–6, 16, 49, 87, 90–95, 99, 102, 105, 115, 116, 118, 125, 177, 192, 205
 Qumran, 150n61
 Ramsey, William, 161
 Raphael, Archangel, 17
 Ravenna, S. Apollinare in Classe, 76; S. Apollinare Nuovo, 58n73; S. Vitale, 28–30, 33, 38–40, 76
 retro-motivation, 164–65, 179, 191
 Revelation, Book of, 35, 46, 86
 Rojdestvensky, Olga, 185
 Rome, Catacomb of Priscilla, 21–23; Sta. Maria Antiqua, 47n59; Sta. Maria Maggiore, 37; Sta. Pudenziana, 33; Via Latina Catacomb, 20, 37
 Sacra Parallela (B. N. Gr. 923), 139–40n30
 Second Commandment, 110, 129–30
 seraphim, 4, 5, 19, 35, 43, 44, 46–49, 53, 86; confusion with cherubim, 48
 Severus of Antioch, 60, 71, 74–77, 78, 81, 90, 103n41, 176, 196, 203 sight, importance for iconophiles, 104–5, 125
 Sissinius, 143n41, 153n73, 154, 181, 182, 183n77
 Sophronius, 176–77
 Stephen of Bostra, 110
 Stephen the Deacon, 133
 Stephen the Younger, 133–35
 Stuhlfauth, Georg, 33

- Sykeon (Galatia), 171
 Symeon Metaphrastes, 143n41, 154, 158,
 164, 183
 Symeon of Thessalonike, 110n51, 203–4n14

 Tarasius, 75n33, 134n17
 Temple of Solomon, 43, 131
 Tertullian, 35
 tetramorph, 35, 43, 46
 Thecla, 176
 Theodora, Mother of Michael III, 14, 155
 Theodore Lector/Anagnostes, 71
 Theodore of Stoudios, 87, 105, 113n59, 121,
 122, 135–36n20
 Theodore of Sykeon, 174–75, 189n96
 Theodore Psalter (B. L. Add. 19.352),
 149n58
 Theodoret of Cyrillus, 10, 15, 59, 70, 75
 Theodotus, 2
 Theophanes the Confessor, 71
 Theophilus (patriarch) 70
 Thessalonike, H. David, 46; H.
 Demetrius, 58n73

 Tobias, 17 thrones, 4, 19
 Tokali Kilise, 47n59
 Trebizond, H. Sophia, 44n56
 Trisagion, 47–48, 85, 86
 Tumba, Mt. (Normandy), 170
 Turner, Victor and Mary, 178

 Venice, S. Marco, 31n33
 Vienna Genesis, 40n51, 43 virtues, 4, 19, 42, 43, 82

 Weitzmann, Kurt, 53
 wings, meaning of, 23–25, 28, 35–36, 40, 58, 60, 63; on Christ, 24; on John the Baptist, 24; on the Virgin Mary, 24n19

 Xanthopoulos, Nicephorus Kallistus,
 204–5, 206

 Zacharias, 1

Text: 12 / 14.5 Adobe Garamond
Display: Perpetua and Adobe Garamond
Composition: Impressions Book and Journal Services, Inc.
Printing and binding: Malloy Lithographing, Inc.

Subtle Bodies

THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE CLASSICAL HERITAGE

Peter Brown, General Editor

- I Art and Ceremony in Late Antiquity, by Sabine G. MacCormack
- II Synesius of Cyrene: Philosopher-Bishop, by Jay Alan Bregman
- III Theodosian Empresses: Women and Imperial Dominion in Late Antiquity, by Kenneth G. Holm
- IV John Chrysostom and the Jews: Rhetoric and Reality in the Late Fourth Century, by Robert L. Wilken
- V Biography in Late Antiquity: The Quest for the Holy Man, by Patricia Cox
- VI Pachomius: The Making of a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt, by Philip Rousseau
- VII Change in Byzantine Culture in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries, by A. P. Kazhdan and Ann Wharton Epstein
- VIII Leadership and Community in Late Antique Gaul, by Raymond Van Dam
- IX Homer the Theologian: Neoplatonist Allegorical Reading and the Growth of the Epic Tradition, by Robert Lamberton
- X Procopius and the Sixth Century, by Averil Cameron
- XI Guardians of Language: The Grammarian and Society in Late Antiquity, by Robert A. Kaster
- XII Civic Coins and Civic Politics in the Roman East, A.D. 180–275, by Kenneth Harl
- XIII Holy Women of the Syrian Orient, introduced and translated by Sebastian P. Brock and Susan Ashbrook Harvey
- XIV Gregory the Great: Perfection in Imperfection, by Carole Straw
- XV “Apex Omnium”: Religion in the “Res gestae” of Ammianus, by R. L. Rike
- XVI Dioscorus of Aphroditon: His Work and His World, by Leslie S. B. MacCoull
- XVII On Roman Time: The Codex-Calendar of 354 and the Rhythms of Urban Life in Late Antiquity, by Michele Renee Salzman
- XVIII Asceticism and Society in Crisis: John of Ephesus and The Lives of the Eastern Saints, by Susan Ashbrook Harvey

- XIX Barbarians and Politics at the Court of Arcadius, by Alan Cameron and Jacqueline Long, with a contribution by Lee Sherry
- XX Basil of Caesarea, by Philip Rousseau
- XXI In Praise of Later Roman Emperors: The "Panegyrici Latini," introduction, translation, and historical commentary by C. E. V. Nixon and Barbara Saylor Rodgers
- XXII Ambrose of Milan: Church and Court in a Christian Capital, by Neil B. McLynn
- XXIII Public Disputation, Power, and Social Order in Late Antiquity, by Richard Lim
- XXIV The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, by Virginia Burrus
- XXV Symeon the Holy Fool: Leontius's Life and the Late Antique City, by Derek Krueger
- XXVI The Shadows of Poetry: Vergil in the Mind of Augustine, by Sabine MacCormack
- XXVII Paulinus of Nola: Life, Letters, and Poems, by Dennis E. Trout
- XXVIII The Barbarian Plain: Saint Sergius between Rome and Iran, by Elizabeth Key Fowden
- XXIX The Private Orations of Themistius, translated, annotated, and introduced by Robert J. Penella
- XXX The Memory of the Eyes: Pilgrims to Living Saints in Christian Late Antiquity, by Georgia Frank
- XXXI Greek Biography and Panegyric in Late Antiquity, edited by Tomas Hägg and Philip Rousseau
- XXXII Subtle Bodies: Representing Angels in Byzantium, by Glenn Peers

This page intentionally left blank

GLENN PEERS

Subtle Bodies

Representing Angels in Byzantium

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS
BERKELEY LOS ANGELES LONDON

University of California Press
Berkeley and Los Angeles, California

University of California Press, Ltd.
London, England

© 2001 by the Regents of the University of California

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Peers, Glenn.

Subtle bodies : representing angels in Byzantium /
Glenn Peers.

p. cm.—(The transformation of the classical heritage ; 32)

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-520-22405-1 (hardcover : alk. paper)

1. Iconoclasm—Byzantine Empire—History.
2. Angels—Biblical teaching. 3. Angels in art.
4. Angels in literature. 5. Byzantine empire—
Church history. 6. Orthodox Eastern Church—
Byzantine Empire—History. 7. Church history—
Middle Ages, 600–1500. I. Title. II. Series.

BR238 .P39 2001

235'.3'088219—dc21

00-055165

Manufactured in the United States of America

9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1 0

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of ANSI/NISO Z39.48-1992(R 1997)
(Permanence of Paper) . ☺

CONTENTS

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

IX

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

XI

ABBREVIATIONS

XIII

INTRODUCTION

I

ONE

ISSUES IN REPRESENTING ANGELS

13

TWO

ARGUMENTS AGAINST IMAGES OF ANGELS

61

THREE
REPRESENTING ANGELS: IMAGES AND THEORY
	89

FOUR
THE VENERATION OF ANGELS AND THEIR IMAGES
	126

FIVE APPREHENDING THE ARCHANGEL MICHAEL
	157

CONCLUSION
	194

BIBLIOGRAPHY
	209

INDEX
	231

ILLUSTRATIONS

1. Icon of the Archangel Michael(?).	18
2. The Israelites at the Twelve Springs.	22
3. Sarigüzel sarcophagus.	25
4. Barberini Diptych.	27
5. Mosaic of the Seasons, detail of Personification of Spring, from Daphne near Antioch.	29
6. The Tomb of Christ, upper register—Soldiers Asleep at the Tomb; lower register—Marys and Angel at Tomb.	34
7. Philoxenia of Abraham, mosaic, S. Vitale, Ravenna.	39
8. Two winged men inscribed “ΕΖΟΥCΙΕ” (“Powers”).	42
9. Angelic Powers, south side, Bema Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea).	44
10. Angelic Powers, north side, Bema Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea).	45
11. Icon of the Virgin and Child, flanked by Saints Theodore and George.	51
12. Archangel Gabriel, Mosaic, Bema arch, Hagia Sophia, Istanbul.	54
13. Virgin and Child, Apse Mosaic, Hagia Sophia, Istanbul.	55
14. Vision of Isaiah, The Christian Topography .	56

15. Icon of the Miracle at Chonae.	57
16. Virgin and Child, Apse Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea).	83
17. René Magritte, The Treachery of Images .	123
18. Sanctuary of the Archangel Michael at Mt. Gargano.	168
19. Icon of the Archangel Michael.	199

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Since this book began its life as a doctoral dissertation, many people should be acknowledged for its conception. Most directly, Herbert Kessler is responsible for the good in this work: he was the exacting midwife for a difficult birth. The help of friends and colleagues at the Johns Hopkins University and at the Villa Spelman was invaluable; I especially thank Ann van Dijk and Irene Kabala for their generous friendship.

The work I did at the doctoral level and since is founded on the training and support I received as an undergraduate, and I never travel far in my studies without silently expressing my gratitude to those teachers who set me on this path. I must single out especially A. Peter Booth (and the rest of the Department of Classics at Acadia University) and John E. Fisher of Wabash College as having provided me with the desire and confidence to pursue this vocation.

I must mention others more briefly but with thanks equally heartfelt: Charles Barber, Stéphane Beauroy, Anthony Bryer, Stephen Campbell, Mark Cheetham, Anthony Cutler and the other, anonymous reader, Georgia Frank, David Jordan and the staff of the Genadius Library, Dirk Krausmüller, Derek Krueger, Nancy Ševčenko, Daniel Weiss and Susan Young. To Kate Toll at the University of California Press and Peter Brown, my debt is great. My thanks, too, to the editor of Byzantion, P. Yannopoulos, and to the editor of Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies, J. Haldon, for allowing me to include here revised versions of the second half of chapter 4 and chapter 5. The University of Texas provided me with a Summer Research Assignment and funds to purchase photographs, and for this help I am grateful. Thanks to Tracy Chapman Hamilton for help with the index; my thanks to the Tommy and Sherry Jacks Fund for making this assistance possible.

Finally, my wife, Cathy, and children, Max and Willah, gave the peace of mind necessary to complete this task; their love is my strength. My parents and my grandparents gave me more than I can express here: with full knowledge of how small it is against their gifts, I dedicate this work to them.

ABBREVIATIONS

AASS	Acta Sanctorum , 71 vols., Paris, 1863–1940.
AB	Analecta Bollandiana
ArtB	Art Bulletin
B	Byzantion
BF	Byzantinische Forschungen
Blondel	Macarii Magnetis quae supersunt ex inedito codice , ed. C. Blondel, Paris, 1876.
BMGS	Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies
Bonnet	M. Bonnet, Narratio de miraculo a Michaele Archangelo Chonis patrato , Paris, 1890.
BS	Byzantinoslavica
BZ	Byzantinische Zeitschrift .
CA	Cahiers Archéologiques .
Cameron, “The Language of Images”	Averil Cameron, “The Language of Images: The Rise of Icons and Christian Representation,” in The Church and the Arts , Studies in Church History, vol. 25, ed. D. Wood, London, 1992, 1–42.

DACL	Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie , ed. F. Cabrol and H. Leclercq, Paris, 1924–.
DChAE	Δελτίον της Χριστιανικής Ἀρχαιολογικῆς Ἑταιρείας.
DOP	Dumbarton Oaks Papers .
DTC	Dictionnaire de théologie catholique , ed. A. Vacant and E. Magenot, Paris, 1899–1950.
EEBS	Ἑταιρείας Βυζαντινῶν Σπουδῶν Ἑπετηρῆς.
Fisher, Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae	Michael Psellus, Oratio in Archangelum Michaellem , in Michaelis Pselli Orationes Hagiographicae , ed. E. A. Fisher, Stuttgart and Leipzig, 1994, 230–56.
GCS	Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte.
Holl	“Die Schriften des Epiphanius gegen die Bilderverehrung,” ed. K. Holl, Sitzungsberichte der Königlich Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften 35.2(1916):828–68 [= K. Holl, Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte , Tübingen, 1928; rp. Darmstadt, 1964, II:351–87].
HTR	Harvard Theological Review .
JAC	Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum .
JöB	Jahrbuch der österreichischen Byzantinistik .
JECS	Journal of Early Christian Studies .
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies .
Leanza	S. Leanza, “Una versione greca inedita dell’ Apparitio S. Michaelis in monte Gargano,” VetChr 22(1985):291–316.
Mansi	G. D. Mansi, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio , 53 vols. in 58 pts., Paris and Leipzig, 1901–1927.

MGH	Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum et Italicarum saec. VI-IX , Hannover, 1878.
OCP	Orientalia Christiana Periodica .
PG	Patrologia cursus completus, Series graeca , ed. J.-P. Migne, 161 vols. in 166 pts., Paris, 1857–1866.
Pitra	J. B. Pitra, Spicilegio Solesmense complectens sanctorum patrum scriptorumque ecclesiasticorum anecdota hactenus opera , 4 vols., Paris, 1852–1858.
PL	Patrologia cursus completus, Series latina , ed. J.-P. Migne, 221 vols. in 222 pts., Paris, 1844–1880.
PO	Patrologia Orientalis .
PTS	Patristische Texte und Studien.
RAC	Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum , Stuttgart, 1950–.
RBK	Reallexikon zur byzantinischen Kunst , Stuttgart, 1963–.
REB	Revue des études byzantines .
RivAC	Rivista d'archeologia cristiana .
RQ	Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumkunde und für Kunstgeschichte .
RSBN	Rivista de studi bizantini e neollenico .
SC	Sources Chrésiennes.
Settimane	Settimane di studi del centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo.
TM	Travaux et Mémoires .
TU	Texte und Untersuchungen.
VetChr	Vetera Christianorum .

This page intentionally left blank

INTRODUCTION

On the Tension between Theology and Cult

Angel, literally “messenger,” can designate all manner of negotiation between heaven and earth and refer to any member of God’s spiritual host. Scripture is unequivocal in stating the existence of an angelic host and is full of diverse examples of the appearance of these transcendental creatures. But the difficulties of perceiving and identifying angels are signaled in scripture simply by the number of guises they assume and impressions they make. Angels appear in scriptural accounts as multiform, awful beings before whom such witnesses as Zacharias are overwhelmed and left speechless (Luke 1:20–22). They appear as clouds and fire (Ex. 13:21–22, 23:20–23), formless voices (Gen. 21:17) and, in the visions of Ezekiel (Ez. 10) and Isaiah (Is. 6), as complex and ultimately unfathomable creatures. The identity of these manifestations in scripture is often obscure; and Christian exegesis with its typological interpretation only compounded the difficulty when it discerned identities not overt in Hebrew scripture.

The scriptural definition of angelic nature as fire and wind (Ps. 104:4) established the belief in the immaterial and enigmatic qualities of angelic beings. Incorporated into the Epistle to Hebrews—“And of the angels he saith, Who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire” (1:7)—this definition became the exegetical cornerstone of Christian angelology. But although the general definition was settled by scripture, the precise nature of the proportion and blend of elemental forces was never fully explained; angelic nature was held to be beyond humanity's ken.¹

Angelology—as historians have named patristic scrutiny of angels²—is replete with uncertainties, and these uncertainties were the source of the special problems of access and familiarity in devotion.³ For Christians, many questions persisted about angels' nature, organization, duties and comprehension.⁴ Agreement among theologians about the specifics of angelic nature was not possible given the transcendence of the objects of speculation, but angels figure so large in scripture and devotion that the subject could not be avoided.

The fire and spirit composition posited a relative value for angelic nature that placed the angels somewhere between the radically different natures of humanity and God. Such theologians as Theodotus in the second century called the angels “intellectual fire, intellectual spirit,”⁵ distinct in property from material fire and light.⁶ Theodotus thought that angels did have bodies—at least they were seen as such—although these bodies, compared to ours, were without form and without corporeality.⁷ Methodius (d. ca. 311) said that the angelic

1. See the texts gathered by J. Turmel, “Histoire de l'angélologie des temps apostoliques à la fin du Ve siècle,” Révue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse 3(1898):411ff.

2. See, for instance, Turmel, “Histoire de l'angélologie,” 289–308, 407–34, 533–52, and also his “L'angélologie depuis le faux Denys l'Aréopagite,” Révue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse 4(1899):289–309, 414–34, 536–62.

3. Angelology is the subject of many studies: see, for instance, DACL I.2:208off., DTC I:1189ff., RAC V:53ff., RBK III:13ff., and M. Bussagli, “Angeli,” Enciclopedia dell'arte medievale (Rome, 1991–) I:629–38, idem, Storia degli angeli. Racconto di immagini e di idee (Milan, 1991), and Le ali di Dio. Messaggerie e guerrieri alati tra oriente e occidente, ed. M. Bussagli and M. D'Onofrio, Milan, 2000.

4. See R. Roques, “Introduction,” in Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, La Hiérarchie Céleste, SC vol. 58, ed. G. Heil and M. de Gandillac (Paris, 1958) lxxi.

5. Preserved in the writings of Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–d. before 215). See Excerpta ex scriptis Theodoto, in Stromata Buch VII und VIII. Excerpta ex Theodoto. Eclogae propheticae. Quis dives saluetur. Fragmente, GCS vol. 17, 2d ed., ed. O. Stählin, L. Früchtel and U. Treu (Berlin, 1970) 110.

6. See, for instance, Eusebius, Praeparatio Evangelica, VII.15.15, GCS vol. 43, ed. K. Mras (Berlin, 1956) 393–94. Pseudo-Athanasius, Quaestiones ad Antiochum Duce, V, PG 28:601C, said that the angels are as different from material creation as the sun from the stars.

7. Excerpta ex scriptis Theodoto, in Stromata Buch VII und VIII, 110–11.

nature is equally composed of air and fire, like souls.⁸ A writer later identified as Macarius the Great (ca. 300–ca. 390) said that the angels have subtle (λεπτὰ) bodies.⁹ Others stated that the angels are beings without body and without matter, but not completely so.¹⁰ Gregory of Nyssa (ca. 330–ca. 394) appears to put the angels out of all contact with matter.¹¹ And Gregory of Nazianzus (329/30–ca. 390) said that the angels can only be perceived by reason because they are composed of pure spirituality or something approaching it—he could not say for certain.¹² Complete agreement concerning the degree of participation of the angels in matter was never possible. Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite¹³ and John of Damascus (ca. 675–ca. 750)¹⁴ came down on the side of the essential spirituality of the angels.

Maintaining a distance between the angels and God on the one hand, and angels and humanity on the other, was an important consideration for theologians. In his text praising the Archangel Michael, for example, Chrysippus (ca. 405–479) was careful to establish the similarities and differences of the natures of Michael and God.¹⁵ He deduced the nature of God from Deuteronomy 4:24

8. Photius, Bibliothèque, Tome V ('Codices' 230–241), ed. R. Henry (Paris, 1967) 100.10–13.

9. Homilia, IV.ix, in Die fünfzig geistlichen Homilien des Makarios, PTS vol. 4, ed. H. Dörries, E. Klosterman and M. Kroeger (Berlin, 1964) 33–34.

10. Turmel, "Histoire de l'angélologie," 422ff.

11. Oratio catechetica magna, VI, PG 45:28AB.

12. Orationes xlv, XLV.5, PG 36:629B.

13. See R. Roques, L'univers dionysien. Structure hiérarchique du monde selon le Pseudo-Denys (Paris, 1954; rp. Paris, 1983) 154ff. On the nature of the angels Pseudo-Dionysius himself is almost completely silent. Pseudo-Dionysius took it as an assumption that the angels were essentially spiritual in nature. In the summary of Pseudo-Dionysius's work by George Pachymeres (1242–ca. 1310), angels are described as bodiless and immaterial; they are immaterial, immortal and deiform (De divinis nominibus, VI.2, PG 3:856C); and in De div. nom., IV.1, PG 3:693C he states: "It is as bodiless and immaterial that they are perceived by the intelligence; and inasmuch as they are intelligences, they perceive themselves in a manner not of this world..." A defining characteristic is that the celestial hierarchy is more immaterial and more spiritual than the human (e.g., De ecclesiastica hierarchia, I.4, PG 3:376B). Roques writes (ibid., 155 n9), "C'est surtout par opposition aux caractères de notre hiérarchie humaine que ceux de la hiérarchie céleste prennent tout leur relief."

14. Expositio fidei, II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II Expositio fidei, PTS vol. 12, ed. P.B. Kotter (Berlin, 1973) 45–48.

15. A. Sigalas, "Χρυσίππου πρεσβυτέρου Ἐγκώμιον εἰς Ἀρχάγγελον Μιχαήλ," EEBS 3(1926):85–93.

("For the Lord thy God is a consuming fire") and Deuteronomy 9:3, as well as John 4:24 ("God is a spirit").¹⁶ But even though Psalm 104:4 and Hebrews 1:7 indicate that the angels are also fire and spirit, Chrysippus said that one must not make the mistake of assuming that the angels are the same as God. They are decidedly not equal in nature or honor, since the creator cannot be equal to his creations. God alone is uncircumscribable, unviewable, and of purer flame.

Chrysippus was mindful to base discussion of angels on scriptural reference;¹⁷ scripture, not cult, was the proper guide.¹⁸ The same ostensible dependence on divine revelation in scripture generally characterized theologians' descriptions of angels, as well as descriptions in miracle tales of angels' work. Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (fl. ca. 500?), in his elaborate taxonomy of heaven in the Celestial Hierarchy, attempted to set his structure on a scriptural foundation, and yet he found that he had to rely on other sources to answer some questions. In a sense, he derived all his orders for his Celestial Hierarchy from the Bible,¹⁹ and his hierarchy differed from those of his predecessors in the systematic laws applied to the orders, their positions, actions and interactions.²⁰

Pseudo-Dionysius rigorously examined scripture for disclosures of the heavenly hierarchy so that a precise structure of angelic beings might be advanced. He divided the hierarchy into triads, the first consisting of seraphim, cherubim and thrones, the second of virtues,

16. Sigalas, "Χρυσίππου πρεσβυτέρου," 89.

17. Sigalas, "Χρυσίππου πρεσβυτέρου," 86.

18. A. Sigalas, Des Chrysippos von Jerusalem Enkomion auf den hl. Johannes den Täufer, Texte und Forschungen zur byzantinisch-neugriechischen Philologie, vol. 20 (Athens, 1937) III.

19. Roques, "Introduction," lxxxi.

20. See Roques, "Introduction," lvii ff. Pre-Dionysian attempts include the Life of Peter the Iberian, regarding a vision of John the Eunuch (see E. Honigmann, "Pierre l'Ibérien et les écrits du Pseudo-Denys l'Aréopagite," in Mémoires de l'Académie Royale de Belgique, Classe des Lettres et des Sciences morales et politiques 47/3(1952):18–19); Cyril of Jerusalem (ca. 315–386), Catechesis mystagogica, V.6, in Catéchèses mystagogiques, SC vol. 126, ed. A. Piédagnel (Paris, 1966) 154; John Chrysostom, Homiliae 1–67 in Genesim, IV, PG 53:44; and the Constitutiones Apostolicae (second half of the fourth century), VIII.12.8, in Didascalia et Constitutiones apostolorum, ed. F.X. Funk (Paderborn, 1905; rp. Turin, 1962) 498. And see A. Louth, Denys the Areopagite (Wilton, Conn., 1989) 35ff.

dominations and principalities, and the last of powers, archangels and angels. His is the best known and most complete attempt at describing the hierarchy, and his symbolic theology influenced at a fundamental level perception of and approaches to angelology from the sixth century on.

Pseudo-Dionysius necessarily depended to some extent on sources other than scripture for the completeness and symmetry of his hierarchy, notably the tradition of the church, Pseudo-Dionysius's own master, Hierotheus, and even his own opinion at particularly difficult junctures.²¹ At one point, for example, Pseudo-Dionysius had to resort to a divergent reading of scripture. In Pseudo-Dionysius's system, only the archangels and angels are in direct contact with humanity. The appearance of the seraphim to Isaiah is, therefore, a direct contradiction of the hierarchical scheme, and Pseudo-Dionysius had to propose a symbolic reading of Isaiah 6:6 wherein the seraphim is actually an angel appearing under symbolic form.²² Clearly, achieving knowledge of God by this method was conditional and subject to personal interpretation.

Pseudo-Dionysius insisted on the inability of human intelligence to understand divine things fully; for him, knowledge only comes through the "truly mysterious darkness of unknowing."²³ Writing about the exegetical possibilities of Isaiah 6:6, he described the necessary process of gaining knowledge of the unknowable as a personal endeavor that is necessarily incomplete.²⁴ Human knowledge of the divine derives in this process largely from personal contemplation of

21. Roques, "Introduction," lxxx ff.

22. Roques, "Introduction," lxxviii–lxxix.

23. De mystica theologia, I.3, PG 3:1001A; Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, The Complete Works, trans. C. Luibheid and P. Rorem (New York, 1987) 137.

24. De coelesti hierarchia, XIII.4, in La Hiérarchie Céleste, SC vol. 58, ed. G. Heil and M. de Gandillac (Paris, 1958) 161. Roques, "Introduction," lxxvi, commented on this passage in this way, "Il y aura donc, en matière théologique, une part d'hypothèse et d'estimation humaine. Mais, soulignons-le, la pointe de relativité s'applique ici aux divers types d'explication qui ont essayé de montrer comment le séraphim d'Isaïe pouvait être un ange, mais non point sur le fait même qu'il l'était: aux yeux de Denys et en vertu de la structure et des lois générales de la hiérarchie, c'est là une vérité absolue qui relève de l'enseignement le plus manifest et le plus sûr de l'illumination théarchique."

symbols or sensible phenomena, but contemplation does not provide final answers, only provisional knowledge.²⁵ For Pseudo-Dionysius, “signs and symbols pointed the seeker of truth on his way, not logical argument.”²⁶

In contrast to the circumspect attempts of theologians to come to terms with angelic nature and activity, popular cult attached great, if not overweening, importance to the near-omnipotence of angelic beings. To be sure, the cult of the Archangel Michael—the most popular of the “personalized” angels in the Byzantine world—did not depend upon these theological speculations for its working premise, although it did share in the fundamental difficulties of comprehension and description inherent in angelology.²⁷ The Christian cult of Michael, and of the angels, was founded on Jewish and pagan beliefs, and it burgeoned naturally out of this wide “power base.” But it also thrived because of its animistic roots. Evidence of Jewish belief in angels who have control over certain natural phenomena is found in the Book of Jubilees (ca. 140–100 B.C.E.), which describes angels, for instance, of fire, wind and darkness;²⁸ in the Book of Enoch (third century B.C.E.), angels have control over frost, snow and other phenomena.²⁹ In short, each natural phenomenon had an angel. Texts that cite Michael in this role as “nature angel” specify his special con-

25. See Roques, L'univers dionysien, 158ff.

26. Cameron, “The Language of Images,” 28.

27. L. Heiser, Die Engel im Glauben der Orthodoxie (Trier, 1976) 222, states that the liturgy is no more specific about the angels’ nature than the theologians are. In the liturgy the angels are given the general attributes of “insubstantial,” “bodiless,” “immaterial.” However, as he notes, “Nicht in theoretischen Erörterungen wird die Natur der Engel erkannt, sondern aus der heilgeschichtlichen Erfahrung ihres tätigen, hilfreichen Dienens für Gott und die Menschen” (ibid., 226). Appearances in history are the only really dependable factor in cult practice.

28. The Book of Jubilees or The Little Genesis, trans. R. H. Charles (London, 1902) 40ff. (c.11).

29. The Book of Enoch or 1 Enoch. A New English Edition, ed. M. Black (Leiden, 1985) 57 (60:17–22), 58 (61:10).

And see J. Daniélou, Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes avant Nicée. Vol. 1. Théologie du judéo-christianisme (Tournai, 1958) 140–41; W.v. Rintelen, Kultgeographische Studien in der Italia Byzantina. Untersuchungen über die Kulte des Erzengels Michael und der Madonna di Costantinopoli in Südtalien (Meisenheim am Glan, 1968) 29; W.v. Rintelen, “Kult- und Legendenwanderung von Ost nach West im frühen Mittelalter,” Saeculum 22(1971):84–85; A. L. Williams, “The Cult of the Angels at Colossae,” JTS 10(1909):415–16. The angels are cerns as water and snow.³⁰ In Egypt, Michael “took over” the role of the Nile God so that he was held responsible for the dew and the rain, and he alone was said to go through the veil to provide life.³¹ Similarly, Michael is described in terms of immanent protection unrestrained by anyone but God.

The sun riseth upon all the world through the supplication of Michael. . . . The earth beareth its fruits through the supplication of Michael. The whole world was reconciled again to God [by Michael], and he it is who delivereth everyone from the snares of the Devil. We find the intercession of Michael in the strenuous work of our hands. . . . We find the intercession of Michael in the body of the vine and of the gladness which is in the wine. . . . For the Archangel standeth by every one who crieth up to God with all his heart and helpeth him.³²

Belief in the elemental character of Michael is not restricted to the Coptic church, although Michael was especially venerated in Egypt.³³ Writing in the late ninth/early tenth century, Pantaleon also remarks on this same elemental character of the Archangel.³⁴ And in his work praising the Archangel Michael, Michael Psellus (1018–1081?) noted the benign immanence of Michael near his shrine: “Such things as the zephyr is able to do for us and breezes placed over every phenomenon and if named they can offer protection: for example, E. Legrand, Bibliothèque grecque vulgaire, 9 vols. (Paris, 1881; rp. Athens, 1974) II:xviii ff.

30. See W. Lueken, Michael. Eine Darstellung und Vergleichung der jüdischen und der morgenländisch-christlichen Tradition vom Erzengel Michael (Göttingen, 1898) 52ff., and 131ff.

31. Lueken, Michael, 131–32.

32. E. A. W. Budge, Miscellaneous Coptic Texts in the Dialect of Upper Egypt (London, 1915) 757.

33. See, on Coptic veneration, E. Amélineau, “Le christianisme chez les anciens Coptes,” Revue de l'histoire des religions 15(1887):54ff. He cites a large number of legends in Christian tradition in Egypt concerning the angels and the majority of these are about Michael; Michael's also are the most varied, “Cet archange était sans cesse en mouvement, tantôt en guerrier, tantôt en batelier, descendant sur la barque aérienne jusqu'au fond des enfers, trempant son aile dans les lacs de feu et en retirant les damnés” (ibid., 56). See further, Lueken, Michael, 70ff., and C. D. G. Müller, Die Engellehre der koptischen Kirche. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der christlichen Frömmigkeit in Ägypten (Wiesbaden, 1959) 8ff.

34. Encomium in maximum et gloriosissimum Michaellem coelestis militiae principem, PG 98:1265B–8A.

from the north refresh our bodies, these things the Archangel is able to do.”³⁵ Michael is the invisible and propitious force that alleviates heat in this region and lifts the oppression of all kinds of illnesses and sufferings. An important component of the angels’ nature is fire and likewise Michael makes himself manifest in this form, as miracle stories testify.³⁶ In Christian belief, angels command and guard their constituent parts, water, air and fire.

The early Church inherited a flourishing, and in some ways troublesome, cult of angels.³⁷ The warning in the Pauline Epistle to the Colossians about the dangers of untoward worship of the angels is an indication of such a problem.³⁸ The Christian cult of angels seems to have been heavily influenced by certain heterodox Jewish practices, as well as pagan beliefs in divine messengers.³⁹ The famous cult of Michael at Colossae, later Chonae, in western Asia Minor, grew out of this active, syncretistic belief in the angels that was common to Jews and pagans both.⁴⁰

35. Fisher 256.639–43. And see also E. A. Fisher, “Nicomedia or Galatia? Where Was Psellos’ Church of the Archangel Michael?” in Gonimos. Neoplatonic and Byzantine Studies Presented to Leendert G. Westerlink at 75, ed. J. Duffy and J. Peradotto (Buffalo, 1988) 179.

36. See chapter 5.

37. The cult of angels, and specifically of the Archangel Michael, was threatening even to the position of Christ in the church. Lueken, Michael, 133ff., exhaustively described this problem; but see also J. Barbel, Christos Angelos. Die Anschauung von Christos als Bote und Engel in der gelehrten und volkstümlichen Literatur des christlichen Altertums, Theophaneia, vol. 3 (Bonn, 1941) 230ff., Daniélou, Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes, 167ff., J. P. Rohland, Der Erzengel Michael. Arzt und Feldherr. Zwei Aspekte des vor- und frühbyzantinischen Michaelkults (Leiden, 1977) 67ff.

38. Col. 2:18, “Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into these things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshy mind.” This rather obscure prescription has been the subject of debate since the exact nature of this worship at Colossae is not known. R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres. Studien zur griechisch-ägyptischen und frühchristlichen Literatur (Leipzig, 1904) 79ff., thought this warning was directed at a cult of animistic forces.

39. For the pagan cult of angels, see A. R. R. Shepherd, “Pagan Cults of Angels in Roman Asia Minor,” Talanta 12/13(1980/81):77–101; F. Sokolowski, “Sur le culte d’angelos dans le paganisme grec et romain,” HTR 53(1960):225–29; and F. Cumont, “Les anges du paganisme,” Revue de l’histoire des religions 72(1915):159–82.

40. See Williams, “The Cult of the Angels at Colossae,” 435ff. R. L. Fox, Pagans and Christians (Harmondsworth, Middlesex, 1986) 380, 742 n18, suspected “a pagan cult of angels” at Chonae, and he notes indications of worship of angels in pagan contexts nearby. The verb ἐμβατεύειν (“to enter into, to approach something in order to investigate it”) is used at Col. 2:18, and although this verb is also found in the context of the cult of Apollo at

Local causes for the cult at Chonae would seem equally important, however. The geography of the region was long noted as particularly fertile for gods—or angels—with awesome power over natural phenomena.⁴¹ Local causes and larger questions of improper worship combined at Colossae to create awkwardness over cult activity directed to the angels. The Epistle to the Colossians seems to have been addressed specifically to the sizable Jewish community at Colossae and in the region of Phrygia, where pagans were also in-

Claros, one need not connect its forms of worship with Colossae for that reason alone. F. R. Trombley, Hellenic Religion and Christianization c. 370–529, 2d ed., 2 vols. (Leiden, New York and Köln, 1995) I:153ff., understands a pagan cult of angels behind the worship of Michael at Chonae.

The transition of cult, pagan to Christian, is often difficult to discern and should not be taken at face value, as I have attempted to demonstrate in my “The Sosthenion near Constantinople: John Malalas and Ancient Art,” B 68(1998):110–20.

The likeliest course for Michael at Chonae is through hellenised Jews in the area. As Marcel Simon writes, “la substitution a toutes chances d’être pré-chrétienne, et d’avoir été opérée par ces juifs syncrétisants dont on entrevoit l’influence à travers les développements polémiques de l’épître aux Colossiens.” See Verus Israel. Étude sur la relation entre chrétiens et juifs dans l’empire romain (135–425) (Paris, 1948) 430–31. F. O. Francis claimed that some form of mystery cult took place at Colossae, but the evidence is slim; see “Humility and Angelic Worship in Col. 2:18,” Studia Theologica 16(1963):109–34 [= Conflict at Colossae. A Problem in the Interpretation of Early Christianity Illustrated by Selected Modern Studies, ed. F. O. Francis and W. A. Meeks (Missoula, Mont., 1973) 163–95].

41. For example, Williams, “The Cult of the Angels at Colossae,” 435, “The remarkable natural phenomena at and near Colossae must from remote ages have appealed to the human mind, and provided material to which both primitive and later religions could cling.” See, too, O. Rojdestvensky, Le culte de saint Michel et le moyen âge latin (Paris, 1922) xvi; Rintelen, Kultgeographische Studien, 25; Rintelen, “Kult- und Legendenwanderung,” 85; and O. F. A. Meinardus, “St. Michael’s Miracle of Khonae and Its Geographical Setting,” Εκκλησία καὶ Θεολογία 1(1980):459–69.

R. Chandler noted in his Travels in Asia Minor: Or, an account of a tour made at the expense of the Society of Dilettanti (Dublin, 1775) 230–31, “It is an old observation, that the country about the Maeander, the soil being light and friable, and full of salts generating inflammable matter, was undermined by fire and water. Hence it abounded in hot springs, which, after passing underground from the reservoirs, appeared on the mountain, or were found bubbling up in the plain or in the mud of the river: and hence it was subject to frequent earthquakes; the nitrous vapour, compressed in the cavities, and sublimed by heat or fermentation, bursting its prison with loud explosions, agitating the atmosphere, and shaking the earth and waters with a violence as extensive as destructive; and hence, moreover, the pestilential grottoes, which had subterraneous communications with each other, derived their noisome effluvia; and serving as smaller vents to these furnaces or hollows, were regarded as apertures of hell, as passages for deadly fumes rising up from the realms of Pluto. One or more of these mountains perhaps has burned; and it may be suspected, that the surface of the country has in some places been formed from its own bowels.”

volved in angelolatry.⁴² The local cult of angels was not so easily dislodged, however, and at the Council held in 380 in nearby Laodicea it was singled out for attack:

It is not right for Christians to abandon the church of God and go away and invoke angels and hold conventicles; for these things are forbidden. If, therefore, anyone is found devoting himself to this secret idolatry, let him be anathema, because he abandoned our Lord Jesus Christ and went after idolatry.⁴³

And somewhat later Theodoret of Cyrrhus (ca. 393–ca. 466) again criticized these excesses of angelolatry:

This disease long remained in Phrygia and Pisidia. For this reason also a synod in Laodicea of Phrygia forbade by a decree the offering of prayer to angels; and even to the present time oratories of the holy Michael may be seen among them and their neighbors.⁴⁴

Wilhelm Lueken noted a scholion to this passage that makes it clear that Theodoret was referring to Michael's shrines in and around Colossae.⁴⁵ Evidently, Chonae was the long-standing center of a heterodox devotion to Michael in particular and to angels in general.

42. Williams, "The Cult of the Angels at Colossae," 436ff.; C. Mango, "Germia: A Postscript," JÖB 41(1991):297; on the number of Jews in Phrygia, Lueken, Michael, 80–81, and K. Belke and N. Mersich, Phrygien und Pisidien, Tabula Imperii Byzantini, vol. 7 (Vienna, 1990) 223, for citations.

It can be inferred that the so-called Epistle to the Colossians was directed at angelolatry in Asia Minor in general, even if the Epistle may not have been directed at the eponymous community. H. Koester, History and Literature of Early Christianity (Philadelphia, 1982) 264, denied the possibility of Paul's authorship but still thought that the Epistle was directed to the church at Colossae.

43. See P.-P. Joannou, Discipline generale antique (IVe-IXe siècles). Tome I.2. Les canons des synodes particuliers (Grottaferrata, 1962) 144–45. The translation of Canon 35 of the Council of Laodicea is from J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (London, 1879) 68. See Williams, "The Cult of the Angels at Colossae," 435; Simon, Verus Israel, 429–30; L. Robert, Hellenica. Recueil d'épigraphie de numismatique et d'antiquités grecques, vol. XI–XII (Paris, 1960) 432ff. And on the anti-Jewish tendencies of the Council of Laodicea, see Rintelen, Kultgeographische Studien, 27, and Lueken, Michael, 81.

44. De providentia orationes x, II, PG 82:613B; trans. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistles, 68.

45. Lueken, Michael, 75.

This composite portrait of devotion to angels in the Early Christian and Byzantine world, as outlined above, reveals conflicting elements. On the one hand, popular, sometimes heterodox devotion to elemental, guardian creatures clearly existed, as the troublesome and flourishing history of the devotion to Michael at Chonae demonstrates; and, on the other, there was an abundance of theological speculation that carefully avoided crossing paths with this popular devotion and instead focused on issues of nature and organization—in other words, on decorous angelology. This study, however, explores how these apparently contradictory approaches to God's invisible multitude could intersect. The possibility of idolatry, a fear of the early church that still acted on the consciences of eighth- and ninth-century Byzantines, was never distant from discussion of angels and their representations. It informed the debates over the appropriateness of representing angels, a debate that began in the early church but was not resolved until the ninth century. The course of this debate as it incriminated material images is the subject of the first three chapters of this book. The worship of angels and of their images is the subject of fourth chapter; this chapter examines theology and miracle stories, and discusses the ways in which both of these genres dealt with the danger of worship of angels and presented seemingly examples of approach instead. The fifth chapter looks at miracle stories of the Archangel Michael at Chonae to examine their verbal representation, that is, how these texts both make Michael more apprehensible to their audience and manage the difficulties of description with which artists also—in their own way—contended.

While this study deals primarily with textual evidence of attitudes towards angels and their images, it is the work of an art historian. It draws on intellectual history, which includes theology, miracle stories, poetry and sermons, and incorporates them into a history of representation. At the center of the study are the cultural conditions of seeing and understanding: an epistemology for which angels are simply the most trying and dangerous case. Transparent images of formless beings made for especially treacherous rapids, which the Byzantines attempted to stop up; this study looks at the shifting waters and dams that having images of angels necessitated.

This page intentionally left blank

One

ISSUES IN REPRESENTING ANGELS

Given the difficult nature of angels and their incorrigible cult, the question arose early in Christianity: How does one make an image of an incorporeal being, and what meaning does that image have for devotion to and comprehension of that being? This question, however, formed part of a larger search for ways of attaining knowledge of God and of things divine. As Averil Cameron's insightful synthesis of different aspects of Byzantine culture demonstrates, it was this search and the distinct approaches to gaining knowledge that led directly to the crisis of Iconoclasm in the eighth and ninth centuries.¹

Iconoclasm arose in the 720s, signaled perhaps by the dramatic destruction of the image of Christ on the Chalke Gate of the imperial palace in Constantinople.² Its direct cause was likely political concerns and the personal inclination of the emperor Leo III

1. Cameron, "The Language of Images"; and also her "Byzantium and the Past in the Seventh Century: The Search for Redefinition," in The Seventh Century. Change and Continuity. Proceedings of a joint French and British Colloquium held at the Warburg Institute 8–9 July 1988, ed. J. Fontaine and J. N. Hillgarth (London, 1992) 250–76.

2. See M.-F. Auzépy, "La destruction de l'icône du Christ de la Chaléc par Léon III: Propagande ou réalité," B 60(1990):445–92, and G. Peers, "Breathless, Speechless Images: On the Chalke Gate Epigram," Hommages Margaret Head Thomson, Cahiers des études anciennes, vol. 34, ed. L. Finette and A. P. Booth (Trois Rivières, Québec, 1998) 109–12.

(r. 716–740), but its intellectual roots are deep in the early church, in divergent approaches to created matter—primarily images—in Christian life and worship.³ Iconoclasm as imperial policy was continued and reinforced by Leo’s son, Constantine V (r. 740–775) but halted under the regency of Irene who ruled for her son Constantine VI and solely from 797 to 802. Irene convened the last ecumenical council in 787, the second held at Nicaea, which reintroduced image worship in the empire. From 815 to 843, Iconoclasm was again enforced until Michael III (r. 842–867) declared for image worship under the influence of his mother, Theodora. The effect of this prolonged period of Iconoclasm was intense debate over images and worship. This study mines that debate for the information it provides about attitudes towards representing angels.

Cameron’s study provides a framework for a more specific analysis of one aspect of the quest for knowledge of the holy, namely depictions of angels. She delineates the process by which early Byzantine society attempted to define and systematize methods of acquiring knowledge and recognizing truth. In Cameron’s view, Iconoclasm “was a manifestation of an uncertainty which people felt about their own thought world.”⁴ And indeed, the period leading up to Iconoclasm reveals two divergent approaches to gaining knowledge in Byzantine culture: symbolism and literalism in art and worship were the two poles of the debate. These conflicting views on art and worship characterize attitudes toward, and perceptions of, angels and their representations. The debate over symbolism and literalism also involved questions about the place of created things in Christian worship; intellectual devotion and material assistance were mutually exclusive for some of the theologians discussed here. Figurative art

3. On the origins of Iconoclasm under Leo III, see S. Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm during the Reign of Leo III with Particular Attention to the Oriental Sources (Louvain, 1973) and D. Stein, Der Beginn des byzantinischen Bilderstreits und seine Entwicklung bis in der 40er Jahre des 8. Jahrhunderts (Munich, 1980). On the roots of Iconoclasm, see P.C. Finney, The Invisible God. Early Christians on Art (Oxford, 1994), E. Kitinger, “The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm,” DOP 8(1954):83–150, and Sister Charles Murray, Rebirth and Afterlife. A Study of the Transmutation of Some Pagan Imagery in Early Christian Funerary Art (Oxford, 1981).

4. Cameron, “The Language of Images,” 4.

was one alienating feature within a larger complex of material aids introduced into worship in the period being examined.

The possibility of idolatry that arose from the introduction of material aids into Christian worship was the underlying and central apprehension that united anti-image theologians. The rejection of images of angels was directly related to that fear of idolatry, but it also involved other issues of primary concern in the early church, namely the worship of angels as gods and pagan attempts to equate Christian angels with their own gods. In the late fourth and fifth centuries, canon 35 of the Council of Laodicea and the repeated warning of Theodoret of Cyrrhus aimed at increasing awareness of the problem and at extirpating the embarrassing problem from the Christian community.⁵ Macarius Magnes in the fourth century combatted the pagan attempt at a rapprochement by denying any resemblance between Christian worship of angels and pagan devotion to their gods.⁶ John of Thessalonike continued to fend off just such advances from pagan quarters into the seventh century.⁷ Evidently, the issue maintained a shame-inspiring purchase within the church. Christian practice, likely in the region of Chonae and perhaps far beyond, evidently encouraged the expression of such pagan views, and pagans could draw parallels between the two apparently irreconcilable beliefs. The shrine at Chonae was a prime site for overweening angel worship, and the stories describing the miracles of Michael were directed at cleansing a situation mortifying for church authorities; the emphasis on the blameless character at the center of the story of the miracle at Chonae was intended to counter behavior that was perhaps not normal but at least perceived to be possible within the cult of angels.⁸ A literal approach to worship, therefore, implicated other issues in the early church that are not simply theological abstractions

5. See the Introduction.

6. See chapter 2.

7. See the Conclusion, and also G. Peers, "Imagination and Angelic Epiphany," BMGS 21(1997):113–31, and D. Krausmüller, "God or Angels as Impersonators of Saints. A Belief and its Contexts in the 'Refutation' of Eustratius of Constantinople and in the Writings of Anastasius of Sinai," Gouden Hoorn 6 / 2(1998/9):5–16.

8. See chapter 4.

but that involved problems of Christian worship within the material, created world and before insubstantial messengers and guardians of that world.

Before such elusive creatures as angels, Christian artists encountered a representational dilemma. Yet they did not consider this problem of depicting spiritual creatures to be insurmountable, as they represented angels from the earliest period. They based their depictions on scriptural description, and, like theologians such as Chrysippus and Pseudo-Dionysius, they prudently stayed on the path scripture had established for angelic appearances. In many ways, artists avoided problems of representations and described angels straightforwardly as men, thereby ignoring the metaphysical qualities of angels altogether. Yet Christian artists did not always show angels as if they were illustrating the Bible literally. Christian artists developed an iconography of angels that commemorated angelic appearances on earth, most often using wings to indicate the symbolic quality of these appearances. In one important sense, the common iconography of the winged man is reductive: it does not describe the bodiless, immaterial nature of angels; rather, it represents God's messengers generically.

The iconography of angels is unique in Christian art in that it described the difficult flashes of epiphany of the formless angels allusively; the iconography of Christ and the saints presented their human forms, derived from corporeal lives on earth, as the iconography of the angels could not. While it is true that angels appropriated human form for some of their appearances on earth, this form was only one among many forms possible for angels. Christ and the saints had secure and comprehensible forms that persisted with a degree of stability throughout their lives on earth; in contrast, angels were unstable and, in the end, unknowable.

Christian images depended on the life that the subject led on earth for their significance in cult since they stated historical likeness and actual presence in the stead of the person represented. As Hans Belting has demonstrated, images of saints grew directly out of the Late Antique practice of honoring the dead through portraits; images became venerated like relics and were treated like vestiges that had contact with the person represented.⁹ Christ and the Virgin were, of course, difficult cases as both rose bodily into heaven; miraculous images, wondrously imprinted with Christ's face or taken from eyewitness observation such as by the Evangelist Luke, fulfilled this desire for verification of earthly being and for contact with the divine.¹⁰

Representing God—that is, the ability to represent absolute transcendence—was the central issue in the period leading to, and including, Iconoclasm, and it determined the selection and introduction of material concerning angels who are also transcendent, though not, like God, absolutely. The central defense for images of God was the incarnation; supreme divinity assumed human form, and lived, suffered and died in that form. Angels also become comprehensible, though not to this same degree, and for this reason were often a corollary for this primary question of Christian representation. But the issue of angels' images diverges immediately from any direct comparison with images of Christ. The angels were never incarnate, only give the illusion of being so—as, for instance, Raphael deluded Tobias into believing him human. Although angels are comprehensible in some fashion, they present a set of problems different from Christ's representability. Their formless nature and illusory apparitions, so well documented in scripture, apocrypha and miracle stories, define the angels' images as allusive to a spiritual reality not altogether apprehensible. Without the anchor of incarnate being that Christ's images refer to, angels' images are symbolic in a distinct way, necessarily referring to the paradox of bodilessness and immateriality made momentarily and partially known.

Angels, it appears, could not participate in the same process of representation as Christ and the saints: they did not manufacture miraculous images, they did not relinquish relics. Altogether their timeless, near-eternal selves denied historical ratification to their like-

9. H. Belting, Bild und Kult. Eine Geschichte des Bildes vor dem Zeitalter der Kunst (Munich, 1990) 42ff., 92ff.

10. On these issues, see the papers in The Holy Face and the Paradox of Representation, Villa Spelman Colloquia, vol. 6, ed. H. L. Kessler and G. Wolf (Bologna, 1998).

Figure 1. Icon of the Archangel Michael (?), Cabinet des Médailles, Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, sixth century.
Photo: Bibliothèque Nationale.

nesses. Painters of icons of angels relied on tried and true modes of representation for depicting these beings. A sixth-century Coptic panel painting of the archangel Michael (?), now in the Cabinet des Médailles, Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris (fig. 1), reveals a clear dependence on idealizing funerary portraiture of the Late Antique period: large, staring eyes give a sense of timeless abstraction; the figure faces the viewer frontally, only betraying the impression of immovability by his right hand raised in benediction; the circular nimbus is depicted in front of the rectangular frame in the upper right hand corner, lending a contrapposto effect to the hand below.¹¹ While these elements provide animation, perhaps a notion of activity benevolently directed at the worshipper, the figure itself is anonymous, undistinguished by feature or by inscription; it is so reliant on pagan idealizing portraiture in iconography and style that only the heroic quality of the figure—and not its individuality—is clear. The stumps of wings alone betray a hint of angelic identity and nature; the icon is not, then, unambiguous in its representation of qualities unique to angels.

11. See Belting, Bild und Kult, 110, fig. 47, and J. Durand in Byzance. L'art byzantin dans les collections publiques françaises (Paris, 1992) 144, no. 98.

If Christian artists sidestepped certain problems of angelic nature in frequently representing angels as men, these images of angels raised difficulties of perception and comprehension on the part of the viewer. Angels are formless, bodiless and immaterial, so a true likeness of such beings in material images is impossible. The relation between the image and model is, therefore, problematic, and definition of any relation relied on viewers' ability to discern symbolic rather than literal "likeness." Byzantine viewers did approach images of angels discriminately: the tension between material representation and immaterial nature is the compelling and attractive quality of their images. Indeed, this tension is the defining characteristic of angels' images and distinguishes their images from other Christian representations.

On a literal level, the iconography of the angels presents a faithful rendering of certain appearances that God's messengers had made on earth. In Christian art, angels are depicted as youths, most often winged; they are generalized in appearance to the point of anonymity, and only the Archangels are consistently named by inscription in representations. Cherubim and seraphim are often recognizable, though not always distinguishable from each other, by the many wings and eyes that scripture prescribed. Yet cherubim, seraphim and other angelic beings—that is, the thrones, principalities, powers, virtues and dominations mentioned in scripture—could also be represented by the generalized iconography of the winged youth. Clearly, the form of a man with wings not only commemorated the human aspect occasionally made manifest to humanity but also referred, more broadly, to all angelic beings.

Although a degree of anthropomorphism became a consistent iconographic element for angels, anthropomorphism itself was not predetermined. For instance, scripture advances different agencies behind the cloud of smoke and pillar of fire that led the Israelites out of the desert in Exodus. At one point (13:21–22), “the Lord went before them”; but at other points in the journey, the text specifies that the Lord’s angel guided the people (14:19, 23:20–23, 32:34, 33:2). Although Exodus is ambiguous about these manifestations’ identity, the cloud of smoke and pillar of fire were generally considered to be emanations of God, that is angels.¹² The angels in illustrations of these events in Exodus presented representational possibilities for painters. They could be depicted either in the form made manifest to the Israelites in the desert, or as men, a form revealed elsewhere in scripture.

In the case of the smoke and fire of Exodus, literal adherence to scripture characterizes the depictions of these epiphanies, and painters did not use the iconography of the winged youth to indicate the nature and ultimate identity of the agencies behind the cloud and fire. Frescoes in cubicula C and O in the fourth-century via Latina Catacomb in Rome both represent a column with a blaze on top beside Moses receiving the law; these two columns are placed on a level above a crowd standing before a building.¹³ The Christian Topography, written in the sixth century, shows a different context for representing this manifestation of God’s providence. Illuminations accompany passages from Exodus and other biblical books, collated by the author in an attempt at a Christian history prefigured by events in Hebrew Scripture. The context is primarily narrative, although Christian typology is the final concern. This particular manifestation of divinity, the column and cloud, is depicted with faithful attention to scripture and interpreted as a sign of God’s providence fulfilled with the coming of Christ.

12. See M. Barker, The Great Angel. A Study of Israel’s Second Angel (London, 1992) 32, 86. Eventually, the Archangel Michael became identified with these manifestations on account of his guardianship of Israel stated at Daniel 12:1. See, for instance, Pantaleon, Narratio, IX, PG 140:579C.

13. See W. Tronzo, The Via Latina Catacomb. Imitation and Discontinuity in Fourth-Century Roman Painting (University Park and London, 1986) 1, 59, figs. 4, 5.

Rather than depicting an angelic being or God, the illuminators chose a literal depiction of a cloud and a column with a flame atop it (fig. 2).¹⁴ Yet the depictions, like scripture, ultimately refer to enigmatic revelations of God's emanations, that is angels, as the column and cloud in the manuscripts and the frescoes allude to changeable beings, unclear identities and obscure meanings. Both examples, despite their different contexts and literal attention to text, demand an understanding on the part of the viewer that the column and cloud are symbolic of aspects of divine, multiform beings. By avoiding any attempts at visually referring to the nature of the epiphanies, the painter shifts the burden to the viewer who must supply an interpretation based on his or her knowledge of scripture. While this burden is not exclusive to viewing angels, it has a special role since their mutable nature demands special processes of interpretation.

Angels' metaphysical qualities notwithstanding, during the early centuries of Christian art, painters, mosaicists and sculptors depicted angels as men. They first devised an anthropomorphic iconography because angels are sometimes described in scriptural accounts as having made themselves manifest as men. The earliest extant representation of an anthropomorphic angel appeared in the third century in an Annunciation in the Catacomb of Priscilla in

14. See K. Weitzmann and G. Galavaris, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Illuminated Greek Manuscripts. Volume One: From the Ninth to the Eleventh Century (Princeton, 1990) 63–64, figs. 141, 142, pls. IXa, Xa; and Cosmas Indicopleustes, Topographie chrétienne, SC vols. 141, 159, 197, ed. W. Wolska-Conus (Paris, 1968–1973) I:47ff.

The column with fire and the cloud are represented in illustrations in the two eleventh-century manuscripts of this sixth-century work at Sinai (cod. 1186, fols. 73r, 73v, 74r) and Florence (Laur. Plut. IX, 28, fols. 103r, 103v, 104r). The illustrations were not invented for these two manuscripts and the eleventh-century recensions rely ultimately on the sixth-century prototype of the Christian Topography for their model. The Sinai and Florence versions more faithfully reproduce the illumination tradition of the Christian Topography than the other member of this manuscript family, the ninth-century Vaticanus graecus 699, and so these illustrations of Exodus can be safely related to a pre-Iconoclastic model.

One should properly follow the identification of the author of the Christian Topography with Constantine of Antioch rather than Cosmas Indicopleustes, as Wanda Wolska-Conus has persuasively argued. See her "Stéphanos d'Athènes et Stéphanos d'Alexandrie. Essai d'identification et de biographie," REB 47(1989):28ff.

Figure 2. The Israelites at the Twelve Springs, The Christian Topography of “Cosmas Indicopleustes,” Monastery of St. Catherine, Sinai, cod. 1186, fol. 73r, eleventh century. Reproduced through the courtesy of the Michigan–Princeton–Alexandria Expedition to Mount Sinai.

Rome. The scriptural narrative (Luke 1:28–38) describes the messenger of God merely as an “angel,” and the painter chose to represent this messenger as a man wearing a tunic and standing firmly on the earth.¹⁵ This solution to the potential difficulties in representing formless beings was used frequently in the first centuries of Christian art and never disappeared from the Byzantine iconographic tradition. Indeed, it shows that describing the special qualities of angels was felt sometimes not to be possible or not to be of paramount concern. In Early Christian art, angels were most often depicted in this earthly guise, as a man either bearded or unbearded,¹⁶ and in this way artists described one comprehensible aspect out of the many that scripture ascribes to angels. However, in the fresco in the Catacomb of Priscilla, the angel is not explicitly identified by inscription or iconographic peculiarity, and the attribution of the scene as the Annunciation is ambivalent. Clearly, the image of a man did not itself indicate the distinct identity of an angel nor could it describe directly any transcendental element in the event.

For some mosaicists, painters and sculptors, the literal depiction of angels as men was restrictive since anthropomorphism could not express qualities peculiar to angels.¹⁷ But in Late Antique art iconographic means that could indicate the distinct identity and metaphysical nature of angels were available to Christian mosaicists, painters and sculptors: by the end of the fourth century, wings were standard—though not exclusive—attributes of angels. They provided the means for referring to supernatural qualities particular to angels that could not be expressed easily in visual terms: transcendence, velocity, ethereality and uncontained activity. For instance, John Chrysostom (ca. 347–407) wrote:

15. See M. Bussagli, Storia degli angeli. Racconto di immagini e di idee (Milan, 1991) 48; and P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana. Nozioni generali dalle origini alla fine del sec. VI (Rome, 1958) 258.

16. The bearded angel is found as late as the fifth century, for example, on an ivory representing the Baptism of Christ in the British Museum; see W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, 3d ed. (Mainz am Rhein, 1976) pl. 60 (#115).

17. G. Berefelt, A Study on the Winged Angel. The Origin of a Motif (Stockholm, 1968) 15.

What do the powers reveal to us by these wings? The exaltedness and ethereality and lightness and speed of their nature. For which reason, Gabriel descends fleet; not that the wings are part of the bodiless power, but that he descends from realms on high and returns to his abode whence he was sent.¹⁸

In Byzantine art, wings became an established and comprehensive distinguishing sign of the offices and nature of angelic beings—and, rarely, of other beings as well, Christ, for instance, or John the Baptist in his angelic guise.¹⁹ In the case of the angels, however, the oc-

18. In Isaiham dominum (Is. 6:1), homiliae 1–6, II, PG 56:137. And, also, Ad eos qui scandalizati, III, PG 52:484, “Therefore when you see the seraphim flying around that exalted and well-fitted throne, their sight walled round by the projection of their wings, hiding their feet, backs and faces, and sending forth fearfully strong cries, do not think wings and feet, and that they are winged. For these are invisible powers. But [it is] on account of the unapproachability of their images, and the incomprehensibility of sitting near an actual throne. For indeed he is incomprehensible and unapproachable to them also, and yet he too condescended.”

19. Christ represented as an angel is a rare iconography based on Isaiah 9:6, “For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given . . . and his name shall be called the Angel of the Great Counsel (Μεγάλης Βουλῆς Ἄγγελος), Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace.” Christ in this guise is depicted winged, and unbearded, but with cross-nimbus or in a mandorla, thereby differentiating him from the heavenly host proper. On this iconography, see S. Der Nersessian, “Note sur quelques images se rattachant au thème du Christ-ange,” CA 13(1962):209–16; J. Meyendorff, “Iconographie de la Sagesse divine dans la tradition byzantine,” CA 10(1959):269, and also his “Wisdom–Sophia: Contrasting Approaches to a Complex Theme,” DOP 41(1987):391–401; and D.I. Pallas, “Ὁ Χριστός ὡς ἡ θεία Σοφία. Ἡ Εἰκονογραφικὴ Περιπέτεια μιᾶς θεολογικῆς Ἐννοῦᾶς,” DChAE 15(1989–1990):127ff., 137ff.

The first extant representation of the winged John the Baptist is found at the church of Sv. Ahilije in Arlije from ca. 1296 (G. Millet, La peinture du moyen âge en Yougoslavie (Serbie, Macédonie et Monténégro), 4 vols. [Paris, 1954–1969] II: pl. 87.1; and RBK III:623ff.). The iconography may very well predate this representation, as Lossky points out instances of seventh-/eighth-century commentary on the angelic nature of John the Baptist. See L. Ouspensky and W. Lossky, The Meaning of the Icons (Boston, 1952) 108. The iconography has been examined by J. Lafontaine-Dosogne, “Une icône d’Angélos au Musée de Malines et l’iconographie du St Jean-Baptiste ailé,” Bulletin de Musées Royaux d’Art et d’Histoire 48(1976):121–44, and M. Bussagli, “Il Precursore. Giovanni l’angelo, martire della luce,” Abstracta 27(1988):23–29.

Rarely, the Virgin Mary may be depicted winged also, but this is generally late and developed perhaps under the influence of the iconography of the winged Christ; see RBK III:108. Furthermore, the Angeloi family in the Palaiologan period depicted themselves with wings on coins as a kind of heraldic emblem, and also perhaps to invoke angelic protection; see T. Bertelè, L’imperatore alato nella numismatica bizantina (Rome, 1951) 45ff.

Figure 3. Sarigüzél sarcophagus, Archaeological Museum, Istanbul (#5408), late fourth century. Photo: Istanbul Archaeological Museum.

casional need to distinguish these beings iconographically from humanity, including Christ incarnate, was important for the creation of angels' iconography. Angelic beings are distinct from, and servile to, Christ, and they do not participate in human nature. Consequently, the winged, anthropomorphic form became a unique sign for the innumerable, invisible entities that mediate between heaven and earth at God's behest.

The iconographic formulae used to depict angelic beings were derived from pagan models. An important example of this derivation is the late fourth-century Sarigüzél sarcophagus in the Archaeological Museum in Istanbul (fig. 3). It shows both the dependence of Christian angels on pagan figures, in particular winged victories, and also the distinctions between the Christian and pagan beings.²⁰ On the Sarigüzél sarcophagus, two flying male angels, clad in tunic and pal-lium, bear a wreath containing Christ's monogram ("XP"). The pagan iconography of two horizontal winged beings holding a wreath, medallion or inscribed plaque clearly motivated the disposition of the angels on the Sarigüzél sarcophagus. For instance, on a third-century sarcophagus from the via Aurelia Antica now in the Palazzo dei Conservatori, Rome, two winged female figures hover horizontally and hold a medallion between them in a manner common in pagan funerary art.²¹

20. See N. Firatli, La sculpture byzantine figurée au Musée Archéologique d'Istanbul (Paris, 1990) no. 81.

Nevertheless, individual elements used in depictions of Christian angels belie any generalizations about unmediated transmission of iconography from pagan to Christian art.²² Pagan figures, such as nikes and personifications, are invariably female; Christian angels, male. In Greek, “ho angelos” (ὁ ἄγγελος) is masculine in gender, a distinction always followed in iconography; hence the distinction in dress. The angels on the Sarigüzel sarcophagus wear tunic and pallium, while nikes wear the female peplos, and, in other cases, the chiton, occasionally with one breast exposed.²³

Gender and dress, therefore, constitute the essential identifying features for nike and angel, and the distinctions of nature and function are nowhere more evident than on monuments with both figures. The ivory leaf from the late fifth-/early sixth-century Barberini diptych (Louvre, Paris) shows a female, chiton-clad victory accompanying the emperor; in the register above, two male winged figures wearing tunic and pallium bear aloft a medallion containing the unbearded Christ (fig. 4).²⁴

The pagan iconography provided some of the meaning of the Christian iconography of victory proclaiming angels. The pagan nikes signal worldly acclaim and, in such contexts as the sarcophagus from the via Aurelia Antica, laud the achievements of the

21. See Berefelt, A Study on the Winged Angel, fig. 15.

22. For instance, O. Wulff, Altchristliche und byzantinische Kunst (Munich, 1914) 136, A. C. M. Beck, Genien und Niken als Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst (Giessen, 1936), and E. Panofsky, Tomb Sculpture. Its Changing Aspects from Ancient Egypt to Bernini, ed. H. W. Janson (London, 1964) 43–44: “Victories could become angels without changing in appearance.”

23. G. Stuhlfauth, Die Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst (Freiburg, 1897) 242ff.; K. Felis, “Die Niken und die Engel in altchristlicher Kunst,” RQ 26(1912):3–25; and see Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, 63ff. and 142ff.

24. See R. Delbrueck, Die Consulardiptychen und verwandte Denkmäler, 2 vols. (Berlin and Leipzig, 1929) I:188ff., II: pl. 48, and F. de’ Maffei, “Tradizione ed innovazione nei ditici eburnei: Giuliano, Pulcheria, Giustiniano,” Rivista degli Studi Orientali 40(1986):129ff. Pallados, writing ca. 400, implies a self-conscious, artistic coexistence for angels and nikes when he describes some painted, Christian nikes. See The Greek Anthology, ed. W. R. Paton, 5 vols. (London, 1927), V:282.

Figure 4. Barberini Diptych, Louvre, Paris, sixth century. Photo: Musée du Louvre.

deceased. In distinction, the Christian iconography attempted to demonstrate the universal claims of that faith. Winged angels demonstrate the metaphysical dimension of Christianity and, on the Sarigüzöl sarcophagus, its victory over death. The angels are the otherworldly heralds of the triumph of Christ throughout the universe and are the celestial counterparts to the saints on the end panels of that sarcophagus.

Other pagan personifications besides nikes played a role in the development of the iconography of Christian angels. A common iconographic feature to mark creatures that occupied the intermediate zone between the heavens and earth, wings were attributes of numerous personifications, such as winds, psychopompic figures, souls and astronomical symbols. Christian art assimilated this widespread motif to denote angels' immaterial and superhuman nature.²⁵ For example, set within a swirling carpet of fruits, plants and birds, four angels hold aloft a medallion containing the Lamb of God in the mosaic of the chancel vault of San Vitale (consecrated 548).²⁶ Although distinguished by gender and dress, the angels owe their disposition and activity to representations of seasons in late Roman art. For example, winged, female personifications of seasons are depicted in the Late Antique period in mosaics from Daphne, near Antioch, (fig. 5) and Halicarnassus.²⁷ These personifications of seasons, with

25. On this question of pagan winged beings generally, see the studies of Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, and "Gli angeli e i venti: considerazioni sul simbolismo aereo delle ali angeliche," Arte medievale 5(1991):107ff. Even birds may have influenced the iconography of the angels; and, in fact, bird-footed angels on a Palaiologan icon (#157) in the Byzantine Museum, Athens, show that an iconographic assimilation of birds and angels was at least possible. See M. G. Soteriou, "Ἀμιπρόσωπος εἰκὼν τοῦ Βυζαντινοῦ Μουσείου Ἀθηνῶν ἐκ τοῦ Ἡπειροῦ," DChAE 4(1959):137, fig. 54.

26. See H. Maguire, Earth and Ocean. The Terrestrial World in Early Byzantine Art (University Park and London, 1987) 76ff.

27. W. R. Lethaby, "The Painted Book of Genesis in the British Museum," Archaeological Journal 69(1912):94, cites a mosaic of the four seasons from Halicarnassus in the British Museum that shows winged female figures wearing tunics; see R. P. Hinks, Catalogue of the Greek, Etruscan and Roman Paintings and Mosaics in the British Museum (London, 1933) 127ff. (#51 c-d). And for the fourth-century mosaic from Daphne, now in the Louvre, see A. Grabar, Early Christian Art. From the Rise of Christianity to the Death of Theodosius, trans. S. Gilbert and J. Emmons (New York, 1968) fig. 163. Seasons were also depicted as males in pagan art; on an early third-century sarcophagus (Landgrafmuseum, Cassel), and on a sarcophagus dating ca. 300–320 (Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.), the seasons are winged nude males. See, respectively, J. Godwin, Mystery Religions in the Ancient World, San Francisco, 1981, fig. 100, and G. M. A. Hanfmann, The Season Sarcophagus in Dumbarton Oaks, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1951). Seasons became a significant element in Roman imperial art in the second century, when they were depicted as young males below the female Victories in the spandrels of the triumphal arch of Trajan at Benevento (114–18); see D. Kleiner, Roman Sculpture (New Haven and London, 1992) figs. 188, 189, and Hanfmann, The Season Sarcophagus, I:171ff. Wings are found subsequently on personifications of seasons in the second century for the first time; Hanfmann, The Season Sarcophagus, I:136. And since seasons are also found on sarcophagi from the second century on, an assimilation of arms raised to hold a medallion, clearly influenced the handling of the angels in the chancel vault at San Vitale. Based on this existing iconography, the angels within this area of the church form part of the nude male figures with the winged and clothed female victories, such as is found on Trajan's arch, may well have resulted in the Late Antique examples of personifications of time found at Aphrodisias, Halicarnassus and ultimately in the Cotton Genesis.

Figure 5. Mosaic of the Seasons, detail of Personification of Spring, from Daphne near Antioch, Louvre, Paris, early fourth century. Photo: Musée du Louvre.

the mosaic program in the sanctuary, the rule of Christ over the entire earth.

The dependence of the iconography of Christian angels on pagan models is complex, and certain pagan models maintained their identities in Christian art and did not influence the angels' iconography in any simple or direct manner. For example, the late fifth-century Cotton Genesis includes representations of both personifications and angels. Dress and gender distinguish the personifications of the days in the creation pages from the angels in such narrative scenes as Abraham entertaining the three angels.²⁸ The former are female and wear garlands in their hair and high girdled chitons that leave their arms bare; the angels in the Philoxenia, on the other hand, are male and wear purple and gold chlamys with a silver tablion over a white tunic.

Yet the identity of these winged figures in the creation pages is still debated by scholars. The figures are often called angels by scholars, despite the clear iconographic distinctions the illuminator made between the figures in the creation pages and in the narrative scenes; for this reason, it is useful to examine the literature on these figures to see the reasoning behind their designation as angels. In 1959, Marie-Thérèse D'Alverny published an article in which she examined the exegetical history of angels in creation, and discerned an affinity between the commentary of Augustine (354–430) on Genesis and the representations of the winged figures in the creation pages of the Cotton Genesis.²⁹ Augustine stated that the creation of light was also the moment of creation for the angels, and so the angels are intellectual creatures, days of creation in his view, who witness and glorify the creations of God. From this exegesis, D'Alverny hypothesized that the winged figures in the Cotton Genesis illuminations,

28. See K. Weitzmann and H. L. Kessler, The Cotton Genesis. British Museum Codex Cotton Otho B. VI (Princeton, 1986) 40, 48 (creation pages), 79–80 (Abraham).

Angels are depicted as men in the scene of Jacob's Dream in the third-century fresco in the synagogue at Dura Europos; as in the Cotton Genesis, the psyches are kept distinct from the angels iconographically as they are depicted as small winged females. See K. Weitzmann and H. L. Kessler, The Frescoes of the Dura Europos Synagogue and Christian Art (Washington, D.C., 1990) 17ff., fig. 10, and 135ff., fig. 178, respectively.

29. M.-Th. D'Alverny, "Les anges et les jours," CA 9(1957):271–300.

who increase in number according to the day of creation, find a direct parallel in this unique exegesis of Genesis by Augustine.³⁰ For this reason, she called them angels.

D'Alverny made an exhaustive survey of the textual tradition of creation and angels, but neglected to specify the iconographic precedents for the winged beings in the creation pages. Furthermore, she accepted the traditional provenance of the Cotton Genesis at Alexandria, and so ran aground on the relation of Augustinian exegesis to a Greek manuscript manufactured in Egypt. Maria Marini Clarelli has offered an hypothesis that attempts to reconcile this provenance with an exegetical tradition.³¹ She proposed that the winged females are angels assimilated to the iconography of pagan psyches; psyches in this view were a fundamental influence on the development of angels' iconography. The winged figures in these illustrations of the Cotton Genesis are, for this reason, depicted wearing chitons, unlike the standard angelic dress of dalmatian and pal-lium, in order to state iconographically the connection between soul and angel.³² However, psyches have butterfly wings in pagan iconography, and the winged figures in the Cotton Genesis creation pages have small sickle-shaped wings; the iconographic parallel is not, therefore, convincing.³³

30. References in D'Alverny, "Les anges et les jours," 273ff.

31. See M.V. Marini Clarelli, "I giorni della creazione nel 'Genesi Cotton,'" OCP 50(1984):65–93; and Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, 72ff.

32. Marini Clarelli, "I giorni della creazione nel 'Genesi Cotton,'" 83ff. She attributed this assimilation to exegesis current at Alexandria in the early Christian period, particularly that of Philo (ca. 20 B.C.E.–ca. 50 C.E.) and Clement (ca. 150–ca. 215). According to the exegesis of Clement of Alexandria, the souls of the just participate in a journey of progressive refinement that leads ultimately to an essential assimilation with the seven first-created angels.

33. An apparent strength of Marini Clarelli's hypothesis is a better contextualization of the manuscript in Alexandria, but Martin Büchsel has recently examined further the Augustinian exegesis on creation with regard to the Cotton Genesis. See M. Büchsel, "Die Schöpfungsmosaiken von San Marco. Die Ikonographie der Erschaffung des Menschens in der frühchristlichen Kunst," Städte-Jahrbuch n.s. 13(1991):29–80. Büchsel discerned elements in the creation cycle in the thirteenth-century mosaic program of San Marco, Venice, which is derived from the Cotton Genesis, that are found only in the work of Augustine; this extensive examination advances further the hypothesis of a connection between the Cotton Genesis and Augustine. He also proposed a provenance for the manuscript at Rome, thus taking away an important underpinning of Marini Clarelli's argument and adding strength to the original connection made between Augustine and the Cotton Genesis by D'Alverny. However, the problem of a Greek manuscript produced at Rome but with palaeographic relations to Alexandria (as Büchsel admits) is not dissipated by Büchsel’s hypothesis that the manuscript was a gift from Leo the Great (d. 461) to a Byzantine emperor. The argument for Alexandrian origin, on palaeographic and iconographic grounds, is still the most compelling for this manuscript. See H. L. Kessler, Studies in Pictorial Narrative (London, 1994) 552.

While the manuscript was likely produced in Egypt, either at Alexandria or at Antinoë, the exegetical sources Marini Clarelli adduces have no discernible impact on the invention of the creation day pages.³⁴ Moreover, the iconographic parallels between pagan personifications of days and the winged figures in the creation pages are the most compelling. For example, a panel from a first-century (?) frieze in the north portico of the imperial Sebasteion at Aphrodisias in Asia Minor depicts a personification of Day (Ἡμέρα). The panel shows a woman clad in a high girdled chiton in a manner similar to the winged figures in the creation day pages of the Cotton Genesis.³⁵ The dress, wings and gender of these personifications show the best precedents for the winged figures in the creation day pages of the Cotton Genesis.³⁶ As the Cotton Genesis has other instances of classical borrowings, the most likely solution to the puzzle of the so-called “angels” is the simplest; pagan personifications of time were included to indicate the increase in days of creation as outlined in Genesis.³⁷

34. See Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 30–31, who contend that palaeographic, stylistic and iconographic evidence points to either of these major Egyptian centers.

35. See K. T. Erim, Aphrodisias. Ein Führer durch die antike Stadt und das Museum, trans. E. Alföldi-Rosenbaum (Istanbul, 1990) fig. 90; and also his Aphrodisias. City of Venus-Aphrodite (New York and London, 1986) fig. p. 122; and R. R. Smith, “Myth and Allegory in the Sebasteion,” Aphrodisias Papers. Recent Work on Architecture and Sculpture, ed. C. Rouché and K. T. Erim (Ann Arbor, 1990) 89–92. On the iconography of Day, see Lexicon iconographicum mythologiae classicae (Zurich and Munich, 1981–) III, 1:774 (#276, #282), 781 (#299).

36. See K. Weitzmann, “Observations on the Cotton Genesis Fragments,” in Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. K. Weitzmann et al. (Princeton, 1955) 127, in which he played down the possibility of the personification of day affecting the manuscript; in “The Genesis Mosaics of San Marco and the Cotton Genesis Miniatures,” in O. Demus, The Mosaics of San Marco. Part 2: The Thirteenth Century. Volume One: Text (Chicago and London, 1984) 109, Weitzmann entertained Ἡμέρα as the more likely influence.

37. On other classical borrowings in the Cotton Genesis, see Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 38ff.

The figures in the creation pages of the Cotton Genesis are plainly different from the angels in the other illustrations of the manuscript, and the differences in identities signal to the viewer that a visual gloss is being made on the creation passages. The winged figures in the creation pages allow an indication of time, thereby revealing an ability on the part of the illuminator to express certain Christian concerns through a pagan iconography. Pagan personifications of time were not direct models for the iconography of angels since figures are differentiated in function and appearance in the Cotton Genesis. The distinctions used reveal that while the iconography of angels owed some debts to pagan models as at San Vitale, Christian painters also perceived differences in these figures and maintained these differences for specific narrative ends.³⁸

Despite the clear iconographic parallels between winged pagan beings and Christian angels, some scholars have sought the origins of the winged angel in a purely Christian context independent of pagan inspiration. In support of this opinion, Georg Stuhlfauth adduced as an early example a fifth-century ivory (Castello Sforzesco, Milan), which depicts a winged man and bull, symbols of the evangelists, hovering above an unwinged angel at the tomb of Christ (fig. 6).³⁹ He also cited the apse mosaic at Sta. Pudenziana, Rome, (401–417) in which evangelist symbols hover in the sky above Christ seated amongst his disciples. These two monuments were his primary pieces of evidence for the contention that the Christian iconography of winged angels was dependent on the evangelist symbol of the winged man.⁴⁰ However, chronology makes it difficult to support an

38. Hanfmann, The Season Sarcophagus, I:195ff., believed that little evidence existed for a true iconographic lineage from seasons to angels: “At most, we might allow that the tendency to conceive natural forces as angels and daimones, coupled with the use of pagan types of personifications for the visual rendering of these concepts, led to an art in which some of the long-winged Seasons have a generic resemblance to the Christian angels.”

39. Grabar, The Golden Age of Justinian, fig. 331, and Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, pl. 60 (#111).

40. Stuhlfauth, Die Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst, 244. The tetramorph cherubim of Ezekiel and Revelation initiated typological interpretation of the Gospels and Evangelists among Christian theologians. This symbolic affiliation of tetramorph and Gospels began as early as the second century; for instance, Irenaeus (ca. 130–ca. 200) wrote: “For the cherubim have four faces, and their faces are the images of the dispensation of the Son of

Figure 6. The Tomb of Christ, upper register — Soldiers Asleep at the Tomb; lower register — Marys and Angel at Tomb. Ivory, Castello Sforzesco, Milan, fifth century. Photo: Foto Marburg/ Art Resource, N.Y.

independent development of this iconography since these earliest monuments are later than the fourth-century appearance of winged angels.⁴¹

Given the fragmentary quality of the archaeological record for this period, the hypothesis of a Christian invention of the iconography of the winged angel cannot be dismissed out of hand. Furthermore, scripture does provide the material for an association of man and wings, for instance in Ezekiel (1:5–6) and Revelation (4:7–8), and early exegetical identification of tetramorph and evangelists suggests—though by no means proves—an equally early appearance in art. Scripture mentions wings and flight at Exodus 25:20, Daniel 9:21, Revelation 14:6, for instance, and descriptions elsewhere make it clear that wings were means for mobility for the cherubim and seraphim. Wings were also symbols of God's unapproachability. For instance, Isaiah's seraphim use two of their wings for flying, and the other two pairs to cover their face and feet (Is. 6:1–3). And third- and fourth-century exegesis by theologians such as Tertullian (ca. 160–ca. 240)⁴² and Chrysostom makes it clear that Christians viewed and discussed wings as symbols of the

God. The one like the lion indicates the efficacious, royal and authoritative nature. The one like the calf presents the sacerdotal and priestly nature. The manlike form depicts the incarnation, and the one like the eagle represents the visitation of the Holy Spirit." Trans. R. S. Nelson, The Iconography of the Prefaces in Byzantine Gospels (New York, 1980) 6. See also O. Wulff, Cherubim, Throne und Seraphim. Ikonographie der ersten Engelshierarchie in der christlichen Kunst (Altenburg, 1894) 8ff., 37ff.; M. de Grooth and P. van Moorsel, "The Lion, the Calf, the Man and the Eagle in Early Christian and Coptic Art," Bulletin Antiecke Beschaving 52/3(1977/8):233–45; M. Werner, "On the Origin of Zoanthropomorphic Evangelist Symbols: The Early Christian Background," Studies in Iconography 10(1984–1986): 1–35, and also "On the Origin of Zoanthropomorphic Evangelist Symbols: The Early Medieval and Later Coptic, Nubian, Ethiopian and Latin Evidence," ibid. 13(1989–1990): 1–47; and D. Kinney, "The Apocalypse in Early Christian Monumental Decoration," in The Apocalypse in the Middle Ages, ed. R. K. Emerson and B. McGinn (Ithaca and London, 1992) 200–16.

41. See Kinney, "The Apocalypse in Early Christian Monumental Decoration," 208ff.

42. Apologeticum adversus gentes pro Christianis, XXII, 8, in Tertulliani Opera. Pars I. Opera Catholica, Adversus Marcionem. Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina, vol. 1, ed. E. Dekkers (Turnhout, 1954) 129: "Every spirit is winged, both angels and demons. In this way, in a moment they are everywhere: all the world is for them one place; what is taking place everywhere is as easy for them to know as to tell. It is thought that their velocity is divine, because their substance is not known."

angels' transcendental nature.⁴³ These texts reveal that Christians were able to provide their own meanings to angels' wings, and they must have encouraged the manipulation of the iconography of pagan winged beings and made such an iconography acceptable in Christian contexts. In the final analysis, the evidence for a Christian invention of the winged angels is simply too scanty and the influence of pagan iconography too manifest for pagan art to be discounted as the primary model for angels.

Although the debt that Christian iconography owed pagan models is clear, Christian painters and mosaicists were able to judge the appropriateness of depictions of winged figures and did not simply absorb an existing iconography. The addition or omission of wings in depictions of angels in Christian art likewise reveals a symbolic quality of wings and the ability of these appendages to signal terrestrial or celestial modes or sites of activity. Anthropomorphic figures, winged or unwinged, could help express orthodox dogma, as well as Christian interpretations of scripture not overt in Hebrew scripture itself.

Christian painters and mosaicists sometimes contended with the problems of apprehension and description of angels in art, and in this way paralleled the attempts of theologians who were concerned with deciphering the meanings behind the obscure appearances of angels in scripture, particularly in the Hebrew Testament. The appearance of the angels of the Lord as "men" to Abraham (Gen. 18) has an important iconographic history from this point of view. Ambiguities present in the account are difficult to reconcile; within the same chapter, the angels are described as "men," "he" and the "Lord." The Greek fathers offered various interpretations of the puzzling appearance of the angels to Abraham at Mamre: simply as three angels, Christ and two angels, or as the Trinity itself.⁴⁴

43. See also Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, 57ff.; Stuhlfauth, Die Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst, 51ff.; Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. Cabrol and H. Leclercq (Paris, 1924–) I, 2:2080ff.; and the Martyrium Bartholomaei in Acta apostolorum apocrypha, ed. C. Tischendorf (Leipzig, 1861) 257.

44. See, for instance, Justin Martyr (ca. 100–ca. 165), Dialogus cum Tryphone Iudaeo, 59, J. Archimbault, ed., Justin. Dialogue avec Tryphon, 2 vols. (Paris, 1909) 276, J. Goodspeed, Die ältesten Apologeten (Göttingen, 1915; rp. New York, 1950) 164; Athanasius (ca. 296–373), Orationes contra Arianos, PG 26:352AB; and Procopius of Gaza (ca. 475–ca. 538), Commen-

Painters and mosaicists also offered various visual interpretations of the true meaning behind this Old Testament epiphany. The first extant example of a representation of the epiphany to Abraham, a fresco in the fourth-century via Latina Catacomb in Rome, simply depicts three young men approaching the seated Abraham.⁴⁵ The painter did not overtly signal the identity of the three men by iconography or inscription. The angels are unwinged, in keeping with the earthly nature of their manifestation to Abraham. The viewer can interpret the fresco literally as describing in a direct fashion the three men who appeared to Abraham; on the other hand, the viewer can infer the spiritual nature of the visitors in the fresco through knowledge of scripture.

In contrast to this literal representation of the three men of the scriptural passage, the mosaicist at Sta. Maria Maggiore, Rome, (ca. 435) offered a more complicated visual exegesis. The middle angel appears in a transparent aureole of light that overlaps and excludes the two flanking angels. By singling out one figure as more powerful and divine than his companions, the mosaicist has signified a Christological interpretation of this epiphany.⁴⁶ The appearance of the “men” to Abraham and Sarah at Mamre is also a typology of the Annunciation to the Virgin. Traditionally, the scene in the upper left-hand portion of the arch mosaic has been interpreted as an Annunciation to the Virgin; in this scene, an angel descends from the sky to announce the news to an enthroned Mary. The angels flanking the Virgin and the angel descending are all shown winged, in distinction to the angels in the Philoxenia scene who are depicted without wings. In providing wings to the angels with the Virgin, the tarii in Genesim, XVIII, PG 87/1:364AB. These various interpretations have been examined more broadly by L. Thunberg, “Early Christian Interpretations of the Three Angels in Gen. 18,” Studia Patristica 8(1966):560–70.

45. See A. Ferrua, La pittura della nuova Catacomba di via Latina, Vatican City, 1960, fig. 24.

46. See C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della Basilica S. Maria Maggiore (Turin, 1956) pl. XV, O. Perler, “Les théophanies dans les mosaïques de Sainte-Marie-Majeure à Rome,” RivAC 50(1974):281ff., B. Brenk, Die frühchristliche Mosaiken in S. Maria Maggiore zu Rom (Wiesbaden, 1975) 108ff., and also W. Loerke, “Observations on the Representation of Doxa in the Mosaics of S. Maria Maggiore, Rome, and St. Catherine’s, Sinai,” Gesta 20(1981):18ff.

mosaicist signifies the overtly spiritual nature of this Annunciation and the eternal setting of the Virgin's court. In contrast, the wingless angels before Abraham and Sarah literally signal the terrestrial quality of that epiphany; the singling out of the central angel reveals that the latent meaning of this appearance is believed to lie in its prophecy of the coming of Christ.⁴⁷

Unlike the mosaicist of the Philoxenia at Sta. Maria Maggiore, the illustrator of the Cotton Genesis chose to depict the angels in the same scene with wings.⁴⁸ The wings, not mentioned in the account, signal to the viewer the identity of Abraham's visitors; believing his visitors to be simply three strangers, Abraham has not yet apprehended that they are angels. Again unlike the case at Sta. Maria Maggiore, the illuminator did not distinguish the angels one from another, and may have wished to express the Trinitarian symbolism often given the event by Christians. Indeed, this same typological interpretation determined other aspects of the manuscript's iconographic program, such as the portrayal of Christ as Logos in the creation pages; in orthodox belief, Christ is co-eternal and consubstantial with God and the Holy Spirit, and by showing Christ at creation, the illuminator stressed this crucial aspect of Trinitarian dogma.⁴⁹

These monuments do not trace a development of an iconography that becomes increasingly settled over the first centuries of Christian art. For example, the sixth-century mosaic of the Philoxenia at San Vitale, Ravenna, also depicts the angels as young, wingless men (fig. 7). The angels are represented seated at table and they indicate the repast Abraham has gathered. Coupled in the same lunette with a depiction of the sacrifice of Isaac, and placed opposite a mosaic of the sacrifices of Abel and Melchizedek, the depiction of the three

47. See S. Spain, "'The Promised Blessing': The Iconography of the Mosaics of S. Maria Maggiore," ArtB 61(1979):518–40, especially 537ff.

48. Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 79–80.

49. See Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 37, and on the Trinitarian issues of the fourth and fifth centuries and art, see C. von Schönborn, L'icône du Christ. Fondements théologiques élaborées entre le Ier et le IIer Concile de Nicée (325–787) (Fribourg, 1976) 22ff.

Figure 7. Philoxenia of Abraham, Mosaic, S. Vitale, Ravenna, ca. 540. Photo: Alinari / Art Resource, N.Y.

men from heaven forms part of a program of eucharistic typology in the sanctuary of the church.⁵⁰

As these examples show, Christian painters and mosaicists determined the appropriateness of wings to represent the epiphany made to Abraham according to the context: they often manipulated iconographic elements in order to express specific interpretations of scriptural passages.⁵¹ In the context of the apse program at San Vitale, God's universal dominion is stated; and the attendance of spiritual servants, their spirituality and distinction from human nature signaled by their wings, is a sign of the all-embracing nature of that dominion. And above the apse, the winged angels on the arch further demonstrate the cosmic acclamation of Christ's rule. While these angels derive their wings and horizontal disposition from pagan triumphal imagery, the winged angels in the chancel vault form part of the program's symbolism of the extent of Christ's mastery over the earth; their wings and unworldly appearance symbolize the ubiquity of Christ's dominion. However, the angels in the Philoxenia scene are distinct from the eternal and metaphysical nature of these angels in the chancel vault, apse and on the principal arch. In contrast, they were depicted without wings, and this distinction provides the viewer with a clue as to the temporal nature of that epiphany. Possi-

50. RBK I:18, and O. von Simson, Sacred Fortress. Byzantine Art and Statecraft in Ravenna, 2d ed. (Chicago, 1976) 25. On the question of this scene's relation to the anti-Arian beliefs of the Byzantine conquerors, see R. Sörries, Die Bilder der Orthodoxen im Kampf gegen den Arianismus. Eine Apologie der orthodoxen Christologie und Trinitätslehre gegenüber der arianischen Häresie dargestellt an den ravenattischen Mosaiken und Bildern des 6. Jahrhunderts (Bern, 1983) 161ff. And on the iconography of the Trinity, see J. Engemann, "Zu den Dreifaltigkeit darstellungen der frühchristlichen Kunst: Gab es in 4. Jahrhundert anthropomorphe Trinitätsbilder?" JAC 19(1976):157–72.

51. Similarly, in the sixth-century Vienna Genesis, as well, the illustration of the calling of Abraham depicts a winged angel descending from the sky (fol. 11r), while Jacob wrestles with a wingless angel on another folio (24r). K. Clausberg, Die Wiener Genesis. Eine Kunstwissenschaftliche Bilderbuchgeschichte (Frankfurt am Main, 1984) 13, figs. 44 and 8, respectively.

It ought to be noted that the iconography of wingless angels is found as late as the Palaiologan period, for instance, in an icon of the Virgin and Child in the Museo di San Giorgio degli Greci in Venice, in which a group of wingless angels clusters in the upper left corner. See N. V. Drandakes, "Παλαιολόγειος εικὼν Βρεφοκρατούσης τοῦ εἰς Βενετίου Ἑλληνικοῦ ναοῦ, Θεολογία 28(1957):244, figs. 1, 2 and 5.

bly as foreshadowings of the Trinity and the eucharistic sacrifice, the Philoxenia is depicted literally. The scene's latent meanings are not indicated by the iconographic attributes of the other angels' transcendental guise. The program at San Vitale demonstrates that different modes of presentation of angels can describe their changeable nature and areas of activity.

The iconography of the winged youth, used in these cases just discussed to symbolize otherworldly nature and activity, was used for other angelic beings as well. Scripture mentions other angelic creatures besides archangels and angels, and these led to the depiction of other ranks of an angelic hierarchy.⁵² Yet, because of the lack of full descriptions in scripture of the members of this hierarchy, the iconography of the winged youth was employed to represent any angelic being. The use of this symbolic iconography must have originated at an early point in the creation of a Christian iconography of angels. Methodius of Olympus (d. ca. 311) provided a precedent for extant representations in his description of an image figured with "likenesses fashioned from gold of his angels, who are the Principalities and the Powers, [which] we make in honour and faith in him."⁵³ Paralleling Methodius' description, examples of images survive in which the winged youth serves as a sign for different angelic orders. A seventh-century Constantinopolitan cameo (#119) from the collection of Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C., bears the inscription "ΕΞΟΥΧΙΕ" ("Powers"), and depicts two winged men (fig. 8).⁵⁴

52. See Colossians 1:16 and Ephesians 1:21. Scripture mentions nine orders in total: seraphim (Is. 6), cherubim (Gen. 3:24, Ex. 25:22), thrones (Col. 1:16), virtues (Eph. 1:21), dominations, principalities, powers (Eph. 1:21, Col. 1:16), archangels (1 Thess. 4:16, Jude 9), angels (Gen. 16:7, for example).

53. Preserved in the writings of John of Damascus, Orationes de imaginibus tres, III, 138, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III Contra imaginum calumniatores orationes tres, PTS vol. 17, ed. P.B. Kotter (Berlin, 1975) 200.

54. M. C. Ross, Catalogue of the Byzantine and Early Mediaeval Antiquities in the Dumbarton Oaks Collection. Volume One. Metalwork, Ceramics, Glass, Glyptics, Painting (Washington, D.C., 1962) 98–99, fig. 57. This iconography continues to be used throughout the Byzantine period. For example, among the fifteenth-century frescoes of the church of the Metropolitan at Mistra, the angelic orders are collectively described by winged men, that is, the angel type; see G. Millet, Monuments byzantins de Mistra (Paris, 1910) pl. 64.1.

Figure 8. Two winged men
inscribed “ΕΞΟΥCΙΕ” (“Powers”), Constantinopolitan
cameo, Dumbarton Oaks,
Washington, D.C., seventh
century. Photo: Dumbarton
Oaks, Washington, D.C.

Faced with a lack of scriptural description—as only the existence of this rank is mentioned—the engraver fell back on this iconography of the winged man; skirting any iconographic complexity or difficulty, the winged man stands in as a generic type.

The mosaics in the bema arch of the destroyed church of the Dormition at Nicaea (Iznik) were an example of this generic iconography of the winged youth within a full-scale program. These original mosaics of the angels have been dated to the late sixth and seventh centuries.⁵⁵ Although the inscriptions state that the figures represented different orders of the angelic hierarchy, the Principalities, Virtues, Dominations and Powers, mentioned together at

55. Fernanda de' Maffei hypothesized that the angelic powers belonged to a different mosaic phase than the Virgin and Child and that they date stylistically to the late sixth century. For this dating, she sought support in the stylistic analysis of G. de Francovich, “I mosaici del bema della chiesa della Dormizione di Nicaea,” in Scritti di storia dell'arte in onore di Lionello Venturi, 2 vols. (Rome, 1956) I: 3–27. She conjectured that the mosaics had been covered during Iconoclasm, not erased as is generally thought, and the repair evident is not connected to the restoration of images in 843. See F. de' Maffei, “L'Unigenito consostanziale al Padre nel programma trinitario dei perduti mosaici del bema della Dormizione di Nicaea e il Cristo trasfigurato del Sinai I,” Storia dell'arte 45(1982):91ff., and also her Icona, pittore e arte al Concilio Niceno II (Rome, 1974) 99ff. However, the restorations apparent in the areas around the angels and the replacing of the cross in the apse likely belong to the same phase,

Colossians 1:16, the angelic beings were depicted as identical winged youths wearing the loros and carrying orbs and standards (figs. 9, 10). Scripture is the primary source for revelation of these divine beings but only the existence of the angels, the Principalities, Virtues, Dominations and Powers, are attested in scripture, not any of their individual qualities. Lacking specific scriptural description, the mosaicists repeated the iconographic type, the winged youth. The angels are nominally different from one another but they share the same nature generally, and they are visually indistinguishable from one another.

Other angelic powers are also represented by an anthropomorphic figure with wings, even the cherubim and seraphim for which extensive scriptural descriptions could be drawn upon. Passages describing the Ark of the Covenant and the Solomonic Temple provide information on representations of cherubim (for example, Ex. 37:7–9, I Kings 6:23–28, Ez. 41:18–20); and the prophets' visions supplied long, if obscure, descriptions of angels. Yet anthropomorphism was used in early Byzantine art to represent these angelic beings in contradiction of scriptural accounts of these angels' appearances. For example, in the sixth-century Vienna Genesis (fol. 2v), a winged man represents the cherubim guarding the gates of paradise with a flaming sword (Gen. 3:24); this winged man diverges from Ezekiel's full description of the cherubim as a six-winged tetramorph (1:4–28, probably post 843, paid for by the otherwise unknown Naukratios, as stated in an inscription between the two angels on the south bema arch.

The precise date of the original foundation by Hyacinthos is not settled. Most scholars prefer the late seventh / early eighth century for the construction of the church and, following this, the mosaics in the apse area. See F.I. Schmit, Die Koimesis-Kirche von Nikaia, das Bauwerk und die Mosaiken (Berlin and Leipzig, 1927), U. Peschlow, "Neue Beobachtungen zur Architektur und Ausstattung der Koimesiskirche in Iznik," Istanbuler Mitteilungen 22(1972):145–87, and C. Barber, "The Koimesis Church, Nicaea: The Limits of Representation on the Eve of Iconoclasm," JöB 41(1991):43–60. However, arguments have been made, through comparisons of sculptural decoration in the church, that the foundation dates to the second half of the sixth century. See C. Barsanti, "Una nota sulle sculture del Tempio di Giacinto nella Chiesa della Dormizione (Koimesis) di Iznik-Nicea," Storia dell'arte 46(1982):210–18, and C. Mango, Byzantine Architecture (London, 1986) 90. Mango has added his voice more recently to the number of scholars who call for a date around 700. See his "Notes d'épigraphie et d'archéologie: Constantinople, Nicée," TM 12(1994):35off.

Figure 9. Angelic Powers, south side, Bema Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea), ninth century. Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

10:12).⁵⁶ And, despite Isaiah's revelation (6:1–3), the seraphim were also depicted as winged men in early representations, for example,

56. This anthropomorphic iconography never entirely disappears; see the thirteenth-century sculpted façade of the Church of Hagia Sophia, Trebizond, where an anthropomorphic cherubim guards paradise. See D. Talbot Rice et al., The Church of Haghia Sophia at Trebizond (Edinburgh, 1968) 48, pl. 17d.

Figure 10. Angelic Powers, north side, Bema Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea), ninth century. Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

on the entrance gate at the fifth-century complex at Alahan in Seleucia in southeast Asia Minor.⁵⁷

57. See Mary Gough, ed., Alahan. An Early Christian Monastery in Southeastern Turkey (Toronto, 1985) 87ff., pl. 20.

Ninth-century examples include the illustration of the appearance of the seraphim as a winged youth to Isaiah in the Vatican “Cosmas Indicopleustes” (Vat. gr. 699, fol. 72v). See

The most exalted members of the hierarchy, the cherubim and seraphim, were most often depicted in Early Christian and Byzantine art in liturgical contexts. Occasionally represented in symbolic form as winged men, despite clear and distinct descriptions in scripture for each creature, cherubim and seraphim also diverge iconographically from scriptural accounts. Christian artists and theologians often used the visions of cherubim and seraphim to express eschatological and cosmological themes. The earliest depiction of the seraphim and the tetramorph cherubim, the fifth-/sixth-century apse mosaic in the church of Hosios David, Thessalonike, conflates the visions of Ezekiel's cherubim (1:4–28, 10:12), Isaiah's seraphim (6:1–3) and the six-winged creatures of Revelation (4:2–10).⁵⁸ Christ appears in a mandorla, supported by the four creatures of Ezekiel and Revelation. The four beasts each have wings with many eyes; yet no fiery wheels are depicted, while the inscription in the scroll held by Christ quotes Isaiah 25:9.⁵⁹ Christa Ihm has called this iconography at Hosios David the liturgical maiestas.⁶⁰

Topographie chrétienne, SC vols. 141, 159, 197, ed. W. Wolska-Conus (Paris, 1968–1973) II:249. See, too, the Reliquary of the True Cross, from Limburg an-der-Lahn, dating in its last reworking to 963, on which the iconography of the four-winged cherubim and the six-winged seraphim applies respectively to the principalities and powers. See J. Rauch, “Die Limburger Staurothek,” Das Münster 8(1955):201ff., especially figs. 5, 16–18, and J.M. Wilm, ibid., 234ff., and H. Wilsdorf, “Zur Staurothek vom Limburg,” BF 18(1992): 197–208. de’ Maffei, “L’Unigenito consustanziale,” 100 n52, cites Gregory of Nyssa on the identification of thrones and powers with seraphim and cherubim (Refutatio confessionis Eunomii, PG 45:556C).

58. See C. Ihm, Die Programme der christlichen Apsismalerei vom vierten Jahrhundert bis zur Mitte des achten Jahrhunderts (Wiesbaden, 1960) 42ff. On the establishment of the Book of Revelation in the eastern Church, see G. Galavaris, The Illustrations of the Prefaces in Byzantine Gospels (Vienna, 1979) 48, especially n49. On Hosios David, see Ihm, Die Programme, 182–84, pl. XIII, 1, and T.F. Mathews, The Clash of Gods. A Reinterpretation of Early Christian Art, rev. ed. (Princeton, 1999) 115ff.

59. The fifth-/seventh-century fresco in the apse niche of Chapel XXVI, Bawit, also reveals elements of each of these three visions; although the depiction conforms generally to Ezekiel's vision, the cherubim have six wings, one face, and many eyes as in Isaiah and Revelation, rather than Ezekiel's four-winged, four-faced creatures with hands and feet. See Ihm, Die Programme, 202–203, pl. XIII, 2. And in the Monastery of Dodo, David-Garedja, Georgia, dating to the seventh/ninth century, two archangels, Michael and Gabriel, flank the enthroned Christ, while two tetramorphs hover underneath. The tetramorphs have four faces and four wings, and they are standing on fiery wheels, referring to Ezekiel, while a Trisagion inscription recalls Isaiah and the liturgy. See Ihm, Die Programme, pl. XIV, 2, and

The Trisagion, the “Holy, holy, holy” chanted by the seraphim in Isaiah (6:3) and Revelation (4:8), influenced the representations of cherubim and seraphim in artistic milieux strongly influenced by liturgical practice.⁶¹ The liturgy also encouraged a certain amount of

A. Alpag0-Novello et al., Art and Architecture in Medieval Georgia, trans. N. Holloway (Louvain-la-Neuve, 1980) 88, figs. 94, 95. And in the crucifixion in the apse of Sta. Maria Antiqua, Rome (705–707), the cherubim and seraphim are identical in that they both have six wings and stand on flaming wheels; see P. Romanelli and P. J. Nordhagen, S. Maria Antiqua (Rome, 1964) pls. 22, 23.

In the period following Iconoclasm, the liturgical maiestas remained popular, particularly in the monastic setting of the churches of Cappadocia. The fresco in the prothesis apse of the New Church at Tokali Kilise, dating from the middle of the tenth century, is typical of this Cappadocian iconography. See A. Wharton Epstein, Tokali Kilise. Tenth-century Metropolitan Art in Byzantine Cappadocia (Washington, D.C., 1986) 68–69, figs. 102, 103. Christ sits enthroned in the middle of the apse, and he is flanked by two pairs of fiery wheels, a seraphim, a cherubim, and two Archangels, Michael and Gabriel. On either side of Christ is an inscription based on the liturgy, “Holy, holy, holy Lord/of Hosts, Heaven and earth are filled with your glory.” The depictions of the seraphim and cherubim generally follow scripture. The seraphim, to Christ’s right, has six eyeless wings, the face of a man in the center of the wings, and hands and feet protruding from the wings; the cherubim has the heads of an ox and a lion to either side, and a man’s head in the middle of four many-eyed wings. Inscriptions above the seraphim and cherubim provide apocalyptic titles for the beasts, also used in the liturgy, “bellowing” (ΒΩΝΤΑ) and “calling” (ΚΕΛΕΤΟΝΤΑ), which are associated with the ox and man figures, respectively.

On the liturgy and the references to the apocalyptic beasts, see F. E. Brightman, “The Historia Mystagoga and Other Greek Commentaries on the Byzantine Liturgy,” JTS 9(1908):248–67, 387–97; G. de Jerphanion, “Les noms des quatre animaux et le commentaire liturgique de Pseudo-Germain,” in his Les voix des monuments. Notes et études d’archéologie chrétienne (Paris, 1930) 250–59; A. Wharton Epstein, “The Problem of Provincialism: Byzantine Monasteries in Cappadocia and Monks in South Italy,” Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 42(1979):39–40; and Galavaris, The Illustrations of the Prefaces in Byzantine Gospels, 86ff.

60. Mathews has raised objections about the imperial connotations of the term maiestas, but the liturgical function is stressed here, not the pagan antecedents of the iconography. See Mathews, The Clash of Gods, 117.

61. André Grabar noted examples, on the other hand, where Christ is enthroned, with the Trisagion printed on the pages of the book he holds; the cherubim and seraphim are not present in these examples. Grabar stresses the importance of theophanic vision, rather than of liturgical texts, in the formation of the iconography of the maiestas. See Martyrium. Recherches sur le culte des reliques et l’art chrétien antique, 2 vols. (Paris, 1943–1946; rp. London, 1972) II:306ff. Yet the number of examples cited above indicate that liturgy also played a fundamental part in the formation of this iconography.

The Trisagion appears to be a very early element in piety and liturgy. See V. Saxer, “Jalons pour servir à l’histoire du culte de l’archange Saint Michel en orient jusqu’à l’iconoclasm,” in Noscere sancta. Miscellanea in memoria di Agostino Amore (Rome, 1985) 362–63; and, more comprehensively, B. D. Sparks, The Sanctus in the Eucharistic Prayer (Cambridge, 1991).

confusion of these two angelic ranks. For example, Christ is addressed in the liturgy:

... for before thee stand thy two living creatures honourable exceedingly, the sixwinged and manyeyed, seraphim and cherubim, with two wings covering their faces by reason of thy godhead which none can gaze on nor comprehend, and with twain covering their feet, with twain also flying...⁶²

The liturgy of John Chrysostom, which mentions “the cherubim, the seraphim, six-winged and many-eyed” (τὰ Χερουβὶμ καὶ τὰ Σεραφὶμ, ἑξαπτέρυγα, πολυόμματα), may also have contributed to the iconographic confusion of seraphim and cherubim, and artists often represented the cherubim and seraphim in identical fashion, with six, many-eyed wings.⁶³

Liturgy, therefore, influenced the development of the Christian iconography of these angelic beings, and furthermore encouraged

62. Translation from F.E. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, Vol. 1 (Oxford, 1896), 175. And see also the Historia ecclesiastica, a liturgical commentary written by the Patriarch Germanus (ca. 634–ca. 733): “You who sit upon the cherubim, manifest yourself to us” (Brightman, “The Historia Mystagogica,” 387).

63. J. Goar, Euchologion sive rituale graecorum (Venice, 1730; rp. Graz, 1960) 61; Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, 385; Wulff, Cherubim, Throne und Seraphim, 19ff.; RBK III:84.

For example, one must look ahead to the early tenth-century chapel (#3) at Güllü Dere, which contains a composite representation in the apse of visions of the seraphim, cherubim and tetramorphs, deriving from Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel and Revelation. The program includes two tetramorphs (ΙΙΟΑΤΩΜΜΑΤΟΝ [sic]), with eye-filled wings, flanking Christ who is enthroned in a mandorla held by the four beasts of Ezekiel and Revelation; two seraphim (ΕΞΑΠΤΕΡΥΤΟΝ) meanwhile give Isaiah and Ezekiel a coal and a book, respectively, to eat. Both of these seraphim have six many-eyed wings. See J. Lafontaine-Dosogne, “Théophanie-visions auxquelles participent les prophètes dans l’art byzantin après la restauration des images,” in Synthronon. Art et archéologie de la fin de l’Antiquité et du Moyen Âge (Paris, 1968) 138ff.; D.I. Pallas, “Eine Differenzierung unter den himmlischen Ordnungen (Ikongraphische Analyse),” BZ 44(1971):55–60; and N. Thierry, Haut moyen-âge en Capadoce. Les églises de la région de Çavuşin (Paris, 1983) 126ff., and pls. 52, 53.

A six-winged tetramorph guards paradise in the ninth-century Paris Gregory; L. Brubaker, Vision and Meaning in Ninth-Century Byzantium. Image as Exegesis in the Homilies of Gregory of Nazianzus (Cambridge, 1999) fig. 10, and also 282–83. This iconography of a tetramorph with an extra pair of wings is not uncommon; see Wulff, Cherubim, Throne und Seraphim, 32ff.

the iconography's dissemination. Neither Pseudo-Dionysius's speculations on the angelic hierarchy nor the increasing interest in the cherubim found in the contra Judaeos literature reveal any direct influence on the iconography of these beings.⁶⁴ Extant representations of cherubim and seraphim betray direct inspiration from liturgical descriptions. Because of this influence, mixing of the iconography of cherubim and seraphim is the rule by the Middle Byzantine period, and differentiation of the angelic beings is often possible only through inscriptions.⁶⁵ The iconography was, in fact, never settled, and this ambiguity indicates that the patrons and artists did not always see the need to distinguish the beings.

In pre-Iconoclastic art, style was a notable expression of iconographic meaning.⁶⁶ The manipulation of style by Christian painters, mosaicists and sculptors has particular interest in this context as style came to be an important means to communicate the difficult nature of angels. If pagan art provided antecedents for the creation of a Christian iconography of angels, it also furnished diverse stylistic modes.⁶⁷ In particular, stylistic analyses show that in the period before Iconoclasm painters and mosaicists used a more naturalistic "classical" style to indicate the distinct qualities of angels.

An examination of the icon of the Virgin and Child flanked by Saints Theodore and George in the Monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai (sixth/seventh century) reveals stylistic distinctions in the de-

64. The influence of the theological work of Pseudo-Dionysius is clearly perceptible in texts that discuss images in the period before Iconoclasm and is equally prevalent throughout the writings of iconophiles. The cherubim, as cited in the contra Judaeos literature, assumed an equally important place in iconophile theory. Both of these topics are treated in chapter 3.

65. For instance, it is unclear in the fourteenth-century mosaics whether the pendentives of the central dome of Hagia Sophia in Istanbul represented seraphim or cherubim. Although these creatures had six wings, neither the number of wings nor even the presence and absence of wings can be relied upon for general identification. On these mosaics, see C. Mango, Materials for the Study of the Mosaics of St. Sophia at Istanbul (Washington, D.C., 1962) 83ff.; and on this issue of confusion, see Wulff, Cherubim, Throne und Seraphim, 26ff., and RBK III:85.

66. See, for instance, Weitzmann/Kessler, The Cotton Genesis, 32ff., and also E. Kitzinger, Byzantine Art in the Making (London, 1977).

67. See O. J. Brendel, Prolegomena to the Study of Roman Art (New Haven and London, 1979) 125ff., on the use of disparate styles within the same monument in Roman art.

piction of angels and humans that communicate the dissimilar natures of these different categories of beings (fig. 11).⁶⁸ Ernst Kitzinger has considered the stylistic treatment of the angels on the icon who stand behind the Virgin's throne and look over their shoulders at the descent of the Holy Spirit. His interpretation stresses the use of "hellenistic" survivals in the handling of the angels, and the rift between angelic and human natures that this hellenistic style expresses.

At times it appears as though a bold, sketchy manner were, so to speak, in the nature of an "iconographic attribute" of angels. An obvious explanation is that it was a means of expressing the fact that they belong to a different order of beings, that they are incorporeal, ἀσώματα. Hellenistic pictorial technique in these cases serves as a means not of actualizing physical, but of accentuating spiritual existence.⁶⁹

68. K. Weitzmann, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Icons. Volume One: From the Sixth to the Tenth Century (Princeton, 1976) 18ff., and pls. IV, V, VI, XLIII, XLIV, XLV, XLVI.

69. Kitzinger, "Byzantine Art in the Period between Justinian and Iconoclasm," in Berichte zum XI. Internationalen Byzantinischen-Kongress, München, 1958 (Munich, 1958) 47. See also his "On Some Icons of the Seventh Century," in Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. K. Weitzmann et al. (Princeton, 1955) 134, on the seventh-century fragment of the head of an angel from Sta. Maria Antiqua, Rome. See also H. Maguire, The Icons of Their Bodies. Saints and Their Images in Byzantium (Princeton, 1996) 70–71.

Andrei Cornea offers a complementary interpretation of the meaning of style in this image. See A. Cornea, "On 'Fiction' and 'Authenticity' in Byzantine Pre-Iconoclastic Painting," Revue roumaine d'histoire de l'art 17(1980):6. Cornea questions the assumption that communicating a sense of life and motion is the aim of the "hellenistic pictorial technique" in the depiction of angels. Cornea proposes two different modes of depiction that he calls "a symbol-image based on fiction" and "a history-image based on truth." The Virgin and Child and the saints are depicted in a frontal, hierarchic manner to indicate their essential historicity; this abstract manner is in direct opposition to the fictional, illusionistic depiction of the angels, which signifies their incomprehensibility. For Cornea, artists used this "hellenistic" manner because, "the naturalistic style could automatically awake in the spectators' minds the stereotypic link, indicating that the image was a fiction lacking a real bodily model, as the statues of gods were, according to the Christians, mere fictions having no anthropomorphic referent they could imitate" (ibid., 7). In other words, the fictional quality of naturalistic depiction of the angels is not an "iconographic attribute" for Cornea, but rather a "classification-index" that warns that any relation to reality is purely coincidental. See also the remarks of Belting, Bild und Kult, 148ff.

Figure 11. Icon of the Virgin and Child, flanked by Saints Theodore and George, Monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai, sixth / seventh century. Reproduced through the courtesy of the Michigan–Princeton–Alexandria Expedition to Mount Sinai.

According to this interpretation, the viewer must make a judgment on the distinct handling of the angels compared to the other figures on this icon, and discern differences in nature from differences in style. The delicate handling of the angels' features and their believable turning, even in the small space allowed, distinguishes the angels from the hieratic figures of the saints; as opposed to these static saints, the central figures of the Virgin and Child in the foreground appear more animated, less frontal, and thus more dynamically alert than the mortal saints to the descending Holy Spirit. Ultimately, analysis reveals that, in this case, the relatively naturalistic depiction of the angels has a paradoxical ability to indicate to the viewer a nature different from that of humanity.

In the hands of painters and mosaicists, style continued throughout the Early and Middle Byzantine periods to be a means of establishing a distinction between human and angelic nature. Two examples of middle Byzantine images reveal that a different style was, in fact, used to represent angels for different ends. For instance, Henry Maguire has contrasted the ninth-century mosaic of the Archangel Gabriel, found in the bema arch of Hagia Sophia, Constantinople, with the Virgin and Child in the apse (figs. 12, 13): "the bodies of the archangels in heaven tended to be rendered as flat and without modeling, because of their lack of materiality."⁷⁰ In the mosaic, the Archangel is set within a gold field that dematerializes his form, and his robes are unmodeled sheets, unrevealing of any substantial form beneath. In contrast, the faces of the Virgin and Child in the apse are naturalistically formed, and they are fashioned three-dimensionally, settled coherently on a substantial throne.

The angels are depicted in an abstract manner to denote the impalpable quality of the heavenly realm; conversely, a more naturalistic style in representations is the complement of angelic activity on earth. An example contemporary with the bema mosaic of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople is a depiction of the epiphany of the seraphim to Isaiah in the Vatican “Cosmas” (fig. 14).⁷¹ In contrast to the stationary, flat seraphim flanking Christ, the human, winged seraphim is clearly occupying a different sphere; the single seraphim strides toward Isaiah in a lively manner, and his torso bends at the waist as his outstretched hand inserts the coal into Isaiah’s mouth. The stylistic distinction between the celestial activities of the seraphim and their rare manifestations on earth is convincingly conveyed by the illusionistic handling of the appearance of the angel before Isaiah, distinct from the seraphim hieratically flanking Christ.

70. "Style and Ideology in Byzantine Imperial Art," Gesta 28(1989):223. The dating of the apse mosaics at Hagia Sophia to the ninth century is not contested; for an alternate view, see N. Oikonomidès, "Some Remarks on the Apse Mosaics of St. Sophia," DOP 39(1985):111–15.

Painters and mosaicists continued to be able to indicate through style the qualities of angels’ nature, as well as their mode of activity. The illustration of Isaiah’s epiphany in the Vatican “Cosmas” is particularly telling because iconography and style work in unison to suggest the earthly and unearthly activities of formless beings. On earth, the seraphim can take on a guise different from their heavenly “form,” and the difference between the seraphim’s anthropomorphism and their many-winged form reveals their fluid formlessness. Iconography can, therefore, distinguish modes of activity in the same illustration, while abstract and naturalistic styles further demonstrate the angels’ different capacities, both attendance in heaven and service on earth.

A more classical modeling can be employed after the ninth century, just the same, to show the earthly movement and work of the angels. Kurt Weitzmann has described the twelfth-century icon of the miracle of the Archangel Michael at Chonae from the Monastery of St. Catherine, Mount Sinai (fig. 15), as an example of classical modeling indicating corporeality and immediacy:

[Michael is] rendered as a youth of Apollonian beauty, gracious in the movement of the body which is shown in full plasticity under a garment which, in classical fashion, clings to the body and whose folds combine a rhythmic flow with modeling power.⁷²

71. See Topographie chrétienne, ed. Wolska-Conus, II: 249.

72. See K. Weitzmann, “The Classical in Byzantine Art as a Mode of Individual Expression,” in Byzantine Art. An European Art. Lectures (Athens, 1966) 166–67 [= K. Weitzmann, Studies in Classical and Byzantine Manuscript Illumination, ed. H. L. Kessler (Chicago, 1971) 166–67].

Figure 12. Archangel Gabriel, Mosaic, Bema arch, Hagia Sophia, Istanbul, ninth century. Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

In contrast, cordoned by the ropey water descending, the bantam hermit opposite Michael is insubstantial and hidden within the monastic carapace. The fuller angelic corporeality, perhaps an oxymoron, lends a sense of presence and actuality, while the self-denial practiced so arduously by the hermit effaces his physical being. The two fields denoted by the joining streams in the middle therefore create two areas of existence, the angelic one occupied by a full-bodied angel and the mortal one almost evacuated by the dematerializing body of the hermit.

Figure 13. Virgin and Child, Apse Mosaic, Hagia Sophia, Istanbul, ninth century. Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

This brief examination of representation of angels in the early Christian and Byzantine periods has revealed only an occasional engagement on the part of mosaicists, painters and sculptors with issues of nature and identity in art. The issues were never resolved as the subjects, that is the angels, were not open to autopsy by artists, since knowledge of angels was derived primarily through descriptions of their enigmatic epiphanies in scripture. Because of the distance of these subjects, painters, mosaicists and sculptors were forced to sidestep problems of making apprehensible something only partially seen and known in the past. Their circumvention of real description is most clearly evident in the straightforward use of an anthropomorphic form for angels. Evidently, the artist was abdicating responsibility for describing nature or identity and was placing the burden of recognizing the being depicted on the shoulders of the viewer. The iconography of the angels is only, then, occasionally complex in its exegesis of spiritual nature and appearances as in the important series of scenes describing the Philoxenia. This series shows that painters and mosaicists—or programmers—recognized the enigmatic quality of the event and attempted to indicate this quality through the description of the “men” as winged or unwinged.

Figure 14. Vision of Isaiah, The Christian Topography of “Cosmas Indicopleustes,” Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, gr. 699, fol. 72v, ninth century. Photo: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana.

Figure 15. Icon of the Miracle at Chonae, Monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai, twelfth century. Reproduced through the courtesy of the Michigan–Princeton–Alexandria Expedition to Mount Sinai.

Wings were used throughout as the primary means to communicate the symbolic nature of the iconography of angels. Color and cloud were also used to indicate the fire and wind composition of angels that scripture prescribed but these solutions were not common.⁷³ Preeminently, the winged youth is an expansive iconography that is allusive to all angels, corresponding to the semantic range of the word “angelos” (ἄγγελος), and not descriptive in any essential way of their nature or appearance. Theological writings furthermore show that Christians generally interpreted angelic epiphany as dissimulation, unrelated to the true nature and form of angels.⁷⁴ In the same way, visual representations are allusions to this angelic dissimulation, and the apparently straightforward representation of winged anthropomorphic figures paradoxically signifies the angels' multi-form constitution.

73. For instance, a sixth-century mosaic in the Church of St. Demetrius in Thessalonike shows an angel seamlessly emerging from a cloud; the mosaic does not correspond to any episode in the surviving hagiographic narratives, although it may depict the martyrdom of the saint. See R. Cormack, Writing in Gold. Byzantine Society and Its Icons (London, 1985) 79–80, fig. 22; Bussagli, Storia degli angeli, 97ff. Christian painters, mosaicists and sculptors also attempted to indicate the fiery quality of angels iconographically. For example, an early sixth-century mosaic in the church of San Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna, represents Christ as the shepherd and judge of Matthew 25. Two standing angels flank the seated Christ, one of whom is red, denoting fire and light, while the other is cobalt blue, denoting the tenebrous nature of a fallen angel. See E. Kirschbaum, “L’angelo rosso e l’angelo turchino,” RivAC 17(1940):209–48, and G. Bovini, Mosaici di S. Apollinare di Ravenna: Il ciclo cristologico (Florence, 1958) 37ff., fig. 4, pl. X. And at Sta. Maria Maggiore, Rome, the hands, feet and faces of the angels are depicted “meravigliosamente rosso” in the fifth-century mosaics; see Kirschbaum, “L’angelo rosso e l’angelo turchino,” 215, C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della Basilica S. Maria Maggiore (Turin, 1956) pls. XLIX, LIII, and Grabar, The Golden Age of Justinian, figs. 157, 161, 162. And, more generally, see A. Petzold, “‘His Face Like Lightning’: Colour as Signifier in Representations of the Holy Women at the Tomb,” Arte medievale 6/2(1992): 149–55.

74. For instance, Basil of Caesarea wrote, “For just as the brand is known through the fire, the one the underlying matter, the other the fire; so with the heavenly powers, they are in essence aerial spirit, if you would, or immaterial fire according to scripture, ‘Who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire’ (Ps. 104:4). Wherefore they are in a place, and become visible, they appear in an image of their own bodies, in this way, to the worthy. But the source of their holiness being outside of their nature is brought to fulfillment by contact with the Spirit” (De Spiritu Sancto, XVI.38, in Traité du Saint-Esprit, SC vol. 17 bis, ed. B. Pruche [Paris, 1968] 380–82).

The assimilation of pagan iconography of winged personifications described in this chapter did not go unnoticed or unopposed by certain figures within the church. Theodoret of Cyrrihus noted that the use of imperial models for Christian art was in keeping with the dignity owed to God.⁷⁵ Although subsequent chapters examine this dialogue in greater depth, the assertion made by the pagan in the pagan-Christian "dialogue," the Apocriticus, is also relevant here. The pagan stated that the gods and the angels were alike in everything, their proximity to God, their spirituality and service; only their names were different.⁷⁶ His opponent, Macarius Magnes, rejected any such connection between the dignity and nature of false gods and true servants; furthermore, he denied the ability of art to depict beings so pure and transcendent.⁷⁷ To Christians who held views similar to Macarius Magnes on angels and art, such connections between pagan and Christian iconography must have appeared as debasing to the spiritual beings and a dangerous invitation to pagan idolatry.

75. Orationes de imaginibus tres, III.80, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III, 176: "And just as the Romans in painting imperial images surrounded [the emperor] with spear-bearers and depicted subject peoples, so Christians depict by similar means. Since the emperor through his appearance assumes the form of God, as borne upon a throne, they reveal the images to all people on earth, and in his form they confer on him what is fitting, the ruler according to the teachings of God." See de' Maffei, Icona, pittore e arte al Concilio Niceno II, 74.

76. Blondel 200.1–12: "If therefore you say that the angels who are stationed near God are passionless and immortal and by nature incorruptible, which we ourselves call gods, on account of their nearness to God on high, what is there that should be disputed about the name or is it only a distinction brought out in the naming? For as far as the name goes the Romans call Minerva what the Greeks call Athena, and the Egyptians and the Syrians and the Thracians call her something else again. Is it not true that they conform despite the difference in names or removed from the name of the god? Some therefore call these angels, or either some call them gods, but there is not very much difference, since their divine nature is testified for, when Matthew wrote thus, 'But Jesus answered and said unto them, Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as angels in heaven' (22:29–30)."

77. Blondel 214–15.

The assimilation of pagan iconography into Christian art was not, therefore, universally approved, and in the first half of the sixth century Severus of Antioch delivered a sermon against the depiction of angels as “princes or kings, in a purple and royal robe, holding marks of universal power.” Despite the differences between pagan and Christian iconography, he evidently believed that the distinctions were not clear enough. Moreover, according to Severus, worshippers were led to think that these intangible servants were God’s co-rulers.⁷⁸ Depicting angels as terrestrial, temporal creatures appeared to opponents of images of angels to be a humiliation of spiritual qualities, and for some the pagan parallels for winged beings were potentially misleading.

The sixth-century epigrams, examined in chapters 2 and 3, display a degree of defensiveness that would certainly support this conclusion. The occasional attempts by mosaicists, painters and sculptors to come to terms with the nature and identity of angels were apparently not effective in the eyes of all Christians. Although these artists added wings to an anthropomorphic form in order to indicate certain symbolic alterations of form that angels accomplished, they could not describe angels in any definitive sense. Representation of angels potentially involved a number of unpalatable issues, idolatry, angelolatry and, at the very least, disrespect for profoundly spiritual beings. The anti-image accusations and iconophile answers to these accusations and the ways in which writers about angels, particularly in miracle stories, approached these issues are the subjects of the following chapters.

78. See chapter 2.

Two

ARGUMENTS AGAINST IMAGES OF ANGELS

Adherents to a literal interpretation of scripture and to intellectual worship simply could not reconcile angelic nature—which is essentially incomprehensible—with material, allusive representations in art. The best-known opponent of artistic representation in the period leading up to Iconoclasm in the eighth century was Epiphanius of Salamis (ca. 315–403). Epiphanius's theology developed from his anti-allegorical stance; and his opposition to religious imagery later made him a natural champion for the iconoclastic party.¹

Elaborate written defenses of images of angels evidently did not arise in the period between Epiphanius and Iconoclasm. However, epigrams are extant from the sixth century that reveal a development

1. On Epiphanius and Iconoclasm, see P. Maraval, "Épiphanie, 'Docteur des Iconoclastes,'" Nicée II, 787–1987. Douze siècles d'images religieuses. Actes du colloque international Nicée II tenu au Collège de France, Paris les 2, 3, 4 Octobre 1986, ed. F. Boespflug and N. Lossky (Paris, 1987) 51–62; on the anti-Origenist theology of Epiphanius, see E. A. Clark, The Origenist Controversy. The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate (Princeton, 1992) 86ff.

G. Ostrogorsky, Studien zur Geschichte des byzantinischen Bilderstreites (Breslau, 1929) 69ff., doubted the authenticity of some of the texts, while Holl showed that they are all Epiphanius's own writings. This study takes the position that the texts of Epiphanius as collected by iconoclasts and refuted by iconophiles reflects a real concern on the part of the fourth-century theologian concerning material representation.

in a direction quite different from Epiphanius's interpretation of angels' images. These show affinities with a symbolic, materialist theology that finds its most detailed and articulate defense in the eighth and ninth centuries. For instance, Agathias (ca. 532–ca. 580) wrote on an image of the Archangel Michael on the island of Plate in the Sea of Marmara, south of Constantinople:

The wax, greatly daring, has represented the invisible, the incorporeal chief of the angels in the semblance of his form. Yet it was no thankless [task] since the mortal who beholds the image directs his mind to a higher contemplation. His veneration is no longer distracted: engraving within himself the [archangel's] traits, he trembles as if he were in the latter's presence. The eyes encourage deep thoughts, and art is able by means of colours to ferry over [to its object] the prayer of the mind.²

Agathias's description of an approach to images of angels is antithetical to Epiphanius's literal position and reveals an ability to interpret material images as the symbolic means to knowledge of an incomprehensible creature. In this description of the image of the archangel, the difficulty of comprehension derives from the incorporeal nature which would seem to be incompatible with material representation; but in Agathias's conception the image also provides the viewer with the means to approach knowledge of the distant and immaterial archangel by way of contemplation of the colors and outlines on the surface of the image. The material image is therefore the bridge between mundane reality and spiritual truths otherwise unattainable. No less intellectual than Epiphanius's, this approach nonetheless admits and encourages material, symbolic aids for worship and contemplation. These two opposing methods of gaining knowledge of God characterize the two sides of a long-standing debate in Byzantine society leading to the convulsive conflict of the Iconoclastic period.

2. The Greek Anthology, ed. W.R. Paton, 5 vols. (London, 1927) I:34; trans. C. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire. 312–1453. Sources and Documents (Toronto, 1986) 115.

Debate over the proper means to a comprehension of divine things, in this case angels, characterizes the period leading up to Iconoclasm in the eighth century.³ Art was part of this debate because it generated discussion over seemingly worship and appropriate avenues to gaining knowledge. The angels' iconography is essentially symbolic in that it relates a human form sometimes assumed by angels but not descriptive of their real nature. The addition of wings is a significant marker in this iconography since wings signal transcendence and ethereality and inhuman speed, all characteristics of the angelic host. This symbolic iconography was evidently not suitable to all Christians, and texts from the fourth century on reveal that such images of angels had excited opposition. Moreover, the dangers of idolatry that attached to material images and to angels themselves were important considerations. This chapter seeks to isolate these strands of theological discussion concerning images of angels and, furthermore, argues that these strands influenced one aspect of iconoclastic opposition to symbolic images of angels. The extant opposition to images of angels falls into two general categories: fourth-century anti-imagist theology and the Monophysitism of fifth-/sixth-century Syria. This chapter examines the particular historical context for these sources and concludes with an examination of the common concerns that allowed their authors to be harnessed to the iconoclastic cause.

Earlier evidence for opposition to images is known mainly through the marshaling of patristic precedents to support the iconoclasts' position on images. A sifting of iconophile texts provides firm documentation of the nature of pre-Iconoclastic opposition to symbolic images, particularly those of angels. Long-standing theological divisions manifest themselves in part by the choice of patristic precedent in the arguments of the opposing sides of the controversy.⁴ Iconoclasts argued that image worship was a recent re-introduction of the idolatry that Christians had overcome but to which they had again succumbed. Iconophiles, on the other hand, claimed their own patristic support in favor of their position of a long-standing and proper worship of icons, initiated and sanctioned by scripture.⁵ The traditions of the Church were thus understood in completely divergent ways by each camp. Both parties, therefore, claimed a distinct line of tradition within the church, written and unwritten, and this chapter examines the development of an anti-image, intellectual theology that motivated certain iconoclastic beliefs concerning representations of angels.

3. See Cameron, "The Language of Images."

4. See the recent survey by A. Giakalis, Images of the Divine. The Theology of Icons at the Seventh Ecumenical Council (Leiden, New York and Köln, 1994) 22ff.

Evidence for the effects of this theology on material objects is scanty; one assumes that before Iconoclasm some images may have been removed because of philosophical differences but that on the whole images were produced and opponents simply avoided such material aids. However, at the end of this chapter, mosaics of the angelic powers in the bema arch of the church of the Dormition at Nicaea (Iznik) will furnish examples of how iconoclasts viewed—and corrected—angels' images.

Both sides of the Iconoclastic controversy claimed the great father of the early Church and renowned opponent of heretics, Epiphanius of Salamis. Iconoclasts declared him a paragon because of his writings against the manufacture and worship of images.⁶ Epiphanius was a particularly difficult case for iconophiles since he was a theologian of unassailable orthodoxy, having written two influential works, the Panarion, a famous anti-heretical treatise, and the doctrinal study An-

5. A certain disregard for scruples of historical research is evident, and indeed charges of falsification of texts were traded by both sides. P.J. Alexander described the collection and confirmation of patristic sources by the iconoclast faction in the preparation for the iconoclastic Council of Hagia Sophia in 815 as more painstaking and scrupulous than the first iconoclastic Council of Hieria, held in 754. For this reason, the patristic citations of the later council were expanded and more accurately cited than the sources adduced at Hieria. See P.J. Alexander, "Church Councils and Patristic Authority. The Iconoclastic Council of Hieria (754) and St. Sophia (815)," Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 63(1958):493–505.

6. These survive only in the fragments found in the rebuttal of Nicephorus, in the Adversus Epiphanidem, part of his Antirrhetics, written in the period 818–20; see Pitra IV:292–380. See Maraval, "Épiphanie, 'Docteur des Iconoclastes,'" 61, and H. G. Thümmel, Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit, TU vol. 139 (Berlin, 1992) 65ff.

coratus, the “Anchor of Faith.” Rather than making a frontal attack, iconophiles leveled the charge, often repeated in this period, of willful falsification.

Epiphanius’s position is the clearest and earliest statement of an opposition to images based on a literal reading of art and a spiritual mode of worship. His active iconoclasm with regard to Christian images is still in doubt,⁷ but his attitude to art is clear from the extant fragments. In short, Epiphanius rejected the ability of art to convey any truth about divine nature: “If someone endeavours to perceive the divine character of the holy Logos in the flesh, out of material colours. . . . [let him be anathema].”⁸ A corollary for Epiphanius is that angels who are spiritual, bodiless and immaterial—though not to the same extent as God—cannot be depicted materially. As he wrote, images, dead and lifeless matter, debase and diminish the angels.⁹ Epiphanius could not countenance the representation of Christ as man since this representation merely reduced Christ to one aspect of his duophysite nature; nor would he allow angels to be depicted as men with mortal traits of “bone and sinew,” because angels are essentially spiritual beings whose nature is like a “devouring fire.” Representations of angels in dead and lifeless matter degrade the prototypes and diminish their nature.

Furthermore, Epiphanius was a fervent opponent of artists’ “deceptions.” Artists’ handiwork is not purely spiritual and, therefore, misleading in his view. It follows that all worship based on material images is essentially idolatrous. According to Epiphanius, artists created empty inventions according to their own fancies, in a medium

7. The well-known incident of the destruction of a curtain covering a door in a church has been interpreted traditionally as a sign of Epiphanius’s active opposition to Christian art. See, for instance, E. Kitzinger, “The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm,” DOP 8(1954):92ff. However, Sister Charles Murray, Rebirth and Afterlife. A Study of the Transmutation of Some Pagan Imagery in Early Christian Funerary Art (Oxford, 1981) 31ff., convincingly analyzed this passage as proof of Epiphanius’s vigorous antagonism simply towards pagan art. The curtain, in her view, depicted a pagan figure, perhaps a god, that Epiphanius felt to be inconsistent with the decoration of a place of worship. Indeed, the event is related within the context of Epiphanius’s apology for not having sent a replacement sooner.

8. Holl 363 (#34) = Adv. Epi., V.14, Pitra IV:303.18–20.

9. Holl 357 (#4) = Adv. Epi., VI.16, Pitra IV:306.35–307.1.

clearly inadequate to the subject. On the representations of Christ and the saints, all Epiphanius saw was irrelevant whimsy that cannot be substantiated by witness.¹⁰ Epiphanius based his position on images of the saints on a pragmatic distinction: the saints lived on earth, had mortal form and so have a single likeness; nonetheless, artists cannot and do not retrieve this likeness because they did not see the subjects with their own eyes. With regard to angels and Christ, the difficulty is of a different order since they are essentially spiritual and comprehensible only in spiritual terms.¹¹ Furthermore, the images of angels falsely attempt to communicate another level of the unknowable which is misrepresented by anthropomorphic forms on material images. Distinct even from representing Christ as man, artists who attempt to contain angelic nature in “bone and sinew” are guilty of deceit since they are not capable of knowing or seeing angels properly; likeness in any meaningful sense is simply out of reach.

Epiphanius’s position on images was based on an anti-allegorical, anti-Origenist stance that could not conceive of an image relating symbolically to its prototype.¹² For Epiphanius, the image and the 10. Holl 361 (#24) = Adu. Epi., XVIII.79, Pitra IV:352.12–22: “At the same time they mislead by their strange notions, representing the appearance of the saints in this or that manner, sometimes as old men and sometimes as youths, such things as they had never seen, they make their own. For they paint the Savior with long hair by some fancy (ὑπονοίας), on account of his being called the Nazarene, as Nazarenes have long hair. And they fail who attempt to bind these types to him. For the Savior drank wine, whereas the Nazarenes did not drink.” And Epiphanius leveled the same accusation at painters of images of the apostles: “And again believing according to their own notions what they make, they deceive. For these deceivers portray Peter the holy apostle as an old man with hair and beard cut close. And also some describe Saint Paul as balding and some bald pated and with a beard, while the other apostles as cropped” (Holl 362 [#26] = Adu. Epi., XIX.86, Pitra IV:357.25–32).

11. Christ’s divine nature made likeness impossible: Epiphanius rejected the ability of art to represent “the unknowable, the inexpressible, the incomprehensible, the unspeakable, whom only Moses was able to face” (Holl 359 [#12]).

12. George Florovsky, in “Origen, Eusebius, and the Iconoclastic Controversy,” Church History 19(1950):77–96, and C. von Schönborn, L’icône du Christ. Fondements théologiques élaborées entre le Ier et le IIer Concile de Nicée (325–787) (Fribourg, 1976) 55ff., 164ff., have described the parallels between iconoclast theology and Origenism. The human nature of Christ was, in Origenist terms, overcome and superseded by the transcendental reality of Christ risen, and so his nature is beyond description in any material depiction or description. Certainly, this position has analogies with that of the iconoclasts, as well as that of prototype were fundamentally distinct and any defense that linked the two would inevitably demean the prototype. The only real worship is founded on intellectual approaches to spiritual truths and not on material aids consisting of images. Images of angels pose particular problems of the relation between material image and immaterial prototype, and seemed to Epiphanius to be more of an obstacle than a clarification and facilitation of worship.

A text relating a dialogue between the fourth-century theologian Macarius Magnes and a pagan opponent shows similar mistrust of material representations, once again in the case of angels.¹³ The exchange over angels formed part of a work known as the Apocriticus, likely an invented dialogue between Macarius and a pagan. The texts of Macarius Magnes and the pagan with whom he is engaged in discussion find their earliest testimony in the work of Nicephorus (ca. 750–828), patriarch of Constantinople at the second outbreak of Iconoclasm in 815.¹⁴ Despite Macarius Magnes's allegiances to the allegorical methods of Origen (ca. 185–254) which iconoclasts es-

Epiphanius; Epiphanius's position, which the iconoclasts found so attractive, was that Christ's divinity is essentially unknowable and can only be demeaned and made separate by merely depicting the human Christ. It must also be said, however, that Epiphanius's anti-Origenism lies primarily in his opposition to Origen's heterodox views on the Trinity; more importantly for this study, Epiphanius's rejection of Origen's method of allegorical interpretation was also an important part of his dissent. On this question, see Clark, The Origenist Controversy, 86ff. Moreover, it is just this openness to symbolic interpretations that characterizes the iconophile approach to images, especially those of angels; see chapter 3.

13. A. Harnack, Kritik des Neues Testaments von einem griechischen Philosophen des 3. Jahrhunderts. Die in Apocriticus des Macarius Magnes enthaltene Streitschrift, TU vol. 37/3 (Leipzig, 1911) and G. Bardy, in DTC IX:1456ff., put Macarius Magnes in the late fourth-century. Harnack identified the opponent as the pagan neo-Platonist Porphyry (ca. 232–ca. 303), the writer of a famous anti-Christian treatise in fifteen volumes, the Κατὰ Χριστιανῶν.

The full text is found in Blondel who reconstructed the original text from a manuscript found in Athens; we can now be certain of the author's original intent. See also L. Duchesne, Macario Magnete et scriptis eius (Paris, 1877) and P.J. Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople. Ecclesiastical Policy and Image Worship in the Byzantine Empire (Oxford, 1958) 165ff.

14. De Magnete, Pitra I:302–35. Nicephorus apparently knew little of the author and gleaned whatever information he had from internal evidence; he found firm evidence of Origenism in the texts, but he also charged Macarius Magnes with Nestorian and Manichaean sympathies. See T. W. Crafer, "Macarius Magnes, A Neglected Apologist," JTS 8(1907):402.

chewed, iconoclasts had invoked Macarius Magnes for his kindred approach to intellectual and non-material worship.

Two texts in the dialogue, one by the pagan and one by Macarius Magnes himself, have special bearing on this discussion of angels. In this portion of the dialogue, Macarius Magnes defended Christian worship from parallels with paganism that his opponent attempted to draw, particularly with regard to idols and representations of angels. The “angelic way of life,” a common epithet of the followers of the monastic vocation, was introduced by Macarius Magnes as an answer to the pagan opponent who is made to equate the angels and the gods of the Greeks.¹⁵ Macarius Magnes proceeded to counter the pagan’s arguments with a denial of any similarity between Christian angels and pagan gods. Pagan gods simply do not exist and furthermore, he stated, the idols of the pagans have no resemblance to the Christian images because God is incomprehensible, and Christians know better than to think that deity can reside in such matter. Macarius brought up images of angels as a means of providing a concrete example of the distinctions between pagan idolatry and purer Christian veneration. Macarius Magnes wrote:

So that if someone who is right thinking should hear of a spiritual existence in heaven, he rejoices in the word of immortality, [and] he himself emulates [the excellence of angels] in his deeds, and zealously affects their merit, by avoiding marriage and fleeing the symbols of corruption, and coming to the passage of death, he is lifted up in the end into the court of the blessed, that is to say, of the angels. But certainly [the good Christian] does not depict the form [of angels], as you yourself say, and [he] does not speak to the shadow or is delighted with the phantoms, conversing with soulless matter as if it had a soul, delighting in dead visions of forms, directing prayer to voiceless matter, imagining that the divine law giver inhabits stone or wood, or pretending to subjugate the insubjugable being in bronze or iron, thinking to capture the uncapturable, he unthinkingly sketches a vague image in a dead vision.¹⁶

15. Blondel 200.1–12.

16. Blondel 214.10–20.

Later, confronted with this text, clearly antagonistic to material images, Nicephorus argued that it misrepresented Macarius Magnes since iconoclasts had indubitably falsified the text and had confused Macarius Magnes's argument against paganism and idolatry with a denial of Christian images. However, Macarius Magnes clearly stated his opinion in this dialogue that a holy person makes a true and godly image by modeling himself after paragons of holiness in the past. For Macarius, the real image is ethical and not a material representation. Furthermore, false and misleading images made after illusory visions must be shunned.

Both Macarius Magnes and Epiphanius belong to a general debate that took place in the fourth century over images, intellectual and material, in worship. Moreover, both form part of an early tradition of spiritual, anti-image worship that was resurrected in the eighth and ninth centuries during renewed debates over worship. Epiphanius stated that divinity is unrepresentable, and can be worshipped only "in spirit and truth," quoting John 4:24.¹⁷ Both theologians were suspicious of the knowledge derived through sight, especially through the viewing of deceptive images.¹⁸ Epiphanius's strong iconoclastic stance, based on the incomprehensibility of God and the essential deceptiveness of images, has parallels with the anti-image theology of Evagrius Ponticus (ca. 345–399), and Macarius's advocacy of intellectual worship is akin to Evagrius's practice of "pure prayer."¹⁹ Evagrius taught that prayer must be rid of emotions and images that are derived from the sensual world; he called this process "apatheia" (ἀπάθεια), involving a resistance to mental image-making and a worship of God only "in spirit and in truth."²⁰ Evagrius advised dis-

17. See P.J. Alexander, "The Iconoclastic Council of St. Sophia (815) and Its Definition (Horos)," DOP 7(1953):43, on Epiphanius's "Treatise against Those who are engaged in making, after the fashion of idols, images in the likeness of Christ, the Mother of God, Martyrs, Angels and Prophets" (frag. 30b; for text, see 63–64).

18. See, for instance, Holl 363 (#33).

19. See Clark, The Origenist Controversy, 102ff., on Epiphanius, and Schönborn, L'icone du Christ, 168, on the affinities of the anti-image theology of Evagrius and iconoclasts.

20. See Clark, The Origenist Controversy, 60ff.; A. Guillaumont, Les "Képhalaia Gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'Origénisme chez les Grecs et chez les Syriens, Patristica Sorbonensis, vol. 5 (Paris, 1962) 37ff., 59ff.; Evagrius Ponticus, Traité Pratique ou Le Moine, 2 vols., SC vols. 170, 171, ed. A. Guillaumont and C. Guillaumont (Paris, 1971) 1:98ff. Accord-engagement from all distractions: “Do not represent the divine in itself when you pray and do not permit your intellect to receive the impression of any form; but go from immaterial to immaterial, and you will comprehend.”²¹ In this sense, Epiphanius, Evagrius and Macarius share comparable positions with regard to approaches to knowledge of things divine: only intellectual and non-material routes were seemly and fruitful in their view.²²

Elizabeth Clark has described the “constellation” of practice and theory in the late fourth century that connects Epiphanius’s own iconoclasm, Evagrius’s anti-imagistic theology, and the destruction of idols in Egypt led by Theophilus (d. 412), patriarch of Alexandria from 385.²³ Epiphanius’s tearing down of a curtain depicting “some form of a man” and produced perhaps by a pagan workshop, and Macarius’s opposition to parallels made between the images of Christian angels and pagan gods must be seen in this context of the general struggle against the profane art of the pagan religion, as each theologian combated the possibility of idolatry inherent in images. Epiphanius recalled precisely the idolatrous practices censured by the Council of Laodicea in his dismissal of making images; and, indeed, that the writer of the Apocriticus has the pagan equate pagan idols with images of angels reveals the special fear that angels aroused in some theologians. Angels were divine creatures, certainly, but they attracted worship that was too easily equated with pagan practice. In the fourth and fifth centuries, angels and their images posed clear threats to proper approach and seemly worship as the Apocriticus, the Council of Laodicea and Theodoret of Cyrrhus demonstrate.

ing to Evagrius, only Moses had seen God in “his proper form and without enigma” and spoke with him “mouth to mouth”; see R. Draguet, “L’Histoire Lausiaque: Une oeuvre écrite dans l’esprit d’Evagre,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 41(1946):330ff.

21. De oratione, LXVI, PG 79:1181A.

22. The general affinities are noted by J. Gouillard, “Fragments inédits d’un antirrétique de Jean le Grammairien,” REB 24(1966):174–75, with regard to some fragments attributed to John the Grammarian, the iconoclastic patriarch of Constantinople from 837–43.

23. The Origenist Controversy, 43ff.; the thesis of the interaction of theology, politics and social practice of the fourth/fifth centuries is key to her description of these texts and events.

Some scholars cite Monophysitism as an important element in iconoclastic theology, and the accusations of iconoclastic beliefs leveled against Philoxenus of Mabbug and Severus of Antioch at the Second Council of Nicaea (787) would seem to suggest at least a theological affinity between iconoclasts and these Monophysite theologians.²⁴ Like Epiphanius and Macarius Magnes, Philoxenus of Mabbug (ca. 440–523), a bishop of Hierapolis-Mabbug in Syria, strongly opposed symbolic images in Christian worship. The opposition to allusive representations was consistent with Philoxenus's theology that emphasized the absolute transcendence and incomprehensibility of Christ's divinity; iconophiles often accused iconoclasts of just such an emphasis that led them into Monophysite error.²⁵ As an extension of this belief, Philoxenus appears to have objected to anthropomorphic images of Christ and the angels, as well as to representations of the Holy Spirit as a dove.²⁶ In a passage taken from the lost Ecclesiastical History of Theodore Lector or Anagnostes (d. after 527), Theophanes the Confessor (ca. 760–817/8) described the malignant Monophysite roots of Philoxenus of Mabbug's position on images:

Xenaias, the servant of Satan, taught that images of the Lord and of the angels should not be accepted. He was a Persian by extraction

24. See Mansi XIII:317–18. And secondary sources include Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, 52, and S. Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm during the Reign of Leo III with Particular Attention to the Oriental Sources (Louvain, 1973) 127. Sebastian Brock argued for a complete dissociation of Monophysitism and iconoclastic theology in "Iconoclasm and Monophysitism," in Iconoclasm. Papers Given at the Ninth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, University of Birmingham, March 1975, ed. A. Bryer and J. Herrin (Birmingham, 1977) 53–57.

25. On Philoxenus of Mabbug's theology, see A. de Halleux, Philoxène de Mabbog. Sa vie, ses écrits, sa théologie (Louvain, 1963); C. N. Tsirpanlis, "Some Reflections on Philoxenos' Christology," Greek Orthodox Theological Review 25(1980):152–62; R. C. Chesnut, Three Monophysite Christologies: Severus of Antioch, Philoxenus of Mabbug, and Jacob of Sarug (Oxford, 1976) 57ff.; and G. Lardreau, Discours philosophique et discours spirituel. Autour de la philosophie spirituelle de Philoxène de Mabboug (Paris, 1985).

26. See Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, 44–45, "[Philoxenus of Mabbug's] position on images then was a logical corollary to his theological views: the angels and the Holy Spirit were clearly incorporeal and in Philoxenus' monophysite theology, Jesus Christ was first and foremost God." See also Kitzinger, "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm," 131, and S. Der Nersessian, "Une apologie des images du septième siècle," B17(1944/5):70.

and, by station, a slave. Having fled from his master and being unbaptised, although he called himself a cleric, he was at the time of Calandion perverting from the [true] faith the villages around Antioch. He was expelled by Calandion, but Peter the Fuller consecrated him bishop of Hierapolis and renamed him Philoxenus.²⁷

Despite unsympathetic descriptions, no evidence exists in the extant texts ascribed to Philoxenus of an unambiguous iconoclastic position.²⁸ However, other texts of Philoxenus can provide testimony concerning his position regarding images and worship. These at least substantiate the charge of fundamental suspicion of images and perhaps also active iconoclasm described in the text read at Nicaea.

Judging by extant texts, Philoxenus of Mabbug held strong views on the images of Christ, the angels and the Holy Spirit in particular, on account of their essential incomprehensibility. Because of the transcendence of these beings, only worship that is intellectual and

27. Theophanes, Chronographia, ed. C. de Boor, 2 vols. (Leipzig, 1883–1885) I:134; trans. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire, 43. I have changed Mango's "saints" to "angels." This alteration is in accordance with an extract found in J.A. Cramer, Anecdota graeca e codd. manuscriptis Bibliothecae regiae parisiensis, 4 vols. (Oxford, 1839–1841; rp. Hildesheim, 1967) II:109.1–2, and is in agreement with de Halleux, Philoxène de Mabbug, 88 n86, and Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, 44–45. See also the reading given by E. Miller, "Fragments inédits de Théodore Le Lecteur et de Jean d'Égée," Revue archéologique 26(1873):402, "Ξεναίος ὁ Φιλόξενος οὔτε Χριστοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ οὔτε ἀγγέλων εἰκόνας ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ συνεχώρει ἀνατίθεσθαι."

At the Second Council of Nicaea, an excerpt was read from John Diakrinomenus's Ecclesiastical History of ca. 500 which more fully describes the reasoning behind Philoxenus of Mabbug's opposition to images of incorporeal beings and the affinities he had with Epiphanius and Macarius Magnes before him: "For Philoxenus said that it is not proper to give the angels, who are bodiless, bodies and thus in human-like shapes to depict them in a type of embodiment, and not to believe that one offers honour and faith to Christ through making an inscribed image; only that which is worship in spirit and in truth is acceptable to him. And a few lines below: he says to note this too, that [Philoxenus says] it is a childish mind that fashions the holy and venerable spirit in an image, despite the fact that the Gospels in no place teach that the Holy Spirit became a dove, but that at some point it appeared in the shape of a dove. Because it is by God's dispensation that it appeared one time in this way and not essentially, it is by no means fitting to make images of a body for the faithful. Philoxenus taught these things and followed this teaching in practice, too. In many places, he cast down the images of angels and hid the painted images of Christ in secret places." See Mansi XIII:180E–1B.

28. On this question, see de Halleux, Philoxène de Mabbug, 88ff.

unhindered by material images is possible. By faith alone, Philoxenus wrote, is humanity able to accept and understand the contradictory and difficult nature of angels:

And thus also it is in respect of the spiritual natures and orders of celestial beings, and it is faith which maketh it possible to receive every word which is spoken concerning them; for otherwise there must necessarily be unbelief, since the Book calleth them “absolute spiritual beings” [in one place], and in another it speaketh of them as “compacted bodies” to which it attributeth forms which are different from each other.²⁹

Philoxenus held that angelic appearances were not “real” but of a spiritual nature. These epiphanies consist of an appearance (φαντασία) or form (σχῆμα) intellectually accessible in some incomplete way. This formulation—in fact, not so very different from iconophile description of angelic appearances—led to a complete disregard for any images of the immaterial angels. Because angels appear in spiritual alterations, images of the angels in symbolic guise can only be defamations and distortions of transcendent, spiritual beings.³⁰

29. From Philoxenus’s sermon “On Faith,” trans. E.A.W. Budge, The Discourses of Philoxenus Bishop of Mabbôgh, A.D. 485–519. Vol. II. Introduction, Translation, etc. (London, 1894) 29–31, which continues, “... but [the angels] possess all the service of the members, although they have no compacted members. And how the operation of the members is established without the members themselves we have no power in our own knowledge to understand; but by this [power] which is given to us by God, I mean faith, we understand these things, and although they do not at all fall under the investigation of human thoughts they are accepted by us without any doubt.”

30. With regard to the particular case of images of Christ, the basis of Philoxenus’s resistance is ethical in that a true Christian ought to make him or herself a true image rather than worship material objects. Brock, “Iconoclasm and Monophysitism,” 54, saw the causes of Philoxenus’s hostility to images rooted in his “puritan asceticism.” Concerning the last charge made by John Diakrinomenos, Philoxenus does state in a commentary on Luke that the Holy Spirit was an intellectual vision, perceived by the intelligence of John the Baptist (Luke 3:22), and was in no way to be interpreted as an essential transformation of the Spirit itself; the Holy Spirit cannot, then, be depicted after John the Baptist’s vision since the vision was spiritual and not material. Brock hypothesized that Philoxenus’s resistance to images of doves was based on an antipathy to the local worship of Atargatis whose cult image was a dove. However, the resistance is theologically consistent with Philoxenus’s position on

Philoxenus's theological positions on intellectual worship and ethical guides are fully consistent with charges of antagonism to images, thereby substantiating his opponents' assessments of his position on art. It is noteworthy that the charges center on Philoxenus's rejection of a relation between image and model, and so any honor due the image; the charges also indicate opposition to a symbolic rendering of spiritual creatures which would make this relation of image and model untenable in Philoxenus's eyes. Moreover, writings by Philoxenus on imagination reveal affinities with the anti-image theology of Epiphanius, Macarius Magnes and Evagrius. Philoxenus believed that imagination naturally forms mental images but that these images lead one away from contemplation of true things; imagination must, therefore, be resisted and, by emptying the mind of thought and images, the spiritual path to true things can be opened.³¹ These views of Philoxenus clearly presage iconoclastic tenets. By tarring iconoclasts with the same brush as the Monophysite Philoxenus, iconophiles reinforced the frequently repeated accusation that iconoclasts were new Monophysites who rejected the incarnation in favor of Christ's divinity.³²

More ambiguous is the passage from the Second Council at Nicaea which impugned the Monophysite bishop Severus of Antioch (ca. 465–538) for his disapproval of the iconography of angels. An unsympathetic portrait of Severus's purposes in his homily on the Archangels Michael and Gabriel is given in a fragment taken from a lost Vita of Severus, written by John, bishop of Gabala, and read at Nicaea II. Iconophiles accused Severus of inappropriate attention to the appearance of angels in art, not iconoclasm strictly speaking:

[Severus of Antioch] used to stand in the bema and deliver long addresses, and he often attempted to persuade the multitude in the very church of the most-holy Michael that white vestments, not the incomprehensibility of wholly spiritual entities, like the Holy Spirit and Christ, and, to a lesser degree, angels.

31. See Lardreau, Discours philosophique et discours spirituel, 125ff., and R. Kearney, The Wake of Imagination. Ideas of Creativity in Western Culture (London, 1988) 144ff.

32. See, for example, K. Parry, Depicting the Word. Byzantine Iconophile Thought of the Eighth and Ninth Centuries (Leiden, 1996) 137, 144.

purple ones, were appropriate to angels. He was not ignorant of the fact that the holy [angelic] host had no concern with vestments, but tried by this device to cause division and to urge against one another people who had this or that opinion.³³

Fortunately, the homily to which John of Gabala refers is extant and the nature of Severus's antagonism can be ascertained. Rather than urging outright iconoclasm, the homily was largely concerned with the cult of angels and the unseemly excesses to which this devotion had been prone. Severus is not unusual for having this concern; as the Epistle to the Colossians (2:18), the Council of Laodicea and Theodoret of Cyrrhus bear witness, excessive worship of the angels had created anxiety within the Church since the first centuries of the Christian era. Severus began his sermon by recalling the pagan errors of angelolatry that had been forbidden under both the Old and the New Covenants.

But, forgetting their condition as soldiers and servants, let us not dishonour them for that reason, through a pagan error, by honours which are beyond their due. For all that which is taken from that glory, which alone is God's, is a dishonour to them. That is why the angel who spoke to Manoah said, "... if thou wilt offer a burnt offering, thou must offer it unto the Lord" (Judges 13:16). And this is why also Barnabas and Paul, those servants as faithful as the angels, prevented the Lycaonian worshippers of demons from offering them a sacrifice as to gods (Acts 14).³⁴

33. Mansi XIII:184C; trans. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire, 44. The response to the reading by the patriarch Tarasius (ca. 730?–806) at Nicaea is interesting because it ends in agreement with the heretic Severus of Antioch; Tarasius states that white vestments must be advocated, despite John of Gabala's assertion that iconographic detail is not a concern of the angels: "Tarasius, the holy patriarch, said, We shall consider, because he has been brought to this very thing by [the question of] relics, as he has said, that it is not befitting for angels to wear purple vestments, but they ought to wear white vestments instead" (Mansi XIII:184C). The iconographic particulars are, nonetheless, irrelevant to Tarasius's intention since in his statement he made it clear that the church takes an interest in artistic practice, to the point of managing and determining it. On this issue of ecclesiastical control of artistic production after Iconoclasm, see H. Maguire, "Magic and the Christian Image," in Byzantine Magic, ed. H. Maguire (Washington, D.C., 1995) 51–71.

34. Severus of Antioch, Les homiliae cathedrales, PO vol. 8/2, ed. M. Brière (Paris, 1919; rp. Turnhout, 1971) 82. Severus's work survives only in a Syriac translation by James of Severus of Antioch then lashed out at the effrontery of the painters who lead Christian worshippers to pagan idolatry by their unsuitable depictions of the angels. It is worth noting that the improper worship is the really contentious issue for Severus of Antioch.

But the hand of the painters, which is insolent and which is a law unto itself, favouring the pagan inventions or the imagination and things connected to idolatry and arranging everything to that end, clothe Michael and Gabriel, as princes or kings, with a purple and royal robe, adorning them with a crown and placing in their right hand the mark of authority and universal power. It is for these reasons and others like them that those who honour the angels in such excesses abandon the Church and transgress its laws and are anathematised by those who are ordained and establish the holy canons.³⁵

Although the passage from John of Gabala says that Severus defended white robes over purple for angels, the sermon clearly does not offer an alternative iconography; Severus denigrated the current iconography of purple-clad angels as strictly untoward and overweening for servants. Justinian's garb in the mosaic at San Vitale (consecrated 548), for example, is the same as that worn by the Archangels Michael and Gabriel in mosaics of the bema arch in the contemporary church of Sant' Apollinare in Classe.³⁶ The late fifth-century Cotton Genesis, moreover, shows the angels before Lot dressed in rich vermillion, one with gold highlights.³⁷ The program for which Severus provided his ekphrasis is, of course, lost, but unquestionably Severus was opposing just this kind of incorporation

Edessa. On this sermon, see the remarks of C. Mango, "St. Michael and Attis," DChAE 12(1984):39ff.

35. Les homiliae cathedrales, 83–84.

36. See A. Grabar, The Golden Age of Justinian. From the Death of Theodosius to the Rise of Islam, trans. S. Gilbert and J. Emmons (New York, 1967) figs. 171 and 11, respectively, and O. von Simson, Sacred Fortress. Byzantine Art and Statecraft in Ravenna, 2d ed. (Chicago, 1976) 60ff.

37. K. Weitzmann and H.L. Kessler, The Cotton Genesis. British Museum Codex Cotton Otho B. VI (Princeton, 1986) 81–82. For other examples, see RBK III:29–32.

of purple-clad, worldly rulers into the iconography of angels.³⁸ Severus then raised another issue surrounding the dangerous worship of angels, as an inoculation of the cult was also being carried out. The reason for their gathering, Severus went on to state, was the decorous consecration of the new church of the Archangel Michael by means of the introduction of the relics of human saints into the church.³⁹

Severus of Antioch proceeded to the charges of insolence he made against painters of angels. He made it clear that he was only speaking figuratively since the images of the angels are not in any sense representative of the real angelic nature, but only symbols.

No one, in effect, can judge that which has rapport [with the angels] by the aspects under which they appear sometimes to saintly men; for these [aspects] are various and they are known differently according to the time, according to the appropriateness of the circumstance and in some appearances such as the eyes of sensible beings are able to perceive.⁴⁰

As the nature of the angels is so difficult to perceive, their images are in a fundamental sense misleading as well as debasing. Artistic independence, and the presumptions this leads to, is also an important theme of the homily. Severus railed against “the hand of the painters who are insolent and are a law unto themselves,” and the affinities to paganism that this kind of practice encouraged in artists.

38. On the imperial garments worn by archangels, see G. Peers, “Patriarchal Politics in the Paris Gregory (B.N. gr. 510),” JöB 47(1997):53–57, and, covering some similar ground, C. Jolivet-Lévy, “Note sur la représentation des archanges en costume impérial dans l’iconographie byzantine,” CA 46(1998):121–28.

39. Relics of saints were apparently introduced into shrines in order to make more palatable this angelic cult with a dubious history. See P. Maraval, Lieux saints et pèlerinages d'Orient. Histoire et géographie des origines à la conquête arabe (Paris, 1985) 56. And P. Canivet has proposed that a crypt at the fifth-century church of the Archangel Michael at Huarte in Syria had been added to provide relics and stability to a potentially excessive cult. The connection proposed by Canivet, in “Le Michaelion de Huarte (Ve s.) et le culte syrien des anges,” B 50(1980):110ff., must remain tentative.

40. Les homiliae cathedrales, 76–78.

In summation, Severus of Antioch was attacking the worldliness of the angels' iconography, and he concluded that this iconography led worshippers to overlook the angels' bodiless and spiritual qualities. According to Severus, angels alter their forms according to the demands of the occasion in their appearances to just men. They are never seen according to their real nature, in fact, which has nothing of the coarseness of our bodies, but in an alteration of their real form. This alteration is necessary because of the unviewability of the angelic beings. Therefore, Severus is essentially unsympathetic to material images rendered by the artistic means derived from the deceitful pagans.

Severus was not an active iconoclast but, like Philoxenus of Mabbug, interpreted angelic appearances as symbolic transformations; and the natural conclusion holds for Severus, as for Philoxenus, that images cannot express the difficulties of comprehension and nature of angels.⁴¹ Sebastian Brock is right to point out that Severus was not aggressively iconoclastic and that, in fact, his conversion may have been influenced by a fresco of Paradise. However, the principal point of the sermon is not, as Brock maintains, the depiction of angels in purple. Severus had larger issues in mind in this homily, namely the inability of art to represent angels in any essential or descriptive way and art's misleading qualities, therefore, in the context of worship.

The theological perspective represented by these four theologians, Epiphanius, Macarius, Philoxenus and Severus, is based on an ultimate spirituality of angels that cannot be communicated by any material image. Painters cannot provide appropriate means for contemplating divine things since they are misled by pagan practice into producing figured matter wholly inadequate to describe transcendent beings. In this anti-imagistic theology, an emphasis on the ethical mode of worship is characteristic; John's dictum on worship "in spirit and in truth" (4:24) is a leitmotiv in the works of these theologians, as it was for iconoclasts themselves who gathered the writings of these earlier theologians for their own purposes. These theologians, therefore, represent a distinct position with regard to approaches to knowledge of God's bodiless creations; their common approach eschewed tangible, manufactured aids in favor of more intellectual methods that avoided the production of mental or material images.

41. Brock, "Monophysitism and Iconoclasm," 53–54.

In the fragmentary texts of Epiphanius and Philoxenus, angels appear to have been adduced as corollaries to the undepictability of Christ. For Epiphanius, just the same, the angels are differentiated from Christ by their special nature, "a devouring fire," at once less exalted than the divine nature of Christ and less tangible than the human saints. Epiphanius also stated the difficulties of rendering the humanity of Christ since artists describe Christ as man out of caprice rather than out of any attempt at true likeness. The fact that Epiphanius is able to make a double calumny against Christ's images, which are equally unable to manifest any truth about either of Christ's natures, indicates the essential distinction between Christ's and angels' images: to "bone and sinew" they cannot claim any likeness at all, as Christ as human could conceivably, since angels' assumptions of human form have only been momentary and illusory.

In the fuller texts of Macarius and Severus, the special distinctions of angels' images are clearer. These theologians saw angels as unique problems since they were concerned exclusively with the issue of angelic appearances and the manufacture of images deriving from these occasions. Both of these theologians viewed material commemorations of angelic epiphany as diminishing such difficult intellectual experiences to base, misleading caricature. The angels—unlike Christ, it ought to be stressed once again—appear in a semblance of their ethereal nature, and depicting the angels in human form, only one of many forms they have assumed, can in no way communicate their immaterial nature and activity.

The danger of idolatry represented by angels' images is also a common feature of these theologians' concerns. The nature and activities of angels allowed parallels to be drawn by pagans to their own deities. Moreover, Christians themselves were evidently not immune to the attraction that angels held for their direct worship separate from God. Severus certainly feared just this possibility and the deceitful allure that angels depicted as princes possessed.

The approach represented by these four theologians influenced the position taken by iconoclasts in the eighth and ninth centuries and reveals a continuity in this anti-imagistic, intellectual theology from the fourth century on. Therefore, an understanding of the iconoclastic position with respect to angels is properly derived from these theologians; it must, in fact, depend upon their limited testimony, since a particular iconoclastic theology of angels from the eighth and ninth centuries is not extant. As only iconophile rebuttals of certain texts survive, one must assume that iconophile dialogues, for instance Nicephorus against Epiphanius and Macarius Magnes, attack positions taken by iconoclasts, who collected and defended this patristic documentation in the first place.

The theological position that expressed considerable anxiety over both idolatry and angelolatry was the formative background for the eighth-/ ninth-century iconoclastic opposition to depicting angels. It explains the concern the later anti-image theologians had for the inherent difficulties in representing angels, of course, but also for the dangers of worship of created things in general and angels in particular. As created beings, angels were not worthy of worship in and of themselves, but representing angels, as Severus pointed out, increased the likelihood of Christians mistakenly directing veneration at angels. Images in that view were the necessary nexus of idolatry and angelolatry. This association of idolatry with angelolatry reveals the primitive origins of iconoclasm, since an iconoclastic position on angels appears to be firmly rooted not only in an intellectual approach to worship but also in pastoral care for Christians who were easily led to immoderate worship of God's creature servants.⁴²

After 752, Constantine V (r. 740–775) seems to have begun a concerted assault against the iconophile position on both theological and political fronts. The strength of this attack, some twenty years after his father had initiated iconoclasm as government policy, indicates a delay in formulation of any truly radical reform. Constantine V, however, produced in the 750s an articulate expression of icono-

42. That the problem of dangerous devotion to angels still existed during Iconoclasm is likely revealed by the reworking of the Chonae miracle story in this period; see chapter 4.

clastic theology much beyond the apparent literalism and bluster of his father's theological convictions. Nicephorus discussed selections from the iconoclastic Πεύσεις, or "Inquiries," and specifically attributed them to Constantine's pen, and in this way he was able to impute personal initiative to the emperor in formulating an iconoclastic theology.⁴³

The iconoclastic theology revealed through the "Inquiries" and "Definition" of the council convened by iconoclasts in 754 is the culmination of one particular strand of theological interpretation of proper Christian worship and comprehension. Clearly, the common ground of these iconoclastic texts and of the patristic sources iconoclasts adduced is an agreement that the images of angels—like those of Christ—are impossible because of the subjects' immaterial, divine nature. Like Christ's image, an image of the angels' earthly appearance would merely separate one manifestation of their nature from their real formless nature.⁴⁴ Epiphanius made an important distinction since the angels—unlike Christ—cannot be depicted simply as "bones and sinew"; the angels have never taken human form, only assumed it symbolically. Therefore, the image of an angel cannot even have a stable visual relation to its prototype, let alone an essential relation. It is strictly a misleading invention by deceitful artists. Iconoclasts, augured by theologians like Epiphanius and Severus, possessed a fundamental distrust of artistic practice; since the angels are so distant from our comprehension, and indeed so rarely seen at all, artists cannot be expected to represent these spiritual beings in an accurate or meaningful way.⁴⁵

Here the shape of the theological debate may unlock the history of an important set of images, representations of angels significantly

43. Contra Eusebium, III, Pitra I:375–77. On the Peuseis, see S. Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Constantine V with Particular Attention to the Oriental Sources (Louvain, 1977) 37ff.

44. See Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Constantine V, 39ff., on iconoclastic Christology.

45. See Mansi XIII:336E; Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Constantine V, 89, and, also, 91 (#16); M. V. Anastos, "The Argument for Iconoclasm as Presented by the Iconoclastic Council of 754," in Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. K. Weitzmann et al. (Princeton, 1955) 185.

altered during Iconoclasm. Admittedly, the evidence for the Church of the Dormition at Nicaea, now Iznik, is not secure: first, destroyed in 1922, the church is lost and so unexaminable, and second, the sequence of creation of mosaics in the seventh century, emendation in the eighth / ninth century and finally restoration in the ninth depends on scholarly argument founded on probabilities. Nonetheless, the position assumed here conforms to general scholarly opinion that the Church of the Dormition reflected the changes in attitudes to images from the seventh to the ninth century. Located on the arch that separates the sanctuary or bema from the nave, these mosaics of angels in the Church of the Dormition have been variously dated in their initial phase to the sixth or seventh century.⁴⁶ Although the inscriptions stated that the figures represented different orders of the angelic hierarchy, the Principalities, Virtues, Dominations and Powers, mentioned together at Colossians 1:16, the angelic beings were depicted as identical winged youths wearing the loros and carrying orbs and standards (figs. 9, 10). A pair occupied both the north and south portion of the arch. The subject of the pre-Iconoclastic mosaic in the apse is still an open question, and an enthroned Christ, an orans Virgin and a seated Virgin and Child have been suggested (fig. 16).⁴⁷

46. Fernanda de' Maffei conjectured that the mosaics had been covered during Iconoclasm, not erased as is generally thought, and the repair evident is not connected to the restoration of images in 843. See F. de' Maffei, "L'Unigenito consostanziale al Padre nel programma trinitario dei perduti mosaici del bema della Dormizione di Nicea e il Cristo trasfigurato del Sinai I," Storia dell'arte 45(1982):91ff., and also her Icona, pittore e arte al Concilio Niceno II (Rome, 1974) 99ff. However, the restorations apparent in the areas around the angels and the replacing of the cross in the apse likely belong to the same phase, probably post-843, paid for by the otherwise unknown Naucratis, as stated in an inscription between the two angels on the south bema arch. For discussion and bibliography, see Peers, "Patriarchal Politics in the Paris Gregory," 54–56, and chapter 1.

47. de' Maffei hypothesized an enthroned Christ in the apse of the church at Iznik flanked by angelic powers. See "L'Unigenito consostanziale," 91ff. By tracing the exegetical history of the psalms (110:3, 93:5, 97:7) and Col. 1:16, de' Maffei attempted to reconstruct a christological program in the apse, which centered on an enthroned Christ. While ultimately untenable, her argument is compelling, especially as it is the only one, to my knowledge, to take into consideration the angelic powers and their relation to Christ, but she finds difficulty in overcoming the art-historical evidence. The only parallel she is able to cite is in the ninth-century Chludov Psalter in which the enthroned Christ is approached by

Figure 16. Virgin and Child, Apse Mosaic (destroyed), Church of the Dormition, Iznik (formerly Nicaea), ninth century. Photo: Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C.

David (Moscow, Historical Museum, cod. 129, fol. 114v, ps. 110). See K.A. Corrigan, Visual Polemics in the Ninth-Century Byzantine Psalters (Cambridge, 1992) 44–45, fig. 54.

The illustration in the Chludov Psalter asserts the divinity of Christ, as the inscription accompanying the marginal illustration reads, “David prophesies concerning the son of God.” The assertion of Christ’s divine nature in this typological context derives from contra Judaeos literature of the sixth and seventh centuries, for example the Trophies of Damascus,

Such figured representations as found in the bema arch at Nicaea did not conform to the iconoclastic notion of the proper image of angels, and the figured portions of the bema arch were eliminated during Iconoclasm. Iconoclasts, of course, found representations of angels distasteful, as they found all figural religious imagery to be contrary to their beliefs concerning appropriate worship.⁴⁸ The distinguishing features of the iconoclastic alterations made on the bema arch at Nicaea were that the inscriptions and standards were left untouched. Evidently, iconoclasts did not object to every aspect of the program and felt that with editing the mosaics at Nicaea could provide proper “images” of angels that were non-figurative and relied on inscribed words.

That conversion provides vital information on attitudes toward, and meanings of, material representations of angels from the iconoclastic point of view. The sutures around the restored angelic powers reveal that the figures were erased and the mosaic field was left blank in which the same psalm (110) is adduced to defend the divine nature of Christ. See Les Trophées de Damas, PO vol. 15/2, ed. G. Bardy (Paris, 1920; rp. Turnhout, 1973) 32.12–33.6. Bardy points out that this psalm is a topos of Jewish-Christian debates from an early date. The currency that this psalm had for the defense of Christ’s divine nature in the period before Iconoclasm, both in exegesis and apologetic literature, lends support to de’ Maffei’s reconstruction of the apse program of Christ as Lord surrounded by his heavenly servants.

The general assumption, however—which moreover has the greater attraction of plausibility—is that the Virgin and child placed in the apse after the end of Iconoclasm was a replacement for a pre-Iconoclastic composition with the same subject. This premise informs C. Barber’s analysis, for example, in “The Koimesis Church, Nicaea: The Limits of Representation on the Eve of Iconoclasm,” JöB 41(1991):43–60.

48. In a review of T. Schmitz’s Die Koimesis-Kirche von Nikaia, das Bauwerk und die Mosaiken (Berlin and Leipzig, 1927), E. Wiegand claimed that making symbolic images of angels did not warrant opprobrium from the iconoclastic point of view and the bema mosaics could have been produced during Iconoclasm; see Deutsche Literaturzeitung 53(1927):2607. E. Kitzinger, “Byzantine Art in the Period between Justinian and Iconoclasm,” in Berichte zum XI. Internationalen Byzantinischen-Kongress, München, 1958 (Munich, 1958) 13, dismissed Wiegand’s hypothesis and suggested himself that the angelic powers belonged originally to a pre-iconoclastic phase. P.A. Underwood, “The Evidence of Restorations in the Sanctuary Mosaics of the Church of the Dormition at Nicaea,” DOP 13(1959):235ff., followed up this suggestion and demonstrated conclusively—to my mind—that the church underwent three phases of mosaic decoration: pre-iconoclastic (before the 720s), iconoclastic (that is, without figured images of angels but with inscriptions and standards left intact, likely effected between the 720s and 787 but possibly also between 815 and 843), and post-iconoclastic, that is to say after the “Triumph of Orthodoxy” in 843.

during Iconoclasm. However, the inscriptions designating each of the powers, the standards that bore the inscribed Trisagion and the passage taken from Psalm 97:7 ("To him all the angels of God offer worship") were apparently left intact and on view during this entire period.⁴⁹ Furthermore, a mosaic cross replaced either the figure of Christ or of the Virgin and Child in the apse.

This iconoclastic program demonstrates the practical limits of the depiction of angels during Iconoclasm and provides concrete form to the iconoclastic theology of angels. Given the preceding discussion of the views of iconoclasts and their predecessors, the elimination of the figural depictions of the angelic powers must be viewed as a natural extension of anti-image theory. The void outlined by the sutures, that is the absence of images, demonstrates iconoclastic belief in the inability of figural description to render angels. The preservation of the inscriptions of the angelic powers, then, marks the limit of representation according to this theory. The presence of the inscriptions, of course, was a happy coincidence for the iconoclasts since it served their purposes so well. The inscription shows that the route to contemplation of these beings must be attempted through meditation on the scriptural designations for angelic powers (Col. 1:16), the nominating inscriptions that signify the beings directly and without figural confusion.

Iconoclasts and their forbears believed that verbal worship was most appropriate.⁵⁰ Words signify purely, with none of the dissimulation or distraction of material images. Iconoclasts held that words were proper signifiers since they were capable of describing intellectually without the contamination and distraction of matter. At the iconoclastic council of 754, iconoclasts stated that "Christ" is a name that refers simultaneously to God and man; therefore, the name "Christ" is an "image" that contains reference to Christ as God and man with none of the futility and deception of the painters' craft.⁵¹

49. See Underwood, "The Evidence for Restorations," 240.

50. On this issue, see J.-M. Sansterre, "La parole, le texte et l'image selon les auteurs byzantins des époques iconoclastes et posticonoclastes," in Testo e immagine nell'alto medioevo, Settimane vol. 41, 2 vols. (Spoleto, 1994) I:197–243.

51. Mansi XIII:252A. See de' Maffei, Icona, pittore e arte, 26ff.

The names of angels are also images in this view in that they refer as pure signifiers to transcendence and incomprehensibility.

The angels' standards with the Trisagion illustrate—paradoxically—other important tenets of iconoclastic theology. The Trisagion is derived from the seraphim of Isaiah (6:3) and Revelation (4:8), and very early entered Christian piety and liturgy. In the context of Nicaea, it denotes the iconoclastic definition of the seemingly verbal and ethical character of worship that iconoclasts held to be the essential elements in devotion.⁵² Iconoclasts had stated that meditation on scripture and divine words contained therein, at Nicaea Psalm 97:7, was the most appropriate and purest approach to knowledge of divine things. The priests were the fitting custodians of such truths, and iconoclasts cited approvingly Malachi 2:7: "For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts."⁵³ The pastoral care of priests is emphasized here at Nicaea precisely in the public setting once decorated with figural images so denigrated by Severus. The communal aspect ought to be stressed here: the iconoclastic revisionists reveal themselves to be guardians of the "truth," that is, in this church they demonstrate their guidance, not just an intellectual ministering but an active, collective attendance. The danger of idolatry diminished considerably, and, their care therefore demonstrated, the iconoclastic clergy—presumably—at Nicaea also indicated the locus of their power and the source of their authority, the words of the gospels left untouched in the mosaic surface.

Finally, the program centered on a cross placed over earlier figural depiction. The cross has been interpreted as the iconoclastic sign par excellence, although it was not exclusive to the iconoclastic cause.⁵⁴

52. See M. V. Anastos, "The Ethical Theory of Images Formulated by the Iconoclasts in 754 and 815," DOP 8(1954):151–60.

53. See Mansi XIII:229E. On the issue of role of the ecclesiastical hierarchy in disseminating knowledge, see Sansterre, "La parole, le texte et l'image."

54. Bibliography and discussion found in L. Brubaker, "To Legitimize an Emperor: Constantine and Visual Authority in the Eighth and Ninth Centuries," in New Constantines. The Rhythm of Imperial Renewal in Byzantium, 4th–13th Centuries, Papers from the Twenty-sixth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, St. Andrews, March 1992, ed. P. Magdalino (Aldershot, 1994) 139–58.

The cross was a venerable sign of victory established by the unassailable precedent of Constantine the Great.⁵⁵ An epigram later quoted by the iconophile leader Theodore of Stoudios (759–826)⁵⁶ demonstrates both the political and devotional meanings of the cross for iconoclasts.⁵⁷ The epigram stated that the image (εἶδος) of Christ, voiceless, breathless and material has been taken down and replaced with the sign (τύπον) of the cross, thrice-blessed and glory of the faithful.

In this discussion of Nicaea, the opposition of image and sign on the bema arch and in the apse is of particular relevance. The illusionistic image of Christ, in an iconoclast's view, deceives through its attempts at describing a living, breathing being out of matter, and misleads the worshipper into adoring the image itself. The cross is an abstract sign, a true image, with no danger of devotional attachment that would lead to iconophile idolatry. The program in the church of the Dormition was altered in this way so that no risk existed of attachment to figured symbols—a paradoxical affinity that iconoclasts appear to have with the seminal theology of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (fl. ca. 500?). And, since no such abstract sign exists for angels, the inscriptions referring to angelic beings provided intellectual modes of comprehension and worship of bodiless beings.

At Nicaea, it is possible to see practice paralleling theory; the illusions of artists abhorred by iconoclasts were displaced in favor of purer signs, inscribed words. According to the iconoclastic definition of the real image, the image must be consubstantial with its prototype and this is clearly not possible for images of angels, given interpretations of their nature; only the eucharist can be a real image in

55. See A. Grabar, L'iconoclisme byzantin. Dossier archéologique (Paris, 1957) 134ff. and J. Moorhead, "Iconoclasm, the Cross, and the Imperial Image," B 55(1985):65–79.

56. Refutatio et subversio impiorum poematum, PG 99:437C.

57. See Grabar, L'iconoclisme byzantin, 130, and Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm during the Reign of Leo III, 113ff.: "The ruler does not tolerate that Christ be depicted [as] a voiceless shape and bereft of breath, with earthly matter, [which is] condemned by the Scriptures; Leo, with his son Constantine, marks the thrice-blessed image of the cross, the glory of the believers, upon the gates of the royal palaces" (trans. ibid., 114–15). The first portion of the epigram is examined briefly in G. Peers, "Breathless, Speechless Images: On the Chalke Gate Epigram," in Hommages Margaret Head Thomson, Cahiers des études anciennes, vol. 32, ed. L. Finnette and A. P. Booth (Trois Rivières, Québec, 1998) 109–12.

this view.⁵⁸ Approach and worship must be intellectual, spiritual and verbal. Symbolic interpretation of images of formless beings has no place in this theology, only direct contemplation and ethical worth. A coherent theology of angels' representations can, therefore, be derived from the fragments of iconoclasts and their forerunners, and the traces of iconoclastic "images" of angelic beings at Nicaea. This theology is literal in its attitude to symbolic manifestation: as Macarius Magnes described it, angelic epiphanies are intellectual and dissembling, and it behooves the good Christian to behave as Abraham and worship these revelations through scripture, inwardly in the soul, and not bow down before any image or creature.

58. Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Constantine V, 45ff.

Three

REPRESENTING ANGELS

Images and Theory

The practice of image worship excited opposition in certain quarters, and the theologians examined in the previous chapter were reacting to existing images that they could not reconcile with their beliefs about worship and contemplation. The preceding chapter described a process of gaining knowledge of God and things divine that had great importance for the formation of the intellectual and theological climate in the period leading up to and including Iconoclasm. This process, recounted here in terms of its relation to one kind of image, namely of angels, depended primarily on intellectual, non-material avenues to spiritual truths; it is essentially non-figural.¹ The influential theologian Evagrius Ponticus (ca. 345–399) was convinced that the mind's impulse to representation was a hindrance to proper devotion. In the opinion of Evagrius—and iconoclasts who belonged to the same theological tradition—material images were insurmountable hurdles to contemplation of divinity.²

1. Contrary to Cameron's contention in "The Language of Images," 28, not all Christian discourse was figural. The preceding chapter sought to demonstrate the slippery character of angels' appearances and nature, and the resistance this excited among certain theologians with regard to figuring angels intellectually and materially.

2. See E. A. Clark, The Origenist Controversy. The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate (Princeton, 1992) 80ff.

Yet many Christians clearly accepted figured, material signs for contemplation and worship. This acceptance represents a mode of approach completely separate from the literalist, intellectual conception described in chapter 2. Moreover, it finds no defender of the magnitude of Epiphanius and, indeed, texts defending images of angels date only to the sixth century, after the death of Severus of Antioch. The development of attitudes to images of angels, then, would appear to conform to a pattern of practice first, followed by opposition and defense.³ However, Methodius of Olympus (d. ca. 311) described images of angels as positive testimony of honor and faith in God.⁴ The pattern of practice, opposition and defense is perhaps too generalized, then, to be allowed to characterize the period of the rise of icons. Nonetheless, this chapter seeks to outline the defense in examining texts concerning images of angels, beginning in the sixth century and concluding with a longer examination of the articulate and extensive justification of images of eighth- and ninth-century iconophiles.

APPROACHES TO SYMBOLIC IMAGES

The most influential theologian for the defense of symbolic images is Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (fl. ca. 500?). Despite the fact that these writings deal with verbal images and the comprehension of divine things through these images, all subsequent discussion of symbolic images, both verbal and visual, relied on his seminal theology.⁵ Pseudo-Dionysius explored the diverse scriptural passages that mentioned angelic epiphanies for pattern, unity and meaning, and, in his Celestial Hierarchy, he offered a comprehensive examination of God's spiritual creations within a highly structured and essentially allegorical framework. His work helped articulate approaches to material

3. The classic formulation of this point of view is E. Kitzinger, "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm," DOP 8(1954):83–150.

4. See chapter 1.

5. See the Introduction, and Cameron, "The Language of Images," 24ff., and also her, "Byzantium and the Past in the Seventh Century: The Search for Redefinition," in The Seventh Century. Change and Continuity. Proceedings of a joint French and British Colloquium held at the Warburg Institute 8–9 July 1988, ed. J. Fontaine and J.N. Hillgarth (London, 1992) 268.

images found in the epigrams examined in this chapter, and it provided a framework within which iconophile theologians could rationalize non-representational, symbolic images of angels.

Pseudo-Dionysius stated that the angels are represented in scripture as a “concession to the nature of our own mind.”⁶ He was not speaking of images, but supporters of images understood a clear link between verbal and visual symbolism.⁷ Discussion of both verbal and visual symbolism concerns the negotiation of the means by which a Christian can come to a comprehension of God. Pseudo-Dionysius discussed one such means at great length, that is the symbolic significance of the angels and their appearances. In describing the meaning of Ezekiel’s angel which appeared in the form of four animals, for instance, Pseudo-Dionysius wrote an excursus on the meaning of their appearances as these varied beasts.⁸ The celestial intelligences took these forms, he says, because they intended to communicate obliquely some knowledge of their nature and duty. The angel took the form of a lion, for instance, to express domination, strength and unconquerability; the angel is represented as an ox because it had the “ability to plough deeply the furrows of knowledge”; the form of an eagle was assumed because of the angel’s “contemplation which is freely, directly, and unswervingly turned” to the divine light; and the form of the horse was taken on because of its “obedience and docility” which corresponds to the character of the angels.⁹ By this means, the angels imitate, as much as they are able, the secret of the ineffable divinity, and envelop themselves mysteriously so as to yield divine illumination.

6. De coelesti hierarchia, II.1, La Hiérarchie Céleste, SC vol. 58, ed. G. Heil and M. de Gandillac (Paris, 1958) 74; Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, The Complete Works, trans. C. Luibheid and P. Rorem (New York, 1987) 148. This contemplation of condescending symbols is also discussed in a question and answer guide from the second half of the sixth century; see J.-C. Guy, “Un Entretien monastique sur la contemplation,” Recherches des sciences religieuses 50(1962):234–35, 238–39.

7. See, for example, Kitzinger, “The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm,” 137ff., and U. Jeck, “Ps. Dionysios Areopagites und der Bilderstreit in Byzanz: Überlegungen zur Dionysiosrezeption des Johannes von Damaskos,” Hermeneia. Zeitschrift für ostkirchliche Kunst 8 / 2(1992):71–80.

8. De coel. hier., XV.8, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 184–88.

9. De coel. hier., XV.8, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 185–87.

According to Pseudo-Dionysius, symbols offer the primary access to God, as they are condescendences that render God accessible to incarnate intelligences. The angels then take on forms, figures and schemata that can fall to our senses and be more readily grasped and interpreted.¹⁰

That one has reason to attribute figures to that which is without figure, and forms to that which has no form ... is not sufficient. ... They require some appropriate elevations and that which has some affinity with our nature, so that consequently we are capable of gaining ourselves the figurations, which are accessible for us. ... But it must be said also that the thing which is hidden under unrevealable and sacred enigmas is suited most perfectly to the mysterious words, and to rendering inaccessible to most people, the holy and secret truth of the otherworldly spirits. For all persons are not saints, and, as scripture informs us, not all have knowledge (I Cor. 8:7).¹¹

The symbols provided by the celestial intelligences have, therefore, an educative role for those seeking greater knowledge of God. This process of contemplation is a simultaneous act of resistance to a complacency attached to matter, and it also involves a full engagement with the symbol itself, rather than a literal interpretation of the symbol.¹² By resistance to complacency, Pseudo-Dionysius meant that one must disengage the sensible images from all signification that is base or vulgar or simply natural which could alter or obscure the divine revelation borne by the images.¹³ The correct play of the

10. See R. Roques, "Introduction," in La Hiérarchie Céleste, xxi ff.

11. De coel. hier., II.2, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 76–77.

12. Roques, "Introduction," xxi; A. Louth, Denys the Areopagite (Wilton, Conn., 1989) 46.

13. And see J. Derrida, "How to Avoid Speaking: Denials," in Languages of the Unsayable. The Play of Negativity in Literature and Literary Theory, ed. S. Budick and W. Iser, trans. K. Friedan (New York, 1989) 44: "A predicate can always conceal another predicate, or rather the nakedness of an absence of predicate—as the (sometimes indispensable) veil of a garment can at once dissimulate and reveal the very fact that it dissimulates and renders attractive at the same time. Hence the voice of an utterance can conceal another, which it then appears to quote without quoting it, presenting itself as another form, namely as a quotation of the other."

symbolism demands that the intelligence adhere openly and exclusively to the intelligible richness of the sensible images. This operation requires an effort of lucidity that discerns the true intelligible value of the image.¹⁴

The exigencies of catharsis and anagogy make humanity prefer the dissembling symbols to symbols that resemble.¹⁵ For the latter places humanity in danger of becoming attached to these things and therefore misled. With dissembling symbols, the effort of anagogy is almost inevitable and so there is no seduction or bonding. With these dissembling symbols of the angelic beings the means of interpretation is a prudent but difficult, and necessarily provisional, act of anagogy.

Every being, every element and every sensible quality can serve as a point of departure to intelligible contemplation and reveal some character of the celestial essences. The anthropomorphism of the angels is, properly speaking, a symbolic dissimulation. The angels take human form for symbolic reasons, that is, on account of humanity's powers of intellect.

But [the angels] are described in human form on account of [human] intelligence, and they have powers of sight directed upwards, and because [humans] have the upright . . . form, and the ability to lead and command according to nature, [because humans live] the least according to sensation as opposed to the other powers that lead illogical lives, and [human nature] masters all of it by the strength of its spirit, and by the dominance of the logical knowledge, and according to the free and unfettered nature of [the human] soul.¹⁶

Each symbol, then, is accessible by an act of exegesis and imparts an amount of intelligible information according to the worth and effort of the person contemplating.¹⁷ The value and the level of the symbol

14. Roques, "Introduction," xxii.

15. De coel. hier., II, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 73–87.

16. De coel. hier., XV.3, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 171–73.

17. De coel. hier., XV, La Hiérarchie Céleste, 163–91.

are bound to the value and the level of the intelligence that uses it. Symbols are, therefore, essentially “cursive” and “mobile,” varying according to the order and receptivity of the intelligence.¹⁸ Pseudo-Dionysius’s position is based on an openness to symbolic interpretation; indeed, his theology demands it.

The ultimate goal of this process of symbolic interpretation is the empty and obscure site of incomprehension, “the brilliant darkness of a hidden silence,” “the truly mysterious darkness of unknowing.”¹⁹ The goal of Pseudo-Dionysius’s negative theology has striking parallels with Evagrius’s desired state of “apatheia” (ἀπάθεια).²⁰ Evagrius stated that the proper preparation for true contemplation of God and things divine was a humble emptying of the mind of all emotion and thought, especially of the figural kind.²¹ Pure prayer and contemplation can thus be accomplished in theory but only after all contaminating sensual “images” have been vanquished. For Pseudo-Dionysius, prayer too is necessary, as “a passage, a transfer, a translation.”²² Silent contemplation of scriptural signs, “secret manifestations” of God, is the route to knowledge of transcendent reality.

The two processes of Evagrius and Pseudo-Dionysius share similar goals in silent, empty contemplation of God, but Evagrius’s absolute

18. Roques, “Introduction,” xc.

19. Respectively, De divinis nominibus, XIII.1, PG 3:977B, The Complete Works, trans. C. Luibheid and P. Rorem, 135; and De mystica theologia, I.3, PG 3:1001A, The Complete Works, trans. C. Luibheid and P. Rorem, 137. And see, in general, on the negative theology of Pseudo-Dionysius, R. Mortley, From Word to Silence. Vol. II. The Way of Negation, Christian and Greek, Theophaneia, vol. 31 (Bonn, 1986) 229ff.

20. It might be said that Maximus Confessor (ca. 580–662) was a natural heir to both of these Church Fathers, indicating that the two systems of thought were reconcilable. Maximus was largely responsible for the dissemination of Areopagite theology in the east; see J. Pelikan, “Introduction,” in Maximus Confessor, Selected Writings (New York, 1985) 6. And in his description of the spiritual life and of pure prayer, Maximus clearly owed a debt to Evagrius; see M. Viller, “Aux sources de la spiritualité de S. Maxime: les oeuvres d’Evagre le Pontique,” Revue d’ascétique et de mystique 11(1930):156–84, 239–68, 331–36.

21. See Clark, The Origenist Controversy, 83ff.

22. See, for example, De div. nom., III.1, PG 3:680D. Quote in text from Derrida, “How to Avoid Speaking,” 41, and further: “Here prayer is not a preamble, an accessory mode of access. It constitutes an essential moment, it adjusts discursive asceticism, the passage through the desert of discourse, the apparent referential vacuity which will only avoid empty deliria and prattling by addressing itself from the start to the other, to you. But to you as ‘hyperessential and more than divine Trinity.’”

eschewing of signs and images as the steps to this goal is the point of departure from Pseudo-Dionysius's process of meditation on unknowable things. Pseudo-Dionysius marks a distinct path, therefore, in his simultaneous process of engagement with a symbol and denial of its literal worth. The path he described was widely influential in the sixth century and beyond. Indeed, the operations he describes influenced much of the theology developed in subsequent centuries, and later iconophile theories of devotion before material images clearly relied on Pseudo-Dionysius's description of approaches to divine things. Moreover, the influence of Pseudo-Dionysius was not restricted to abstract theological speculation; traces of his theology can also be discerned in actual practice as gleaned from a set of sixth-century epigrams.

Written about images of the Archangel Michael, these epigrams illustrate in a concrete way perceptions of images in the period immediately following Pseudo-Dionysius. They reveal a thematic thread linking Pseudo-Dionysius's theology concerning symbolic approaches to images of angels and perceptions of tangible material images. The theology and more popular understanding represented by these epigrams occupy the same conceptual ground: that an image makes material in a dissembling way an immaterial being for contemplative rather than descriptive purposes. This group of epigrams, therefore, parallels positions described in abstruse terms by iconophile theologians, and taken as a whole these different texts show a mode of gaining knowledge through images common to both theory and practice.

This small group of epigrams was composed as part of a larger anthology, gathered during the reign of Justin II, perhaps around 568, by Agathias (ca. 532–ca. 580).²³ Based on the antique model of the

23. See Alan Cameron, The Greek Anthology from Meleager to Planudes (Oxford, 1993) 16. However, R. C. McCail thought that this group of epigrams on images of angels originated outside of the cycle proper; see his "The Cycle of Agathias: New Identifications Scrutinised," Journal of Hellenic Studies 89(1969):92ff. Furthermore, McCail dates the epigrams from a period ranging from 555 to 570, against Cameron who sees them as a coherent and contemporary group. See R. C. McCail, "On the Early Career of Agathias Scholasticus," REB 28(1970):142.

Garland written by Meleager (fl. ca. 60 B.C.E.), the epigrams were apparently written by a group of educated men on set topics and in similar styles. The collection is extant only because of a compilation made in about 900 by Constantine Cephalas. Its survival is of great importance as this cycle of epigrams provides remarkable evidence of attitudes to images of angels from the period preceding Iconoclasm.

In the first place, an image of the Archangel may be intended as a thank-offering for past benefit and as a request for future aid. Agathias wrote this epigram for an image of the Archangel at the Sosthenium near Constantinople:

Aemilianus of Caria and John with him, Rufinus of Alexandria and Agathias of Asia having completed the fourth year of their legal studies, O Archangel, dedicated to thee, O Blessed One, thy painted image, praying that their future may be happy. Make thyself manifest in the direction of their hopes.²⁴

The question of materiality is raised in this epigram to the extent that the Archangel's benign presence is beseeched through the lawyers' gift of depiction. The aim of materiality, the devotional goal of this epigram, is expressed more forcefully and more paradoxically in another epigram in the group. An epigram by Agathias on another image of the Archangel also expresses gratitude for the Archangel's intervention and protection but raises important issues of perception and depiction not brought up in the Sosthenium epigram:

24. The Greek Anthology, ed. W.R. Paton, 5 vols. (London, 1927) I:35. And see Averil Cameron, Agathias (Oxford, 1970) 5. Robin Cormack has discussed this epigram in connection with a newly discovered fresco from the theatre at Aphrodisias that he dates to the sixth century; see his "The Wall Painting of St. Michael in the Theatre," in Aphrodisias Papers 2. The Theatre, a Sculptor's Workshop, Philosophers, and Coin Types, ed. R. R. R. Smith and K. T. Erim (Ann Arbor, 1991) 115. And T. F. Mathews used this epigram to describe the creation of an "interior imprint" of a spiritual reality in the Byzantine viewer; however, he neglects the symbolic quality of likenesses of angels in favor of visual engagement and involvement. See his "Psychological Dimensions in the Art of Eastern Christendom," in Art and Religion: Faith, Form and Reform, 1984 Paine Lectures in Religion, ed. O. Overby (Columbia, Mo., 1986) 12ff.

“On a picture of Theodorus the Illustrious and twice Proconsul, in which he is shown receiving the insignia of office from the Archangel in Ephesus”: Forgive us, O Archangel, for picturing thee, for thy face is invisible; this is but an offering of men. For by thy grace Theodorus hath his girdle of a Magister, and twice won for his prize the Proconsular chair. The picture testifies to his gratitude, for in return he expressed the image of thy beauty.²⁵

The difficulty inherent in depicting the Archangel, and the referential quality that necessarily results in such depictions, is significant. Although the Archangel is by nature invisible, and in this way unperceivable, the image is made according to the means available to humanity. For this reason, the image is conditional and incomplete, but the image’s provisional quality, which the epigram states, is the crucial issue. The donor apologizes for the presumption of manufacturing an undepictable subject, since the image is only an approximation, but the image was made because the Archangel has made himself manifest, in some fashion, on the donor’s behalf. Commemorating the Archangel’s invisible guidance and protection, the image was clearly an emblem of angelic aid. The iconography of the Archangel—which one may safely assume was of the winged youth as celestial minister—is a sign for this watchful and benevolent presence.

The epigrams’ significant operation is the spiritual or intellectual contemplation that the material image initiates.²⁶ Agathias’s epigram

25. The Greek Anthology, I:36. See also P. Speck, “Ein Bild des Erzengels Michael in Ephesos (Anthologia Palatina I,36),” Varia II, ΗΙΟΙΚΙΑ ΒΥΖΑΝΤΙΝΑ, vol. 6 (Bonn, 1987) 355–62; and also Alan Cameron, The Greek Anthology, 72ff. and 152ff.

26. R.C. McCail, “The Erotic and Ascetic Poetry of Agathias Scholasticus,” B 41(1971):246, rightly questions Kitzinger’s view of the process of comprehension that Agathias describes. For Kitzinger, the viewer looks at the image “as if” the figure represented were there. See “The Cult of Images Before Iconoclasm,” 147–1268. Clearly, however, Agathias’s intellectual approach uses the image as a bridge over which one travels for knowledge and communication, not as an embodiment of the model. McCail also points out that Agathias’s formulation of the passage of honor from image to prototype relies on sound patristic foundations, like the statement of Basil of Caesarea (ca. 329–379), “ἡ τῆς εἰκόνας τιμὴ ἐπὶ τὸ πρωτότυπον διαβαίνει” (De Spiritu Sancto, XVIII, Traité du Saint-Esprit, SC vol. 17 bis, ed. B. Pruche [Paris, 1968] 406).

is significant in this regard since the image is explicitly said to incite the mind to a “higher contemplation” by means of the image’s colors.²⁷ Agathias’s description of approach is paralleled by a contemporary epigram of Nilus Scholasticus. Nilus is equally aware of the difficulties involved in the capturing of a likeness and notes the “daring” quality of representation: “‘On an image of the Archangel’: How daring it is to picture the incorporeal! But yet the image leads us up to spiritual recollection of celestial beings.”²⁸ The process by which the mind is ferried to higher contemplation is stated succinctly in this epigram. The image, Nilus and Agathias both assert, is not a representation of the form of the Archangel in any essential way, but only an approximation of the formless Archangel. But by this representation of an unviewable being the image allows the viewer to reflect on the being itself. In fact, the image maintains a tentative, intellectual proximity of the ineffable being, otherwise unknowable and unapproachable. The image gives Agathias’s “confused veneration” a focus and an object. The material image provides, therefore, a paradoxical ability to conduct through the eyes a lucid contemplation of the unviewable, incomprehensible Archangel.

These epigrams ought to be seen, moreover, in the context of the increasing number of formulations of art’s role in worship in the course of the sixth century. The anagogical function of images of angels as described in these epigrams parallels the function of images in Christian worship that Hypatius of Ephesus (d. ca. 541) describes in a letter written to Julian, bishop of Atramyntium.²⁹ In Hypatius’s view, images should be admitted, albeit grudgingly, into Christian worship because they are a means by which the weaker and less spiri-

27. The Greek Anthology, I:34. On this epigram, see chapter 2.

28. The Greek Anthology, I:33.

29. See P.J. Alexander, “Hypatius of Ephesus: A Note on Worship in the Sixth Century,” HTR 45(1952):177–84, and S. Gero, “Hypatius of Ephesus on the Cult of Images,” in Christianity, Judaism and Other Greco-Roman Cults. Studies for Morton Smith at Sixty, 4 vols. (Leiden, 1975) II:208–16; and G. Lange, Bild und Wort. Die katechetischen Funktionen des Bildes in der griechischen Theologie des sechsten bis neunten Jahrhunderts, Würzburg, 1969, 44ff. The text is found in F. Diekamp, Analecta patristica. Texte und Abhandlungen zur griechischen Patristik, Orientalia christiana analecta, vol. 117 (Rome, 1938) 127ff., and in H. Thümmel, Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit, TU vol. 139 (Berlin, 1992) 320–21.

tually advanced in the community might come to some introductory knowledge of divine things. For this reason, Hypatius told his correspondent, he shuns material aids, but admits images into worship,

... because we permit each order of the faithful to be guided and led up to the divine being in a manner appropriate to it [the order] because we think that some people are guided even by these [gold, silver, etc.] towards the intelligible beauty and from the abundant light in the sanctuaries to the intelligible and immaterial light.³⁰

Hypatius also stated that the cherubim on the Ark of the Covenant were one example of God's providence condescending for the sake of the weaker members of his chosen people; in this way, God gave material guidance to know him better.³¹ The anagogical function of images as described in this letter bears striking similarities to the epigrams discussed above, and also in a general way to the neo-Platonism of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite.³² These texts describe the spiritual elevation to divinity that signs, material and verbal, can provide for Christians. Yet Hypatius clearly saw a dichotomy between more advanced spirituality and the less perfect that depends upon these material signs, which Pseudo-Dionysius does not distinguish.

Evidently, sixth-century ecclesiastics and laymen alike, taking Hypatius and Agathias as examples, were grappling with the function and meaning of images in Christian worship. Hypatius was clearly

30. Diekamp, Analecta patristica, 128.26–30; trans. Alexander, "Hypatius of Ephesus," 180.

31. Alexander, "Hypatius of Ephesus," 179–80. The example of the cherubim presages the iconophile emphasis on God's prescription for the construction of the Ark and the cherubim; see below.

32. Kitzinger thought the theology of Pseudo-Dionysius an important factor in the formulation of image theory such as Hypatius expounded in this letter to Julian. See "The Cult of Images Before Iconoclasm," 137–38. Jean Gouillard, "Hypatios d'Éphèse ou du Pseudo-Denys à Théodore Studite," REB 19(1961):72ff., was also struck by the coincidence in thought regarding symbolism and ascent to higher mysteries in both Hypatius and Pseudo-Dionysius. However, Gero sees only a general knowledge of platonic concepts in Hypatius, and concluded that Hypatius was drawing from the same well without direct dependence on Pseudo-Dionysius. See "Hypatius of Ephesus on the Cult of Images," 211–12.

ambivalent on the ultimate value of images but open-minded and willing to admit the usefulness of images in Christian pedagogy. Slightly later, Agathias is quite certain of the purpose of images in the elevation of the Christian mind toward divine things. The use of images as a means by which the worshipper remembers and venerates the person depicted is also a theme of the anti-Jewish literature of the seventh century, and it becomes a standard response to accusations of idolatry from non-Christians and iconoclasts alike. Pseudo-Athanasius, for instance, wrote that Christians do not honor the icons themselves, “But we only show forth our soul’s condition (σχέσιν) and love toward the form seen on the icon.”³³ And in his Disputatio adversus Judaeos, Anastasius Sinaïtes (d. ca. 700) said that Christians honor and imitate Christ and the saints through a material image as the Jews honor the power of the word through a material book.³⁴

The epigrams of Agathias and Nilus take a similar position with regard to honor passing to the prototype. They also show in their emphasis on “higher contemplation” of incomprehensible angels certain affinities with philosophical ideas associated with pagan neo-Platonism. For example, the language used by Porphyry (ca. 232–ca. 303) to rationalize the worship of pagan statues in his treatise

33. Quaestiones ad Antiochum ducem, XXXIX, PG 28:621B–D. See also Leontius of Neapolis, preserved in the writings of John of Damascus, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. III Contra imaginum calumniatores orationes tres, PTS vol. 17, ed. P.B. Kotter (Berlin, 1975) 156–58; V. Déroche, “L’Apologie contre les Juifs de Léontios de Néapolis,” TM 12(1994):79ff.; On the Divine Images. Three Apologies Against Those Who Attack the Divine Images, trans. D. Anderson (Crestwood, N.Y., 1980) 41–42; Trophies of Damascus (Les Trophées de Damas), PO vol. 15/2, ed. G. Bardy [Paris, 1920; rp. Louvain, 1973] 78.11ff.); the Armenian John Mayragometsi (S. Der Nersessian, “Une apologie des images du septième siècle,” B 17[1944/5]:60; and the Dialogue between the Jews, Papiscus and Philo, and a Monk (Dialogue between a Christian and a Jew entitled ANTIBOLH ΠΑΠΙΣΚΟΤ ΚΑΙ ΦΙΛΩΝΟΤ ΙΟΥΔΑΙΩΝ ΠΡΟΣ ΜΟΝΑΧΟΝ ΤΙΝΑ, ed. A.C. McGiffert [Marburg, 1889] 51–52).

See Lange, Bild und Wort, 188ff., K.A. Corrigan, Visual Polemics in the Ninth-Century Byzantine Psalters (Cambridge, 1992) 40ff., and V. Déroche, “L’authenticité de l’Apologie contre les Juifs de Léontios de Néapolis,” Bulletin de correspondance hellénique 110(1986):661ff.

34. PG 89:1233C–6A. John Mayragometsi compares the ink used to write scripture and the pigments used to depict the saints. See Der Nersessian, “Une apologie des images du septième siècle,” 66–67.

“Concerning Idols” is closer to the epigrams’ conception of images of angels than the down-to-earth polemic of texts against Jews. Porphyry stated that pagan statues are simply wood and stone, but also images suited for human perception through which the learned are able to comprehend the deity.³⁵ This formulation of the use of images for gaining knowledge of transcendent beings is a clear forerunner of the philosophical defense of images of the sixth-century epigrams.³⁶ As he may well have been Macarius Magnes’s “opponent” in the Apocriticus, Porphyry’s views on symbolic images are directly relevant here. One can clearly discern in this pagan-Christian dialogue of the fourth century the beginnings of the later disagreement between neo-Platonic ideas of symbolic images and intellectual, non-material worship.³⁷ In fact, the differences between Porphyry and Macarius Magnes seen in that dialogue can be taken as emblematic

35. See J. Bidez, Vie de Porphyre. Le philosophe néoplatonicien (Gand and Leipzig, 1913; rp. Hildesheim and New York, 1980) 143ff., text 1*–23*, F. Börtzler, Porphyrius’ Schrift von den Götterbildern (Erlangen, 1908) and C. Clerc, Les théories relatives au culte des images chez les auteurs grecs du II^e siècle après J.-C. (Paris, 1915) 253ff. The text on pagan statues is preserved in the third book of Eusebius of Caesarea’s Praeparatio Evangelica, GCS vol. 43, 2d ed., ed. K. Mras (Berlin, 1975). The connection between pagan defense of statues and Christian defense of image worship was noted by A. Grabar, L’iconoclasm byzantin. Dossier archéologique (Paris, 1957) 138ff., and P.J. Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople. Ecclesiastical Policy and Image Worship in the Byzantine Empire (Oxford, 1958) 27ff.

36. See Lange, Bild und Wort, 182ff. Leslie Brubaker, “Icons Before Iconoclasm?” in Morfologie sociali e culturali in Europa fra tarda antichità e alto medioevo, Settimane vol. 45, 2 vols. (Spoleto, 1998) II:1226–27, 1231, argues for the increased importance of the transparent image in the mid-sixth century, but a case can surely be made for continuity of this idea in Late Antiquity.

37. A. Harnack, Kritik des Neues Testaments von einem griechischen Philosophen des 3. Jahrhunderts. Die in Apocriticus des Macarius Magnes enthaltene Streitschrift, TU vol. 37/3 (Leipzig, 1911); G. Bardy, in DTC IX:1459. Macarius’s opponent defended pagan statues in this way: “Since it is then acknowledged that the angels share in the divine nature, those that make proper reverence to the respected gods do not think that it is the god, the image that is fashioned out of wood or stone or bronze, nor if some portion of the image should be cut off, do they believe that a portion of God’s power is subtracted. It should be called to mind that the images and temples were constructed by the ancients, that on account of coming hither the believers were brought to remembrance of God, when they go there, and being purified generally and offering devotion and supplication, and for what things they desired they asked from the gods. For even if someone makes an image of a friend, certainly one does not think that his friend is in it nor does one think that a part of the body is enclosed in the sections of the representation, but honour for the friend is shown through the image” (Blondel 200.12–22).

as the conceptual differences generally separating the defenders and opponents of images of angels under discussion in this study. The writers of the epigrams were clearly influenced by neo-Platonic ideas on images in their emphasis on the ascent of the mind to a higher reality through matter; in particular, Pseudo-Dionysius provided these writers with a suitably Christian framework for these neo-Platonic concepts. While these writers of the sixth-century epigrams, as well as Hypatius of Ephesus, have real affinities with the anti-Jewish theologians of the seventh century, they used more rarefied and subtle descriptions of intellectual processes involved in viewing images derived from direct contact with neo-Platonist ideas.³⁸

Agathias's epigrams are also marked by an element of defensiveness that leads one to think that the place of images in worship and devotion was not resolved in every Christian's mind. Images had been perceived more and more as incontrovertible proofs and venerable recollections by some Christians,³⁹ but the opposition discussed in the previous chapter reveals that certain church officials resisted with equal force the use of images in worship.⁴⁰ In this context, Agathias was not alone in seeing the representation of angels as "daring." And in the sixth century, John of Gaza also wrote of the undaunted artists who strove to depict such bodiless beings. In his description of paintings in a bath house at Gaza, John describes the artists as "boiling with boldness" and "made drunk in mind" in delineating the

38. The relation between pagan apologetics, such as Porphyry's defense of images, and Byzantine image theory was described with great economy by N. H. Baynes, "Idolatry and the Early Church," in his Byzantine and Other Studies (London, 1955) 116–43.

39. For example, A. D. Kartsonis, in Anastasis. The Making of an Image (Princeton, 1986) 58–59, discusses Anastasius Sinaïtes's view that images are theological proofs that cannot be falsified. Also, Canon 82 of the Council of Trullo (692) stated a belief in the ability of art to express truths about the divinity and incarnation of Christ: "in order that the perfect should be set down before everybody's eyes even in painting, we decree that [the figure of] the Lamb, Christ our God, who removes the sins of the world, should henceforward be set up in human form on images also, in the place of the ancient lamb, inasmuch as we comprehend thereby the sublimity of the humiliation of God's Word, and are guided to the recollection of His life in flesh, His Passion and His salutary Death and the redemption which has thence accrued to the world." See Mansi XI:977BC; trans. C. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire. 312–1453. Sources and Documents (Toronto, 1986) 139–40.

40. See Kitzinger, "The Cult of Images in the Age Before Iconoclasm," 139, and McCail, "The Erotic and Ascetic Poetry of Agathias Scholasticus," 241ff.

heavenly powers, that is “to lend body to bodiless nature.”⁴¹ Clearly, in the minds of some Christians, representing angels existed as an issue that was propelled by material images on view and in devotion. The embodying of angelic powers, begun in Christian art as early as the second century, remained an issue into the sixth century and grew in importance as images became increasingly prominent in cult practice. The issue of how one came to knowledge of angelic beings persisted as an element in the debates over worship and images of the period preceding Iconoclasm, and drew particular attention when the debates reached a head in the mid-eighth century as iconophile theologians turned their attention to the theory and practice of devotion to images.

THE ICONOPHILE THEORY OF SYMBOLIC IMAGES OF ANGELS

Commentary on images of angels did not appear again until the eighth-/ninth-century iconophile defense arose in reaction to the iconoclastic attack on religious images. The elaborate defense of images arose as circumstances demanded, but the striking parallels between iconophile theology and the epigrams discussed above must be seen as a sign of continuity in basic approach to images of angels. In the debates over worship and symbolism that were central to the development of Byzantine theology in the sixth and seventh centuries, a consistent feature was an acceptance of images of angels as means, albeit partial, to a comprehension of God’s spiritual servants. Dependent on earlier writings, iconophile theology is the most comprehensive treatment of the significance of such images in worship, and because of its articulation and extensiveness this image theory needs detailed examination. Moreover, theory helps shed light on the meaning of the ninth-century restoration of the mosaics of the angelic powers in the Church of the Dormition at Nicaea (Iznik), and this chapter ends by examining these mosaics with regard to the exchange between word and image.

41. See P. Friedländer, Johannes von Gaza und Paulus Silentarius. Kunstbeschreibungen justinianischer Zeit (Leipzig and Berlin, 1912; rp. Hildesheim and New York, 1969) 135.12–136.25. Abstract theological concepts, like the Trinity, are also depicted in this program. According to John of Gaza, a cross within three concentric circles referred to the Trinity. See Friedländer, Johannes von Gaza und Paulus Silentarius, 137.41–138.44; and H. Maguire, Earth and Ocean. The Terrestrial World in Early Byzantine Art (University Park and London, 1987) 12–13, 20–21. This symbolic mode of depicting the Trinity parallels Philoxenus’s scruples concerning depiction of the Holy Spirit, as discussed in the previous chapter; see McCail, “The Erotic and Ascetic Poetry of Agathias Scholasticus,” 245, who speculated that the misgivings of Philoxenus of Mabbug, Severus of Antioch and John of Gaza concerning images of angels may have derived from the influence of the Christian university at Gaza.

That images could lead viewers from the visible to knowledge of the invisible, however incomplete, was a primary defense of images for iconophiles.⁴² The faculty of sight was a necessary element in iconophile justifications of images in worship, and, although the ultimate goal was to transcend the material assistance that images afforded, vision was defined as a fundamental means of facilitating knowledge. John of Damascus (ca. 675–ca. 750), for instance, was strongly in favor of the comprehension that comes through the faculty of sight: “Sensation is the strength of the soul returned from matter, and therefore discernment. Sensory moreover are the organs.... The first sense is sight.”⁴³ Hearing and the other faculties follow in descending order of importance. John of Damascus was the first great opponent of iconoclastic doctrine and for that was anathematized at the iconoclastic council of Hieria in 754. John of Damascus’s image theory was perhaps not as sophisticated as that of such later opponents of iconoclasm as Nicephorus (ca. 750–828), Theodore of Stoudios (759–826) and Photius (ca. 810–d. after 893), but almost all the arguments regarding angels found in these ninth-century theologians can be seen in some form in John of Damascus’s work. Through John of Damascus, the general reliance on the theology of Pseudo-Dionysius is evident in iconophile theory. As John and other iconophiles stated, images may serve as sensible symbols, as Pseudo-Dionysius put it, that lead the worshipper to comprehension of the divine, because of the particular qualities of the sense of the sight.

42. For instance, in the eighth-century Adversus Constantinum Caballinum, the process is set out in one passage in the form of a fictional dialogue between an iconophile and an iconoclast. In the dialogue, the iconophile rhetorically asks the iconoclast how he himself would teach a stranger all the mysteries of their faith. The iconophile protests that one cannot be led to the higher mysteries of the invisible things without some kind of material prop or demonstration, "For if you said to him, 'It is invisible,' what has he seen that he should put trust in your conscience and faith?" The first thing one must do is build on sensible things so that in this way, little by little, one is led to invisible things. The didactic function of the material image is clearly emphasized in this passage, since the education and conversion of the stranger is accomplished by means of the images themselves. See Adversus Constantinum Caballinum, X, PG 95:325C–8B, and also P. Speck, Ich bin's nicht, Kaiser Konstantin ist es gewesen. Die Legenden vom Einfluß des Teufels, des Juden und des Moslem auf den Ikonoklasmus, II OIKIA BYZANTINA, vol. 10 (Bonn, 1990) 402. The text begins this way: "You take him into the church. You reveal to him the world which surrounds him. You open up for him the forms of the figures of the holy icons. This unbeliever sees and he says, 'Who is this crucified? Who is this rising and who is trampling upon the head of this old man?' Do you not teach him from the icons, saying, 'This crucified man, he is the son of God, who was crucified for the sins of the world? This risen man, it is he who raises the forefather of the world, Adam, who fell because of disobedience, and he went into Hades, where he was held these many years kept in chains and by unbreakable bars in these nether regions?' And in this way do you lead this man in to the knowledge of God. Again, you lead him to the font of the baptistery. And he sees only water in the font, you the faithful one behold the water, and see light and spirit. When he has partaken of baptism, then he takes the truth from the senses, and applies them to the invisible ungenerated. If you offer the mystery of the body and blood of the Saviour, he sees bread and wine only. And you see the body and blood of Christ which flows from the undefiled source. And if he becomes worthy, he partakes with you." On this text, see also M.-F. Auzépy, "L'Adversus Constantinum Caballinum et Jean de Jérusalem," BS 56(1995):323–38.

43. Expositio fidei, II.18, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II Expositio fidei, PTS vol. 12, ed. P.B. Kotter (Berlin, 1973) 83–84. John of Damascus is typical, in this way, of iconophile stress on the importance of the sense of sight. For instance, the author of the Adversus Constantinum Caballinum, again, is explicit about the importance of sight and images for convincing the viewer of the truth and magnitude of doctrine; the means is again an engagement with an “iconic imprint,” but with real emotional compulsion. See VIII, PG 95:324C–5A. The Second Council of Nicaea in 787 was equally explicit about the role of the images and sight in spiritual development. The Fathers of the Council stated that the outlines and the representations of the apostles, martyrs, saints and holy persons are there “so we are led to remember, attend, and participate in their holiness.” See Mansi XIII:132E. Elsewhere it is stated that hearing of the appearance of the angel to the Virgin we call the event to mind, and yet “seeing the icon in this way we consider the consequences of the thing more manifestly.” See Mansi XIII:269C. And, finally, Nicephorus defended visual perception but in a more “scholastic” way, according to his method of discourse, “For we all know that sight is the most honoured and necessary of the senses and it may allow apprehension of what falls under perception more distinctly and sharply; for ‘it is the nature of that which is heard to travel less quickly than that which is seen,’ and seeing will attract faster than the other senses since it also has the attractive power to a larger degree.” See Refutatio et eversio, 119, Nicephori patriarchae constantinopolitani Refutatio et eversio definitionis synodalis anni 815, Corpus Christianorum. Series Graeca, vol. 33, ed. J. Featherstone (Louvain, 1997) 211.56–62, trans. Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, 211.

If iconophiles considered the anagogical and didactic function of images to be securely established, they needed to address other equally pressing iconoclastic accusations. In particular, Christological issues, which iconoclasts had already raised, became central for iconophiles;⁴⁴ and images of angels were used primarily as supports for the iconophile position on representing Christ. If this central Christological issue was the reason for the introduction of angels into these arguments, defense of images of angels soon diverged from the Christological path into new territory. It will become clear in the course of this chapter that this divergence occurred because of Christ's earthly life which the angels could not share.

In John of Damascus's theology, which typifies iconophile writing, Christ's life incarnate is the primary justification for representation. In turn, the incarnation had renewed a bond between God and humanity and initiated a new dispensation that images of Christ assert. The angels were brought into these arguments because they too appeared on earth and were apprehended in time and place. Description of the means by which their formless and immaterial nature was apprehended is the point at which justification of their images parts from the defense of Christ's images.

Important for the defense of Christ's representability was the definition of circumscription. The opponents of images had equated circumscription and painting so that the two were inseparable. This equation effectively ruled out the possibility of making images of Christ since the making of an image would presume that an essential aspect of the subject had been captured. And for God who is ineffable, capturing any part of his essence on an image is clearly impossible: God is simply uncircumscribable. From the beginning, then, the iconophile counterattack was centered on the definition of circumscription as distinct from painting, and circumscription, therefore, became a primary support in iconophile theory for the ability to represent spiritual beings.

44. Christology was central for western image theory, too, although anagogy was not a prescribed method of viewing. See H. L. Kessler, "Real Absence: Early Medieval Art and the Metamorphosis of Vision," in Morfologie sociali e culturali in Europa fra tarda antichità e alto medioevo, Settimane vol. 45, 2 vols. (Spoleto, 1998) II:1157–1213.

John of Damascus first discussed circumscription as a chief defense for the representations of Christ.⁴⁵ Angels were invoked and discussed in this connection in order to support the Christological argument for images. Angels substantiated the depiction of Christ because they are intellectual and bodiless, but apprehended in time and space, and thus circumscribable. Despite their nature, therefore, they can be depicted. John of Damascus wrote:

They are circumscribable. For when they are in heaven they are not on earth; and when they are sent to earth by God, they do not remain in heaven. They are not bound by walls or doors or keys or seals. For they are unbounded. I say that they are invisible; for not as they are do they appear to the worthy to whom God desires that they appear, but they see [the angels] altered, just as they are able to perceive. For only [God] is truly unbounded, only he is uncreated. For all creation is made finite by being created by God.⁴⁶

However, angels have particular problems attendant upon their nature since they have no visible form and change according to the situation:

God created them in his own image, of nature bodiless, wind, as it were, or immaterial fire, as the divine David said, “[God] who

45. Orationes de imaginibus tres, II.5, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos, III, 71–72; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 52–53: “If we attempted to make an image of the invisible God, this would be sinful indeed. It is impossible to portray one who is without body: invisible, uncircumscribed, and without form. Again if we made images of humans and believed them to be gods, and adored them as if they were so, we would be truly impious. We do neither of these things. But we are not mistaken if we make the image of God incarnate, who was seen on earth in the flesh, associated with humanity, and in his unspeakable goodness assumed the nature, feeling, form, and colour of our flesh. For we yearn to see how he looked, as the apostle says, ‘Now we see through a glass darkly’ (I Cor. 13:12). Now the icon is also a dark glass, fashioned according to the limitations of our physical nature.”

46. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos, II, 45. And also, “Physical things which have shape, bodies which are circumscribed, and have colour, are suitable subjects for image-making. Nevertheless, even if nothing physical or fleshly may be attributed to an angel, or a soul, or a demon, it is still possible to depict and circumscribe them according to their nature. For they are intellectual beings, and are believed to be present invisibly and to operate spiritually” (De imag. or., III.24, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos, III, 130–31; On the Divine Images, trans. Anderson, 78).

maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire" (Ps. 104:4). [And he made them] ethereal, and ardent, and fervent, and incisive, and penetrating, according to the divine will, calling them servants, and ascendent, and free from all knowledge of material things.⁴⁷

According to John of Damascus, the angels are intellects, ceaselessly moving, who are in places which are intelligible. But their nature is such that they cannot be circumscribed corporeally, he said, as they are not formed corporeally by nature, nor are they three dimensional. Rather, they appear and perform intellectually where they are commanded to be by God, and nowhere else.⁴⁸ Unlike Christ they have no stable, earthly form, and yet, since they are still within the boundaries of John of Damascus's definition of circumscription, they may be depicted. John of Damascus's definition depends largely on the ability of the angels to occupy place, that is, to be corporeal enough to have limit and circumference:

And the angel while he is contained in a place somatically, has form and outline. It is said that he is in a place, because he is present intellectually and operates according to his nature, and is not elsewhere, but is circumscribed in that way intellectually, there in that place where he operates. For it is not possible according to this for him to operate in different places. Only God can operate everywhere at once. And the angel, quick by nature, and traveling speedily and readily, operates in different places. God being ubiquitous and over everything, by this operates differently by a single, simple operation.⁴⁹

It is characteristic of angelology, and iconophiles were no exception, that the distinction between God and his messengers must be maintained, as well as the discrimination of the nature of humanity and of the angels.

47. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II, 45.

48. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II, 47.

49. Exp. fid., I.13, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II, 38.

Therefore the angel is an intellectual being in perpetual motion, of free will, bodiless, serving God, having received an immortal nature according to grace, of which nature the form and definition is known only to the Creator. It is said that an angel is bodiless and immaterial but only in relation to us. For everything measured against God, who alone is incomparable, is found base and material. God alone is naturally immaterial and bodiless.⁵⁰

Because they share some spiritual characteristics with the divine nature, however, angels were useful parallels for the entry of Christ into the world. This parallel supported the iconophile contention that divinity can be represented because it had appeared on earth. Angels occupy the middle area—as a kind of third body—in nature somewhere between God and humanity, but with a nature not fully determinable. If beings as immaterial and unparticipating as the angels can be circumscribed and depicted, then Christ incarnate should surely be circumscribed as human, and depicted as such.

The notion of circumscribability of the angels was derived from a context not properly concerned with iconophile theology nor properly speaking with Christology, but rather with the problematic nature and role of the angels.⁵¹ John of Damascus's innovation was to

50. Exp. fid., II.3, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos. II, 45.

51. For instance, Gennadius of Marseilles, who died between 492 and 505, wrote that all creatures are to some extent corporeal, even the intellectual creatures of God. The proof of this is that all these creatures can be circumscribed in place, just as the soul which is enclosed in flesh and the demons who are in nature similar to the angels. Only God however is truly incorporeal and invisible by nature. God is rightly thought to be incorporeal because he is everywhere and infuses all creation with his presence (De ecclesiasticis dogmatibus, XI, PL 58:984A).

